[1490] By a vast army which did not leave them even a fugitive,
And (did he not) punish them with burning punishment?

Mulʿ is in the mountains of Khūṭ,[128] where Mulʿī girdles are made.

In this year, Asad moved those of the soldiers who were living at al-Barūqān to Balkh, giving each one who had a dwelling at al-Barūqān a (new) dwelling equivalent to his former one. To each who did not have one, he assigned a dwelling as well. He intended 125. The same as Ghūr.

126. Possibly an epithet for Asad as a lion, which is the meaning of his name.
127. The Kalb are a prominent Syrian tribe representing the Yaman; the Kilāb are a Syrian Qaysī tribe. Thus Asad's achievements cannot be belittled by Syrians of either tribal party. *EI*², s.v. Kalb b. Wabara, Kilāb b. Rabīʿa.
128. Mountains near Balkh, hence precisely in Ghūr where the expedition took place. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 406.

to settle them according to their akhmās,[129] but he was warned that tribal quarrels would break out; therefore, he mixed them. To build the city of Balkh, he requisitioned a quota of workmen from each district according to the amount of its tax. He entrusted the construction of the city of Balkh to Barmak, the father of Khālid b. Barmak.[130] Al-Barūqān was the residence of the governors. Between al-Barūqān and Balkh are two *farsakh*s, and between the city and Nawbahār[131] about two *ghalwah*s.[132] Abū al-Barīd said about Asad's building the city of Balkh:

There has busied your heart—and passion is making you love—
A white gazelle affectionate toward her calf at Ḥawmal.
She grazes on the first fruits of the thorn bush, her sides hanging loosely,
A watered place to which no tame thing goes at night,
By the places where animals come in a winding gully, to which are inclined Cows which sway, their flanks adorning them.
In the blessed one that you have fortified,
The weak is protected and the fearful settles down. [1491]
Therefore, I see (for) you in it what any good man has seen:
A triumph, while the doors of heaven are pouring.[133]
There has come to you the name by which the insightful
Is satisfied with you, because of what you, the kind one, has intended.
O best ruler to (ever) direct the affairs of subjects,
I most certainly swear to the truth of my oath.
God has made it[134] safe by your work after Earthshaking events have been the terror of hearts.

---

129. Sing. khums, lit. "fifth." The larger political- military groupings of the Arab tribes in al-Baṣrah and Khurāsān. They are the Ahl al-'Āliyah, the Tamīm, the Bakr, the 'Abd al-Qays, and the Azd. The Ahl al-Kūfah had by this time become a sixth khums in Khurāsān. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1290–1; 'Alī, Tanẓīmāt, 41–3.

130. This Barmak was the keeper of the Buddhist shrine of Nawbahār at Balkh. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Barāmika.

131. The Buddhist shrine near Balkh. See note 130.

132. A measure equaling one-twenty-fourth of a farsakh. Ibn Rustah, A'lāq, 22.

133. Rain is seen as a blessing.

134. That is, Balkh.

Pilgrimage and Governors

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Hishām led the pilgrimage.

This is what I heard from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar. Al-Wāqidī, Hishām,[135] and others said likewise.

The governors of the major provinces in this year were the same as those whom we mentioned before in the year 106.

135. Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sāʾib b. Bishr al-Kalbī, died 204(819) or 206(821), famous historian, genealogist, etc. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 108; Sezgin, GAS, I, 268–71.

The Events of the Year 108

(MAY 8, 726—APRIL 27, 727)

In it, the campaign of Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik occurred. He reached Qaysariyyah,[136] the Byzantine city near al-Jazīrah[137] and conquered it.

Also in it, Ibrāhīm b. Hishām campaigned and captured one of the Byzantine strongholds. [1492]

In it, Bukayr b. Māhān sent a group which included ʿAmmār al-ʿUbādī to Khurāsān. But a man denounced them to Asad b. ʿAbdallāh, who captured ʿAmmār and cut off his hands and legs, although his companions escaped. Coming to Bukayr b. Māhān, they gave him the news. He wrote about that to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, who wrote in reply to the letter, "Praise be to God Who has shown your mission to be true and has rescued your party."

In it, a fire occured at Dābiq.[138]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfi[139] —his 136. Caesarea Mazaca, capital of ancient Cappadocia, now Kayseri in central Turkey. See EI^{2}, s.v. Kaysariyya; Theophanes, Chronicle, 96.

137. The area of Mesopotamia northwest of Baghdad, now in Iraq, northeast Syria, and southern Turkey. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Djazīra.

138. A town about 15 mi. from Aleppo near Aʿzāz, used as a mobilization point by the Banū Marwān for their summer campaigns against Byzantium. See EI^{2}, s.v. Dābiḳ.

139. The mawlā of the Banū ʿAdī of Quraysh, died 154/771, he was active as a father:[140] The grazing land burned, even the animals and men burned.

Campaign of Asad in al-Khuttal

In it, Asad b. 'Abdallāh campaigned in al-Khuttal.[141]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: The Khāqān came against Asad when the latter had [already] gone back to al-Quwādhiyān[142] and recrossed the Oxus, so that there was no fighting between them in that campaign.

According to Abū 'Ubaydah:[143] Rather, they defeated Asad and put him to shame, so that young boys sang:

You have come form Khuttalān.[144]
With a spoiled face you have come.

Al-Sabal[145] was fighting against him and brought in the Khāqān. Asad had pretended that he would winter in Surkh Darah.[146] Then Asad ordered the troops to depart and sent forth his standards, [1493] going in one dark night to Surkh Darah. His men shouted, "God is the Greatest." Asad asked, "What's the matter with the men?" He was told, "This is their sign when they are going home." He then said to 'Urwah the herald, "Announce that the amīr is heading for Ghūrīn." Thus he went on his way, and the Khāqān came when they had [already] gone off to Ghūrīn, Asad having recrossed the Oxus, so that neither he nor they met. Asad returned to Balkh. The poet said about that in praise of Asad: transmitter in al-Madīnah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 53–4.

---

140. The mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, a very famous Medinese jurist, he died between 117(735) and 120(738). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 412–4.

141. Mountainous region centered south of the present Kulyab in Tajikistan. In the early eighth century A.D. it was an autonomous principality tributary to the Islamic empire. EI^{2}, s.v. Khuttalān.

142. Text: al-Quwādiyān; read al-Quwādhiyān, as Ms. O. The district to the east of Saghāniyān and northeast of al-Tirmidh, modern Termez, in Tajikistan. In the early eighth century A.D., it was a small principality tributary to the Islamic empire. Barthold, Turkestan, 71–2; Le Strange, Lands, 439–40.

143. Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā al-Baṣrī, the mawlā of the Taym, d. 210(825), the great traditionist. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 246–8.

144. The same as al-Khuttal.

145. The ruler of al-Khuttal. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 9, 81–2.

146. An unidentified place in eastern Tajikistan.

I assigned[147] myself two thousand [men] from each khums,
From each heavily-armed, broad-fronted [division].

The Muslims went on to al-Ghūriyān,[148] whose people they fought for a day, withstanding them. A man among the pagans showed forth and stood before his comrades. He planted his spear in the ground and had suspended a green band [from his horse] as a mark. Salm b. Aḥwaz[149] was then standing with Naṣr b. Sayyār. Salm said to Naṣr, "I already know the view of Asad, but I am going to attack this lout [anyway]; perhaps I will kill him and Asad will be satisfied." Naṣr answered, "As you wish." So Salm attacked the enemy horseman, who did not even pull out his spear before Salm came over him and stabbed him, leaving him [lying] in front of his horse, scraping the ground with his leg. Then Salm returned, stopping to say to Naṣr, "I am going to make another attack." Then he charged until, when he came near them, a man of the enemy opposed him. They struck each other, and Salm killed his opponent. Then Salm returned, wounded. Naṣr said to Salm, "Wait here until I attack them." He charged until he was in the enemy's midst, where he slew two men, then came back wounded. Stopping [by Salm] he said, "Do you think what we have done will [1494] please him, may God not please him?" Salm answered, "No, by God, I do not suppose so."

At this point the messenger of Asad came to the two of them saying, "The amīr says to you, 'I have taken note of your stance from today as well as your worthlessness to the Muslims, may God curse you!'" They replied, "Amen, if we come back again to the like of this." The two sides held each other off that day, then both fought again the next day. The pagans were soon defeated. The Muslims captured their camp and conquered the land, taking prisoners, captives and spoils.

But some say that Asad came back from al-Khuttal routed in the year 108. The people of Khurāsān said:

You have come from Khuttalān.

147. Text: nadaytu; read: nadabtu, as in Ms. BM.

148. Another name for al-Ghūr. See note 124.

149. Al-Māzinī of the Tamīm, the chief of Naṣr b. Sayyār's shurṭah later, he was an inveterate Qaysī warrior who was slain by Abū Muslim in 130[748]. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 211–2.

With a spoiled face you have come.
Broken-spirited you have come back.

In the campaign in al-Khuttal, the troops were struck with a severe hunger. Asad sent forth a young servant[150] of his with two sheep, telling him, "Do not sell them for less than five hundred [dirhams]." When the boy was gone, Asad said, "No one will buy them except Ibn al-Shikhkhīr,"[151] who was at the outpost. Ibn al-Shikhkhīr, upon entering in the evening, found the two sheep in the market and bought them for five hundred [dirhams]. He slaughtered one of them [for himself] and sent the other to one of his brothers. When the boy came back to Asad and told him the story, Asad sent him one thousand dirhams.

Ibn al-Shikhkhīr is ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr, the brother of Muṭarrif b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr al-Ḥarashī[152]

Pilgrimage and Officials

Ibrāhīm b. Hishām led the pilgrimage this year while he was governor of al-Madīnah, Mecca and al-Ṭā'if.

[1495] I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant —Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā —Abū Maʿshar. Al-Wāqidī said likewise.

The officials of the main cities in charges of worship, warfare, and the judiciary were the same in this year as in the preceding year, and we have already noted them before.

150. Or: Young man, boy, page, slave. Often ghulāms were formally slaves and made up a guard force exclusively loyal to their master. However, the word does not necessarily denote a slave. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ghulām.

151. The son of a companion of the Prophet. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 288.

152. Abū ʿAbdallāh, the well-known Baṣran jurist. Most probably he died 86(705)–87(706). Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 173–4; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 382.

The Events of the Year 109

(APRIL 28, 727—APRIL 15, 728)

In it occurred the campaign of 'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' al-Fihrī[153] leading the seaborne force. There was also campaign of Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām against Byzantine territory, where he took a fortress called Ṭībah.[154] However, a group from the people of Antioch who were with him suffered losses.

In it, 'Umar b. Yazīd al-Usayyidī was killed. Mālik b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd slew him.

The Report about the Slaying of 'Umar b. Yazīd al-Usayyidī

The reason for that, according to what has been reported, is that Khālid b. 'Abdallāh witnessed (the prowess of) 'Umar b. Yazīd at the time of the war with Yazīd b. al-Muhallab,[155] and thus Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik became impressed with him. Yazīd said, "This is the man of Iraq!" That angered Khālid, who therefore commanded [1496] Mālik b. al-Mundhir, who was in charge of the security forces in 153. Of the Quraysh, the son of the original conqueror of North Africa and founder of Qayrawān. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 178.

154. Unidentified. Reading uncertain.

155. See note 25.

al-Baṣrah, to exalt 'Umar b. Yazīd and not disobey any command of his until he had made it known to the people. Then Mālik devoted himself to finding a pretext against him (by which) to kill him, and so he did. One day, when 'Abd al-A'lā b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir[156] was mentioned, Mālik slandered him, whereupon 'Umar b. Yazīd objected, "Do you slander the like of 'Abd al-A'lā!" Mālik then answered him rudely and beat him with whips, until he had slain him.

Campaign of Asad against al-Ghūr

This year Asad b. 'Abdallāh campaigned against Ghūrīn. Thābit Quṭnah said:

I see Asad[157] in war when it comes to him,
And he fights the enemy; he wins and imposes.
He took al-Sabal's[158] land, of which the Khāqān is the guardian, Burning whatever resisted him and destroying.
Groups of the Turks came to you (from) what is between Kabul
And Ghūrīn, for they did not escape from you by flight.
The enemies did not overwhelm a lion of the jungle,
The father of ferocious beasts, whom they stirred up, but he turned on them pursuing,
A hairy one, as if saffron were upon his arm,
Repulsive of countenance, he has grown teeth and proven (himself).
Was there no protection in the blessed fortress [1497] For your troops, the coward dreading, while he instilled fear?
'Abdallāh[159] built for you a fortress that you inherited Long ago, if the old be reckoned, and begat a noble son.

In this year, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik removed Khālid b. 'Abdallāh from Khurāsān and dismissed his brother Asad from it.

156. Al-Qurashī, the son of the conqueror of Khurāsān, a noble Baṣran noted for his piety. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 75; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 95.

157. Or: a lion.

158. Full vocalization gives al-Sabal, but the last vowel has been omitted for the sake of the poetic meter.

159. Asad's father.

Hishām's Removal of Khālid and His Brother from Khurāsān

The reason for that was that Asad, the brother of Khālid, was so zealous for his tribal grouping that he alienated the people.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Abū al-Barīd said to one of the Azd, "Let me go in to your fellow tribesman 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ,[160] commend me to him and tell him about me." At this he let him in. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ was then Asad's governor of Balkh. The Azdī said, "May God make the amīr prosper! This is Abū al-Barīd al-Bakrī, our brother and helper. He is the poet of the people of the East. He it is who says:

If the Azd break an alliance which was guaranteed
In an earlier time by 'Abbād and Mas'ūd,
And Mālik and Suwayd,[161] (two) who guaranteed it together
When swords were drawn against the Azd so fiercely
That they called to one another, 'May God give you a respite on the sidelines,' While (men's) skins were bleeding from the blows."

At this, Abū al-Barīd pulled the Azdī's hand, saying, "May God curse you as an intercessor!" (To the amīr he said,) "He lied, may [1498] God make you prosper! Rather I am he who says:

The Azd are our brothers; they are our allies.
There is neither breach nor alteration between us."

The amīr replied, "You have told the truth," and laughed. Abū al-Barīd is from the Banū 'Ilbā' b. Shaybān b. Dhuhl b. Tha'labah.

Asad was zealously partisan against Naṣr b. Sayyār and a group with him of the Muḍar. He beat them with whips on a Friday and said in his sermon: "May God disfigure these faces, the faces of the adherents of dissension, hypocrisy, disturbance, and corruption! O God, separate me from them and take me out to my refuge and my 160. Al-Kharaqī, clearly also an Azdī, from the village of Kharaq in the Marw oasis. Ṭabarī, III/2, 1428, 1544. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 360.

161. These lines refer to the anti-Tamīm alliance during the tribal fighting in al-Baṣrah in the second civil war (fitnah) 64–5(684–5). The four men who guaranteed it are 'Abbād b. Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān, Mas'ūd b. 'Amr al-Ma'nī of the Azd, Mālik b. Misma' al-Ḍubay'ī of the Bakr, and Suwayd b. Manjūf al-Sadūsī, also of the Bakr. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rikh, 325.

homeland! Few are those who would eagerly desire (to face) what is before me or to open their mouths when the Commander of the Faithful is my maternal uncle, Khālid b. 'Abdallāh is my brother, and I have twelve thousand Yamanī swords."

Then he came down from his pulpit. When he had led the Friday worship and the people had come into his audience and taken their seats, he drew out a document from beneath his bed and read it to the people. In it were mentioned Naṣr b. Sayyār, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al-Ghāmidī,[162] Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr al-Abānī of the Abān b. Dārim, and al-Bakhtarī b. Abī Dirham of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Ubād.[163] These he called and rebuked, reducing the group to misery.[164] Not one of them spoke. Then Sawrah spoke, mentioning his position, obedience and sincere intentions. He said that Asad ought not to accept the report of a prattling enemy; rather, he should bring them together with the one who accused them [1499] falsely. Asad, however, did not accept his plea. Rather he ordered them to be stripped. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym was beaten. He was a pot-bellied man with thin hips and spindly legs; therefore, when he was beaten, he bent over and his long underpants began to slip from their place. A man from his family stood up, taking a Harawī[165] cloak of his own, and began to hold out his garment with his hand, while he looked at Asad, desiring that he give him permission to cover 'Abd al-Raḥmān. Asad signalled to him that he do so, whereupon the man approached and covered 'Abd al-Raḥmān. It is said that it was rather Abū Numaylah[166] who covered him, saying to him, "Cover yourself, Abū Zuhayr, for the amīr is a governor of good breeding."

It is also said: Rather Asad beat them in the corners of his reception hall. When he was done, he said," "Where is the he-goat of the Banū Ḥimmān?" This man had recently been punished by the amīr. He is 'Āmir b. Mālik b. Maslamah b. Yazīd b. Ḥujr b.

162. See note 77.

163. Asad's four victims represent all the great tribal groupings or army divisions or akhmās of Khurāsān: the Ahl al-'Āliyah, Azd, Tamīm, and Bakr, thus refuting the statement that their punishment was a case of Asad's tribal partisanship.

164. Text: fa'azam; read: fa'aram, as in Codd.

165. Of Herat.

166. Ṣāliḥ b. al-Abbār, the mawlā of the 'Abs, who were associated with the Yaman in Khurāsān. He was a minor Khurāsānī poet and also a supporter of the 'Alid rebel Yaḥyā b. Zayd in 125(743). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1692–3, 1723–5; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 129.

Khaysaq b. Ḥimmān b. Ka'b b. Sa'd. Asad is said to have shaven them after the beating. Turning them over to 'Abd Rabbihi b. Abī Ṣāliḥ, the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym, one of his guards, and to 'Īsā b. Abī Burayq, he then sent them to Khālid. Asad wrote to Khālid, "These men intended to overthrow me." As often as the hair of any of them grew out, Ibn Abī Burayq would shave it off. Al-Bakhtarī b. Abī Dirham would say, "I would like it if he would beat me for a month along with this one," meaning Naṣr b. Sayyār, owing to what had happened between them at al-Barūqān. The Banū Tamīm sent a message to Naṣr (saying), "If you wish, we [1500] will rescue you from them," but Naṣr prevented them. When they were brought before Khālid, he blamed and rebuked Asad, saying, "Could you not have sent their heads?" 'Arfajah al-Tamīmī[167] said:

How is it that all the supporters of the Caliph
Are in trouble while the enemies of the Caliph are left free?
I wept, my tears uncontrolled, as was right for me to do,
While Naṣr, war's meteor, was bound in manacles.

Naṣr said:

She has sent (me) reproach for no fault;
In a letter Umm Tamīm[168] puts forth blame.
If I am shackled as a prisoner before them
In worry, anxiety and graveness,
The hostage of the Qasr,[169] you will not find any affliction
Like the captivity of honorable men by a wicked one.
Tell those who claim they belong to the Qasr, the Qasr
Being the possessors of a spearshaft having cracks:
Have you been weaned from betrayal and treachery,
Or are you like the perpetually unjust?

Al-Farazdaq[170] said:

---

167. Al-Dārimī, a minor poet apparently from Ṭukhāristān. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1525–6.

168. Al-Marzubānah bt. Qudayd b. Manī' al-Minqarī of the Tamīm, of a noble Tamīmī lineage, the wife of Naṣr and the mother of at least six of his sons. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, MS Istanbul, II, 706–7.

169. Or: compulsion, the meaning of the word in Arabic, an obvious play on words.

170. The nickname of Hammām b. Ghālib al-Mujāshi'ī, the great Tamīmī poet

Khālid, isn't it that, if not for God, you would not have been obeyed,
And if not for the Banū Marwān you would not have shackled Naṣr?
Therefore you would have met, had his shackles not been tightly bound,
The sons of war, neither unarmed in the meeting nor worried.

Asad b. 'Abdallāh spoke from the pulpit in Balkh, saying in his sermon, "O people of Balkh, you have nicknamed me the Raven, and by God I will most certainly send your hearts astray."[171] Thus, [1501] when Asad had become zealously partisan and alienated the people by his partisanship, Hishām wrote to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, "Remove your brother." Thereupon he dismissed him but asked permission for him to make the pilgrimage. Thus Asad came back to Iraq, bringing with him the dihqāns[172] of Khurāsān, in the month of Ramaḍān (December 20-January 18 of the year 109). Asad left as his deputy in charge of Khurāsān al-Ḥakam b. 'Awānah al-Kalbī.[173] Al-Ḥakam stayed a summer campaigning season but did not go out to fight.

'Abbāsid Missionaries in Khurāsān

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: The first missionary of the Banū al-'Abbās to come to Khurāsān was Ziyād Abū Muḥammad, the mawlā of the Hamdān. He was sent forth in the first governorship of Asad b. 'Abdallāh by Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās, who told him, "Call the people to us, stay among the Yaman, and treat the Muḍar gently." He also warned him to avoid a man from Abrashahr[174] called Ghālib[175] because of his excessive of the Umayyad court. See EI^{2}, s.v. al- Farazdaḳ.

---

171. The verb "to send astray" (uzīghanna) here is a play on the nickname Raven (zāgh), as well as an allusion to Qur'ān 61:5.

172. Sing. dihqān. The class of native Iranian nobles and landlords. See EI^{2}, s.v. Dihḳān.

173. Of Syrian origin, he was later governor of Sind. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Awāna b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī.

174. That is, Naysābūr or Nīshāpūr, still today an important city of Iranian Khurāsān. See EI^{2}, s.v. Nīshāpūr.

175. Apparently a supporter of the 'Alid Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. See feeling for the descendants of Fāṭimah.[176]

It is said that the first to bring a message to Khurāsān from Muḥammad b. ʿAlī was Ḥarb b. ʿUthmān, the mawlā of the Banū Qays b. Thaʿlabah of the inhabitants of Balkh.

When Ziyād Abū Muḥammad arrived, he summoned (people) to (the imāmate of) the Banū al-ʿAbbās, while mentioning the behavior of the Banū Marwān along with their oppression. He also began feeding the people. At this juncture, Ghālib came to him from Abrashahr. There was a struggle between them, Ghālib preferring the family of Abū Ṭālib while Ziyād favored the descendants of al-ʿAbbās. Ghālib having left him, Ziyād spent a winter in Marw. Among the inhabitants of Marw who used to visit him were Yaḥyā b. ʿAqīl al-Khuzāʿī and Ibrāhīm b. al-Khaṭṭāb al-ʿAdawī.

Suwayd al-Kātib was staying at Barzan[177] in the houses of the family of al-Ruqād[178] when al-Ḥasan b. Shaykh was in charge of finances for Marw. Suwayd told al-Ḥasan about the matter of Ziyād; al-Ḥasan then informed Asad b. ʿAbdallāh about him. Asad summonded Ziyād, who had with him a man with the patronymic Abū Mūsā. While looking at the latter, Asad said to him, "I know you." Abū Mūsā answered, "Yes." Asad said to him, "I saw you in a wine shop in Damascus." Abū Mūsā replied, "Yes." Asad asked Ziyād, "What is this which has reached me regarding you?" Ziyād answered, "Falsehood has been brought to you; I only came to Khurāsān to trade. I have given out my money among the people. When it comes back to me, I will leave." Asad said to him, "Leave my province (forthwith)." Therefore, Ziyād went away but later came back to his business (in Khurāsān). Al-Ḥasan then renewed (his warning to) Asad, giving him the impression that Ziyād was involved in something serious. Thus Asad sent for Ziyād, and when he looked upon him, he said, "Did I not forbid you from remaining in Khurāsān?" Ziyād responded, "O amīr, there is no harm to you from me." By this he enraged Asad, who ordered that they be killed. Abū Mūsā then said to him, "Decree whatever you will!"[179] Owing to this, Asad's wrath increased further, and he said [1502]

Sharon, Black Banners, 148, 162–3, 171.

176. That is, the ʿAlids.

177. A village in the Marw oasis. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 382.

178. Descendants of al-Ruqād b. al-Mundhir al-Ḍabbī, of a subtribe associated with the Tamīm. See Ibn al- Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 89, II, 491.

179. Qurʾān 20:72.

to Abū Mūsā, "Have you made me the equal of Pharaoh?" Abū Mūsā replied, "I have not made you so, but God has!" Thus Ziyād and his companions were slain. They were ten from the noblest lineage of al-Kūfah. None were spared among them that day except two boys whom Asad considered too young. He ordered the rest to be killed at Kushānshāh.[180]

Some say that Asad ordered a line to be drawn around Ziyād's middle. Then he was stretched between two men and struck at, but the sword missed him, whereupon the people in the market shouted, "God is Greater!" Asad asked, "What is going on?" He was told, "The sword did not cut him." Asad then gave Abū Ya'qūb a sword. He went out in long underwear, the people having gathered about Ziyād. Abū Ya'qūb struck at him, but the sword missed. Then he struck again and cut him in two.

Others say that Asad offered clemency to them: whoever among them would recant what he had been accused of, he would let [1503] him go. Eight among them rejected the (offer of clemency; two recanted. On the next day, one of the two came while Asad was in his audience chamber overlooking the market in the old city. He said, "Is this not our prisoner of yesterday?" The man came toward Asad saying, "I ask that you join me with my companions." They were overlooking the market with him while he was saying, "We are content with God as Lord, Islam as religion, and Muḥammad as Prophet." Asad called for the sword of the Bukhārā Khudhāh[181] and cut off the man's head four days before the Feast of Sacrifice.[182]

Then, after them, a man from the people of al-Kūfah named Kathīr[183] came. He stayed with Abū al-Najm.[184] Those who met Ziyād used to come to him (too). He would speak and preach to them, continuing to do so for a year or two. Kathīr was illiterate.

---

180. An unidentified place in the Marw oasis.

181. The local ruler of the Bukhārā oasis, under the suzerainty of the Islamic state but partially autonomous. His name was Ṭughshādah, and he ruled from 91(710) to 121(739). See EI^{2}, s.v. Bukhārā.

182. Apparently, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 6, 109(March 23, 728). However, this conflicts with the version on p. 1501 above, which says Asad left Khurāsān in Ramaḍān 109(December 727–January 728).

183. Abū al-Ḥusayn Kathīr b. Sa'd. He was the chief Hāshimite missionary in Khurāsān ca. 108(726)–ca. 111(729). See Sharon, Black Banners, 166–7, 172, 184.

184. Abū al-Najm 'Imrān b. Ismā'īl, the mawlā of the family of Abū Mu'ayṭ al-Qurashī, one of the twelve 'Abbāsid nuqabā' in Khurāsān and the father-in-law of Abū Muslim. See Sharon, Black Banners, 155, 166, 192, 215.

Khidāsh[185] came to him while he was at a village called Mar'am.[186] He got the better of Kathīr. His name is said to have been 'Umārah, but he was called Khidāsh ecause he marred the faith.

Thābit Quṭnah's Anger at Asad

Asad, by having appointed 'Isā b. Shaddād al-Burjumī as the subgovernor of a certain district, had placed him over Thābit Quṭnah. Thābit as a result became angry and hence disparaged Asad, saying:

I see every people know their father,
While the father of Bajīlah wavers between them.
I found my father to be your father, so do not Join against me with the enemy, clamoring.
I will shoot with my arrow whoever shoots at you with his arrow,
Whoever you attack being an enemy undeniable.
Asad b. 'Abdallāh, may his pardon be exalted,
Is a possessor of sins, then how can it be with one who has not sinned?
Have you made me a travelling bag for al-Burjumī,
While al-Burjumī is the base, unproductive one? [1504]
A slave: when noblemen contend together in a race, you see him
Coming along sluggishly, (as if) bearing (a burden) in a procession.
I take refuge with the tomb of Kurz[187] from being seen
As a subordinate of an unfruitful slave from the Tamīm.

185. 'Umārah or 'Ammār b. Yazīd. He was a native of the district of Naysābūr and founded a strong movement in Khurāsān that favored the 'Alids and threatened 'Abbāsid plans. He dominated the work of the da'wah in Khurāsān from 111(729) to his execution in 118(736). See EI^{2}, s.v. Khidāsh.

186. An unidentified place in the Marw oasis, perhaps rather to be transliterated M-r-gh-m, with vocalization undetermined.

187. Kurz b. 'Āmir b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī, the great-great-grandfather of Asad b. 'Abdallāh. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 222, II, 374.

Ashras b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī Becomes Governor of Khurāsān

In this year, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik appointed Ashras b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī[188] governor of Khurāsān.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad —Abū al-Dhayyāl al-'Adawī[189] and Muḥammad b. Ḥamzah[190] —Ṭarkhān[191] and Muḥammad b. al-Ṣalt al-Thaqafī: Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik removed Asad b. 'Abdallāh from Khurāsān, putting Ashras b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī in charge of it as governor (instead) and commanding him to correspond with Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī. Ashras was virtuous and benevolent; the Khurāsānīs used to call him "the Perfect" on account of his virtuous behavior towards them. Thus he went to Khurāsān. When he reached it, the people were delighted by his arrival. He put in charge of his security force 'Umayrah Abū Umayyah al-Yashkurī, then removed him and appointed al-Simt. He entrusted the judiciary of Marw to Abū al-Mubārak al-Kindī,[192] who had no knowledge of judicial affairs. Because of this, Ashras consulted Muqātil b. Ḥayyān.[193] Muqātil advised him to appoint Muḥammad b. Zayd,[194] whom he then entrusted with the judiciary. He remained judge until Ashras was dismissed. Ashras was also the first to establish the mobile frontier force.[195] He put in command of the mobile frontier force 'Abd al-Malik b. Dithār al-

188. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, II, 201.

189. Or Abū al-Walīd al-Hunayd b. Iyās b. Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān. From a family of Khurāsānī warriors and historical transmitters from the 'Adī al-Ribāb, he may have witnessed the death of Qutaybah b. Muslim in 96(715). Naqā'iḍ, 357.

190. Muḥammad b. Ḥamzah b. 'Amr al-Aslamī al-Khuzā'ī, the Ḥijāzī transmitter. See Ṭabarī, IV/1, 2128; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 127.

191. Possibly Abū Ḥumayd, the mawlā of the family of Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalaḥāt al-Khuzā'ī, of Baṣran connections. He must have been a contemporary of the Caliph Hishām. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 252.

192. Or: Abū al-Munāzil 'Uthmān b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥārith, the nephew of the famous Kūfan jurist Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 425.

193. Abū Mu'ān or Abū Bisṭām al-Nabaṭī al-Balkhī, the mawlā of the Shaybān, a subtribe of the Bakr. He enjoyed a long career as a counselor of the amīrs of Khurāsān from at least 98(717) to 130(748), when he was resisting Abū Muslim in Ṭukhāristān, and died in exile in Kabul before 150(767). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 277–9; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1330, 1998.

194. He is Muḥammad b. Zayd b. 'Alī b. (Abī) al-Qamūṣ al-Kindī, also described as an 'Abdī or a Jarmī. He is said to have been from al-Baṣrah, but in that case probably would not have been a Kindī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 173–4.

195. That is, a force of cavalry placed in frontier garrisons. See EI[1], s.v. Ribāṭ; Barthold, Turkestan, 189; Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 110.

Bāhilī.[196] Ashras took charge of affairs both small and great personally.

When Ashras came to Khurāsān, the people shouted, "God is Greater," out of delight with him. One man said: [1505]

The All-Compassionate One has heard a people's shouts of 'God is Greater'
On the day that their imām came to them from the Sulaym.
An imām[197] of guidance has strengthened their commonwealth by him,[198]
(A people who) were scrawny, their bones not marrowy.

When he came, he rode a donkey. Thus Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī[199] said to him, "O amīr, if you wish to be governor of Khurāsān, ride horses, hold tight the reins of your steed, and use the whip constantly on his flank so that he advances to the fire. Otherwise, go back!" Ashras answered, "Then I will go back, for I will not plunge into the fire, O Ḥayyān." Nevertheless, he stayed and rode horses.

According to 'Alī: Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn said, "I dreamt before Ashras came that someone said, 'There comes to you one harsh of heart, weak in helpers, ill-omened.' I awoke in alarm. The second night I dreamt, 'There comes to you one harsh of heart, weak of helpers, ill-omened, a traitor to his people, Jaghr.'"[200] Then he said:

An army is lost whose commander is Jaghr;
Is there a remedy before the tribes are crushed?
If (the enemy) were turned away from them by him he might be (acceptable),
And if not they will become stories of a teller of Tales.

---

196. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1420, 1423.

197. That is, the Caliph.

198. That is, Ashras.

199. Abū al-Hayyāj, the mawlā of Maṣqalah al-Shaybānī of the Bakr, adviser to the governors of Khurāsān. But his mention here must be a mistake, as he was poisoned on the orders of his last patron, Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, in 102[721]. Possibly the story related to Ḥayyān but is wrongly placed in time under Ashras; alternatively, it could relate to one of Ḥayyān's sons, perhaps Muqātil, who was just mentioned. See p. 1504 above. For Ḥayyān, see Ṭabarī, III/2, 1430–1; see also note 193.

200. A Persian word meaning "frog." See Steingass, Persian Dictionary, s.v. jagr, chughr.

Ashras was called Jaghr in Khurāsān.

Ibrāhīm b. Hishām Leads the Pilgrimage

This year Ibrāhīm b. Hishām led the pilgrimage.

I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar. Al-Wāqidī and others said likewise.

According to al-Wāqidī: Ibrāhīm b. Hishām delivered the ser-[1506] mon to the people at Minā[201] in this year on the day after the Day of Sacrifice[202] following the noon worship. He said, "Ask me, for I am the descendant of the unique one.[203] You will not ask one more knowing than me." Then a man from the people of Iraq stood up facing him and asked him about the sacrifices, as to whether they were required or not. Ibrāhīm did not know anything with which to answer him and hence came down (from the pulpit).

Governors

The Governor of al-Madīnah, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if in this year was Ibrāhīm b. Hishām. In charge of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah was Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh. In charge of worship at al-Baṣrah was Abān b. Ḍubārah al-Yazanī,[204] in charge of its security force was Bilāl b. Abī Burdah,[205] and in charge of its judiciary was Thumāmah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Anṣārī, appointees of Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh. In charge of Khurāsān was Ashras b. ʿAbdallāh.

201. The main camping site, to the northeast of Mecca, for pilgrims during the greater pilgrimage or ḥajj. See EI^{2}, s.v. Minā.

202. The Day of Sacrifice is Dhū al-Ḥijjah 10. The day after it here is Dhū al-Ḥijjah 11, 109(March 28, 728). See EI^{2}, s.v. Ḥadjdj.

203. A reference to Ibrāhīm's great-great-grandfather al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah, who is said to be referred to by this name (Ar. waḥīd) in Qur'ān 74:11.

204. Of the Dhū Yazan clan of the Ḥimyar. He was a Syrian from Ḥimṣ. See Crone, Slaves, 146.

205. Al-Ash'arī, grandson of the famous governor of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah Abū Mūsā. See Crone, Slaves, 147.

The Events of the Year

110

(APRIL 16, 728 - APRIL 4, 729)

Among its events was the campaign of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik against the Turks. He approached them near Bāb al-Lān[206] until he met the Khāqān with his hordes. They fought for nearly a month, while suffering from heavy rain. God defeated the Khāqān, who fled away. Thus Maslamah returned (homeward), going by way of the Mosque of Dhū al-Qarnayn.[207]

In this year, according to what has been reported, Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām campaigned against the Byzantines' territory, taking Ṣamāluh.[208] [1507]

In it, 'Abdallāh b. 'Uqbah al-Fihrī led the summer campaign. He was in charge of the seaborne force. But according to al-Wāqidī, it was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mu'āwiyah b. Ḥudayj[209] who was in

206. The pass in the central Caucasus between Alania (now North Ossetia) and Georgia, guarded by an impregnable fortress used by Maslamah in his campaign. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 246; EI[2], s.v. Alān, al-Ḳabḳ.

207. An unidentified place in the Caucasus, but probably near Bāb al-Lān.

208. Or Ṣamālū, a fortified town of Cilicia near Ṭarsūs and al-Maṣṣīṣah. Probably the same as a Samalouos of the Byzantines. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 423; Ramsay, Asia Minor, 278, 355.

209. Or b. Khadīj al-Sakūnī of the Kindah, the son of a famous companion of the Prophet and a great warrior of Egypt. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 429; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, II, 413.

charge.

In this year, Ashras[210] called the dhimmīs among the inhabitants of Samarqand and Transoxiana to Islam, stipulating that the jizyah would be removed from them. They accepted that, but when they became Muslims, Ashras nevertheless (continued to) impose the jizyah on them. Therefore they made war on him.

Ashras and the Affair of the People of Samarqand and Those Who Followed Them in It

It is stated that Ashras said while governor of Khurāsān, "Seek out for me a man possessing piety and excellence, that I may send him beyond the Oxus to call them to Islam." He was then advised to appoint Abū al-Ṣaydā' Ṣāliḥ b. Ṭarīf, the mawlā of the Banū Ḍabbah.[211] But this man said, "I am not skillful in Persian"; therefore they attached to his service al-Rabī' b. 'Imrān al-Tamīmī.[212] Abū al-Ṣaydā' declared, "I am going forth on the condition that whoever becomes a Muslim will not have the jizyah taken from him, and thus only the kharāj[213] of Khurāsān will be on the heads of the men." Ashras said "Yes." Abū al-Ṣaydā' then said to his companions, "I am going forth. If the officials do not deal in good faith, will you help me against them?" They said, "Yes." Thus he [1508] travelled to Samarqand, where al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-'Amarraṭah al-Kindī was in charge of both the military forces and the financial office.

Abū al-Ṣaydā' called on the people of Samarqand and its environs to become Muslims, stipulating that the jizyah would be removed from them. At this, the people hurried (to become Muslims). Therefore, Ghūrak wrote to Ashras saying, "The kharāj has

---

210. Text: al-Ashras; read: Ashras.

211. In 100(719), this prominent fighter for the rights of the mawālī in Khurāsān even complained to the Caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz himself about their condition. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1353–4.

212. Of unknown connections. Crone's assertion that he may be a son of 'Imrān b. al-Faḍl al-Burjumī is an unsupported speculation, as his names are common ones. See Crone, Slaves, 114.

213. Theoretically, the jizyah was the head tax on non-Muslims, while the kharāj was the land tax; but in practice these terms were often used loosely or interchangeably in early documents, as here. See *EI*², s.v. Kharādj; also, note 37. For an alternative view, that the terms were used with precision from the earliest times, defended in detail, see Kabīsī, Aṣr Hishām, 293–336.

fallen off drastically." Ashras then wrote to Ibn Abī al-'Amarraṭah saying, "In the kharāj there is power for the Muslims. I have heard that the inhabitants of al-Sughd and their likes have not become Muslims by (their own) desire, but rather they have only entered into Islam to escape the jizyah. Therefore, see who has been circumcised, performs the ritual obligations, practices his Islam rightly, and can recite a chapter from the Qur'ān. From him (alone) lift (the burden of) the kharāj."

Then Ashras dismissed Ibn Abī al-'Amarraṭah from the financial office, giving it (instead) to Hāni' b. Hāni', to whom he joined al-Ikhshīdh.[214] Ibn Abī al-'Amarraṭah said to Abū al-Ṣaydā', "I have nothing to do with the kharāj anymore, but beware of Hāni' and al-Ikhshīdh.[215] Therefore, Abū al-Ṣaydā' began forbidding them from taking the jizyah from whoever had become a Muslim. Hāni' wrote (to Ashras), "The people have become Muslims and built mosques." Then the *dihqān*s of Bukhārā came to Ashras to say, "Who will you take the kharāj from, now that all the people have become Arabs?" Ashras wrote back to Hāni' and to the (financial) officials, "Take the kharāj from whomever you used to take it from." Thus they brought back the jizyah upon those who had become Muslims.

At this, seven thousand of the inhabitants of al-Sughd refused (to pay) and seceded, setting up camp seven *farsakh*s from Samarqand. These went out to them to support them: Abū al-Ṣaydā', Rabī' b. 'Imrān al-Tamīmī, al-Qāsim al-Shaybānī,[216] Abū Fāṭimah al-Azdī,[217] Bishr b. Jurmūz al-Ḍabbī,[218] Khālid b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Hajarī,[219] Bishr b. Zunbūr al-Azdī, 'Āmir b. Qushayr or Bashīr al- [1509] Khujandī, Bayān al-'Anbarī and Ismā'īl b. 'Uqbah.

Ashras removed Ibn Abī al-'Amarraṭah from the military command (as well), putting in his place al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-214. Text: al-Ishḥīdh; read: al-Ikhshīdh. The title of Ghūrak as prince of Samarqand. See Barthold, Turkestan, 93, 95, 185, 189–190.

215. Text: al-Ishḥīdh; read: al-Ikhshīdh.

216. Of the Bakr, he was later a loyal follower of al- Ḥārith b. Surayj al-Tamīmī. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1584, 1868, 1923, 1932.

217. Also called al-Iyādī, but that is probably a copyist's mistake. No Iyādīs are known from Khurāsān, nor are any likely to have been there. See note 454.

218. Of the Tamīm, he was later a prominent follower of al- Ḥārith b. Surayj al-Tamīmī, and was slain with him 128(746). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1931–4.

219. Text: 'Abdallāh al-Naḥwī; read: 'Ubaydallāh al-Hajarī.

Sulamī,[220] joining to him 'Umayrah b. Sa'd al-Shaybānī.

When al-Mujashshir arrived, he wrote to Abū al-Ṣaydā', asking that he come to him with his companions. When Abū al-Ṣaydā' and Thābit Quṭnah came, he imprisoned them both. Abū al-Ṣaydā' declared, "You have committed betrayal and gone back on what you said!" Hāni' answered him, "It is not betrayal as long as bloodshed is prevented by it." He transported Abū al-Ṣaydā' to Ashras[221] but kept Thābit Quṭnah in his own prison. When Abū al-Ṣaydā' was transported, his companions met and put Abū Fāṭimah in command in order that they might fight Hāni'. But Hāni' said to them, "Wait until I write to Ashras, so that we may get his opinion and act according to his command." Thus they wrote to Ashras. Then Ashras wrote, "Impose the kharāj upon them."

After this, Abū al-Ṣaydā"s followers went back (to their opposition), but their movement weakened, while their leaders were pursued, taken, and carried to Marw. Thābit remained imprisoned. Ashras appointed Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sarī, the mawlā of the Banū 'Uwāfah,[222] as a colleague for Hāni' b. Hāni' in charge of the kharāj. Hāni' and his agents pressed on with the collection of the kharāj insistently, treating the Iranian nobles with disregard. Al-Mujashshir gave 'Umayrah b. Sa'd power over the dihqāns, who [1510] were made to stand while their clothes were torn and their belts were tied around their necks. The agents also took the jizyah from those of the humble who had become Muslims. As a result, (the people of) al-Sughd and Bukhārā became apostates, calling upon the Turks to send an army (to support them).

Thābit Quṭnah stayed in al-Mujashshir's prison until Naṣr b. Sayyār came as governor with authority over al-Mujashshir and had Thābit taken by Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh al-Laythī to Ashras, who imprisoned him. Naṣr b. Sayyār had treated Thābit kindly and well. Therefore Thābit Quṭnah, while imprisoned by Ashras, 220. Abū al-'Adabbas. He enjoyed a long career as an important leader in Khurāsān at least from 91(710) to 141(758). He was the first cousin of Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim through his aunt, who was Mūsā's mother, and like Mūsā hailed from the Banū Ḥarām b. Sammāl branch of the Sulaym. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1241, III/2, 1544, 1660, I/3, 135; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 231, 238, 246.

221. Text: al-Ashras; read: Ashras.

222. A famous Iranian mawlā who had once been apppointed by 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz himself to set up inns for travellers and who had been in charge of the kharāj of Transoxiana in 102(721). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1364, 1421, 1447–8.

praised Naṣr, saying:

What trench at a tent site and (what) stones have stirred up your longing,
And (what) traces which a downpour of rain has effaced?
Nothing is left of them nor of the stones marking their courtyard
Except broken fragments and except the fireplace
And a (lone) dweller in the encampments of the tribe, after they (have gone),
Like an exposed scout in his worn-out clothes.
The dwellings of Laylā are barren deserts with no friend in them Nearer than al-Ḥujūn,[223] and how great is its distance from my dwelling!
I was given in exchange for her, when she had become too far to visit:
The valley of fear, in which no night traveler goes,
In the featureless desert, constantly, in a scorched and dry spot,
While a flooded place[224] separates us, its wavy sea running.[225] [1511]
We battle the Turks, and the mourning woman does not cease (weeping), Among us and among them over a reckless possessor of courage.
If my opinion of Naṣr was ever truthful,
Among what refutation I devise and what I allow to pass,
He does not send the troops home until he has led them to take Great spoils, while he gains possession of a great (ruler's) kingdom.
The horses stumble in chains at times,
Carrying the plunder to those seeking vengeance,
Until they see them to be dazzling just before they are sent home;
Among them is a standard like the shadow of a predatory hawk.

223. A hillside at Mecca, the site of the famous Muslim cemetery. Since Thābit was at Samarqand, the reference to a place in Arabia emphasizes the enormous physical as well as spiritual distance. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 225.

224. Text: mu'niq; read: mughriq, as in B. Both readings are possible, but mughriq conforms better with the rest of the verse as we have interpreted it. See next note.

225. Text: adhiyyatun jārī; read: ādhiyyuhu jāri, as in Cairo ed. The line is obscure.

The frontier cannot be protected except by a possessor of perseverance
From among the generous, those driving for vengeance.
I, while I am of the stock from which the branches
Leafed out, and my forearm's (thrust) is piercing and accurate,
Will certainly mention a matter about you in which you excelled
Whoever was before you, O Naṣr b. Sayyār:
You stood up for me like a free man when (my) tribe [1512] Failed me, and I found my supporters slow (to help).
While every friend in whom I had hoped became Hostile to me, and ties with my neighbors were tattered.
But I did not clothe myself in the matter which they caused to fall
On me, nor did I defile my poor garments,
Nor did I rebel against an imam who had a right
To my obedience, nor did I commit any shameful act.

According to ʿAlī: Ashras went out to campaign and stopped at Āmul, where he stayed for three months. He sent ahead Qaṭan b. Qutaybah b. Muslim,[226] who crossed the Oxus with ten thousand men. Thereupon the forces of al-Sughd and Bukhārā, accompanied by the Khāqān and the Turks, approached, beleaguering Qaṭan in his camp which was protected by a trench. The Khāqān began to choose a horseman every day who would cross the Oxus with a group of Turks. Some of the Turks suggested, "Attack their animals while they are unsaddled." Thus they crossed and made their raid while the Muslims were dispersed. Ashras then released Thābit Quṭnah on the surety of ʿAbdallāh b. Bisṭām b. Masʿūd b., ʿAmr,[227] sending him forth with the latter and the cavalry. They followed the Turks and fought them at Āmul until they had rescued what the Turks held. Then (other) Turks crossed the Oxus to their compatriots who were returning, (enabling them to escape). Then Ashras crossed with the Muslims to join Qaṭan b. Qutaybah.

226. The son of the famous governor of Khurāsān 86(705)–96(715). See Crone, Slaves, 137.

227. Of the Azdī subtribe of the Banū Maʿn. He was the grandson of Masʿūd b. ʿAmr, Qamar al-ʿIrāq, the famous Azdī leader of al-Baṣrah, commanded the Azdī army division in Khurāsān and was killed in 112(730), unless the ʿAbdallāh b. Bisṭām supporting Abū Muslim in 129(747) is the same person. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 381; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 213, II, 402; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1535, 1546, 1968.

Ashras sent a man called Mas'ūd, one of the sons of Ḥayyān, on a raid, but the enemy met and fought them. Some men of the Muslims were stricken, and Mas'ūd was defeated, so that he returned to Ashras. A certain poet of theirs said: [1513]

The raid of Mas'ūd failed; it did not gain as booty
Other than varieties of charging and galloping.
They camped in a land of deserts containing no friend:
Their (horses) at the mountain's base were the likes of drones (swarming).

The Battle of Baykand

The enemy approached, and, when they were close by, the Muslims met and fought them for a short time, then broke off the engagement. In that time, some men of the Muslims were slain. Then the Muslims renewed the battle, (this time) persevering. The polytheists were defeated. Ashras passed on with the troops until they camped at Baykand.[228] At this, the enemy cut off their water. Ashras and the Muslims stayed in their camp that day and night. When they arose in the morning, their water being exhausted, they dug (for water) but did not find any and became thirsty. Thereupon they left for the city[229] where the waters had been cut off from them, Qaṭan b. Qutaybah being in charge of the Muslim vanguard. The enemy met and fought them to the point that the Muslims were exhausted from thirst. Seven hundred of them died and the troops were unable to fight. Only seven men were left in the battle line of al-Ribāb.[230] Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn[231] was almost captured owing to the exhaustion he suffered. Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj[232] urged the men on, saying, "O people, being killed by the

228. A city outside the great wall of the Bukhārā oasis towards the Oxus River, five *farsakh*s southwest of the city of Bukhārā. Baykand is its Arabic name, locally it was called Paykand. See Le Strange, Lands, 463; Barthold, Turkestan, 117–8.

229. That is, Bukhārā.

230. That is, of the subtribe of 'Adī al-Ribāb of the Tamīm.

231. Al-Ḍabbī, of the leading family of the Ḍabbah. An early Khurāsānī, he first appears in 74(693). He was a consistent supporter of the government and led the khums of the Tamīm in Khurāsān from at least 93(712) to 96(715). He must have been rather old here, and presumably he died shortly afterwards. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 860, 1029, 1291; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 246; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 203–4.

232. Al-Mujāshi'ī of the Tamīm, the famous revolutionary leader, Tamīmī partisword is nobler in (this) world and greater in reward with God than death by thirst." At this al-Ḥārith b. Surayj, Qaṭan b. Qutaybah, and Isḥāq, the son of Wakī"s brother Muḥammad, advanced with [1514] horsemen of the Banū Tamīm and the Qays. They fought until they drove the Turks from the water, whereupon the men hurried to it, drinking and quenching their thirst.

Thābit Quṭnah passed by 'Abd al-Malik b. Dithār al-Bāhilī and said to him, "O 'Abd al-Malik, do you follow the traditions of the jihād?" The latter answered, "Wait for me while I wash and embalm myself!"[233] Thābit stood waiting for him until he came out, then the two of them went on their way. Thābit said to his companions, "I am more knowledgeable about fighting those than you are," and urged them on. Thus they attacked the enemy. The fighting grew furious, and Thābit was slain along with a number of the Muslims, who included: Ṣakhr b. Muslim b. al-Nu'mān al-'Abdī, 'Abd al-Malik b. Dithār al-Bāhilī, al-Wajīh al-Khurāsānī, and al-'Aqqār b. 'Uqbah al-'Awdhī.[234] Qaṭan b. Qutaybah and Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. Ḥassān gathered together horsemen from the Banū Tamīm and the Qays who pledged each other to (fight to) the death, and boldly assaulted the enemy, fighting them and causing them to retreat. The Muslims pursued them, killing them until night stopped them and the enemy scattered. Then Ashras came to Bukhārā and besieged its populace.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak[235] —Hishām b. 'Umārah b. al-Qa'qā' al-Ḍabbī[236] —Fuḍayl b. Ghazwān:[237] Wajīh al-Bunānī told me while we were circumambulat-san, supporter of Murji'ite doctrines and precursor of Abū Muslim. He led a long-lasting frontier revolt 116(734)–126(744), gave the governors of Khurāsān almost interminable trouble and even joined the Turks. He was killed 128(746). See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 464–72, 476, 485–8.

---

233. In preparation for a certain death.

234. Text: al-'Ūdī; read: al-'Awdhī. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 157, from which it is clear that only al-'Awdhī is a tribal name, as the text demands, and that the 'Awdh had become part of the Azd.

235. Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Marwazī, the mawlā of the Ḥanẓalah of the Tamīm, 118(736)–181(797), the great religious scholar of Khurāsān and Iraq. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 382–7

236. Almost certainly of al-Kūfah and very likely a mawlā as well, as are those before and after him in this isnād. His father is given as one of the sources of Fuḍayl b. Ghazwān. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 297.

237. Abū al-Faḍl Fuḍayl b. Ghazwān b. Jarīr al-Kūfī, the mawlā of the Ḍabbah. He was a traditionist and was killed in the reign of al-Manṣūr (136(754)–158(775)).

ing the House,[238] "We met the Turks, who slew a group of us. I was struck down. I watched them while they sat and asked for water, until at last they came to me. A man of them said, 'Leave him, for he has a step he (still) must take and a fate he must meet.' This[239] is the step which I have just taken; now, I hope for martyrdom." After this, he went back to Khurāsān and was martyred with Thābit. [1515]

According to al-Wāzi' b. Mā'iq: Al-Wajīh passed by me leading two mules on the Day of Ashras. I said, "How did you arise this morning, O Abū Asmā'?" He answered, "I arose between being perplexed and gathering together. O God, join the two battle lines together in combat!" Then, wearing his bow and sword around his shoulders and wrapped in a hood, he attacked the opposing force and was martyred. Al-Haytham b. al-Munakhkhal al-'Abdī[240] was also martyred.

According to 'Alī —'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak: When Ashras met the Turks, Thābit Quṭnah said, "O God, as I was the guest of Ibn Bisṭām yesterday, make me your guest today! By God, the Banū Umayyah will not look upon me bound in iron!" Then he charged forward, as did his companions, but his companions were proven false, while he stood firm. His steed was shot, causing it to run away briskly, but Thābit struck it and then advanced boldly. Thābit was hit and returned from the fight wounded. He said while he lay prostrated, "O God, I arose in the morning the guest of Ibn Bisṭām and have entered the evening as your guest; therefore, receive me in the heaven of your goodly reward!"

According to 'Alī: It is said that Ashras crossed the Oxus and camped at Baykand, but found no water there. Thus, when his forces arose in the morning, they departed. When they neared the fortress of the Bukhārā Khudhāh, which was at that point a mile[241] away from them, a thousand horsemen met them, surrounding

---

See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 297–8.

238. That is, the Ka'bah, during the pilgrimage.

239. That is, the pilgrimage.

240. Actually, al-Jurmūzī of the Azd. His being attributed to the 'Abd al-Qays is unique to this place in the text and must be a mistake, unless the Jurmūz were at some time a subtribe of the 'Abd al-Qays; but there is no indication of that in the sources. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 222. Al-Haytham had been with al-Muhallab as early as 82(701) and had helped to overthrow Qutaybah in 96(715). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1078, 1296; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 500.

241. The Arabic mile equals 4,000 cubits (dhirā') of 22.75 inches each, thus the troops. A cloud of dust spread (over them), so that a man could not see his neighbor.

Six thousand of the Muslims, including Qaṭan b. Qutaybah and Ghūrak[242] of the dihqāns, were cut off. These reached a fortress [1516] among the forts of Bukhārā thinking that Ashras had perished, while (actually) Ashras was inside the forts of Bukhārā. Thus the two forces did not meet up for two days. Ghūrak joined the Turks in that battle. He had entered the fortress with Qaṭan, but when Qaṭan sent a man to him, (Ghūrak's troops) shouted at Qaṭan's messenger and Ghūrak joined the Turks.

It is said that Ghūrak fell in that day with a (Turkish) cavalry force and had no choice but to join them. It is (also) said that Ashras sent a message to Ghūrak asking him for a drinking cup, but that he answered Ashras's messenger, "Nothing is left to me to use in anointing myself except this cup; therefore, leave it!" Then Ashras sent a message to him (again), saying, "Drink from a gourd and send me the cup." Thus Ghūrak left him.

Naṣr b. Sayyār was in charge of Samarqand and 'Umayrah b. Sa'd al-Shaybānī was in charge of its taxation while they were besieged. 'Umayrah was among those who had come with Ashras.

Quraysh b. Abī Kahmas approached on horseback and said to Qaṭan, "The amīr and his men have made camp. None of the troops were lost except for you." Thus Qaṭan and his men made their way to the camp, which was a mile away.

It is said that Ashras camped near the city of Bukhārā, about a farsakh away, that place being called al-Masjid.[243] Then he moved to a grassy field called Bawādirah.[244]

The Siege of Kamarjah

Sabābah or Shabābah, the mawlā of Qays b. 'Abdallāh al-Bāhilī, came to the troops who were encamped at Kamarjah.[245] Kamarjah measuring 7,508.33 English feet or 1.43 English miles. See Hava, al-Farā'id al-Durriyyah, s.v. m-y-l, dh-r-'. However, there were many different measurements for a dhirā'.

---

242. Text: Ghūzak; read: Ghūrak, as Codd. and throughout the text.

243. This may be identical with the fortified village of Afshīnah, west of Bukhārā. See Barthold, Turkestan, 119.

244. Outside the walls of Bukhārā. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 70.

245. A fortified place seven farsakhs west of Samarqand in the Zarafshān Valley.

was one of the noblest battle days of Khurāsān, and the greatest of them (to take place) in the days of Ashras in his governorship. Sabābah or Shabābah said to those at Kamarjah, "The Khāqān will be passing by you tomorrow. I suggest to you that you show your [1517] weapons and let him see earnestness and supreme effort, so that he will lose his taste for fighting you." One man among them said, "Secure yourselves against this one, for he has come to weaken you." They answered, "We will not do so; this is our mawlā whom we have come to know for his good advice." Thus they did not accept what the man said, but did what the mawlā had commanded them.

The Khāqān came upon them in the morning. When he was opposite them, he went up to the road to Bukhārā, as if he intended going there, but then he descended (toward the river) with his troops, (passing) behind a hill separating the Muslims and himself. The Turks camped and made ready, while the Muslims were unaware of them. When this, which surprised them, happened, the Muslims climbed up the hill, and suddenly there was a mountain of steel, (including) the forces of Farghānah, al-Ṭāraband,[246] Afshīnah,[247] Nasaf[248] and portions of the forces of Bukhārā.

The Muslim army then regretted (that it had come out). Kulayb b. Qanān al-Dhuhlī said, "They intend to come against you; therefore, send groups of your mailed animals along the road to the river as if you mean to have them drink. When you have stripped off their armor, take the road to the gate and slip in by groups, one group at a time." When the Turks saw them slipping away, they attacked them in the defiles. But the Muslims knew the road better than the Turks and beat them to the gate. The Turks overtook them there, killing a man called al-Muhallab who was part of the Muslims' garrison and was an Arab. The Turks fought the Muslims and took the gate outside the trench; then they entered (through) it and both parties continued fighting. One of the Arabs brought out a bundle of stalks which he had set ablaze and threw it in their faces, whereupon they drew back and cleared the [1518]

See Barthold, Turkestan, 125; Gibb, Arab Conquests, 71, and especially 86 n. 14.

246. The ancient capital of al-Shāsh. See EI[2], s.v. Tashkent.

247. Apparently a suburb of Samarqand or a town nearby. Probably not the Afshīnah of Bukhārā. See Barthold, Turkestan, 87, 119.

248. An important city of Transoxiana, it was called Nakhshab in Persian and is now Karshi (Qarshi) in Uzbekistan. See EI[1], s.v. Nakhshab.

place, leaving dead and wounded behind. When it was evening, the Turks withdrew while the Arabs burnt the bridge. Then Khusraw b. Yazdigird[249] came to them with thirty men saying, "O Arabs, why do you kill yourselves when I have brought the Khāqān to restore my kingdom to me and (at the same time) will obtain a safe-conduct for you?" But they reviled him, and he went away.

Bāzagharī[250] came to them with two hundred men. He was a shrewd man from Transoxiana whom the Khāqān used not to oppose. With him were two relatives of the Khāqān and horses from the frontier cavalry force of Ashras. He said, "Grant us a safe passage so that we can come close to you and I can propose to you what the Khāqān has sent me to you for." They then gave him a safe-conduct, and he came near the city, its defenders looking down on him. He had with him Arab prisoners. Bāzagharī said, "O Arabs, let down one of your men to me so that I may speak to him about the message of the Khāqān." Thereupon they let down Ḥabīb, the mawlā of the Mahrah, of the inhabitants of Darqīn.[251] The Turks spoke to him, but he did not understand. At this, Bāzagharī said, "Let down to me a man who will undersand me." Thus they let down Yazīd b. Sa'īd al-Bāhilī, who spoke a little Turkish.

Bāzagharī said, "These are the horses of the (Muslim) frontier cavalry force, and the leaders of the Arabs are prisoners with them." He also told them, "The Khāqān sent me to you to say to you, 'I will give to whoever of you had a stipend of six hundred (dirhams one of) one thousand (dirhams), and to whoever had a stipend of three hundred (dirhams one of) six hundred (dirhams).' He is also decided besides this to treat you well." Yazīd answered him, "This is a matter that will not come together. How can the [1519] Arabs, who are wolves, be with the Turks, who are sheep? There will not be between us and you peace." Bāzagharī became angry. The two Turks who were with him said, "Should we not cut off his head?" Bāzagharī answered, "No. He came down to us on a safe-conduct." Yazīd understood what the two had said and was afraid, 249. Probably Khusraw b. Fayrūz b. Yazdigird, grandson of the last Sassanid king. If so, he would be the maternal uncle of the Caliph Yazīd b. al-Walīd. He could hardly be the son of Yazdigird III, who died 31(651), but rather his grandson. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 71; Tabari, III/2, 1874; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 310.

250. Vocalization uncertain.

251. Vocalization uncertain.

therefore he said, "O Bāzagharī, will you not make us two halves? One half will go with our moveable possessions, while the (other) half will go with the Khāqān. If the Khāqān is victorious, we will be with him; if it is otherwise, we will be like the rest of the cities of the people of al-Sughd." Bāzagharī and the two Turks agreed with what Yazīd had said. Bāzagharī said to him, "Propose to the people what we have agreed to." So Yazīd approached (the wall) and grasped the end of the rope, and they pulled him up until he was on the wall of the city. He called out, "O people of Kamarjah, unite together, for there has come to you a people who call you to unbelief after faith! What do you think?" They answered, "We will neither respond nor agree!" He said, "They call on you to fight against the Muslims on the side of the polytheists!" They replied, "We will all die together sooner than that!" He said, "Then let them know!"

They looked down on them and said, "O Bāzagharī, will you sell the captives in your hands? We will redeem them. But as for that which you have called us to, we will not submit to it." Bāzagharī responded, "Will you not rather purchase yourselves from us? For with you are nothing but the like of those of you who are in our hands." In their hands was al-Ḥajjāj b. Ḥumayd al-Naḍrī,[252] to whom they said, "O Ḥajjāj, will you not speak?" He said, "I am under surveillance." The Khāqān commanded that trees be cut down, whose green wood his men began to throw (into the trench), while the defenders of Kamarjah threw in dry wood, [1520] until the trench was level for the Turks to cross. But the Muslims set fires in it, and a strong wind, a work of God, arose.

The fire blazed in the wood and burnt up all that they had done in six days in one hour of daylight. We[253] shot (arrows) at them, injuring them and causing them to be preoccupied with wounds.

An arrow struck Bāzagharī in his navel, causing his urine to be retained so that he died that night. His Turks cut off their ears, becoming the worst of those with bowed heads, weeping. Then 252. Perhaps of the Banū al-Naḍr b. 'Uwāfah b. Sa'd al-Fizr of the Tamīm. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 215; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 75. But see note 452.

253. Sometimes traces of direct narrative like this appear in al-Ṭabarī, implying the account here is that of an eyewitness. Changing person like this in Arabic is called iltifāt. It is quite common in the Qur'ān and is more acceptable than in English.

a horrible thought occurred to them: when the daylight was prolonged, they brought out the captives, who were one hundred, including Abū al-ʿAwjāʾ al-ʿAtakī and his companions, and killed them. They threw to the Muslims the head of al-Ḥajjāj b. Ḥumayd al-Naḍrī. The Muslims had two hundred of the sons of the polytheists as hostages in their hands, whom they now slew, though they fought desperately. The fighting became heavy. The enemy stood on the gate of the trench, then five Turkish chiefs went along on top of the wall. At this Kulayb said, "Who will help me against these?" Ẓuhayr b. Muqātil al-Ṭufāwī said, "I will help you against them." Then he went forward hurrying, saying to certain young men, "March behind me," as he was wounded. And two of those chiefs were slain on that day, while three escaped.

One of the Transoxianan princes said to Muḥammad b. Wassāj,[254] "It is strange that there does not remain a single prince in Transoxiana who has not fought at Kamarjah other than me. It is hard on me that I do not fight along with my equals and that my prowess has not been seen." The people of Kamarjah continued to suffer from (attacks) until Arab troops advanced, descend-[1521] ing on (the forces) of Farghānah. At this, the people of al-Sughd, Farghānah and al-Shāsh and the dihqāns blamed the Khāqān, who said to them, "You claimed that there were fifty donkeys in this (town) and that we would take it in five days, but now the five days have become two months." Thus he reviled them and ordered them to depart. They said, "We will not spare any effort, but rather bring us forth tomorrow and watch." On the next day, the Khāqān came and stood. The prince of al-Ṭāraband went up to him, asking permission to give battle and go into the Muslims' town. But the Khāqān said, "I do not think you should fight in this place," which he regarded as dangerous. The prince then said, "Give me two Arab girls as slaves, and I will go out against them." At this the Khāqān gave his permission.

Thus the prince fought. Eight of his men were killed, but he came on until he stopped before a breach (in the wall) beside which was a house. In the house there was a hole that opened on to the breach. Inside the house was a man of the Banū Tamīm who was sick. He threw at the prince a hooked iron which caught on his mail. Then he called the women and boys, who dragged him. The prince fell on his face and knees. A man threw a stone at him, which struck him at the base of his ear. He was knocked prostrate, and a man stabbed him, killing him. A beardless youth of the Turks came up and slew the killer, taking his plunder and his sword, but we overcame them regarding his body. It is said that he who answered the call to this was the best horseman of the people of al-Shāsh.

254. Text: Wishāḥ; read: Wassāj, as B and Cairo ed. Probably a Tamīmī related to Bukayr b. Wassāj al-ʿUṭāridī, governor of Khurāsān 72(691)–74(693), or even his son. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 219, where A.M. Hārūn also has preferred Wassāj to the commonly given Wishāḥ.

The Muslims took up a wooden water basin and stuck it against the wall of the trench; then, they made doors for it and set archers behind them. These included Ghālib b. al-Muhājir al-Ṭā'ī, the [1522] paternal uncle of Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī[255] and two other men, one of whom was a Shaybānī, the other a Nājī. When the Khāqān came to look at the trench, the Nājī shot at him, hitting the bone of his nose, but he was wearing a Tibetan helmet,[256] so that the shot did not harm him. The Shaybānī also shot at him, but could not see more of him than his eyes. Finally, Ghālib b. al-Muhājir shot him, the arrow entering his chest, throwing him over. Nothing more severe touched the Khāqān.

It is said that the Khāqān only killed al-Ḥajjāj and his companions on that day because he had become alarmed. He sent a message to the Muslims saying, "It is not our practice to withdraw from a city on which we have descended without conquering it, or without its defenders leaving it." Kulayb b. Qanān answered him, "It is not of our religion to give over our hands until we are killed, so do what seems best to you." The Turks decided that their siege against the Muslims was harmful (to themselves); therefore, they gave them a safe-conduct with the stipulation that they go away—both the Khāqān and the Muslims—from the town with their families and possessions to Samarqand or al-Dabūsiyyah.[257]

255. Ghālib earlier was in the expedition to save Qaṣr al-Bāhilī 102(721). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1422. Abū al-'Abbās is al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān, a famous 'Abbāsid agent (dā'ī). See Crone Slaves, 174.

256. Ar. kashkhūdah. Not found in the dictionaries, but its meaning is evident from both the context and from the element khūdah.

257. A large town about midway between Samarqand and Bukhārā on the south bank of the Zarafshān River. As it was 17 or 18 *farsakh*s west of Samarqand, it also lay to the west of Kamarjah. See Barthold, Turkestan, 97; Le Strange, Lands, 468.

Then the Khāqān told them, "Choose for yourselves whether to depart from this city."

The people of Kamarjah realized what difficulty they were in owing to the siege and hardship. They said, "We will consult the inhabitants of Samarqand," and sent Ghālib b. al-Muhājir al-Ṭā'ī. He descended into a place in the valley and went along to a fortress named Farzāwinah,[258] whose dihqān was his friend. He [1523] said to him, "I have been sent to Samarqand; therefore, carry me there." The dihqān replied, "I cannot find any mount except certain of the mounts of the Khāqān, who has fifty animals in the pasture." Therefore, they went forth together to that pasture, where Ghālib took a steed and mounted it. A second steed was familiar with Ghālib's steed and thus followed him. Ghālib reached Samarqand that very night and told the folk there about the matter of the people of Kamarjah. They advised him (to tell them to go) to al-Dabūsiyyah, saying, "It is closer." Thus he came back to his companions. They took hostages from the Turks so that the latter would not interfere with them, and they also requested a man from the Turks through whom they would be strengthened, along with men from among themselves. The Turks said to them, "Choose whomever you want." They chose Kūrṣūl[259] to be with them, and he stayed with them until they reached where they wanted.

It is said that when the Khāqān saw that he would not get at them, he cursed his companions and commanded them to travel away from the Muslims. Al-Mukhtār b. Ghūrak and the prince of al-Sughd spoke to him, saying, "Do not do so, O King, but rather give the Muslims a safe-conduct so that they may go out of the town and may think that you only did that for them for the sake of Ghūrak, who is with the Arabs, loyal to them. His son al-Mukhtār has only beseeched you concerning that fearing for his father." The Khāqān gave his consent to them about that and sent Kūrṣūl over to the Muslims, to be with them, protecting them from whomever sought (to attack) them.

---

258. Vocalization uncertain.

259. Al-Turqashī. His Turkish name is Kōl-chūr, his title the Baga Tarkhan. He first appears fighting the Arabs in 102(721) as one of the Khāqān's great nobles. Later he murdered the Khāqān in 120(738) and usurped his place. He seems to have been executed by the Chinese in 126(744). See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 61, 85, 91; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 472, 476.

Thus the Turkish hostages came into the Muslims' hands, while the Khāqān departed, giving the impression that he was heading for Samarqand. The hostages which were in the Muslims' hands were from among the Turkish princes. When the Khāqān left, Kūrṣūl said to the Arabs, "Depart!" They answered, "We do not like to leave while the Turks have not yet gone, nor do we trust them not to threaten any of the women, at which the Arabs would get angry, and thus return to the same kind of war we were (just) in."

Therefore, Kūrṣūl left them alone until the Khāqān and the Turks had gone on. When they had performed the noon worship, Kūrṣūl bid them to depart, saying, "Difficulty, death, and fear are only until you have gone two farsakhs; then you will reach contiguous villages." They then departed, there being in the hand [1524] of the Turks a group of Arab hostages who included Shu'ayb al-Bakrī or al-Naṣrī, Sibā' b. al-Nu'mān[260] and Sa'īd b. 'Aṭiyyah. In the hands of the Arabs were five of the Turks. They had mounted behind every Turkish man a man of the Arabs with a dagger. Each Turk was wearing only a gown with full sleeves, and thus they led them along. Then the Iranians[261] said to Kūrṣūl, "Al-Dabūsiyyah holds ten thousand fighting men. We don't guarantee that they will not come forth against us." He answered, "If the Arabs fight you, they will fight us with you," and thus they kept going. When they had drawn within about a farsakh of al-Dabūsiyyah or less, its inhabitants, seeing horsemen, standards, and a vast force, supposed that Kamarjah had been taken and that the Khāqān was aiming at them.

We drew near to them, they having readied themselves for war. Kulayb b. Qanān sent forth a man from the Banū Nājiyah called al-Ḍaḥḥāk galloping on a steed. In command of al-Dabūsiyyah was 'Aqīl b. Warrād al-Sughdī. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk came to them while they were arranged in rows of cavalry and infantry, giving them the news. At this, the men of al-Dabūsiyyah galloped forward to carry whoever was too weak to walk or was wounded. Then Kulayb sent 260. Al-Azdī. He was already a revolutionary by 126(744), when his execution was sought; in 130(748) he was governor of Samarqand for Abū Muslim, but in 135(753) was arrested for plotting against him. Al-Ya'qūbī gives his name as Sibā' b. Ma'mar. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1858, 2001, I/3, 82; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 410.

261. These must be mawālī who had been in Kamarjah with the Arabs.

a message to Muḥammad b. Karrāz and Muḥammad b. Dirham, so that they would inform Sibāʿ b. al-Nuʿmān and Saʿīd b. ʿAṭiyyah that they had arrived safely. Then they freed the hostages: the Arabs began sending back one of the Turkish hostages who were in their hands, while the Turks sent back one of the Arab hostages who were in their hands, until there was left Sibāʿ b. al-Nuʿmān [1525] in the hands of the Turks and one of the Turks in their hands. Each side began to fear treachery from the other. Sibāʿ said, "Let the Turkish hostage go"; therefore, they freed him, leaving Sibāʿ in the Turks' hands. Kūrṣūl asked him, "Why did you do this?" He answered, "I trusted in your view of me and said that your spirit would be above treachery in such an instance." At this Kūrṣūl rewarded him, armed him, mounted him on a horse and returned him to his companions.

The siege of Kamarjah lasted fifty-eight days. It is said that they did not water their camels for thirty-five days.

The Khāqān divided the sheep among his followers, saying, "Eat their meat, fill their skins with earth, and fill up your trench," which they did, filling it up. But God sent against them a cloud pouring rain, which carried away what they had thrown in (the trench) and deposited it in the greater river.[262]

Also, a group of Khārijites was with the inhabitants of Kamarjah, including Ibn Shunj, the mawlā of the Banū Nājiyah.

In this year the people of Kurdar[263] became apostates, but the Muslims fought and conquered them. The Turks had helped the people of Kurdar. Therefore, Ashras sent to the vicinity of Kurdar a thousand men to help the Muslims. When they arrived, the Muslims, having defeated the Turks, triumphed over the forces of Kurdar. ʿArfajah al-Dārimī said:

We protected the people of Marw and others, [1526] And we drove the Turks away from the people of Kurdar.
If you give what we have taken as spoil to others,
An honorable man may be wronged and then wait patiently.

262. That is, the Zarafshān. This report refers to the time of the siege, being a doublet of the account appearing on pp. 1517–8.

263. A town in the delta of the Oxus, on the right bank. See Le Strange, Lands, 455; Barthold, Turkestan, 151.

Pilgrimage and Governors

In this year, Khālid b. 'Abdallāh gave charge of the worship at al-Baṣrah together with the security force, youths (aḥdāth),[264] and judiciary to Bilāl b. Abī Burdah, bringing all these together under him and thereby dismissing Thumāmah b. 'Abdallāh b. Anas from the judiciary.

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl led the pilgrimage, as reported by Abū Ma'shar, al-Wāqidī and others.

I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.

Ibrāhīm b. Hishām was governor of al-Madīnah, Mecca and al-Ṭā'if in this year, while Khālid b. 'Abdallāh was governor of al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah and all of Iraq and Ashras b. 'Abdallāh was governor of Khurāsān.

264. What is meant by aḥdāth is obscure, but already at this time they may have constituted a loosely organized urban militia for secondary duties, analogous to the vigiles of Augustan Rome. See EI^{2}, s.v. Aḥdāth.

The Events of the Year

III

(APRIL 5, 729—MARCH 25, 730)

Among the year's events, Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām led the summer campaign on the left flank (against the Byzantines), while Sa'īd b. Hishām[265] led the summer campaign on the right, even reaching Qaysariyyah.

According to al-Wāqidī: In the year III, 'Abdallāh b. Abī Maryam[266] led the seaborne force. Also, Hishām made al-Ḥakam b. Qays b. Makhramah b. al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abd Manāf[267] commander of all the men from the inhabitants of Syria and Egypt.

---

265. Son of of the Caliph Hishām by a concubine, he commanded at Ḥimṣ for his brother Sulaymān in the civil war against Marwān and, being captured by the latter, was imprisoned in Ḥarrān until 132(750), when he was slain. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1912, I/3, 43; Zubayrī, Nasab, 168.

266. Perhaps the mawlā of the Banū Sā'idah of the Khazraj, as Bakr b. Suwādah al-Judhāmī, who transmitted from him, is said to have died in the sea near Spain in 128(746). They could have been associates in seaborne expeditions. 'Abdallāh is said to have seen Abū Ḥumayd al-Sā'idī, who died around 60(680), and therefore he was probably born around 50(670) or slightly later. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 483–4, VI, 26, XII, 79.

267. Since Qays b. Makhramah was a companion of the Prophet a century earlier, and since no son al-Ḥakam is attributed to him by the genealogists, one or two generations are almost certainly missing from this genealogy. 'Abdallāh b. Qays b. Makhramah was in charge of the judiciary of al-Madīnah 74(693)–75(694) for al-Ḥajjāj. Perhaps this al-Ḥakam is his son or nephew. See Wakī', Quḍāh, I, 124–5; Zubayrī, Nasab, 92–3.

In this year the Turks moved againts Ādharbayjān, but al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr[268] met and defeated them. [1527]

In it Hishām appointed al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī[269] governor of Armenia.

This year, Hishām removed Ashras b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī from Khurāsān and appointed al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Murrī[270] as governor.

The Reason for Hishām's Removal of Ashras from Khurāsān and His Appointment of al-Junayd

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Abū al-Dhayyāl: The reason for the dismissal of Ashras was that Shaddād b. Khālid al-Bāhilī went to Hishām to complain about him. Therefore, Hishām dismissed him, appointing al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān as governor of Khurāsān in the year 111(730).[271]

The reason for Hishām's appointment of Junayd was that he had given a jeweled necklace to Umm Ḥakīm bt. Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam, the wife of Hishām.[272] It pleased Hishām; thus al-Junayd gave Hishām another necklace. After this, he appointed al-Junayd governor of Khurāsān and had him carried (thither) by eight (animals) of the state post.[273] Al-Junayd sought from him more animals than those, but Hishām did not give (them to him).

Al-Junayd came to Khurāsān with five hundred (men) while Ashras b. 'Abdallāh was fighting the people of Bukhārā and al-Sughd. He asked for a man who would go with him to Transoxiana, and al-Khaṭṭāb b. Muḥriz al-Sulamī,[274] Ashras's deputy,[275] was 268. Al-Ṭa'ī. He had ruled al-Balqā' in Syria and then had been governor of Armenia for Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. See Crone, Slaves, 127.

269. The Umayyad general who governed al-Baṣrah, Iraq, Khurāsān and Armenia at different times. See Crone, Slaves, 132.

270. Text: al-Muzanī; read: al-Murrī. See note 9.

271. The appointment probably came late in the year. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 459–60n.

272. The Umayyad wife of Hishām, his first cousin once removed, the mother of five of his children. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 167; Kaḥḥalah, A'lām al-Nisā', I, 285–7.

273. The communications network at the Caliph's disposal, also used for intelligence gathering. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Barīd.

274. Still alive in 130(748), when he was part of a Muḍarī delegation to Abū Muslim. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1985.

275. In Marw.

recommended to him. When he reached Āmul, al-Khaṭṭāb advised him to stop there and write to those at Zamm[276] and those around [1528] it to come to him. But he refused, rather sending a message to Ashras, "Supply me with cavalry," and was afraid to cross before the cavalry reached him. Therefore, Ashras sent him ʿĀmir b. Mālik al-Ḥimmānī. When ʿĀmir was on a certain part of the road, the Turks and Sughdīs attacked him in order to cut him off before he could reach al-Junayd. ʿĀmir retreated to a strongly walled garden and fought the enemy at its entrance. With him was Ward b. Ziyād b. Adham b. Kulthūm, the (grand)son of the brother of al-Aswad b. Kulthūm.[277] A man of the enemy shot Ward with an arrow, hitting him in the side of the nose and piercing both nostrils. ʿĀmir b. Mālik said to him, "O Abū al-Zāhiriyyah, you look like a brooding chicken!" One of the great men of the Turks was slain by the gate, while the Khāqān was on a hill behind which was a swampy thicket. ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr al-Samarqandī[278] and Wāṣil b. ʿAmr al-Qaysī[279] went forth with (a force of) shākiriyyah,[280] circling round until they were behind that waterhole. Then they joined together wood, reeds, and whatever else they could, to make a path through the water to cross on. The Khāqān did not notice (anything) until (they shouted), "God is Greater!" Wāṣil and the shākiriyyah assaulted the enemy and fought them, a horse being killed from under Wāṣil. The Khāqān and his forces were defeated. ʿĀmir b. Mālik came out of the garden and went on his

276. A town on the left bank of the Oxus at an important ford, the modern Kerki or Karkhi. See Barthold, Turkestan, 80–1; Le Strange, Lands, 403–4.

277. Al-ʿAdawī of ʿAdī al-Ribāb. Al-Aswad led the first Muslims to reach Bayhaq into one of its walled gardens, but was cut off by the enemy at the entrance and slain there by the enemy while trying to get out. This is a curious inversion of the story of ʿĀmir here, both stories having the Muslims beleaguered in a walled garden and fighting at the entrance, which suggests a possible doublet. Adham completed the conquest of Bayhaq 31(650). See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 500.

278. Al-Ṣarīmī al-Sughdī al-Hazārmard. He was a great warrior and one of the inveterate Khurāsānī supporters of the Umayyads who stayed with Naṣr b. Sayyār to the bitter end, then was finally killed by Abū Muslim's followers in 131(749) at the capitulation of Nihāwand. He was apparently from Ṭukhāristān, like ʿĀmir b. Mālik al-Ḥimmānī. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1691, 1920–1, 2000, I/3, 6–8.

279. An Arab inhabitant of Bukhārā who was assassinated while governing for Naṣr there 121(739). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1693–4.

280. From the Persian chākir, servant. These were a body of servant-soldiers personally attached to their patron, who often formed an elite bodyguard. See Barthold, Turkestan, 180, 183; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 496.

way to al-Junayd with seven thousand (troops). Finally, he met al-Junayd and proceeded with him.

In charge of al-Junayd's vanguard was 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym.[281] [1529] When al-Junayd reached a point two farsakhs from Baykand, the Turkish cavalry met him, and he fought them. Al-Junayd and those with him nearly perished. Then God gave him victory, and he went along until he reached the camp. Al-Junayd was triumphant, killing the Turks. The Khāqān marched against him, so that they met below Zarmān[282] in the territory of Samarqand. Qaṭan b. Qutaybah was in charge of al-Junayd's rear, while Wāṣil commanded the men of Bukhārā, of which he was a resident. The king of al-Shāsh was taken prisoner,[283] and in this battle al-Junayd also captured the nephew of the Khāqān, whom he sent to the Caliph. Al-Junayd had left behind al-Mujashshir[284] b. Muzāḥim as his deputy at Marw during his campaign and appointed Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr of the Banū Abān b. Dārim over Balkh. When he had achieved so much of his purpose,[285] he sent 'Umārah b. Mu'āwiyah al-'Adawī, Muhammad b. al-Jarrāḥ al-'Abdī and 'Abd Rabbihi b. Abī Ṣāliḥ al-Sulami[286] as a delegation to Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. Immediately they departed, but fell to quarreling among themselves at al-Tirmidh, where they remained for two months. Then al-Junayd reached Marw, having triumphed. The Khāqān said, "This is an easy-living boy who defeated me this year, but I will destroy him in a future year."

Pilgrimage and Governors

Al-Junayd appointed his officials, giving appointments only to Muḍarīs. He appointed Qaṭan b. Qutaybah as governor of Bukhārā, al-Walīd b. al-Qa'qā' al-'Absī[287] as governor for Herat, Ḥabīb b.

281. Or Ibn Khuraym, al-Murrī, al-Junayd's first cousin on his father's side. See Crone, Slaves, 98.

282. A town between Samarqand and Bukhārā in the Zarafshān Valley seven farsakhs west of Samarqand and thus necessarily close to Kamarjah. See Barthold, Turkestan, 96–7; Le Strange, Lands, 468.

283. Text: fa-usimm; read: fa-usir, as Ms. BM and Cairo ed.

284. Text: Mujashshir; read: al-Mujashshir.

285. By defeating the Turks.

286. A mawlā. See above, p. 1499.

287. A relative of the Umayyads through his cousin, the wife of 'Abd al-Malik Murrah al-ʿAbsī[288] as chief of his security force, and Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Bāhilī[289] over Balkh. Naṣr b. Sayyār had been [1530] subgovernor of Balkh, and he and the Bāhilīs were estranged from one another owing to what had happened between them at al-Barūqān. Therefore, Muslim sent (his men) to Naṣr. They found him sleeping and thus brought him back in a long nightshirt which was tucked up. He was not wearing long underpants but was trying to cover himself with his shirt.[290] Muslim was embarrassed and said, "You have brought a chief of the Muḍar in this condition!" Then al-Junayd dismissed Muslim from the governorship of Balkh and appointed al-Tujībī[291] b. Ḍubayʿah to it. He also put Shaddād b. Khālid al-Bāhilī in charge of the finance office of Samarqand. Al-Samharī b. Qaʿnab[292] was with al-Junayd.

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī led the pilgrimage. His governorship included the same area in this year as it had the year before, which I have mentioned earlier. The governor of Iraq was Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh while that of Khurāsān was al-Junayd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.

---

and the mother of al-Walīd and Sulaymān, he was a Syrian from Qinnasrīn. After his eastern service with al-Junayd, he was back in Syria as governor of Qinnasrīn by 119(737). See Crone, Slaves, 105.

288. Probably a mistake for al-Murrī. A supporter of Marwān, he fought the ʿAbbāsids in the jund of al-Urdunn 132(750). See Crone, Slaves, 167.

289. The most important Bāhilī in Khurāsān after Qutaybah his uncle, he held the rule in Balkh in 111(730), 120(738) and 123(741) at least, was considered for the governorship of Khurāsān 120(738), was later a supporter of Naṣr and fought Abū Muslim until at least 130(748). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1663–4, 1723, 1999.

290. Text: qamīṣayh; read: qamīṣah; there being no justification in the context for the dual. For qamīṣ, see Dozy, Vêtements, 371–5.

291. Text: Yaḥyā; read: al-Tujībī. Al-Tujībī was of the Murrah like al-Junayd, whom he served as governor of Herat as well as Balkh before being killed in 116(734). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1566–8.

292. Probably a Riyāḥī of the Tamīm. See Crone, Slaves, 113.

The Events of the Year

112

(MARCH 26, 730 - MARCH 14, 731)

Among the events of this year was the summer campaign of Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām, in which he captured Kharshanah[293] and burned Farandiyyah in the region of Malaṭyah.[294]

In this year, the Turks went forth from al-Lān. Al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī met them with those Syrians and Ādharbayjānīs he had with him. But his army did not gather in full strength, so that al-Jarrāḥ and those with him died as martyrs on the field [1531] of Ardabīl, and the Turks took Ardabīl.[295] Al-Jarrāḥ had left his brother al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abdallāh as his deputy for Armenia.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar: The Turks slew al-Jarrāḥ b.

293. Kharsianon in Byzantine Cappadocia near Malaṭyah. The event is also reported by Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, who agrees with al-Ṭabarī's dating and naming of the commander and by Theophanes, who places it in a year beginning with September 730 and erroneously calls the Muslim commander Maslamah. The event may thus be dated to early autumn, about Jumādā II–Rajab 112(September-October 730). See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 504; Theophanes, Chronicle, 101; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 359;Ramsay, Asia Minor, 248–9.

294. An important city on the upper Euphrates, it still bears the same name. It was then in the hands of the Muslims. See EI[1], s.v. Malaṭya.

295. A large city still bearing the same name in eastern Ādharbayjān. See Le Strange, Lands, 159, 168; EI[2], s.v. Ardabīl.

ʿAbdallāh at Balanjar.[296] When Hishām heard the news, he summoned Saʿīd b. ʿAmr al-Ḥarashī[297] and said to him, "I have heard that al-Jarrāḥ has fled before the polytheists." Saʿīd replied, "Certainly not, O Commander of the Faithful. Al-Jarrāḥ knows God too well to flee from the enemy. Rather he has been killed." Hishām then asked, "What is your opinion?" Saʿīd answered, "That you send me along with forty post animals, that you then send me every day forty animals with forty men on them, and that you then write to the commanders of the troops so that they will come to me." Thereupon Hishām did that.

It is mentioned that Saʿīd b. ʿAmr came upon three groups of Turks which were going to the Khāqān with those Muslims and dhimmīs whom they had captured. Al-Ḥarashī rescued those who had been taken and made great slaughter among the Turks.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: Al-Junayd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said on one of the nights of his fighting with the Turks in the defile, "A night like the night of al-Jarrāḥ and a day like his day!" It was said to him, "May God make you prosper, when al-Jarrāḥ was attacked, the men of sagacity and perseverance were slain, so that when night came on him, his troops slipped away under the cover of darkness to cities of theirs in Ādharbayjān, and al-Jarrāḥ, having few (men) by morning, was killed."

In this year, Hishām sent his brother Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik
[1532] to follow the Turks. He traveled in a winter of severe cold, rain and snow, nevertheless pursuing them—according to what has been reported—until he passed beyond al-Bāb[298] in their footsteps. He left al-Ḥārith b. ʿAmr al-Ṭāʾī behind at al-Bāb.

In this year, the battle between al-Junayd and the Turks, whose leader was the Khāqān, occurred in the defile. In this fight Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr was slain. It has been said that this battle happened in the year 113.[299]

---

296. A town north of the Caucasus in Khazaria. See EI^{2}, s.v. Balandjar, al-Ḳabḳ.

297. A Syrian from Qinnasrīn, he served as governor in al-Baṣrah, Khurāsān, and Armenia. See Crone, Slaves, 144.

298. The Caspian Gates. See EI^{2}, s.v. Bāb al-Abwāb, al-Ḳabḳ.

299. By Ibn Khayyāṭ, for example. Gibb and Wellhausen concur with the later dating, which seems to make more sense, as events of the previous years appear much compressed. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 505; Gibb, Arab Conquests, 73; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 460n.

The Battle of the Defile: What Its Cause Was and How It Happened

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: Al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān went forth campaigning in the year 112, heading for Ṭukhāristañ. He camped by the river of Balkh, sending 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym to Ṭukhāristān[300] with eighteen thousand (men) and Ibrāhīm b. Bassām al-Laythī[301] in another direction with ten thousand. The Turks then raised their army and came against Samarqand, where Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr, one of the Banū Abañ b. Dārim, was governor. Sawrah wrote to al-Junayd, "The Khāqān has mobilized the Turks. I went out against them, but I was unable to defend the (outer) wall[302] of Samarqand. Help!" Al-Junayd thereupon commanded his forces to cross (the Oxus). Al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī, Ibn Bisṭām al-Azdī, and Ibn Ṣubḥ al-Kharaqī went to him and said, "The Turks are not like others; they neither meet you in a battle line nor marching slowly in readiness. You have scattered your troops: Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān is at al-Nayrūdh, al-Bakhtarī is at Herat, the forces of al-Ṭālaqān have not [1533] yet come to you and 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym is away." Al-Mujashshir told him, "The possessor of Khurāsān ought not to cross the Oxus with less than fifty thousand (men). Therefore, write to 'Umārah so that he may come to you. Wait and do not hurry." Al-Junayd responded, "What about Sawrah and the Muslims who are with him? Even if I had only the Banū Murrah or those who came with me of the Syrians, I would cross." He added:

Is not the worthiest man he who witnesses the roar of battle,
Where heroes are slain, giant upon giant?

He also said:

What would be my plea, what would be my plea, what would be 300. Upper Ṭukhāristān, lying east of Balkh, is clearly meant. See Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 10.

301. Rather, the mawlā of the Layth. His was a well-known family of mawālī who served Naṣr but secretly supported the Hashimite cause. Thus in 128(746) Ibrāhīm was still fighting for Naṣr, but by 130(748) he was pursuing him on behalf of Abū Muslim. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1927; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 591; Akhbār al-Dawlah, 233.

302. This probably refers to a wall or walls enclosing gardens or suburbs rather than to the city itself.

my plea,
If I did not fight? Therefore cut my side curl!

Al-Junayd then crossed, making camp as Kishsh.[303] He had sent al-Ashhab b. 'Ubayd al-Ḥanẓalī to find out about what the enemy was doing. Al-Ashhab came back to him saying, "They have come upon you; therefore, get ready to set out!" The Turks advanced (a force) to spoil the wells which were on the road to Kishsh, as well as whatever waterholes were on it. Al-Junayd then asked, "Which of the two roads to Samarqand is better?" Those with him answered, "The road of al-Muḥtaraqah."[304] But al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī interposed, "Being killed by the sword is better than being killed by fire. The road of al-Muḥtaraqah has trees and (tall) grass in it, not having been cultivated for years, so that these by now have overgrown each other. If you meet the Khāqān, he will set fire to all that, so that we will be killed by the fire and smoke. Rather take the road of the steep ascent, on [1534] which there will be equality between us and them." Therefore, al-Junayd took the road of the steep ascent and climbed up into the mountains. Al-Mujashshir took the reins of his mount, saying, "It used to be said that certain of the troops of Khurāsān would perish at the hands of a luxury-loving man from the Qays. We now fear that you may be he." Al-Junayd replied, "Dispell your fear." Al-Mujashshir said, "But while the like of you is among us it will not be dispelled." He spent the night at the bottom the ascent, then departed when he arose in the morning. Al-Junayd found himself between those leaving and those staying. He met a horseman and asked him, "What is your name?" He answered, "Ḥarb." Al-Junayd asked, "The son of whom?" He replied, "The son of Maḥrabah." Al-Junayd again asked, "From which subtribe?" Ḥarb answered, "The Banū Ḥanẓalah." Al-Junayd told him, "May God give warfare,[305] rage, and rabies power over you!" Al-Junayd went

303. Text: Kiss; read: Kishsh, and likewise throughout the text. An important city like Nasaf-Nakhshab between the Oxus and Samarqand; now Shahr-i-Sabz in Uzbekistan. See EI^{2}, s.v. Kash; Barthold, Turkestan, 134–5; Le Strange, Lands, 469–70.

304. A village near Samarqand north of the mountains separating Samarqand and Kishsh. It was formerly called Faryāb and seems to have been in a wooded area. See Barthold, Turkestan, 138.

305. Arabic: ḥarb. A play on the name Ḥarb b. Maḥrabah, who is seen here retreating, despite his fierce name.

on with his troops until he entered the defile, there being four farsakhs between him and the city of Samarqand. But the Khāqān came against him on the morrow with a huge force. The inhabitants of al-Sughd, al-Shāsh, and Farghānah, as well as part of the Turks, marched against al-Junayd.

The Khāqān attacked the vanguard, which was commanded by 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr. These returned to the camp, while the Turks followed them, coming at them from every direction. Al-Ikhrīd[306] had said to al-Junayd, "Return the troops to the camp, for a numerous force has come against you." The first of the enemy came up while the men were having lunch. 'Ubaydallāh b. Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān[307] saw them but did not wish to tell the men until they had finished their lunch. Abū al-Dhayyāl looked about, saw them and said, "The enemy!" Therefore the men rode to (warn) al-Junayd. He put the Tamīm and the Azd on the right and the Rabī'ah on the left next to the mountain. In command of the armored cavalry of the Banū Tamīm was [1535]
'Ubaydallāh b. Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān, while 'Umar or 'Amr b. Jirfās b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Shuqrān al-Minqarī commanded the light cavalry. 'Āmir b. Mālik al-Ḥimmānī commanded the division of the Banū Tamīm. 'Abdallāh b. Bisṭām b. Mas'ūd b. 'Amr al-Ma'nī commanded the Azd, whose armored and light cavalry were commanded by al-Fuḍayl b. Hannād[308] and 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawdhān,[309] the one in charge of the armored and the other the light cavalry. It is said that rather the last was Bishr b. Ḥawdhān, the brother of 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawdhān al-Jahḍamī. These met with (the forces of) the Rabī'ah near the mountain in a narrow place where no one

306. The local Iranian ruler of Kishsh, from which al-Junayd has just come. See Ṭabarī I/3, 79–80. Not to be confused with al-Ikhshīdh, the ruler of Samarqand, who was with the Turks at this time.

307. Al-'Adawī, from the famous family of 'Adawī transmitters. He was present at the killing of Qutaybah in 96(715) and on later occasions was entrusted with division of spoils and led the Tamīm cavalry division. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1446, 1463; Naqā'iḍ, 357, 361.

308. Text: Fuḍayl; read: al-Fuḍayl. He belongs to the Banū al-Ḥārith al-Ghiṭrīf, a subtribe of the Azd. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 217, II, 247; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 514.

309. He is reputed to have been at the siege of Bukhārā with Salm b. Ziyād as early as 62(682) and in 96(715) was in command of the Azd division of the Khurāsānī army. See Ṭabarī II/2, 1290–1; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 275–6; Narshakhī, Ta'rīkh Bukhārā, 67.

approached them.

The enemy made for the (Muslim) right wing, where the Tamīm and the Azd were in a wide place which had space for cavalry. Ḥayyān b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Zuhayr dismounted in his father's view to give his horse to his brother 'Abd al-Malik. His father then said to him, "O Ḥayyān, hurry to your brother, for he is but a youth, and I fear for him." But Ḥayyān refused; therefore, his father said, "O my little son, if you are slain in this state of yours, you will be slain disobedient." Therefore, Ḥayyān went back to the place where he had left his brother and the horse. He found his brother had joined the camp and had tethered the horse. Ḥayyān cut its halter and rode off on it, coming to the enemy, which had now surrounded the place where he had left his father and his companions.

[1536] Al-Junayd sent to their aid Naṣr b. Sayyār with seven (others), including Jamīl b. Ghazwān al-'Adawī. 'Ubaydallāh b. Zuhayr joined them, and they charged the enemy, whom they put to flight. Then the enemy returned the charge against them, so that they were all slain together, not one of them who were in that place escaping.[310] 'Ubaydallāh b. Zuhayr, Ibn Ḥawdhān, Ibn Jirfās, and al-Fuḍayl b. Hannād were killed.

The right wing fell back while al-Junayd was standing in the center. He came now to the right and stood beneath the standard of the Azd. He had behaved harshly towards them, so that the standard bearer of the Azd said to him, "You have not come to us to give us an award nor to honor us, but rather you have learned that no harm will come to you as long as a man of us is alive. If we win, it will be for your benefit; if we perish, you will not weep over us. By my life, if we win and I survive, I will never speak a word to you." He then advanced and was killed. Ibn Mujjā'ah[311] took up the standard also and was then slain. The standard was held by eighteen (different) men of the Azd, who were killed. On that day, eighty men of the Azd were killed.

The men fought persistently until they were exhausted. Their swords would neither wound nor cut anything.[312] Their slaves cut wooden staves to fight with, until (finally) the two sides 310. Naṣr b. Sayyār, however, was not killed.

311. Ḥamzah b. Mujjā'ah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-'Atakī. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 203, II, 419.

312. Because they were dulled by so much use.

wearied, the battle being close-fought, so that they abstained from further fighting. Of the Azd who were killed were: Ḥamzah b. Mujjā'ah al-'Atakī, Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawdhān al-Jahḍamī, 'Abdallāh b. Bisṭām al-Ma'nī, his brother Zunaym, al-Ḥasan b. Shaykh, al-Fuḍayl al-Ḥārithī, who was the cavalry commander, and Yazīd b. al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḥuddānī, who had made the pilgrimage, spending 180,000 (dirhams) on it. He had said to his mother Waḥshiyyah, "Pray to God that he grant me martyrdom"; thus she prayed for him. He lost consciousness and thus was martyred thirteen days after his coming back from the pilgrimage. Two slaves of his fought beside him, although he had ordered them to go away, and both were slain and thus martyred. [1537]

On the Day of the Defile, Yazīd b. al-Mufaḍḍal had brought in a hundred camels loaded with gruel of parched barley for the Muslims. He began asking about people, and did not ask about anyone except it was said to him, "He has been killed." Therefore, he advanced saying, "There is no god but God," and fought until he was slain. On that day, Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawdhān fought while on a sorrel horse wearing a gilded coat of mail. He charged seven times, killing a man in every charge, then he returned to his station. Those in his part of the battlefront were awed by him; therefore, the enemy's interpreter called out, "The king says to you, 'Do not advance, but come over to us: we will reject our idol which we worship and worship you (instead).'" Muḥammad declared, "I am fighting you so that you will leave the worship of idols and worship God alone!" He then fought on and was martyred. Jusham b. Qurṭ al-Hilālī of the Banū al-Ḥārith[313] was killed. Al-Naḍr b. Rāshid al-'Abdī was also slain. He had entered the room of his wife while the troops were fighting and said to her, "How would you be if you were brought Abū Ḍamrah on a saddle blanket, stained with blood?" She then tore the front (of her garment) and called out in affliction. He said, "Enough from you! If every female loudly bewailed me, I would disobey her out of longing for the fair black-eyed women of paradise." He returned then to fight until he was martyred. [1538]

While the men were (undergoing) the like of this, a dust cloud approached; then horsemen appeared. Al-Junayd's herald called out, "To the ground! To the ground!" and dismounted, as did the troops also. Then al-Junayd's herald called out, "Let every commander dig a trench in front of his position," and thus the men dug trenches.

313. Of the Azdī subtribe of the Banū al-Ḥārith al-Ghiṭrīf. The Banū Hilāl mentioned here are from the Hilāl b. 'Amr b. Ka'b b. al-Ḥārith al-Ghiṭrīf al-Aṣghar. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 217.

Al-Junayd, watching 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Makkiyyah attack the enemy, said, "Who is this heady wine pouring?" He was answered, "This is Ibn Makkiyyah." Al-Junayd said, "Is he the tongue of the people? How excellent he is! What a man he is!" The sides then refrained from fighting further. One hundred and ninety Azdīs were casualties.

They had met the Khāqān on a Friday. Al-Junayd sent a message to 'Abdallāh b. Mu'ammar b. Sumayr al-Yashkurī,[314] telling him to stop in the district near Kishsh and hold back whoever passed by him, keeping both the baggage and infantry. The mawālī came, infantry except for a solitary horseman. The enemy were pursuing them. 'Abdallāh b. Mu'ammar stood firm against the enemy and thus suffered martyrdom along with men from the Bakr.

The Muslims arose on Saturday morning. The Khāqān drew nigh at midday, but he did not see any place to fight in easier than the position of the Bakr b. Wā'il, who were commanded by Ziyād b. al-Ḥārith. When the Khāqān came at them, the Bakr said to Ziyād b. al-Ḥārith, "Their forces outnumber us. Therefore, let us attack them before they attack us." Ziyād answered them, "I have [1539] practiced (warfare) for seventy years. If you charge them, going up to them, you will be defeated; rather, leave them alone until they draw near," and so they did. When the enemy neared them, they charged them, clearing them away from themselves, so that al-Junayd prostrated himself. The Khāqān said that day, "The Arabs, when they are put in difficult straits, defy death. Therefore, leave them alone until they come out, and do not oppose them, for you cannot stand up to them." Certain maids belonging to al-Junayd came out making ululations, and some men from the people of Syria answered back saying, "God, God, O people of Khurāsān, whither (are you going)?" Al-Junayd said, "(It is) a night like al-

314. A member of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's entourage as early as 82(701), he commanded large forces in Jurjān in 98(717) and in Transoxiana 99–100(718–9), when he is reported to have passed Farghānah. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1078, III/2, 1327–8; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 524; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 302; Ta'rīkh al-Khulafā', 196a.

Jarrāh's night and a day like his day."

In this year, Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr al-Tamīmī was slain.

The Killing of Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr al-Tamīmī and the Rest of the Campaign

According to 'Alī—his authorities: 'Ubaydallāh b. Ḥabīb[315] said to al-Junayd, "Choose between you yourself perishing or else Sawrah." Al-Junayd answered, "It is easier for me that Sawrah perish." 'Ubaydallāh said, "Then write to him so that he may come to you with the forces of Samarqand, for if it reaches the Turks that Sawrah has set out toward you, they will go off toward him to fight him." Therefore, al-Junayd wrote to Sawrah ordering him to come.

It is said that al-Junayd wrote, "Help me." 'Ubādah b. al-Salīl al-Muḥāribī,[316] the father of al-Ḥakam b. 'Ubādah, said to Sawrah, "Look for the coldest house in Samarqand and sleep in it, for then, when you go out, you will not care whether the amīr is angry with you or satisfied." Ḥulays b. Ghālib al-Shaybānī[317] said to him, "The Turks are between you and al-Junayd. If you go out, they will fall on you and take hold of you." Thus he wrote to al-Junayd, "I cannot go out." Al-Junayd wrote back to him, "O son of a stinking [1540] mother, you will come out, for if not, I will send to you Shaddād b. Khālid al-Bāhilī," who was an enemy of Sawrah. "Therefore come, put so-and-so at Farrukhshādh[318] with five hundred bowmen, and

315. Al-Hajarī al-Asbadhī of the 'Abdallāh b. Dārim subtribe of the Tamīm, he belongs to a family of probably at least partly Iranian descent originally from al-Baḥrayn. In 100(719), he was in charge of the finance office for Khurāsān, in 102(721) he sarcastically assailed the governor in an Arabic poem, and in 130(748) an 'Abdallāh b. Ḥabīb al-Hajarī is mentioned supporting Naṣr at Marw. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1354, 1430; Akhbār al-Dawlah, 286; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 234; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 171–2, V, 393.

316. Possibly the same as the Abū al-Salīl al-Bakrī who was the first to stand up in the mosque in 126(744) to oppose the rule of Naṣr and who denounced Marwān b. Muḥammad in 128(746). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1856, 1917.

317. A famous Shī'ite warrior originally from al-Kūfah, he is reputed to have taken part in the revolt of al-Mukhtār as early as 65(685). He entered Khurāsān in 83(702), to which he had fled with the remnants of Ibn al-Ash'ath's rebels, and later fought in 93(712) and 102(721) against al-Sughd and the Turks. See Ṭabarī, I/2, 574, II/2, 1109, 1249, II/2, 1422.

318. Or: Farrukhshīdh. A village outside the wall of Samarqand, for which one of the city's gates was named. See Barthold, Turkestan, 87–8.

stay close to the water and do not leave it." At this, Sawrah decided to set out. Al-Wajaf b. Khālid al-ʿAbdī said, "You are most certainly going to cause yourself and the Arabs to perish by your setting out, as well as causing the destruction or whoever is with you." Sawrah answered, "My lamb will not be removed from the oven until I go." ʿUbādah and Ḥulays said to him, "If you refuse except to set out, then take (the way) by the river." Sawrah answered, "I would not reach al-Junayd by way of the river in two days time, while there is between me and him in this direction (only) a night, so that I will reach him in the morning. Therefore, when the companies of people[319] are quiet (for the night), I will set out to traverse the distance." The Turks' spies came (back to their masters), bringing them the news, while Sawrah ordered the departure, leaving as his deputy in Samarqand Mūsā b. Aswad, one of the Banū Rabīʿah b. Ḥanẓalah. Sawrah went out with twelve thousand. By morning he was at the top of a mountain to which only a non-Arab named Kārtaqabad[320] had guided him. There the Khāqān met him when it was morning. Sawrah had traversed three *farsakh*s, while one farsakh remained between himself and al-Junayd.

According to Abū al-Dhayyāl: Sawrah fought the Turks in a lowland between hills. Both he and the Turks persevered until the heat (of day) became fierce.

Some say that Ghūrak said to the Khāqān, "Your day is a hot [1541] day; therefore, do not fight until the sun is hot upon them, while they are wearing weapons which weigh them down." Thus the Khāqān did not fight, following instead Ghūrak's opinion. Rather, he set fire to the grass, stood against the Muslims and kept them from the water. Sawrah asked ʿUbādah, "What is your opinion, O Abū al-Salīl?" He answered, "My opinion is, by God, that there is no one of the Turks but that he desires spoil; therefore, slaughter these animals, burn these supplies, and bare the sword, and then they will leave the way clear for us."

According to Abū al-Dhayyāl: Sawrah said to ʿUbādah, "What is your opinion?" He answered, "I have given up my opinion." Sawrah asked, "What do you think now?" ʿUbādah replied, "That we go down, pointing our spears (outward in readiness), and march

319. Text: rijl; read: zujal, as Cairo ed. Zujal (sing. zujlah) could also here mean "conditions" rather than "companies of people."

320. Vocalization uncertain.

along slowly, for it is only one farsakh until we reach the camp." Sawrah said, "I am not strong enough to do this, nor are so-and-so and so-and-so," and he enumerated certain men, "but I am of the opinion that I should collect the cavalry along with whomever I think can fight and (with these) strike the Turks, whether I come through safely or perish." Thus he gathered the forces, and they attacked; the Turks were driven back. Dust was stirred up, so that they could not see, while behind the Turks were the flames, which they fell into, the enemy and the Muslims falling into them together. Sawrah also fell, his thigh having been smashed. The Muslims scattered. The dust cloud cleared while the men were thus scattered, so that the Turks cut them off and slew them. None of the Muslims escaped save two thousand, and it is (also) said one thousand. Among those who did escape was ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr al-Samarqandī, whom a man of the Turks recognized and gave protection. Ḥulays b. Ghālib al-Shaybānī was martyred. An Arab commented, "Praise be to God, Ḥulays has been martyred! I saw him bombarding the House[321] in the days of al-Ḥajjāj saying, 'My surging force is an eagle, with brickbats and wooden shafts,' while a woman who was standing there, as often as he threw a stone, would say, 'O Lord, (let it strike) me and not Your House.' Now he has been martyred." [1542]

Al-Muhallab b. Ziyād al-ʿIjlī fled with seven hundred men, including Quraysh b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿAbdī, to a district named al-Murghāb, where they fought the people of one of its fortresses. Al-Muhallab b. Ziyād was wounded, whereupon they put al-Wajaf b. Khālid in command. Then al-Ishkand,[322] the ruler of Nasaf, came against them with cavalry, Ghūrak also being with him. Ghūrak said, "O Wajaf, you have a safe-conduct." Quraysh said, "Do not trust them, but rather when night falls on us, we will go out in spite of them until we reach Samarqand, for if we are with them in the morning, they will slay us." But they disobeyed him and stayed; thus the Turks drove them along to the Khāqān, who said, "I will not allow the safe-conduct given by Ghūrak." Ghūrak said to al-Wajaf, "I am a slave of the Khāqān from his shākiriyyah." The Muslims asked, "Then why did you deceive us?" Thereupon 321. That is, the Kaʿbah.

322. The personal name of the ruler of Nasaf, possibly in charge of Sughdī refugee forces. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 85, 86–7 n.25.

al-Wajaf and his companions fought them but were slain, except for seventeen men who entered a walled garden. Evening fell, and the polytheists cut down a tree and laid it across the garden's en-[1543] trance. Quraysh b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿAbdī came to the tree, threw it aside, and went out with three men. They slept in a sepulchral vault, hiding therein. Being too cowardly, the others did not go out and were killed on the morrow.

Sawrah was also slain. When he was killed, al-Junayd, coming out of the defile, headed for Samarqand in haste. Khālid b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Ḥabīb[323] said to him, "Go! Go!" while al-Mujashshir[324] b. Muzāḥim al -Sulamī was saying, "I plead with you by God, stay!" while al-Junayd was going forward. When al-Mujashshir saw that, he dismounted and took al-Junayd's bridle, saying, "By God, you will not go! Rather you will most certainly make camp whether you like it or not! We will not let you destroy us owing to the talk of this Hajarī! Make camp!" Therefore, al-Junayd made camp, while the people encamped also. But their encampment was not yet complete when the Turks appeared. Al-Mujashshir said, "Had they met us while we were going, would they not have extirpated us?" When it was morning, the two sides engaged in battle. A group of the Muslims fled, and the men retreated. Al-Junayd said, "O people, it is hellfire!" At this, they returned. Al-Junayd ordered a man to call out, "Any slave who fights is free!" At this, the slaves fought so fiercely that the people were astonished by it. One of them would take a saddle blanket, cut an opening in it (for his head) and put it around his neck to protect himself with it. The troops were pleased by what they saw of the perseverance of the slaves.

The enemy renewed the attack, but the men persisted until the enemy was beaten. Then the Muslims went on their way. Mūsā b. al-Naʿīr said to the men, "Are you delighted by what you saw the slaves doing? By God, you will most certainly suffer a critical day from them (sometime)!" Al-Junayd went on his way. The enemy [1544] took a man of the ʿAbd al-Qays, tied him up and hung around his neck the head of Balʿā' al-ʿAnbarī, the son of Mujāhid b. Balʿā'.

323. Al-Hajarī from the ʿAbdallāh b. Dārim. He rebelled with al-Ḥārith b. Surayj from 116(734) to 128(746), but then joined Naṣr's forces. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1572, 1582, 1928; also, note 315.

324. See note 284.

When the men found the 'Abdī, the Banū Tamīm took the head and buried it.

Al-Junayd passed on into Samarqand. He then took the families of those who had been with Sawrah to Marw, while he stayed in al-Sughd four months. The chief commanders of Khurāsān in war were: al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ al-Kharaqī, and 'Ubaydallāh b. Ḥabīb al-Hajarī. Al-Mujashshir would camp the men according to their divisions and also position the outposts, no one having the like of his wise opinion regarding that. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ, if some grave development occurred during war, was second to none in his wise opinion. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ḥabīb was in charge of mobilization for battle. There were also men of the mawālī who were the like of those in wise opinion, sound advice and knowledge about warfare, including al-Faḍl b. Bassām, the mawlā of the Banū Layth,[325] 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh, the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym and al-Bakhtarī b. Mujāhid, the mawlā of the Banū Shaybān.[326]

When the Turks had gone away to their country, al-Junayd dispatched Sayf b. Waṣṣāf al-'Ijlī from Samarqand to Hishām, but Sayf was too cowardly to go, as he feared the way, and he asked to be relieved (of his mission). Thereupon al-Junayd relieved him and sent Nahār b. Tawsi'ah,[327] one of the Banū Taym al-Lāt, and Zumayl b. Suwayd al-Murrī, (of) the Murrah of the Ghaṭafān. Al-Junayd wrote to Hishām, "Sawrah disobeyed me. I ordered him to stick to the water, but he did not do so. Thus his forces scattered from him, a group coming to me at Kishsh, a group (going) to Nasaf and [1545] a group to Samarqand, while Sawrah and rest of his forces were stricken." Hishām then summoned Nahār b. Tawsi'ah to ask him 325. Surely the brother of Ibrāhīm b. Bassām. See note 301. Al-Faḍl first appears in 93(712) or possibly 91(710), where he is recorded only as Ibn Bassām al-Laythī. In 104(722), he was an adviser of the governor Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1222, III/2, 1443; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 246.

326. From the class of government officials who remained loyal to the Umayyads, he later appears with Naṣr b. Sayyār as the latter's adviser and secretary in 120(738) and 130(748), when he was executed by Abū Muslim. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1661, 1666, 1995.

327. One of the best-known Khurāsānī poets and the most famous of them to come from the Bakr. Probably from al-Baṣrah originally, he first appears in the entourage of al-Muhallab in 82(701) and subsequently in the entourages of many of the governors of Khurāsān until 120(738). His poems nearly always reflect support for the current governor, whoever that might be. See 'Aṭwān, al-Shi'r al-'Arabī fī Khurāsān, 280–9; Ibn Qutaybah, Shi'r wa Shu'arā', I, 537–8.

about the news, and the latter told him what he had witnessed. Nahār b. Tawsi'ah then said:

By your life, you did not favor me when you sent me
But rather you only exposed me to dangerous spots.
You invited a group to do it,[328] but they were afraid of mounting it, While I was a man skillful in riding[329] terrors.
Thus I became sure—if God did not forbid—that I Would be the food of beasts of prey or birds that circle overhead,[330]
The Companion of 'Irāk, who was the easiest for you
To lose, whom you had wrapped up with leaves of paper,[331]
For I—even if you prefer 'Irāk owing to blood relationship—Am more greatly preferred by the favor of the Caliphs.
In the time of 'Uthmān, we came as delegations, and before him,
And we were (ever) the possessors of glory both ancient and newly acquired.

'Irāk, a cousin of al-Junayd through their fathers, was with them in the delegation.

Hishām wrote to al-Junayd, "I have just sent to you twenty thousand men as reinforcement, ten thousand from the forces of al-Baṣrah under 'Amr b. Muslim, and from the forces of al-Kūfah ten thousand under 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym,[332] besides weapons including thirty thousand spears and a like number of shields. Enlist, for there is no limit for you in enlistment up to fifteen thousand men."[333]

328. That is, to undertake the mission.

329. Text: rikabuh; read: rakkabah, as in Cairo cd.

330. That is, vultures.

331. Apparently a reference to their dangerous mission of carrying letters without adequate protection.

332. Both of these commanders were Khurāsānīs.

333. M.A. Shaban has translated this obscure and crucial sentence differently: "Enlist (only) 15,000 men because enlistment is purposeless to you." He claims that this command actually entailed a dropping of tribesmen from the army list in Khurāsān. Despite the arguments he adduces, probably the crisis made acute by the Battle of the Defile, (which may have been even worse for the Muslims than is indicated by al-Ṭabarī here), can hardly have led to the dropping of any possible Muslim forces. Therefore, we find little justification for Shaban's view here and follow the more traditional interpretation. See Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 114–7; Gibb, Arab Conquests, 75.

It is said that al-Junayd dispatched the delegation to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, and then Khālid sent a delegation to Hishām to say, "Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr went out hunting with his companions, whereupon the Turks beset them and thus they were stricken." When Hishām was informed of the calamity of Sawrah, he said, "We are God's, and to Him we return![334] The disaster of Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr in Khurāsān and of al-Jarrāḥ at al-Bāb!" [1546]

Naṣr b. Sayyār fought bravely that day, though his sword was broken and the straps of his stirrups were cut, for he took his stirrup straps and beat a man with them until he wore him out. On that day, 'Abd al-Karīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥanafī and eleven men who were with him fell into the flames with Sawrah. Among those in the forces of Sawrah who escaped were one thousand men. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥātim b. al-Nu'mān[335] said, "I saw tents built between the sky and the earth and asked, 'Whose are these?' They told me, 'Those of 'Abdallāh b. Bisṭām and his forces.' Then they were slain on the morrow. Later a man said, 'I passed through that place some time after that and found the fragrance of musk emanating.'"

But al-Junayd did not thank Naṣr for the bravery he had shown. Therefore Naṣr said:

If you envy me for bravely fighting for you
Someday, then the like of my bravery has brought upon me envy.
God forbids, Who by His power has raised
My heel over you and Who has given (me) strength above you,[336]
As well as my smiting the Turks for you on the day you were parted
In the defile by the sword, until it had passed over the summit.

On the Day of the Defile, al-Junayd started into the defile, sup-334. Qur'ān 2:156.

335. Possibly the son, but more likely a grandson, of the Ḥātim b. al-Nu'mān al-Bāhilī mentioned by Crone, though she entirely omits the latter's well-attested role in the conquest of Khurāsān. See Crone, Slaves, 104–5; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 501; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 173; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 46.

336. Compare these two verses with those of Naṣr on p. 1553, below.

posing that no one would come against him from the mountains. He sent Ibn al-Shikhkhīr ahead in charge of the vanguard, while [1547] he himself undertook (to command) the rear. He did not set out wings (at all). The Khāqān approached and defeated the vanguard, which lost killed whom it lost killed. The Khāqān came at al-Junayd from the latter's left, while the Jabghūyah[337] came against the right. Men from the Azd and the Tamīm were struck down, while the Turks also captured tents and structures belonging to al-Junayd. Al-Junayd, when it was evening, gave an order to a man of his own house, saying to him, "Walk among the ranks and the siege engines, listening for what the men are saying and how they are." The man did so and then returned to al-Junayd to report, "I perceived them to be well in spirit, reciting poetry to each other and reading the Qur'ān." That pleased al-Junayd, wherefore he praised God.

It is said that on the Day of the Defile, the slaves took a stand at the side of the camp, when the Turks and Sughdīs had come near and were pouring down on it. The slaves met them and, battling them with tent poles, slew nine of the enemy, whose spoils al-Junayd gave to them.

Ibn al-Sijf said about the Day of the Defile, intending Hishām:

Remember orphans lost in the land of the Turks,
Emaciated, as if they were partridges in their enclosure,
And have mercy, and if not, then reckon it[338] a ruined community
Having neither any breath left in it, nor weight.
Do not hope at all for the continuation of time after them, [1548] Though hope be extended to a man as long as he is alive.
They met regiments from the Khāqān, marked out with banners,
For whom the expanse of the plain and the mountain were narrow.
After they had looked upon them for a little without crying out,
They held out their hands to God, supplicating.

337. Or apparently originally Jabghū. He was the paramount ruler of all Ṭukhāristān in pre-Islamic times, but his influence had been curtailed and was at this time confined to Upper Ṭukhāristān, the center of his territory, where his capital was at Warwālīz, near modern Qundūz, east of Balkh. He seems to have been of Hephthalite Turkish origin. Probably the Jabghū was not present at the Battle of the Defile. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 8–9, 74; Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 11–3.

338. That is, the community of Khurāsānī Muslims.

They paid to the Lord of Moses a true homage:
There was neither doubt in their hearts nor confusion.

Al-Junayd remained at Samarqand that year. The Khāqān went off to Bukhārā, where Qaṭan b. Qutaybah was in command. The people were afraid for Qaṭan on account of the Turks. When al-Junayd consulted them, some said, "Stay in Samarqand and write to the Commander of the Faithful that he supply you with troops." Some said, "You (should) go along until you reach Rabinjan,[339] then from it you go to Kishsh, then from it you go to Nasaf. From it you reach the territory of Zamm and, crossing the Oxus you descend to Āmul, whence you take the road to Qaṭan."[340]

After this, al-Junayd sent to 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh, saying, "People have been giving me conflicting advice." Then al-Junayd informed him of what they said and asked, "What do you think?" 'Abdallāh then demanded of al-Junayd that he not oppose him in what he advised him to do, whether it concerned setting out, encamping, or fighting. Al-Junayd said, "I agree." 'Abdallāh said, "I seek from you certain actions." Al-Junayd asked, "What are they?" 'Abdallāh continued, "That you dig a trench around wherever you encamp. Also do not forget to carry water even if you are on the bank of a river. And that you obey me regarding [1549] your encamping and your setting out." Al-Junayd gave him (the undertaking) that he wanted. 'Abdallāh said:

"As for what they have advised you to do regarding staying in Samarqand until help reaches you, help will come too slow for you. And if you set out, taking the people by another way,[341] you will sap their strength, so that they will be too broken to face their enemy, and the Khāqān will make bold against you. Today he is trying to open (the gates of) Bukhārā, but the Muslims have not opened (them) for him. But if you take another way, the people will scatter from you, hurrying to their homes. The people of Bukhārā will hear of it and surrender to their enemy. However, if you take the mightiest way, the enemy will be in awe of you. My advice to you is that you direct yourself towards the families of those who were present among Sawrah's forces at the defile, so that you may divide them according to their subtribes and transport them with you. I hope that by this God will help you against your enemy. My advice is also that you give to every man who stays behind in Samarqand one thousand dirhams and a horse."

339. A town on the road between Samarqand and Bukhārā on the Zarafshān River, twelve or thirteen farsakhs, west of Samarqand. See Barthold, Turkestan, 96–7.

340. This circuitous route is meant to show the cowardice of those proposing it. See Le Strange, Lands, map IX.

341. Than the one 'Abdallāh is suggesting.

Al-Junayd followed his advice, leaving as his deputy in Samarqand 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr with eight hundred (men), four hundred cavalry and four hundred infantry, whom he supplied with weapons. They reviled 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh, the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym, saying, "He has exposed us to the Khāqān and the Turks; he does not want other than our destruction!" 'Ubaydallah[342] b. Ḥabīb asked Ḥarb b. Ṣubḥ, "How many of you were in the rear today?" Ḥarb answered, "Sixteen hundred." 'Ubaydallāh declared, "We have just been exposed to de-[1550] struction!"

Then al-Junayd ordered the families to be transported. He went out, the people being with him. In charge of his advanced detachments were al-Walīd b. al-Qa'qā' al-'Absī and Ziyād b. Khayrān al-Ṭā'ī. Al-Junayd also sent al-Ashhab b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Ḥanẓalī ahead with ten (men) from the vanguard of the troops, telling him, "As often as you go a stage, send a man back to me to provide me with information."

Al-Junayd went on his way. But when he was at Qaṣr al-Rīḥ,[343] 'Aṭā' al-Dabūsī[344] seized al-Junayd's bridle to hold him back. At this Hārūn al-Shāshī, the mawlā of the Banū Khāzim,[345] beat 'Aṭā' over the head with a spear, until he broke it on his head. Al-Junayd said to Hārūn, "Leave al-Dabūsī alone!" He continued, "What is the matter, O Dabūsī?" Al-Dabūsī answered, "Look for the weak-

342. Text: 'Abdallāh; read: 'Ubaydallāh. See note 315.

343. Unidentified place on the road between Samarqand and Bukhārā.

344. Probably of the Tamīm, he also figured in Sa'īd al- Ḥarashī's campaign in 104(722) and later supported Ibn Surayj. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1442.

345. Text: Ḥāzim; read: Khāzim. No Banū Ḥāzim can be identified from the genealogy books. On the other hand the descendants of Ibn Khāzim al-Sulamī were prominent and had many mawālī. This is supported by manuscript B, where Ibn Ḥāzim replaces Banū Ḥāzim; thus Ibn Khāzim could be the original reading. The violently pro-Qaysi politics of this Hārūn also agree with what we know of the family of Ibn Khāzim. This Hārūn is almost certainly identical with the Hārūn b. al-Siyāwush or Siyāwush who enthusiastically supported Naṣr, in 121(739) and 123(741). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1693, 1722.

est old man among your soldiers, arm him with a complete set of arms, gird him with a sword, quiver, and shield, and give him a spear, then make us go at the speed of his walk, for we are not able to stand being driven, fighting and swiftness of march while we are on foot." Al-Junayd then did that, and no one bothered the troops until they had gone out from the dangerous places.

When al-Junayd drew near to al-Ṭawāwīs,[346] the reconnaissance parties came back (with news) about the approach of the Khāqān. They opposed him at Karmīniyah[347] on the first day of Ramaḍān (113) (November 6, 731).[348] When al-Junayd had gone from Karmīniyah, Muḥammad b. al-Zandī[349] came with the asāwirah[350] at the end of the night. When he was at the edge of the desert of Karmīniyah, he saw the enemy's weakness and thus returned to al-Junayd to inform him. Al-Junayd's herald called out, [1551]
"Will the registered[351] not go out to their enemy?" Then the people went out, and the battle began. A man called out, "O people, you have become Ḥarūrīs[352] and thus have risked your lives!"

ʿAbdallāh b. Abī ʿAbdallāh came to al-Junayd laughing. Al-Junayd said to him, "This is not a day for laughing!" He was answered, "He (only) laughed out of wonder. Praise be to God who has not made you meet these (Turks) except in mountains causing thirst, they being on a mountain top and exhausted at the end of the day, while you have made a camp fortified by a trench, and 346. An important city seven or eight farsakhs northeast of Bukhārā but within the great wall of that oasis. See Barthold, Turkestan, 98–9; Le Strange, Lands, 462.

347. A very large town between al-Ṭawāwīs and Dabūsiyyah, the present Karmine, surrounded by fertile lands watered by canals from the Zarafshān River. See Barthold, Turkestan, 97–8; Le Strange, Lands, 468.

348. This date can better be assigned to 113(731) than to 112(730). See note 299.

349. Tex: al-Randī; read: al-Zandī. This is the nearest possible reading attested by the genealogists and very probable, as it refers to Zandanah, a town four farsakhs north of Bukhārā, west of al-Ṭawāwīs and southwest of Karmīniyah. That al-Junayd would employ a local scout is very likely. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 511; Le Strange, Lands, 462 and map IX.

350. An Arabicized Persian word meaning "heavy, mailed cavalry." Some asāwirah became Muslims as a group in the earliest phase of the Islamic state in Iran and continued to form a separate group in al-Baṣrah, where they became a subtribe of the Tamīm, and probably in Khurāsān. It is presumably these, or other Iranian cavalrymen, that are meant here. See Morony, Iraq, 198, 207–8, 528.

351. That is, in the dīwān.

352. That is, Khārijites. Implications of the line are obscure, except that the Khārijites had a reputation for fighting furiously.

you have supplies with you." Thus the Turks fought (only) a little and then retreated. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh had said to al-Junayd while they were fighting, "Break camp and depart," whereupon al-Junayd asked him, "And is there any way?" 'Abdallāh answered, "Yes, you go with your standard about three ghalwas.[353] The Khāqān would have wished you to stay put and thus gather his forces around you when he wanted." Therefore, al-Junayd gave orders to set out. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh was in command of the rear. He sent a message to al-Junayd saying, "Make camp." Al-Junayd replied, "Shall I make camp in a waterless place?" 'Abdallāh again sent him a message, "If you do not make camp, you will lose Khurāsān." Thereupon he made camp, commanding the men to make a provision of water, whereupon the troops—the infantry and the archers—went in two columns, drawing water and passing the night. When they arose in the morning, they departed. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh said:

"You, O Arabs, are (in) four divisions, which must not find fault with one another. No fourth can desert its place. There is a vanguard, which is (also) the center, two wings and a rear. If [1552] the Khāqān gathers his cavalry and infantry and then hits a certain division of yours, namely the rear, it will be your destruction, and it is likely that he will do so. I expect that today. Therefore, strengthen the rear with cavalry."

Thus al-Junayd sent (there) the cavalry of the Banū Tamīm, including the armored cavalry. The Turks came to assault the rear when the Muslims had drawn near to al-Ṭawāwīs. They fought, the battle becoming severe between them. Salm b. Aḥwaz attacked one of the Turkish nobles, slaying him.

The Turks drew a bad omen (from the outcome of the battle) and went away from al-Ṭawāwīs. The Muslims went on their way, coming to Bukhārā on the day of (the feast of) al-Mihrijān.[354]

They met us with Bukhārī dirhams, giving them out ten to each man. 'Abd al-Mu'min b. Khālid[355] said, "I saw 'Abdallāh b. Abī

353. See note 132.

354. A Zoroastrian festival associated with the autumnal equinox, Mihrijān should fall in September, but here occurs on about November 7. Apparently the Zoroastrian festivals had become unsynchronized with the seasons. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 461n; EI[1], s.v. Mihr.

355. Abū Khālid al-Ḥanafī, a judge of Marw and a traditionist. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 432-3; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ṭabaqāt, 323.

'Abdallāh after his death in a dream. He said, 'Tell people about me by (citing) my (sound) advice on the Day of the Defile.'"

Al-Junayd use to mention Khālid b. 'Abdallāh saying, "A rag among rags; a man without family, the son of a man without family; a lonely man (qull), the son of a lonely man; a thin-bellied one (hayfah) among the thin-bellied." It is claimed that hayfah means 'hyena,' that 'ujrah[356] means 'pig' and that qull means 'solitary one.'

The troops with 'Amr b. Muslim al-Bāhilī from the inhabitants of al-Baṣrah and with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al-Ghāmidī[357] from among the inhabitants of al-Kūfah came while al-Junayd was at al-Ṣaghāniyān. He sent with them al-Ḥawtharah b. Yazīd al-'Anbarī and those whom he had deputed (to go) with him among [1553] the merchants and others, commanding them to bear away the families of the people of Samarqand but to leave the fighters there, and they did so.

Abū Ja'far:[358] It has been said that the Battle of the Defile between al-Junayd and the Khāqān was in the year 113.[359]

Naṣr b. Sayyār said, remembering the Day of the Defile and the slaves' fighting:

I have lived while those who envy me are many.
O Owner of the Ascending Stairways,[360] do not lessen their number!
If you[361] envy me for the like of (my) bravery for you
One day, then the like of my bravery will have drawn envy to me.
God, Who has raised my heel over you by his power
And has equipped (me) better than you, refuses (except that I be so).[362]
I charged the enemy with wounded horses,

356. This word does not appear in the text just cited by al-Ṭabarī, as is stated in a footnote in the Leiden edition. Unless it originally occurred earlier in the text before being lost in transmission, its mention here is superfluous as explanation.

357. Text: al-'Āmirī; read: al-Ghāmidī. See note 77.

358. That is, al-Ṭabarī himself.

359. As we have seen this is the correct date. See note 248.

360. A title of God. See Qur'ān 70:3.

361. Plural, referring to the enviers.

362. Compare this and the preceding verse with Naṣr's verses on p. 1546, above.

Until they took (an upper) hand against their enviers.
Who is he among you, in the defile, when the enemy came,
Who did not head for the main part of the baggage as (his) goal?[363]
You did not thereby keep the command from God, nor Did you perseverantly seek the good (reward)[364] of what He has promised.
Nothing prevented you from sitting in camp at the time of hardship
Except the slaves breaking wooden staves by smiting (with them).[365]
Should you have not thanked my defense of your Junayd
When the spears were clashing, the meteor of war having [1554] blazed up?

Ibn 'Irs al-'Abdī, praising Naṣr on the Day of the Defile and blaming al-Junayd, because Naṣr performed outstandingly on that day, said:

O Naṣr, you are hero of all of Nizār;[366]
Yours are the brilliant deeds and highest action.
You cleared away anxiety from all the tribes
In the defile, when they had submitted and been humbled.
On the day of al-Junayd, when the spears were contending,
The throat bloody and the banners brightly flapping,
You did not cease charging them with a free soul,
Until their multitude opened up and broke apart.
All the people after it are your freedmen;
Yours are the noble and exalted qualities all together.

Al-Shar'abī al-Ṭā'ī said:

I remembered Hind in a strange country:
O how much longing you have! Will you ever be reunited?
I remembered her, though al-Shāsh lay between me and her,

363. Rather than fighting.
364. That is, martyrdom is God's path.
365. That is, the troops fought only because the slaves were putting them to shame by fighting well.
366. Note that the 'Abdī poet uses Nizār, the nearest shared ancestor of his tribe with Naṣr, to include himself and his people with Naṣr's group.

And the defile of 'Iṣām,[367] while destinies were being fulfilled,[368]
A country wherein is the Khāqān, his slow-marching armies huge in numbers,
And iron-helmeted Naylān[369] with seventy thousand men.
When the Khāqān moves and his troops go forth,
(Many) deaths come near to us at that time. [1555]
There, Hind, we do not amount to half of them,
Nor do we have, O Hind, anything we covet from the enemy.
Have I not seen many a fleshy young woman Whom an ugly, fat-faced, small-eared Sughdī was driving along (as a captive)?
I try to protect her when her intimate friend has turned away;
She calls the Muslims to herself, making herself heard.
She calls in her loudest voice to the warriors of her people,
'Is there not a man among you who is jealous (for me) and will return (to rescue me)?
Is there not a noble man among you who will bring me back,
Who realizes that death in some instances profits?'
They did not answer her, except that her veil
In the palm of the young man in the midst of the squadrons is more hideous.
To God I complain about a shrinking in their[370] hearts
And a terror which has filled their insides and is spreading.
Who will carry from me a letter (on) paper
To Khālid before we are divided up (as booty):
That, like our remnants, our amīr,
If we count him, is the humiliated one brought low. [1556]
They[371] made the Khāqān and his soldiers greedy for us:

---

367. This place, named for Iṣām b. 'Abdallāh al-Bāhilī, was in the southern part of Farghānah in the district of Isfarah. It had only been briefly held by the Muslims under Qutaybah and then lost following a possible defeat in Farghānah unmentioned in Ṭabarī. By mentioning this place, the poet seems to be exaggerating the length of separation from his beloved as well as stirring up memories of past debacles to compare with al-Junayd's. See Gibb, Arab Conquest, 49, 62; Barthold, Turkestan, 160–1, 186.

368. By death in the present battle.

369. Abū Unūjūr, the cousin of the king of Farghānah through their fathers and the king's governor of Isfarah in 103(721). See Ṭabari, III/2, 1440, 1442.

370. That is, the Muslim fighters.

371. An ambiguous "they," referring to traitors or bunglers on the Muslim side.

Should not we wish we were dry and broken grass shaken (by the wind)?

Ibn 'Irs's name is Khālid b. al-Mu'ārik of the Banū Ghanm b. Wadī'ah b. Lukayz b. Afṣā.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—an informant from the 'Abd al-Qays: Ibn 'Irs's mother was a slave girl; therefore, his brother Tamīm b. al-Mu'ārik sold him to 'Amr b. Laqīṭ, one of the Banū 'Āmir b. al-Ḥārith.[372] Being about to die, 'Amr freed him, saying, "O Abū Ya'qūb, how much wealth do I have in your keeping?" He answered, "Eighty thousand (dirhams)." 'Amr said, "You are free, and what is in your hands is yours."

'Amr used to live in Marw al-Rūdh.[373] The 'Abd al-Qays had fought with each other concerning Ibn 'Irs and sent him back to his people. Ibn 'Irs said to al-Junayd:

Where are the protectors in war of a group
Who were the beauty of the angry vanguard?
They have perished according to destinies which they came to,
And the wandering one granted a respite (from death) is like he who has perished.
The eye causes its tears to flow copiously:
There is nothing to hold back the eye's tears.
Look: do you see that the dead ever return, [1557] Or do you see in time anything everlasting?
Formerly, our strength used to be feared,
When we would throw back defeated enemy ranks against those still coming on,
Until we were tried by that which blemished us
After (we had possessed) mighty, overwhelming strength.
Like he who hocks his camel without swerving
At first, being enraged and exhausted,
You split open a thing whose breach could not be repaired
With an abundantly numerous, assembled army.

372. Of the 'Abd al-Qays like Ibn 'Irs, he was in 83(702) Ibn al-Ash'ath's governor of Kirmān, whence he presumably fled to Khurāsān, where he was spared by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's clemency to the Yaman and the Rabī'ah. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1105.

373. An important town of the upper Murghāb River about 160 miles south of Marw, it was a center for the Banū Tamīm. See Le Strange, Lands, 404–5; Ṭabarī, passim.

You weep because of war[374] when it has shown itself:[375]
May you be mutilated and cut up as a commander!
You abandoned us, pieces of a slaughtered beast
Which the slaughterer divides for a round-breasted girl.
Drawn swords rose,
Cutting off (arms at the elbow) between the upper and lower arms.
Heads fell continuously from their blows
Between two sides flashing with lightning, thundering.
While you were like an infant girl in her (women's) tent,
Not ever knowing the trick of the trickster. [1558]
We are people whose war is difficult:
It blasts (both) the standing and the sitting.
Samarqand and its contingents have become
The talk of (both) those absent and those present.
How many a resolute (warrior) is buried in the defile,
Robust of powers, a possessor of strength, praiseworthy,
Who sought relief in the disaster and engaged blindly in the clamor (of battle), Neither fearstruck, feeble nor holding back.
If only you[376] were on the Day of the Defile in a pit Covered over with hard, dry mud!
War and its sons play with you
As hawks play with quails coming (to water).
Your heart flew, owing to the battle, out of fear;
Your flying heart will not return.
You should not ever have thought the battle on the day of the forenoon (To be) like your drinking tangy wine with ice.
I hate the wide beauty of your eye,
As well as a face in a corrupt body.
Junayd, your stock is not attributable
To an (authentic) origin, nor was your ancestor ascendant (in stature). [1559]
Fifty thousand were slain having gone astray,
While you cried out for them like a shepherd for lost sheep.

374. That is, the disaster of the defile.
375. Lit., "when it has uncovered its leg."
376. That is, al-Junayd.

Do not press at all to meet with war:
You are not to be praised in rushing upon (the enemy).
I have put on him[377] as a collar around his neck, the collar of a lone, warbling pigeon,
A poem which a poet penned,
That the posts might hurry it to Khālid.

Pilgrimage and Governors

In this year Ibrāhīm b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī led the pilgrimage.

I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar:

It has been stated that the one who led the pilgrimage in this year was Sulaymān b. Hishām.[378] The governors of the main provinces in this year were the same as those who were (in office) in the year 111, whom we have mentioned before.

377. That is, the messenger of Ibn ʿIrs to Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh.

378. Abū al-Ghamr, the son of the Caliph Hishām. He was later famous for his campaigns against the Byzantines as well as for his army of personal retainers, the Dhakwāniyyah, which were a mainstay of the regime of Yazīd b. al-Walīd and which he used against Marwān b. Muḥammad. He was executed by the ʿAbbāsids 132(750). See Zubayrī, Nasab, 168; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 339, 375–6, 381–2, 554; Shaban, Islamic History 600-750, 147, 154, 157, 161–3.

The Events of the Year

113

(MARCH 15, 731 - MARCH 2, 732)

Among the events in it was the death of ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Bukht[379] while he was with al-Baṭṭāl ʿAbdallāh[380] in the land of the Byzantines.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—ʿAbdal-ʿAzīz b. ʿUmar: [1560] ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Bukht went out campaigning with al-Baṭṭāl in the year 113, but al-Baṭṭāl's forces were defeated and fell back. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, however, tried to make his horse turn again to attack, saying, "I have never seen a horse more cowardly than it! May God spill my blood if I do not spill yours!" Then he threw his helmet off his head and shouted, "I am ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Bukht! Is it from Paradise that you flee?" Then he advanced against the throats of the enemy. As he passed a man, he was saying, "I am so thirsty!" The man said, "Go forward, water is before you." Thus he charged into the enemy and was slain along with his horse.

Among the events was what Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik did in splitting up his armies in the lands of the Khāqān. Thereby cities 379. Abū ʿUbaydah. A Meccan mawlā of the Marwānids, also a transmitter of ḥadīth. See Ibn Kathir, Bidāyah, IX, 304–5.

380. The great Muslim frontier fighter against the Byzantines and an epic hero, he conquered Gangra in Paphlagonia in 109(728) and fell near Akroinos in central Anatolia, apparently in the summer of 122(740). See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Baṭṭāl, ʿAbd Allāh.

and fortresses were conquered at his hands, (many) of their people being killed, taken prisoner, and made captive. A great number of the Turks burned themselves up with fire. Those who were behind the mountains of Balanjar submitted to Maslamah; also, the son of the Khāqān was slain.

Among the events was the campaign of Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām against the territory of the Byzantines. He stationed himself in the vicinity of Mar'ash,[381] then returned.

In this year a group of the missionaries of the Banū al-'Abbās went to Khurāsān. Al-Junayd arrested a man from among them, killing him. He declared, "Whoever of them is found, his blood may be shed with impunity."

Pilgrimage and Governors

Sulaymān b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik led the pilgrimage in this [1561] year according to the statement of Abu Ma'shar.

I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: Al-Wāqidī said likewise.

Some have said that the one who led the pilgrimage in this year was Ibrāhīm b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī. The governors of the major provinces in this year were those who had been their governors in the year 112(730), of whom mention has been made by us already.

381. Formerly the Byzantine Germanikeia, this important city of northeast Cilicia in the Taurus foothills is still Maraş in modern Turkey. See EI[1], s.v. Mar'ash.

The Events of the Year

114

(MARCH 3, 732—FEBRUARY 20, 733)

Among the events were the summer campaign of Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām (against the Byzantines) on the left flank and the summer campaign of Sulaymān b. Hishām on the right flank. It has been recorded that Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām took the outer city of Aqrun[382] and that 'Abdallāh al-Baṭṭāl met a force under Constantine,[383] defeating them and taking Constantine prisoner. Sulaymān b. Hishām reached Qaysariyyah. In this year, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik removed Ibrāhīm b. Hishām from al-Madīnah, appointing as its governor (instead) Khālid b. 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam.[384]

According to al-Wāqidī: Khālid b. Abd al-Maḷik came to al-Madīnah on the fifteenth of the month of Rabī' al-Awwal (March 16, 732). The governorship of Ibrāhīm b. Hishām in al-Madīnah lasted eight years.

---

382. Akroinos, now Afyonkarahisar, in western Anatolia. See Ramsay, Asia Minor, 54; Theophanes, Chronicle, 101, 103; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 509–10; EI^{2}, s.v. Afyūn Ḳara Ḥiṣār and s.v. al-Baṭṭāl, 'Abd Allāh.

383. Not, of course, the heir to the Byzantine throne, the future Constantine V (718–775).

384. Al-Umawī, he is the second cousin of the Caliph Hishām. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 170–1; Wakī', Quḍāh, I, 171–4. Ibn al-Kalbī has a slightly variant genealogy for him. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharat, I, 10, II, 340.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year Muḥammad b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī[385] was made governor of Mecca.

According to certain authorities: Rather Muḥammad b. Hishām was made governor of Mecca in the year 113. When Ibrāhīm was dismissed, Muḥammad b. Hishām was confirmed as governor of Mecca.

[1562] In this year, the plague reportedly broke out at Wāsiṭ.[386]

In it, Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik returned from al-Bāb after defeating the Khāqān. He built al-Bāb and fortified what was there.

Pilgrimage and Governors

In this year, Hishām appointed Marwān b. Muḥammad[387] governor of Armenia and Ādharbayjān.

There is a difference of opinion about who led the pilgrimage in this year.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam led the pilgrimage in the year 114 while he was governor of al-Madīnah.

According to certain authorities: Muḥammad b. Hishām led the pilgrimage in this year while governor of Mecca. Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Malik stayed at home that year and did not attend the pilgrimage.

Al-Wāqidī—ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar[388] —Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān[389] said the same.

According to al-Wāqidī—Abū Maʿshar: Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Malik led the pilgrimage in the year 114 while Muḥammad b. Hishām was governing Mecca—we regard this as the correct version.

The governors of the major provinces in this year were the same

---

385. Maternal uncle of the Caliph Hishām, executed by Yūsuf b. ʿUmar 125(743). See Zubayrī, Nasab, 329; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 354.

386. The great military base of the Umayyads, a large city in its own right, halfway between al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah in southern Iraq. See EI[1], s.v. Wāsiṭ.

387. Later the last Umayyad caliph 126(744)–132(750). See EI[1], s.v. Marwān II b. Muḥammad.

388. Abū Muḥammad ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Miswar b. Makhramah al-Zuhrī al-Madanī ca. 95(714)–170(786), a traditionist from a family of traditionists and also a scion of a noble Qurashī lineage. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 171–3.

389. Abū Muḥammad al-Madanī ca. 60(680)-145(762), the famous traditionist. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 399–400.

as those in the year before, except that the governor of al-Madīnah in this year was Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Malik, the governor of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif was Muḥammad b. Hishām, and the governor of Armenia and Ādharbayjān was Marwān b. Muḥammad.

The Events of the Year 115

(FEBRUARY 21, 733—FEBRUARY 9, 734)

Among the events in it was the campaign of Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām [1563] in the land of the Byzantines.

In it, the plague broke out in Syria.

Pilgrimage and Governors

Muḥammad b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl led the pilgrimage in this year while he was governor of Mecca and al-Ṭā'if.

I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit — his informant — Isḥāq b. 'Īsā — Abū Ma'shar.

The governors of the major provinces in this year were the same as those in the year 114, except that there is a difference of opinion about the governor of Khurāsān in this year.

According to al-Madā'inī: Its governor was al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān.

According to certain authorities: Its governor was 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym al-Murrī. He who has said that claims that al-Junayd died in this year, naming as his successor 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym, but as for al-Madā'inī, he reported that the death of al-Junayd was in the year 116.

In this year, a severe drought and famine befell the people in Khurāsān. Al-Junayd wrote to the rural districts, "Marw used to be secure and tranquil, its provision coming to it abundantly from every place, but it became ungrateful for the blessings of God![390] Therefore, bring food to it!"

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: This year al-Junayd gave a man a dirham with which he bought a loaf (of bread). Al-Junayd said to them,[391] "You complain of hunger and of a loaf for a dirham! When I was in India, a grain of cereal used to sell by piece for a dirham!" He said, "Marw is as God said, 'And God strikes a parable: a city which used to be secure and tranquil.'"[392]

390. Qur'ān 16:112.
391. Apparently meaning "those present."
392. Qur'ān 16:112.

The Events of the Year 116

(FEBRUARY 10, 734 - JANUARY 30, 735)

[1564] Among these were what happened in the summer campaign of Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām in the territory of the Byzantines.

In this year, a severe plague occurred in Iraq and Syria, the severest of it being—according to what has been reported—at Wāsiṭ.

In it occurred the death of al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān and (the beginning of) the governorship of 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd al-Hilālī in Khurāsān.

The Matter of al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Murrī and 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh al-Hilālī in Khurāsān

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: Al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān married al-Fāḍilah bt. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. At this, Hishām became angry with al-Junayd and appointed 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh as governor of Khurāsān (instead). As al-Junayd was suffering from dropsy, Hishām said to 'Āṣim, "If you reach him while he still has a last spark of life, cause his soul to depart." But when 'Āṣim arrived, al-Junayd had died.

(Certain authorities) report that Jabalah b. Abī Rawwād came in to visit al-Junayd when he was sick. Al-Junayd said, "O Jabalah, what are the people saying?" I[393] said, "They are in pain for the governor." He said, "This is not what I asked you about. What are they saying?" as he pointed towards Syria with his hand. I said, "Yazīd b. Shajarah al-Rahāwī[394] is coming to Khurāsān." Al-Junayd said, "That (man) is the lord of the Syrians." Then he asked, "And who else?" I said, "'Iṣmah or 'Iṣām," hinting at 'Āṣim. He said, "If 'Āṣim comes, he will be a trying enemy. There is (to be) no greeting for him nor welcome." [1565]

Al-Junayd died in that illness of his in al-Muḥarram of the year 116 (February 10 - March 11, 734). He left behind as his deputy 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym. 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh came and imprisoned 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym and al-Junayd's officials, torturing them. Al-Junayd's death was at Marw. Abū al-Juwayriyyah 'Īsā b. 'Iṣmah[395] said, eulogizing him:

Generosity and al-Junayd have perished together;
Upon generosity and al-Junayd be peace!
They have both become buried in the the ground of Marw
As long as the pigeons sing on the branches.
You two were the pleasure of noble persons; thus when You died, generosity died as did the noble.

Then Abū al-Juwayriyyah came to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī, praising him, but Khālid said to him, "Did you not say: 'Generosity and al-Junayd have perished together?' You will get nothing from us." Thereupon Abū al-Juwayriyyah left, saying:

The shining one of the horizons continues to bear us
To 'Umārah and the strong-necked camels fat of hump.[396]

(This is from) a poem in which he praised 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym, the cousin of al-Junayd through their fathers. 'Umārah was the

393. That is, Jabalah.

394. Of the Sahm b. Sa'd b. 'Abdallāh b. Rahā' branch of the Madhḥij. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 265, II, 596; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 483. Curiously, a man with the same names is represented as active from 39(659) to 58(678), when he is reported killed. See Ṭabarī, VI/1, 3448, 1/2, 86, 173, 181.

395. Possibly the same as Abū al-Juwayriyyah, the mawlā of the Juhaynah, a Kūfan poet in 122(740), but pro-Yaman. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1711.

396. Or possibly, "To 'Umārah and the lofty, broad-based mountains," though this seems less likely.

grandfather of Abū al-Haydhām,[397] the leader in the factionalism in Syria.

ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbdallāh arrived and imprisoned ʿUmārah b. Ḥuraym and the officials of al-Junayd, torturing them.

In this year al-Ḥārith b. Surayj rebelled, and war occurred be-[1566] tween him and ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbdallāh.

About the Revolt of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj

According to ʿAlī—his authorities: When ʿĀṣim came to Khurāsān as governor, al-Ḥārith b. Surayj advanced from al-Nakhudh[398] until he reached al-Fāryāb.[399] He sent Bishr b. Jurmūz ahead of him.

ʿĀṣim sent al-Khaṭṭāb b. Muḥriz al-Sulamī, Manṣūr b. ʿUmar b. Abī al-Kharqāʾ al-Sulamī,[400] Hilāl b. ʿUlaym al-Tamīmī,[401] al-Ashhab al-Ḥanẓalī, Jarīr b. Hamyān al-Sadūsī[402] and Muqātil b. Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī, the mawlā of Maṣqalah, to al-Ḥārith. Khaṭṭāb and Muqātil b. Ḥayyān had said, "Do not meet him without offering a safe-conduct," but the group refused. When they reached him at al-Fāryāb, he bound them with chains and imprisoned them, assigning a man to guard them.

But they tied the man up and escaped from the prison, riding their mounts and driving off the mounts of the post. They passed through al-Ṭālaqān, where Suhrab,[403] the ruler of al-Ṭālaqān, in-

397. His geneology (nasab) given in various works as ʿĀmir b. ʿUmārah b. Ḥuraym obviously cannot be correct, as al-Ṭabari here specifically states that he is ʿUmārah's grandson, not his son, and as his leadership of the Qays at the factionalism in Damascus in 176(792) comes sixty years after ʿUmārah's activity. A note in a manuscript of Ibn Durayd calls him ʿAmir b. Ḍubārah, but Ḍubārah is probably only a copyist's error for ʿUmārah. Thus it seems the name of his father has dropped from his geneology. Perhaps his true name is Abū al-Haydhām b. ʿĀmir b. ʿUmārah. See Crone, Slaves, 98; Ṭabarī, I/3, 624–5; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 127, II, 168; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 289.

398. The present Andkhuy in northern Afghanistan. See Le Strange, Lands, 426; EI[2], s.v. Andkhuy.

399. Now Dawlatābād in Afghanistan, though Le Strange identifies it with the nearby Khayrābād. See Le Strange, Lands, 426; EI[2], s.v. Fāryāb.

400. A diehard Muḍarī, supporter of Naṣr b. Sayyār and opponent of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj, he held various posts and was executed at Marw in 130(748) by Abū Muslim. See Ṭabarī, III/2 1688–9, 1868–9, 1989.

401. Abū Muḥārib al-Mujāshiʿī. He was with Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī in 104(722) counselling caution. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1442; Ibn Khayyāt, Taʾrīkh, 587.

402. He too was with Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī in 104(722). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1446.

403. The local Iranian prince, apparently already on the throne in 90(709). See tended to do them ill but then held back and left them alone. When they reached Marw, ʿĀṣim commanded them to deliver sermons dealing with al-Ḥārith, in which they mentioned the wickedness of his behavior and his treachery. Then al-Ḥārith moved on to Balkh, where Naṣr was in charge. The troops (there) fought him, but he defeated the men of Balkh, whereupon Naṣr went away to Marw.

According to certain authorities: When al-Ḥārith was drawing near to Balkh, al-Tujībī b. Ḍubayʿah al-Murrī and Naṣr b. Sayyār were in charge of it, both having been appointed by al-Junayd. [1567]

Al-Ḥārith reached the Bridge of ʿAṭā', which is on the Balkh River[404] two *farsakh*s from the city, and met Naṣr b. Sayyār, who had ten thousand (men) with him, while al-Ḥārith b. Surayj had four thousand. Al-Ḥārith called them to (obey) the Qurʾān and the Sunnah and to pay homage to an acceptable candidate.[405] At this, Qaṭan b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Juzayy al-Bāhilī said, "O Ḥārith, you call (us) to God's book and the Sunnah. By God, even if Gabriel was on your right and Michael was on your left, I would not respond to you!" Qaṭan fought them, but a shot hit him in the eye, so that he was the first killed. The forces of Balkh fled to the city in defeat. Al-Ḥārith followed them until he entered it, while Naṣr went out from another gate. Al-Ḥārith commanded (his men) to desist from (attacking) the men of Balkh further. A man in the forces of al-Ḥārith said, "I was walking in one of the streets of Balkh when I passed by women weeping, one of whom was saying, 'O father, would that I knew who struck you!' A bedouin Arab who was walking beside me asked, 'Who is this weeping woman?' Someone said to him, 'The daughter of Qaṭan b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Juzayy.' The bedouin said, 'I, by your father, struck you (with this misfortune)!' I asked him, 'Did you kill him?' He answered, 'Yes.'

It is said that Naṣr came while al-Tujībī was in charge of Balkh. Naṣr imprisoned al-Tujībī, who remained a prisoner until al-Ḥārith defeated Naṣr. Al-Tujībī had whipped al-Ḥārith forty lashes during the governorship of al-Junayd, wherefore al-Ḥārith trans-

---

Ṭabarī, II/2, 1206.

404. Presently the Dehās River. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 78.

405. That is, for the position of amīr. Al-Ḥārith did not specify that "the chosen one" (al-riḍā) should be from the Prophet's family.

ferred him to the castle of Bādhkar[406] at Zamm. A man from the Banū Ḥanīfah came claiming that al-Tujībī, when he was in charge [1568] of Herat, had slain his brother. Al-Ḥārith gave him over to the Ḥanafī. Al-Tujībī said to him, "I will ransom myself from you for one hundred thousand (dirhams)," but the man did not accept (it) from him and killed him. Some say that al-Tujībī was slain in the governorship of Naṣr before al-Ḥārith came against him.

When al-Ḥārith gained control of Balkh, he appointed as governor for it a man from the sons of ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim[407] and departed. When he was in al-Jūzjān,[408] he summoned Wābiṣah b. Zurārah al-ʿAbdī and also summoned Dujājah and Waḥsh, the two ʿIjlīs, Bishr b. Jurmūz and Abū Fāṭimah to ask, "What is your sound advice?" Abū Fāṭimah answered, "Marw is the iron helmet of Khurāsān and its horsemen are many; even if they only met you with their slaves, they would obtain their due from you. Therefore, stay (where you are). If they come against you, you will fight them, if they stay (where they are), you will cut off their supplies." Al-Ḥārith said, "I do not see (it) that way; rather, I will go to them." Thus al-Ḥārith having taken Balkh, al-Jūzjān, al-Fāryāb, al-Ṭālaqān, and Marw al-Rūdh, advanced to Marw. The people of religion among the people of Marw said, "If he passes on to Abrashahr and does not come to us, he will divide our community; if he comes against us, he will be overtaken by misfortune."

It reached ʿĀṣim that the people of Marw were corresponding with al-Ḥārith. ʿĀṣim resolved to set out, saying, "O people of Khurāsān, you have rendered the oath of allegiance to al-Ḥārith b. Surayj.[409] He does not proceed to a city except that you have left it to him. I am going to betake myself to the land of my people, Abrashahr, and write from it to the Commander of the Faithful so that he may supply me with ten thousand (troops) from the inhabitants of Syria." Al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim said to him, "If they[410] give you their oath of allegiance (promising) to divorce their wives and free their slaves (if they fail to uphold it), then stay;
[1569] if they refuse, then go until you reach Abrashahr and write to the 406. The citadel of Samm. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 78.

407. Text Ḥāzim; read: Khāzim. He is Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh. See note 50.

408. A large district west of Balkh in Lower Ṭukhāristān, a center of the Tamīm. See EI[2], s.v. Djūzdjān.

409. Text: Shurayḥ; read; Surayj.

410. That is, the Muslim forces from Marw.

Commander of the Faithful, that he may supply you with Syrian troops." Khālid b. Huraym,[411] one of the Banū Tha'labah b. Yarbū', and Abū Muḥārib Hilāl b. 'Ulaym said, "By God, we will not let you go. Your debt to the Commander of the Faithful constrains us. We are with you until we die, provided that you pay generously." 'Āṣim said, "I will do so." Yazīd b. Qarrān-al-Riyāḥī[412] said three times, "If I do not fight beside you as long as you fight, then the daughter of al-Abrad b. Qurrah[413] is divorced." She was his wife. 'Āṣim asked, "Are you all in accord with this?" They said, "Yes," whereupon Salamah b. Abī 'Abdallāh,[414] the commander of 'Āṣim's guard, made them swear to divorce their wives (if they were unfaithful to their oaths).

Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj approached Marw with a numerous assemblage (of forces)—it is said with sixty thousand men—including the cavalry of the Azd and the Tamīm, among whom were: Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā,[415] Ḥammād b. 'Āmir b. Mālik al-Ḥimmānī,[416] Dāwūd al-A'sar, Bishr b. Unayf al-Riyāḥī,[417] and 'Aṭā' al-Dabūsī. Some of the dihqāns of al-Jūzjān (were present), as well as Tarsul[418] the dihqān of al-Fāryāb,[419] Suhrab the prince of al-Ṭālaqān, and Qaryāqis[420] the dihqān of Marw, along with their

411. Apparently the son of the famous Khurāsānī warrior Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah 'Adī b. Hārithah al-Mujāshi'ī, despite his identification here with the very different Banū Tha'labah b. Yarbū'. This group is not mentioned in the sources as being in Khurāsān after 32(653) and perhaps had been integrated with the Banū al-Mujāshi'. Khālid was a supporter of Naṣr in 128(746). See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1041, III/2, 1917; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 61, II, 287.

412. He appears once more with Naṣr in 121(739). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1691.

413. A partisan of Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr, he later revolted with Ibn al-Ash'ath and is last heard of in 83(702). See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1094; Crone, Slaves, 112–3.

414. A brother of 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh al-Kirmānī, the mawlā of the Sulaym, Salamah was a supporter of Juday' b. 'Alī al-Kirmānī in 128(746). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1933–4.

415. Al-Farāhīdhī of the Azd. He was a famous warrior of Khurāsān who at different times supported al-Ḥārith, Naṣr, and al-Kirmānī, and is last heard of in 130(748). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1971–2, 1985; Akhbār al-Dawlah, 244.

416. The son of 'Amir b. Mālik, the Tamīmī leader of al-Jūzjān. See note 73. Ḥammād was governor of al-Jūzjān for Naṣr in 125(743) and was later with Naṣr in 128(746). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1918, 1922; Akhbār al-Dawlah, 244.

417. After reconciling with Naṣr, he was still fighting for him in 129(747). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1970.

418. Vocalization uncertain. He was called "King of al-Fāryād" in 90(709). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1206.

419. Text: li-Fāryāb; read: al-Fāryāb, as Cairo ed.

420. Vocalization uncertain.

likes.

ʿĀṣim went forth with the forces of Marw and others and camped at Jiyāsar[421] beside the synagogue.[422] He gave the troops a [1570] dīnār each, but the men spoke evil of him. Then gave them three dīnārs each, giving to both the troops and others. When the two sides drew near to each other, ʿĀṣim ordered the bridges to be destroyed. Al-Ḥārith's men came up and said (to ʿĀṣim's men), "You are holding us in the desert! Allow us to cross over to you, that we may debate with you about the matter for whose sake we have mobilized." But ʿĀṣim's men refused, whereupon al-Ḥārith's infantry set about repairing the bridges. The infantry of the inhabitants of Marw came to fight them. Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā al-Farāhīdhī went over to ʿĀṣim with his standard, bringing it over with two thousand men. He joined the Azd (division in ʿĀṣim's army). Ḥammad b. ʿĀmir b. Mālik al-Ḥimmānī went over to ʿĀṣim as well. He joined the Banū Tamīm.

According to Salamah al-Azdī: Al-Ḥārith had sent envoys to ʿĀṣim, including Muḥammad b. Muslim al-ʿAnbarī, to ask him to act in accord with the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet. Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj that day wore black.

When Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā changed sides, al-Ḥārith's troops began to attack. The forces met. The first to be slain was Ghiyāth b. Kulthūm of the family of al-Jārūd. Al-Ḥārith's troops were defeated. Many men of al-Ḥārith's forces drowned in the canals of Marw and the Great River.[423] The *dihqān*s returned to their own lands. On that day, Khālid b. ʿIlbāʾ b. Ḥabīb b. al-Jārūd[424] was hit on his face.

ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbdallāh sent ʿAbd al-Muʾmin[425] b. Khālid al-Ḥanafī, [1571] ʿIlbāʾ b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī,[426] Yaḥyā b. ʿAqīl al-Khuzāʿī, and Muqātil b. Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī to al-Ḥārith to ask him what he 421. Original name: Sarīkyārah; Jiyāsar is the Arabicized form. A village in the Marw oasis. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 195.

422. Or: church.

423. Probably the Murghāb itself. See Le Strange, Lands, 398–9, 401n.

424. Of the leading family of the ʿAbd al-Qays, his father was commander of the khums of ʿAbd al-Qays in Khurāsān from at least 93(712) to 102(721). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1419; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 246.

425. Text: al-Muʾmin: read: ʿAbd al-Muʾmin. See note 355.

426. A Baṣran who had migrated to Marw, he was a transmitter of traditions. He was already in Khurāsān with Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī in 104(722). Ṭabarī, III/2, 1447; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 273–4.

wanted, while al-Ḥārith sent Muḥammad b. Muslim al-ʿAnbarī alone (to meet with them). Muḥammad said to them, "Al-Ḥārith and your brothers greet you with peace and say to you, 'We are thirsty and our animals are thirsty (as well). Therefore, let us make camp tonight, to that we may exchange envoys about what is between us and debate with each other. If we agree with you about what you want, fine; if not, you are responsible for your business," But they refused him and spoke rudely. Muqātil b. Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī said, "O people of Khurāsān, we used to be the equivalent of one household, our frontier was one and our hand against our enemy was one. We disapprove what your leader has done: while our amīr has sent him the learned men of Islam and reciters of the Qur'ān from among his companions, he has sent only a single man." Muḥammad answered, "I have only come to you to deliver a message: we seek the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet. What you seek will come to you tommorrow, God willing." Then, Muḥammad b. Muslim went back to al-Ḥārith.

When it was midnight, al-Ḥārith moved off. ʿĀṣim was informed, so that when it was morning he went against al-Ḥārith, and the forces met. In charge of al-Ḥārith's right was Rābiḍ b. ʿAbdallāh b. Zurārah al-Taghlibī. The troops fought furiously. Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn—he was the chief of the Bakr b. Wā'il (for ʿĀṣim), while in charge of the Bakr b. Wā'il (for al-Ḥārith) was Ziyād b. al-Ḥārith b. Surayj—attacked, and many of al-Ḥārith's men were killed. [1572] Thereupon al-Ḥārith crossed the valley of Marw,[427] setting up a tent beside the monks' dwellings, and ʿĀṣim desisted from (pursuing) him.

The slain were a hundred. Saʿīd b. Saʿd b. Jaz' al-Azdī was killed, and Khāzim b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim,[428] who was with al-Ḥārith, drowned. About three thousand (men) mustered to al-Ḥārith.

Al-Qāsim b. Muslim: When al-Ḥārith was defeated, ʿĀṣim refrained from (pursuing) him, though if he had pressed on against him, he would have destroyed him. He sent a message to al-Ḥārith (saying), "I am returning to you that which I guaranteed to you and 427. Presumably to the other side of the river.

428. Al-Sulamī, the son of the famous rebel Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh and grandson of the renowned governor of Khurāsān, he probably hailed from the vicinity of his father's base at al-Tirmidh. See note 50; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 423–6.

your troops, on the condition that you depart," and al-Ḥārith did so.

Khālid b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ḥabīb had come to al-Ḥārith the night he was defeated. His companions had decided to desert al-Ḥārith, saying, "Did you not claim that he would not reject your advice?"[429] But he came to them and quieted them.

'Aṭā' al-Dabūsī was one of the horsemen. He said to his servant on the Day of Zarq[430] "Saddle my horse for me, that I may play with this female donkey." He called out offering combat. A man from the inhabitants of al-Ṭālaqān came out to face him, saying in his language, "O Kīrikhar!"[431]

Pilgrimage and Governors

Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabarī: In this year, al-Walīd b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, who was the heir apparent, led the pilgrimage.

I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b.
[1573] 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. Al-Wāqidī and others said likewise.

The governors of the major provinces in this year were the same as those in the one before, except for Khurāsān, whose governor in this year was 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh al-Hilālī.

429. Text: rāyah; read: ra'yah. The text is obscure. If we follow it as written, it means "that he would not return a standard to you"; that is, that he would fail. But the reference to a standard is hard to explain, especially for this Khālid, who seems to have been more of an adviser than anything else. See note 323. Likewise his father 'Ubaydallāh. See note 315.

430. A town on the Murghāb about seven *farsakh*s southeast of Marw, apparently at the edge of the Marw oasis. This reference establishes the site of the battle. See Le Strange, Lands, 400–1.

431. Obscure term, apparently Iranian.

The Events of the Year 117

(JANUARY 31, 735 - JANUARY 19, 736)

Among the events in it were the summer campaign of Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām (against the Byzantines) on the left flank and the summer campaign of Sulaymān b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik on the right flank from the direction of al-Jazīrah, whence he scattered his raiding parties into the land of the Byzantines.

In it, Marwān b. Muḥammad, who was governor of Armenia, sent out two expeditions, one of which conquered three fortresses in al-Lān, while the other descended on Tūmānshāh, whose inhabitants made peace (on terms).

In it, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik removed 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh from Khurāsān, which he joined to (the province of) Khālid b. 'Abdallāh. Khālid made his brother Asad b. 'Abdallāh governor of it.

According to al-Madā'inī: Hishām's dismissal of 'Āṣim from Khurāsān and the subordination of Khurāsān to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh happened in the year 116/734.

The Reason for Hishām's Dismissal of 'Āṣim and His Appointment of Khālid for Khurāsān

According to 'Alī—his authorities: The reason for that was that ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbdallāh wrote to Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik, "Now then:

[1574] O Commander of the Faithful, the scout is not false to his people. The matter which the Commander of the Faithful has entrusted me with requires me to give him sincere counsel: Khurāsān will not be well unless it is joined to (the province of) the governor of Iraq, so that supplies, advantages, and assistance for it in events and misfortunes will be nearby, (and this is) owing to the remoteness of the Commander of the Faithful from it and the slowness of his help in reaching it." When his letter had gone forth, he went out to his companions, Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn and al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī and their companions, telling them the news. Al-Mujashshir said to him, "After the letter has gone forth, are you (jolted) as if a lion has just surprised you?" After this came Asad b. ʿAbdallāh, whom Hishām had sent forth (as governor) a month after ʿĀṣim's letter. Al-Kumayt b. Zayd al-Asadī[432] sent the people of Marw this poem:

Will you not deliver to the community of the people of Marw,
Despite its remoteness[433] and distance,
A letter from a sincere counselor giving a greeting of peace
And enjoining earnestness regarding that which they have undertaken.
And deliver an apology to Ḥārith, from us
To him, that those near me are strained with exertion.
If that were not so, cavalry would have visited you
From the two metropoli[434] with horsemen who cut down (enemies).
Therefore, do not weaken, nor be satisfied with ignominy,
Nor let Asad deceive you with any promise.
Be like prostitutes if you are shortchanged [1575] And if you admit of injury from a scoundrel!
And if not, then raise up banners black
Against those who go astray and transgress.
How can it be, when you are seventy thousand

---

432. Famous pro-Muḍar Kūfan Shīʿī poet. See al-Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XV, 113–130.

433. Text: nāʾ; read: naʿy, as in Cairo ed.

434. Ar. al-miṣrayn, sing. miṣr. Originally garrison cities for the Arab Muslim troops on the edge of the desert, these had by now become major cities and seats of power. Here al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah are meant. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. m-ṣ-r; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 26.

That Khālid has laid you low with the like of an ape,
And those whom he charged—on his responsibility—with Razīn
And his party, but he did not keep his promise,
And those who covered the Quḍā'ah with a robe of humiliation
By killing the father of Salāmān b. Sa'd.[435]
So go slowly, O Quḍā'ah, do not be Followers having no roots for themselves in Najd[436]
If you were to summon the Banū Nizār,
Horsemen would come to you having both lank and curly hair.
May every nose of the Quḍā'ah be cut off,
And may they never gain any glory!

Razīn who is mentioned had rebelled at al-Kūfah against Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, who had given him a safe-conduct but did not keep to it. Naṣr b. Sayyār said regarding him at the time al-Ḥārith approached Marw and raised black banners, al-Ḥārith being of the opinion of the Murji'ah:[437]

Leave behind you a worldly life and a family you are going to leave;[438]
What good is there in a world and a family that do not last,
Except for a remainder of days to an appointed time?
Therefore, seek from God a family who do not die.
Strive after much fear of God regarding secrets:
The best of fear of God is what is hidden.
Know that you are hostage to your works;
Therefore be much worried, sad.
I see murderous deceit in the master of he
Who in these days has been deceived.
(The world) will be for a man various times; it will make him

435. A subdivision of the 'Udhrah, a subtribe of the Quḍā'ah. Any event alluded to here must have taken place in the Jāhiliyyah (pre-Islamic times). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 447.

436. The home of the Arabs tracing descent from 'Adnān, as opposed to the Yaman. The Quḍā'ah's position between the two was ambiguous and had been changing toward the Yaman. Here they are exhorted to remember their ties with 'Adnān. See EI[2], s.v. Ḳudā'a.

437. The followers of a religious doctrine propounded by Jahm b. Ṣafwān, al-Ḥārith's associate. See EI[1], s.v. Murdjī'a.

438. That is, when you die anyway.

[1576] Stumble one day, and another time it will give him ease,
While time transforms a youth having a pleasant
Life, so that he later gets knocked about:
(Life) is sweet to him one time, so that he is pleased with it
For a while, and becomes bitter in taste for him (other) times.
Is it a passing moment from the remnants of time which you wait for,
Other than like that which has elapsed, in which you may carry out (your plans)?
Make your struggle against those who do not hope for an afterlife,
And be an enemy to a people who do not offer Islamic worship.
And slay their follower among us and their helper, Sometimes declaring them unbelievers, and curse them sometimes,
And those finding fault with us regarding our religion, who are The worst followers of religion if you searched out information on them,
And those saying, 'The path of God is our desire';
How far they have deviated from what they say!
Therefore, slay them in anger for God, triumphing Over them by it, and leave the doubter seduced (by the rebelliousness).
Your delay (of judgment) has pushed you together with polytheism in a coupling,
So that you are a people of polytheism and delayers (of judgment at the same time).
May God not exile into the tombs other than you,
For your religion has been tied to polytheism.
God has cast fear into your throats because of it,
While God decrees for us goodness and exalts us,
So that we may be the helpers, when a fearful event occurs Owing to what you are aiming at through polytheism for Islam and the world.
Do you (people) fault us, lying about it, (saying that We are between) extremist and oppressor? What is among us is enough for me!
He among those of you whom God afflicted first refused (Being afflicted with) hypocrisy, nor did He thus afflict us.

Then al-Ḥārith came back again to make war on ʿĀṣim. When ʿĀṣim heard that Asad b. ʿAbdallāh had drawn near, that he had [1577] sent in charge of his vanguard Muḥammad b. Mālik al-Hamdānī[439] and that he had stopped at al-Dandānqān,[440] he made peace with al-Ḥārith. He drew up a document between the two of them stipulating that al-Ḥārith could abide in whatever districts of Khurāsān he wished and that the two of them would write together to Hishām, asking him (to obey) the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet. If he refused, they were to join together against him. Some of the (tribal) leaders stamped the document, but Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn refused to stamp it, saying, "This is rebellion against the Commander of the Faithful." Khalaf b. Khalīfah[441] said to Yaḥyā:

Your heart's concern refuses except to be joined together,
    While your sleep refuses except to refrain
Without hearing, and you would not find me
    Trying to hear one possessed by distraction.
We preserved the Umayyah in their sovereignty,
    And we expose ourselves to danger for them that they may be be feared.
We defend them and their sovereignty
    If we do not find them able to defend themselves.
The genealogical connection that was of old between us
    And the Umayyah has refused except to break apart.
Did we not snatch away the head of Ibn al-Zubayr
    And tear the sovereignty from him?
We settled the Caliphate in its deserving family
    When the people were struggling with each other fiercely over it.
We supported the Umayyah with Yamanī sword
    When the sovereignty was stripped from them altogether.
Among us is he who strengthened the people of Iraq,
    And if Yaḥyā left the frontier, it would be lost.

439. Al-Khaywānī. He was the chief of the division of the Tamīm and the Hamdān at al-Kūfah in 122(740). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1702; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 228.

440. An important town two day's march southwest of Marw. See Le Strange, Lands, 400.

441. Al-Aqṭaʿ, of unknown connections but sympathetic to the Yaman-Rabīʿah. See Ibn Qutaybah, Shiʿr wa Shuʿarā', 714–5; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1822–3, 1847, 1862, 1946.

We wrecked matters for Ibn Surayj, [1578] Although he had made them as firm as he could.
What he says is wise; (it is) wisdom (to say)
When a group of people are dispersed, they are united.
On the evening of Zarq, after they had determined (on battle),
We repressed the determination of the oath-breakers;
But if not for the hero of the Wā'il,[442] no leader would Have been able to cook sheep's trotters thoroughly.[443]
Tell Umayyah therefore to consider our Hands that have not been rewarded for it, and our good work.
Will you give up killing our chiefs,
As we reject other than your right (to the Caliphate)?
Is he among those devoted (to you) who did not offer you for sale
Like another who chanced upon a market and sold (you) out?
Ibn Ḥuḍayn, in reaction to what you do, refuses Except to bear patiently and except to follow.
Had al-Ḥārith felt safe from the two Wā'ils,[444]
He would have frightened you in the number of those he had frightened,
While he was a wry-mouthed causer of mischief
Who spread error among that which he spread.
We sufficed the Umayyah as a sealed document
By which ʿĀṣim obeyed whom he obeyed.
If not for the positions of our standards
With the troops, the troops would have feared being lost.
We brought together the old (effort) for them with the new,
But the Umayyah refuse except cutting (us) off, (from) Treasures whose benefit belongs to other than us;
We have not known any benefit from them.
If our banners came to your treasures, the veil being parted,
You would be frightened on your insides.
Therefore, where is the good faith for the people of good faith?
Thanks is too good to be made lost.
Where are the stored up provisions belonging to the Banū Wā'il, 442. That is, Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn, chief of the Bakr b. Wā'il.

443. Text: li-yunḍiḥ; read: li-yunḍij as in Cairo ed. Sheep's trotters here symbolize the whole sheep slaughtered for a victory feast.
444. Text: al-Wā'ilīn; read: al-Wā'ilayn. This must refer to the Bakr and the Taghlib b. Wā'il, the two branches of Wā'il.

If stores are to be returned to the people? [1579]
Do you not know that our swords
Treat violent hatred and cure headache?
When Ibn Ḥuḍayn goes forth with the battle standard,
And the people of the citadels have handed over the citadels,
When Ibn Ḥuḍayn goes forth with the battle standard,
Vultures and hyenas point him out.
When Ibn Ḥuḍayn goes forth with the battle standard,
He slaughters, while the Ma'add are an unwholesome pasture.

'Āṣim b. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṣharāḥīl al-Yashkurī, who was one of the people of counsel, advised Yaḥyā to break the agreement, saying, "Signs. Later they will become clear, while they also are equivocal words; therefore, render (your speech) ambiguous."

'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh was in a village belonging to the Kindah in the highest part of Marw, while al-Ḥārith encamped at a village of the Banū al-'Anbar. They met with horses and men. With 'Āṣim were a man from the Banū 'Abs leading five hundred men from the inhabitants of Syria and Ibrāhīm b. 'Āṣim al-'Uqaylī[445] with the like of that.[446] 'Āṣim's herald called out, "Whoever brings a head will get three hundred dirhams." After that, one of his officials brought a head while biting on its nose. Then a man from the Banū Layth called Layth b. 'Abdallāh brought a head. Then another brought a head. It was said to 'Āsim, "If the men become greedy in this, they will not leave a boatman nor a peasant but that they will bring you his head." Thus his herald called out, "Let no one bring a head, for whoever brings one will get nothing from us." Al-Ḥārith's forces were defeated, prisoners being taken from [1580] them. 'Āṣim's forces captured 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr al-Māzinī, the head of the forces of Marw al-Rūdh. The prisoners were eighty, most of them from the Banū Tamīm. 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh slew them on the canal of al-Dandānqān.

The Yaman had sent from Syria with five hundred men a man who was equal to one thousand men and whose patronymic was Abū Dāwūd in the days of the factionalism. He would not pass through a village among Khurāsān's villages without saying, "It is as if you have seen me while I was passing by bearing the head of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj." When the forces met, Abū Dāwūd invited a single combat, and al-Ḥārith b. Surayj came forward against him, striking him on his left shoulder and knocking him to the ground. His companions protected him and bore him away. He became mixed up and would say, "O Abrashahr! O poor al-Ḥārith b. Surayj! O possessors of the inhabited world!" The horse of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj was shot in its breast. Al-Ḥārith pulled out the arrow and made it run, urging it on by hitting it so that he made it leap and sweat, distracting it from the pain of the wound.

445. A Jazīran commander who later became governor of Sijistān. See Crone, Slaves, 150–1; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, II, 352.

446. These two contingents of Syrian troops represented respectively the Syrian Yaman and the Qays.

A man from among the Syrian troops charged al-Ḥārith. At the moment when he thought the spear would hit him, he leaned over from his horse. After that, he pursued the Syrian, who said to him, "I ask you by the sanctity of Islam for my blood (to be spared)." Al-Ḥārith said, "Get down from your horse." He got down, and al-Ḥārith mounted it. The Syrian said, "Take the saddle, for by God, it is better than the horse."

A man of the ʿAbd al-Qays said:

The Quraysh have taken up the pleasure of life while guarding [1581] Through us every dust-colored ravine in Khurāsān.
Would that the Quraysh some night found themselves
Swimming in a dark green depth of the sea!

The Syrian troops glorified Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn owing to what he did in the matter of the document which ʿĀṣim wrote. They wrote a letter and sent it with Muḥammad b. Muslim al-ʿAnbarī and a man from the Syrian forces. They met Asad b. ʿAbdallāh at al-Rayy. It is also said that they met him at Bayhaq.[447] He said, "Go back, for I will set this matter straight." Muḥammad b. Muslim said, "My house has been destroyed." He responded, "I will rebuild it for you and will set right for you every injustice."

Asad wrote to Khālid, boasting falsely that he had defeated al-Ḥārith and telling him about the matter of Yaḥyā. Khālid allowed Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn ten thousand dīnārs and provided him with a hundred sets of clothes.

ʿĀṣim's governorship lasted less than a year. It has been said it was for seven months. Asad b. ʿAbdallāh arrived when al-Ḥārith had gone away. Asad imprisoned ʿĀṣim, asking him about what he had spent, holding him to account and taking from him a hundred thousand dirhams. He said, "You did not campaign nor did you go outside of Marw," while ʿUmārah b. Ḥuraym was standing (there) and the subordinates of al-Junayd were in prison. Asad said to them, "I will act among you either according to our custom or according to the custom of your people." They responded, "Rather, according to your custom." Therefore, he let them go.

447. The modern Sabzavār, a large city west of Naysābūr. See *EI*², s.v. Bayhaḳ; Le Strange, Lands, 391.

According to ʿAlī—his authorities: When Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik heard of the affair of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj, he wrote to Khālid [1582]
b. ʿAbdallāh, "Send your brother to put aright what has been upset. If it is to turn out as hoped, let it be by him." Thus, he dispatched his brother Asad to Khurāsān. When Asad arrived, ʿĀṣim did not hold anything in Khurāsān except Marw and the district of Abrashahr, while al-Ḥārith b. Surayj was at Marw al-Rūdh and Khālid b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Hajarī was at Āmul. Asad feared if he headed toward al-Ḥārith in Marw al-Rūdh, Khālid b. ʿUbaydallāh would enter Marw from the direction of Āmul, while if he made for Khālid (at Āmul), al-Ḥārith would enter Marw from the direction of Marw al-Rūdh. Therefore, he resolved to dispatch ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym al-Ghāmidī with the troops of al-Kūfah and the troops of Syria to the district of Marw al-Rūdh to seek out al-Ḥārith, while Asad went with (the rest of) the troops to Āmul. He put in command of the Banū Tamīm al-Ḥawtharah b. Yazīd al-ʿAnbarī. The cavalry of the inhabitants of Āmul led by Ziyād al-Qurashī, the mawlā of Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī, met Asad's forces at ʿUthmān's wells,[448] but Asad defeated them, (pursuing them) up to the city gate. Then they charged back against Asad's troops. A servant of Asad b. ʿAbdallāh called Jabalah, who was his standard bearer, was slain. The forces of Āmul fortified themselves in three cities they possessed.

Asad descended upon them, laying siege to them and setting up mangonels against them. They were commanded by Khālid b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Hajarī, from among al-Ḥārith's adherents. The besieged sought a safe-conduct. Ruwayd b. Ṭāriq al-Quṭaʿī, a mawlā [1583] of the Quṭayʿah, went out to them and asked, "What do you 448. Probably on the road to Marw near Āmul. See Le Strange, Lands, 403.

seek?" They answered, "The Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet." Ruwayd said, "You may have that." They said, "On condition that you not take the people of these cities to account for our crime." He gave them that and put as governor over them Yaḥyā b. Nuʿaym al-Shaybānī,[449] one of the Banū Thaʿlabah b. Shaybān and the son of Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah's[450] brother.

Then Asad advanced along the road to Zamm, heading toward the city of Balkh, whereupon he met a mawlā of Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, who told him that the people of Balkh had rendered the oath of allegiance to Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim.[451] Asad then came to Balkh and, using boats, went from it to al-Tirmidh. (There) he found al-Ḥārith besieging al-Ḥajjāj b. Hārūn al-Numayrī, the sons of Zurʿah and the family of ʿAṭiyyah al-Aʿwar al-Naṣri[452] along with the forces of al-Tirmidh, while al-Sabal was with al-Ḥārith. Asad camped on the opposite side of the river, able neither to cross over to them nor to supply them. The forces of al-Tirmidh came out of the city and fought al-Ḥārith fiercely. Al-Ḥārith pretended to flee from them, then came back charging them, and they were defeated. Yazīd b. al-Haytham b. al-Munakhkhal and ʿĀṣim b. Muʿawwil al-Bajalī[453] were slain along with one hundred and fifty of the Syrian troops and others. Bishr b. Jurmūz, Abū Fāṭimah al-Azdī[454] and those with al-Ḥārith from the villages would come to the gates of al-Tirmidh to weep, to complain about the Banū Marwān and their oppression, and to ask the inhabitants to come down to (join) them in order to help them make war on the Banū Marwān. But those in al-Tirmidh refused them (this). Al-Sabal, who was with al-Ḥārith, said, "O Ḥārith, [1584] al-Tirmidh has been built with drums and flutes. It will not be

449. Abū al-Maylā', he was an important Khurāsānī noble of Balkh of Kūfan origin who changed parties many times and ended joining with Abū Muslim then turning on him in 130(748). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1925, 1966–7, 1970, 1997–98; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 148; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 354.

450. A Kūfan notable who tried to conquer Ṭabaristān under Muʿāwiyah but was killed. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 411; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 321.

451. Al-Sulamī. See note 50.

452. Text: al-Naḍrī; read: al-Naṣrī. Being here in al-Tirmidh, he is far more likely to belong to the Qaysī Banū Naṣr b. Muʿāwiyah than to any Banū al-Naḍr; and, indeed, as a tribal nisbah al-Naḍrī seems almost nonexistent. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, III, 226–7, 229; also note 252.

453. Text: al-Najalī; read: al-Bajalī.

454. Text: al-Iyādī; read: al-Azdī. See note 217.

conquered by weeping, but it will only be by the sword. Therefore, fight, if you are able to fight!" Afterward, al-Sabal left him and came to his own country.

When Asad passed through the land of Zamm, he faced al-Qāsim al-Shaybānī, who was in a fortress by Zamm called Bādhkar. Asad went along until he came to al-Tirmidh, where he camped on the opposite side of the Oxus, placing his elevated seat on the river bank. The men began to cross. Al-Ḥārith in his vessel attacked those whose vessels were downstream from the vessels of the city. The two sides met in a vessel in which were Asad's men, including Aṣghar b. 'Aynā' al-Ḥimyarī, and the vessel of al-Ḥārith's men, in which was Dāwūd al-A'sar. Aṣghar shot at and struck the (other) vessel. He said, "I am the Aḥmarī boy!" Dāwūd al-A'sar said, "Owing to a certain matter, I do not trace back my origin to him, may no land be yours!" He stuck his vessel to the vessel of Aṣghar, and they fought.

Al-Ishkand approached. He had desired al-Ḥārith to go away and said to him, "I have only come to you in order to help you." Al-Ishkand concealed himself behind a monastery. Al-Ḥārith came near with his forces. When the people of al-Tirmidh came out against him, he pretended to flee from them, and they pursued him. Naṣr was with Asad sitting watching, and he showed disgust, knowing that al-Ḥārith had tricked the people of al-Tirmidh. But Asad supposed that he had only done that out of solicitude for al-Ḥārith when he had turned about (to flee). At this point, [1585]
Asad wished to reproach Naṣr, when suddenly al-Ishkand came out against the people of al-Tirmidh, charging against them, and they fled. In the battle Yazīd b. al-Haytham b. al-Munakhkhal al-Jurmūzī of the Azd and 'Āṣim b. Mu'awwil, who was of the Syrian forces' cavalry, were killed. Then Asad departed for Balkh. The men of al-Tirmidh went out against al-Ḥārith, defeating him and killing Abū Fāṭimah, 'Ikrimah and a group from among the people having clear insight.

Then Asad went to Samarqand by way of Zamm. When he came to Zamm, he sent a message to al-Qāsim[455] al-Shaybānī, who was in Bādhkar and was of the forces of al-Ḥārith, saying:

"You have only censured your people for what bad behavior occurred among them. That did not extend to the women, nor to the allowance of rape, nor to the seizure by the polytheists of the like of Samarqand. I am headed for Samarqand. May God's covenant and His guarantee be against me if I begin acting evilly toward you. You will receive munificent gifts, kindness, honor and safe-conduct, as well as whoever is with you. But in case you ungratefully despise what I have invited you to accept, then may God's covenant and the guarantee of the Commander of the Faithful, as well as the guarantee of the Amīr Khālid be against me when you shoot (even) an arrow, if I do not refuse to give you a safe-conduct after it. Even if I were to give you a thousand safe-conducts then, I would not uphold them."

455. Text: al-Haytham; read: al-Qāsim. A copyist's error.

Thus al-Qāsim went out to him according to what safe-conduct he had undertaken towards him, and Asad protected him from harm. Al-Qāsim went with Asad to Samarqand.

Asad paid the troops a double stipend. He transported them on what animals there were that he had driven along with him. He [1586] carried with him food from Bukhārā and drove along with him many sheep belonging to the Kurds, which he divided among the men. Then he went up to Waraghsar,[456] from which the water of Samarqand is derived. He blocked up the watercourse at its origin,[457] diverting it away from Samarqand. He would even bear the stones with his own hands in order to throw them onto the dam. Then he came back from Samarqand until he stopped at Balkh.

Certain authorities claim that that which I have mentioned regarding the matter of Asad and the matter of the adherents of al-Ḥārith was in the year (1)18.

Pilgrimage and Governors

In this year, Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Malik led the pilgrimage.

In it, the governor of al-Madīnah as well as of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif was Muḥammad b. Hishām b. Ismāʿīl, that of Iraq and the East 456. A town, now Rabāṭ-i-Khawja, four farsakhs east and upstream from Samarqand on the south bank of the Zarafshān River. See Barthold, Turkestan, 83, 92–3, 191; Le Strange, Lands, 465, 467.

457. Probably the present Dargham Ariq, which separated at Waraghsar. That Asad had to do this shows that Samarqand had been lost in the preceding years, perhaps in 113. See Barthold, Turkestan, 83; Gibb, Arab Conquests, 78–9.

was Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, and that of Armenia and Ādharbayjān was Marwān b. Muḥammad.

In it, Fāṭimah bt. 'Alī[458] and Sukaynah, the daughter of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī,[459] died.

Punishment of 'Abbāsid Missionaries in Khurāsān

In this year, Asad b. 'Abdallāh arrested a group of the missionaries of the Banū al-'Abbās in Khurāsān, killing some, mutilating some, and imprisoning some. Among those arrested were Sulaymān b. Kathīr, Mālik b. al-Haytham, Mūsā b. Ka'b, Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ, Khālid b. Ibrāhīm, and Ṭalḥah b. Ruzayq.[460] When they were brought to Asad, he said to them, "O depraved ones, did God not say, 'God forgives what has gone before, but whoever repeats (his offence), God will wreak vengeance upon him, and God is Mighty, the Possessor of vengeance'?"[461] It has been reported that Sulaymān b. Kathīr asked, "Shall I speak or keep silent?" Asad said, "Rather, speak up!" Sulaymān said, "We, by God, are as the [1587] poet said:

If, being without water, my throat were choked,
I would be like a choking man; I drink water a little at a time, to stop choking.

You know what our story is. By God, scorpions have been hunted by your hands! O amīr, we are men from your own people! These Muḍarīs have only raised this (matter) to you because we were the harshest of people against Qutaybah b. Muslim; thus, they have only sought their revenge." Then the son of Sharīk b. al-Ṣāmit al-Bāhilī spoke, saying, "These people have been arrested time after time!" Mālik b. al-Haytham said, "May God make the amīr prosper! You ought to consider this man's speech in conjunc-

458. The daughter of the Caliph 'Alī by a concubine. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 44, 46; Kaḥḥālah, A'lām al-Nisā', IV, 81.

459. The granddaughter of the Caliph 'Alī and great-granddaughter of the Prophet. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 59; Kaḥḥālah, A'lām al-Nisā', II, 202–24.

460. These men were all naqībs of the 'Abbāsid da'wah in Khurāsān and thus all natives to the province. The first two are Khuzā'īs, the second two Tamīmīs from the marginal subtribe of Imru' al-Qays, and the last two a Bakrī from the Dhuhl and an Iranian mawlā of the Khuzā'ah. See Sharon, Black Banners, 192–3 and passim; Crone, Slaves, 181, 186.

461. Qur'ān 5:95.

tion with that of others." They said, "It is as if, O brother from the Bāhilah, you seek revenge for Qutaybah. We, by God, were the harshest of people against him!" Asad sent them to jail. Then he summoned ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym and asked him, "What do you think?" ʿAbd al-Raḥmān answered, "I think you should make gifts of them to their tribes." Asad asked, "What about the two Tamīmīs who are with them?" ʿAbd al-Raḥmān answered, "You should let them go." Asad said, "In that case, I would be disowned by ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd."[462] Then Asad asked, "What would you do with the Rabaʿī?" ʿAbd al-Raḥmān answered, "By God, I would let him go." Asad then called for Mūsā b. Kaʿb to be brought and gave orders regarding him that he be bridled with a donkey's bridle. He then commanded that the bridle be drawn back, and it was pulled back so that his teeth were shattered. Then he said, "Smash his face," whereupon his nose was broken, his beard cut off, and one of his molars fell out. Then he called for Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ. Lāhiz [1588] said, "By God, there is no right in this, that you do this to us and leave the Yaman and the Rabīʿah alone!" At this, he whipped him three hundred lashes then said, "Crucify him!" But al-Ḥasan b. Zayd al-Azdī[463] said, "He is under my protection and is innocent of that which he has been slandered[464] with." Asad asked, "What about the others?" Al-Ḥasan answered, "I know they are innocent; therefore, let them go." Thus Asad let them go.

462. Asad's father.

463. Al-Azdī here is almost certainly a mistake for al-ʿAnbarī. He was the head of the Tamīm in Khurāsān at least 125[743]–129[747] and probably here as well, where his intervention on behalf of his tribal division saved his fellow tribesman's life. Akhbār al-Dawlah has b. Yazīd for his filiation. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1771, 1773; Akhbār al-Dawlah, 276.

464. Text: fudhif; read: qudhif.

The Events of the Year 118

(JANUARY 20, 736—JANUARY 7, 737)

Among these events was the campaign of Mu'āwiyah and Sulaymān, the two sons of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, against the land of the Byzantines.

Asad in Khurāsān

In this year, Bukayr b. Māhān sent 'Ammār b. Yazīd[465] to Khurāsān to be in charge of the party of the Banū al-'Abbās. He settled—according to what has been reported—in Marw and changed his name, calling himself Khidāsh. He called (people) to (the imāmate of) Muḥammad b. 'Alī. The people hastened to him, accepting what he had brought, hearing him and obeying. Then he changed what he called them to, affecting a lie, expounding the religion of the Khurramiyyah[466] and calling (people) to it. He gave them license regarding each other's wives, telling them that that was by the order of Muḥammad b. 'Alī. News of him reached Asad b. 'Abdallāh, who set out spies against him, leading to his seizure.

465. See note 185.

466. Latter-day Mazdakites. See EI^{2}, s.v. Khurramiyya. But the claim 'Ammār/Khidāsh was a Khurramī is probably false. See Sharon, Black Banners, 166–9, 182–3.

He was brought to Asad when the latter had made ready for the campaign of Balkh. Asad asked him how he was, but Khidāsh spoke rudely to him. Therefore, Asad gave orders concerning him, and his hand was cut off, his tongue torn out, and his eye gouged [1589] out.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī—his authorities: When Asad came to Āmul, immediately they brought him Khidāsh, the leader of the Hāshimiyyah. Asad ordered Qurʾah[467] the doctor to cut out his tongue and gouge out his eye. Asad said, "Praise be to God who has taken revenge on you for Abū Bakr and ʿUmar." Then he handed him over to Yaḥyā b. Nuʿaym al-Shaybānī, the governor of Āmul. When he returned from Samarqand, he wrote to Yaḥyā, who killed Khidāsh and crucified him at Āmul. Also, Asad was brought Ḥazawwar, the mawlā of al-Muhājir b. Dārah al-Ḍabbī, and beheaded him on the river bank.

Then Asad, when he had gone away from Samarqand, stopped at Balkh. He sent Judayʿ al-Kirmānī[468] to a castle containing the heavy baggage of al-Ḥārith and that of his companions. The name of the castle was al-Tubūshkān in Upper Ṭukhāristān. In it were the Taghlibī Banū Barzā, al-Ḥārith's relatives by marriage. Al-Kirmānī besieged them until he took the place, slaying their warriors, massacring the Banū Barzā, and making captive the whole range of its population, Arabs, mawālī, and children, (all of) whom he sold at auction in the market of Balkh.

According to ʿAlī b. Yaʿlā, who witnessed that: Four hundred and fifty men among al-Ḥārith's adherents became full of rancor toward him. Their leader was Jarīr b. Maymūn, who was in charge of the judiciary, and among them were Bishr b. Unayf al-Ḥanẓalī and Dāwūd al-Aʿsar al-Khwārizmī. Al-Ḥārith said, "If you must separate from me and seek a safe-conduct, then seek it while I am present, for it is more probable (thus) that they will answer to you
[1590] positively. But if I depart before that, they will not give you a safe-

467. Later present with Naṣr at Bukhārā in 121(739). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1694.

468. Al-Maʿnī of the Azd. Though of ʿUmānī origin, he was apparently born and raised in Kirmān, as shown by his name as well as by his association with the Kirmānī mawlā of the Sulaym. See note 414. He was briefly governor of Khurāsān in 120(738) and was most famous for leading the Yaman in the disastrous factionalism of 126(744)–129(747). Masʿūd b. ʿAmr, leader of the Azd in al-Baṣrah, was Judayʿ's cousin. See EI[2], s.v. Judayʿ; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 381; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 483, 502; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 213, II, 263.

conduct." They said, "Depart and leave us alone." Then they sent Bishr b. Unayf and another man to seek a safe-conduct. Asad gave the two of them a safe conduct and gifts. At this, they betrayed the people in the castle, informing him that those (therein) had neither food nor water.

Asad sent out al-Kirmānī with six thousand men, including Sālim b. Manṣūr al-Bajalī[469] in command of two thousand men, al-Azhar b. Jurmūz al-Numayrī with his own forces and the troops of Balkh numbering two thousand men, and five hundred men from the Syrian forces under Ṣāliḥ b. al-Qa'qā' al-Azdī.[470] Al-Kirmānī sent out Manṣūr b. Sālim with his troops. Manṣūr crossed the Dirgham River,[471] passing the night (on the other side). In the morning, he remained where he was until the day was advanced. Then, he spent the day travelling nearly seventeen *farsakh*s, tiring out his horses. Then he came to Kishm[472] in the land of Jabghūyah. He reached a walled garden containing a planting which had sent forth stalks. The men in the camp sent their animals into it, there being four *farsakh*s between them and the castle. Then al-Kirmānī departed. When he had come to the watercourse, his scouts came to him to tell him that a group was coming headed by al-Muhājir b. Maymūn. When they reached al-Kirmānī, he struggled against them, after which they went away. Al-Kirmānī went along until he stopped beside the castle. When he first encamped there were about five hundred men in a mosque which al-Ḥārith had built. When it was morning, the cavalry all joined him, and al-Azhar's forces and the forces of Balkh followed. When they had gathered, [1591] al-Kirmānī delivered a speech to them, praising God and extolling Him and then saying:

"O people of Balkh, I do not find a similtude for you except the adulterous woman who gives access to her leg to whomever

469. He appears later as Manṣūr b. Sālim and Manṣūr b. Muslim; Manṣūr b. Sālim is most likely to be right. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1607, 1609.

470. He fought for the Yaman in the civil strife of 128(746). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1936.

471. Now called the Gukchah or Kowkcheh, it is the main river in the interior of Badakhshān. See Le Strange, Lands, 435–6.

472. Text: Kishtam; read: Kishm, as BM. This important town south of the Dirgham River in Badakhshān still exists, its identification made probable by its proximity to the lands of the Jabghū in Upper Ṭukhāristān. See Le Strange, Lands, 437.

comes to her. Al-Ḥārith came to you with a thousand men of the Iranians, and you gave your city over to his power, after which he slew your nobless and drove out your amīr. Then you went along with him among his helpers to Marw, where you forsook him. Then he came back to you beaten, but you gave the city (again) over to his power. By Him in Whose hands is my soul, I will not hear about any man of you having written a message to them on an arrow but that I will cut off his hand and foot and crucify him. As for whoever is with me from among the inhabitants of Marw, they are my special friends. I do not fear their treachery."

Then he rushed up to the castle, staying by it a day and a night without fighting. When it was the next day, a crier called out, "We have cast off our covenant with you." After that, they fought those inside, who were thirsty and hungry. Those besieged requested that they submit (themselves) to a judgement, but that their women and children be put aside for them. Thus they yielded (themselves) to Asad's judgement. After some days had passed, al-Muhallab b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-'Atakī came with a letter from Asad (saying), "Transport to me fifty of their men, including al-Muhājir b. Maymūn and his equals from their chiefs." They were borne to him, and he killed them. Asad also wrote to al-Kirmānī that he divide those who remained with him into thirds, that he crucify a third, cut off the hands and feet of a third, and cut off (only) the hands of a third. Al-Kirmānī did that and also brought forth their valuables, selling them at auction. Those whom he killed and crucified were four hundred.

In the year 118, Asad adopted the city of Balkh as his capital, bringing to it the government offices and building stongholds. Then he campaigned against Ṭukhāristān, then the land of Jabghūyah, where he conquered and took captives.

Hishām Dismisses Khālid b. 'Abd al-Malik from al-Madīnah

[1592] In this year, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik dismissed Khālid b. 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam from (the governorship of) al-Madīnah, appointing to it Muḥammad b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl.

According to al-Wāqidī: On the day Khālid was dismissed from al-Madīnah, Abū Bakr b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm[473] received a letter containing his appointment as governor, after which he mounted the pulpit and led the people in worship for six days. Then Muḥammad b. Hishām came from Mecca as governor of al-Madīnah.

'Ali b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās Dies

In this year, 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās[474] died. His patronymic was Abū Muḥammad. His death took place at al-Ḥumaymah[475] in the land of Syria. He was seventy-eight or seventy-seven years old. It has been said he was born on the night in which 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was struck, which was the night of the seventeenth of Ramaḍān of the year 40 (January 24, 661), and thus his father named him 'Alī, saying, "I have given him the name of the most beloved of creation to me." He also gave him the patronymic of Abū al-Ḥasan. When 'Alī came to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, the latter honored him, seating him on his elevated couch. 'Abd al-Malik asked him about his patronymic, and 'Alī told him. 'Abd al-Malik said, "Among my troops this name and patronymic are not borne together by anyone." Then he inquired if any sons had been born to him. At that time, Muḥammad b. 'Alī had been born to him. He informed 'Abd al-Malik of that, and thus 'Abd al-Malik gave him the patronymic of Abū Muḥammad.

Pilgrimage and Governors

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hishām led the pilgrimage while he was governor of Mecca, al-Madīnah, and al-Ṭā'if. It has been said that the governor of al-Madīnah in this year was Khālid b. 'Abd al-Malik and that Muḥammad b. Hishām during it held (only) Mecca

473. He is Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Najjārī al-Khazrajī, governor of al-Madīnah for al-Walīd, Sulaymān and 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz and also sometimes in charge of the judiciary. His death date is disputed, 100(719), 110(728), 117(735), and 120(738) being given; apparently the last date is correct. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 38–40; Wakī, Quḍāh, I, 135–46; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 186, II, 223.

474. Progenitor of the 'Abbāsids. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Alī b. 'Abd Allāh b. al-'Abbās.

475. A ruined site in southern Jordan near al-'Aqabah, it was the location of the 'Abbāsid imām's clandestine activities from 98(717) to 131(749). See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Ḥumayma; Sharon, Black Banners, 120.

[1593] and al-Ṭā'if, the first statement being that of al-Wāqidī. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh was governor of Iraq, holding the entire East. His governor for Khurāsān was his brother Asad b. 'Abdallāh, while his governor for al-Baṣrah, (in charge of) its youths (aḥdāth), its judiciary, and leading the public worship of its inhabitants was Bilāl b. Abī Burdah. In charge of Armenia and Ādharbayjān was Marwān b. Muḥammad b. Marwān.

The Events of the Year

119

(JANUARY 8, 737—DECEMBER 28, 737)

Among these was the campaign of al-Walīd b. al-Qa'qā' al-'Absī against the territory of the Byzantines.

In this year, Asad b. 'Abdallāh campainged against al-Khuttal, capturing the castle of Zagharzak.[476] From it, he went to Khidāsh,[477] filling his hands with captives and sheep. Al-Ḥanash[478] had fled to China.

In it, Asad met the Khāqān, the ruler of the Turks, killing him and a great many of his troops, while Asad and the Muslims were unharmed and went away with many spoils and captives.

The Story of This Campaign in al-Khuttal

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: Ibn al-Sā'ijī[479] wrote to the Khāqān Abū Muzāḥim—he was only given the patronymic Abū Muzāḥim because he used to put the Arabs in 476. Vocalization and location uncertain.

477. A place name, vocalization and location uncertain.

478. Text: al-Jaysh; read: al-Hanash, throughout the text, as Gibb. He was the blooded heir of al-Sabal. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 81–2.

479. The regent of al-Khuttal. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 82.

hard straits (yuzāḥim)—when the latter was at Nawākith[480] to inform him about Asad's having entered al-Khuttal and scattered his [1594] troops in it, and that he was in a losing situation. When the letter reached the Khāqān, he commanded his troops to make ready. The Khāqān possessed a meadow and a mountain, a protected area which no one drew near to or hunted in. The two were left as a space for (practice) warfare: what was in the meadow for three days and what was in the mountain for three days. In these, they prepared themselves, pasturing (their animals) freely and tanning the freshly flayed skins of the game animals, from which they made containers. They also stocked up bows and arrows. The Khāqān called for a saddled, bridled horse and commanded that an ewe be cut up and hung by leather straps. Then he took some salt, putting it in a bag and attaching it to his belt, and commanded each Turk to do likewise, saying, "This is your ration until you meet the Arabs in al-Khuttal."

He took the road of Khushwarāgh. When Ibn al-Sā'ijī perceived that the Khāqān had drawn near, he sent a message to Asad saying, "Depart from al-Khuttal, for the Khāqān has cast his shadow over you." Asad cursed the messenger and did not believe him. Thereupon the ruler of al-Khuttal sent the message:

"I did not lie to you. I am he who informed the Khāqān of your entry and the scattering of your troops. I told him that it was an opportunity for him and asked him for help. Besides, you have stripped the country bare and taken spoils, so that if he meets you in this condition he will triumph over you. The Arabs have been ever hostile to me for as long as I have been surviving, but the Khāqān has overwhelmed me, his weight has become severe, and he holds me in his obligation by his saying, 'I have expelled the Arabs from your country and returned your rule to you.'"

Asad then knew that he had told the truth. He ordered that the (valuable) heavy baggage[481] be sent ahead and put in charge [1595] of it Ibrāhīm b. 'Āṣim al-'Uqaylī al-Jazarī, who later governed Sijistān. Asad sent out with him the old men, among them Kathīr

480. According to Gibb, the Khāqān's capital on the Chu River in present-day Kazakhstan, but this is uncertain. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 82; Le Strange, Lands, 487. See Cairo ed. for an alternative reading.

481. Shaban thinks this consisted of trade goods destined for China. See Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 127.

b. Umayyah, the father of Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzā'ī, Fuḍayl b. Ḥayyān al-Mahrī, and Sinān b. Dāwūd al-Quṭa'ī. The commander of the Ahl al-'Āliyah[482] was Sinān al-A'rābī al-Sulami, while 'Uthmān b. Shabāb al-Hamadhānī,[483] the grandfather[484] of the judge of Marw, was in charge of receipts. Thus the heavy baggage went on its way.

Asad also wrote to Dāwūd b. Shu'ayb[485] and al-Aṣbagh b. Dhu'ālah[486] al-Kalbī, both of whom he had sent off in a certain direction, saying, "The Khāqān has drawn near; therefore, join the heavy baggage train with Ibrāhīm b. 'Āṣim." Dāwūd and al-Aṣbagh met a Dabūsī who told them a rumor that the Khāqān had defeated the Muslims and killed Asad. Al-Aṣbagh said, "Even if Asad and those with him have been stricken, Hishām is still with us, and we (can) retreat to him." But Dāwūd b. Shuāyb said, "May God make life repugnant after the men of Khurāsān!" Al-Aṣbagh said, "How lovely is life after the men of Khurāsān! Al-Jarrāḥ and those with him were slain, but the Muslims were not much harmed thereby. Even if Asad and the forces of Khurāsān have perished, God will not desert His religion. God is Living, Everpresent, the Commander of the Faithful is living and the Muslims' troops are many." Dāwūd said, "Shall we not see what Asad has done, so that we may depart with (accurate) information?" Thus the two of them went along until they overlooked the camp of Ibrāhīm. (There) they suddenly saw campfires. Dāwūd said, "These are the Muslims' campfires; I see them close together, while the Turks' campfires are (always) scattered." Al-Aṣbagh said, "They are in a narrow place." They drew closer and heard the braying of the donkeys. Dāwūd asked, "Do you not know that the Turks do not have donkeys?" Al-Aṣbagh replied, "They captured them yesterday and would not be able to eat them in one day or two." Dāwūd [1596]

482. One of the tribal sections (akhmās) of al-Baṣrah and Khurāsān, consisting mainly of Muḍarī tribes from central and western Arabia. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 398n.

483. Probably a mawlā, unless his nisbah is a mistake for al-Hamdānī.

484. Or: ancestor.

485. Al-Ḥuddānī of the Azd, he later supported al-Kirmānī in 126(744) and 128(746). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1861, 1925, 1932.

486. Text: Dhuwālah; read: Dhu'ālah, as in Cairo ed. A Syrian who later fought for the Yaman in Iraq and Syria during the tribal factionalism. See Crone, Slaves, 156.

said, "Let us dispatch two horsemen to shout, 'God is Greater.'" Thus they sent two horsemen out. When they neared the camp they shouted, "God is Greater." The camp answered them with the same shout. Then they approached the camp, in which was the heavy baggage. With Ibrāhīm were the forces of al-Ṣaghāniyān and the Ṣaghān Khudhāh. Ibrāhīm b. ʿĀṣim lost no time in breaking camp.

Asad came from al-Khuttal toward Jabal al-Milḥ,[487] intending to ford the River of Balkh.[488] Ibrāhīm b. ʿĀṣim had already crossed with the captives and what he had taken (as booty). Asad was overlooking the river at the time when the Khāqān came against him after having travelled from Sūyāb[489] for seventeen nights. Abū Tammām b. Zaḥr and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khanfar, both Azdīs, came to Asad to say, "May God make the amīr prosper! God has given you exemplary success in this campaign, so that you have taken spoils and are unscathed. Therefore, cross this water, leaving it behind your back." But Asad, after ordering that they be beaten on their necks and they be driven out of the camp, remained where he was that day. On the next day, he departed. In the river are twenty-three places where people ford it, and where the river channel is, it reaches the two sides of the saddle. Thus the troops forded it. Asad commanded every man to carry across a sheep, and he (even) carried over a sheep himself. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭarrif b. al-Shikhkhīr said to him, "What you are [1597] doing in carrying a sheep is not more serious than what you are afraid of. You have scattered the men and diverted their attention while your enemy has cast his shadow over you. Put these sheep aside, may God's curse be upon them, and command the men to make ready (for battle)." Asad responded, "By God, no man who does not have a sheep with him may cross until these sheep are finished but that I will cut off his hand." Thus the men began carrying the sheep, the horseman carrying it in front of him, the foot-soldier around his neck, and they waded in. It is said that when the foreparts of the horses' hooves dug into the river(bed), it became

487. Lit. the Mountain of Salt.

488. Here this means the Oxus. See note 404.

489. Text: Sūyāt; read: Sūyāb as in Cairo ed. A town of the Turks and their sometime capital on the Chu River near the present Tokmak. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 82; Barthold, Turkestan, 195, 201.

mucky[490] in some places. Some of the horsemen were tipping to the side and falling off their mounts. Therefore, Asad commanded that the sheep be thrown away, and the men forded. They had not finished crossing when the Turks came up against them en masse, killing those who had not crossed. The men began charging into the river (to escape).

It is said that the Azd and the Tamīm were responsible for the (rear) guard, the weak among the troops having been left behind. Asad rode into the river, commanding that the camels be brought across to the Transoxanian side, so that they could be loaded with the heavy baggage. A dust cloud approached from the direction of al-Khuttal, which was the Khāqān. When a major part of his troops had fully come up with him, he attacked the Azd and the Banū Tamīm, who retreated. Asad galloped until he reached his camp. He sent a message to those with the heavy baggage whom he had dispatched ahead of him, (saying), "Make camp and fortify your place in the middle of the valley." The Khāqān drew near. The Muslims supposed that he would not cross to them since the river was between them and him. When the Khāqān saw the river, he ordered al-Ishkand, who was at that time the Iṣbahbadh of Nasaf,[491] to go along the battle line until he reached its farthest point, asking the horsemen and the people of insight regarding warfare and water, "Can the river crossing and attacking Asad be supported (together)?" All of them replied, "It cannot be borne," until he came to al-Ishtīkhan,[492] who said, "Yes, it can be supported, for we are fifty thousand horsemen; thus, if we charge in a single mass, we will throw back the water from each other and its flow will cease." Thereupon they beat on their kettle drums, which Asad and those with him supposed to be only a threat from them. But the Turks made their mounts charge by spurring them on most severely. When the Muslims saw the Turks' charge, they turned (retreating) into their camp. The Turks crossed, causing a great dust cloud to rise by which a man could not even see his mount, nor could they recognize each other. The Muslims entered their [1598]

490. Text: sibāḥah; read: sibākhah, as in Cairo ed.

491. Text: Nasā; read: Nasaf, as in Cairo ed.

492. Apparently the local ruler of an important fortified town of the same name seven farsakhs due north of Samarqand. See Le Strange, Lands, 466; Barthold, Turkestan 95–6.

camp, hurrying with what was (still) outside. The slave youths went out with pack-saddle cloths (worn as armor) and tent poles (as weapons) and struck the faces of the Turks, who turned back in flight.

Asad passed the night. When he rose in the morning—having kept his troops in a state of alert through the night in fear of the Khāqān's treachery and his coming (to attack them) before sunrise -and saw nothing, he summoned the chief men to consult them. They said to him, "Accept good health!" Asad responded, "This is not good health; rather, it is a calamity. We met the Khāqān yesterday, and he triumphed over us, capturing troops and weapons. Nothing has kept him from us today except that prisoners have fallen to his hands who have told him about the location of the heavy baggage ahead of us, so that he has given up confronting us out of greed for it." Therefore, Asad broke camp, sending ahead of him scouts, one of whom came back to report to him that he had seen the Turks' green hoods, as well as banners from those belonging to al-Ishkand, but few men. Thus Asad went along, the pack animals being heavily loaded. He was told, "Make camp, O amīr, and accept good health!" He answered, "Where is the good [1599] health that I accept it? It is naught but a calamity, a loss of souls and wealth!" When it was evening, Asad found himself at a (possible) campsite. He consulted the men as to whether they should make camp or go on. The men said, "Accept good health! What could the loss of property be in comparison to our well-being and the well-being of the troops of Khurāsān?" But Naṣr b. Sayyār was silent. Asad said, "What is the matter with you, O Ibn Sayyār, that you are silent, not speaking?" Naṣr said, "May God make the amīr prosper! Two possible dispositions in your favor (are): if you go, you will aid those who are with the heavy baggage, rescuing them. But if you reach them and find that they have perished, you will have performed a hard task which must be performed." Asad accepted his view and marched on during all of that day.

Asad summoned Sa'īd al-Ṣaghīr,[493] who was a horseman, the mawlā of the Bāhilah, and was knowledgeable about the land of al-Khuttal. Asad wrote a letter to Ibrāhīm commanding him to prepare (for battle), "For the Khāqān has set off in your direction." Asad told Sa'īd, "Go with the letter to Ibrāhīm, to where he was before the night. If you do not do so, Asad will be quit of Islam if he does not kill you. If you join al-Ḥārith, Asad will be responsible for the same oath, if the auctioneer does not sell your wife in the market of Balkh and all the people of your household." Sa'īd said, "Then give me your fine-tailed, dark-bay horse." Asad said, "By my life, if I offered your blood easily and was stingy to you regarding the horse, I would most certainly be vile," and he gave it to him. Sa'īd then went on a mount of those led by the side. His servant boy was on a horse of his and had with him Asad's horse, [1600] which he led by the side. When he drew opposite the Turks, who had set off after the heavy baggage, their scouts chased him. He transferred to Asad's horse so that they did not overtake him, thus bringing the letter to Ibrāhīm. Some of the scouts followed him—it is said about twenty men—until they saw Ibrāhīm's camp. Then they turned back to the Khāqān, informing him.

493. He later brought aid to Naṣr from Ṭukhāristān in 128(746). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1920–1.

The Khāqān attacked the heavy baggage (train) in the earliest morning. Ibrāhīm had dug a trench (for fortification) which the Khāqān came against while the Muslims were guarding it. He ordered the men of al-Sughd to fight them. But when they drew near the Muslims' garrison, the latter rose up in their face, driving them back and killing one of their men. The Khāqān said, "Mount up!" At this point, the Khāqān climbed a hill and began to look for a breach and the direction of the battle.

Then he would do (the following): he would go off alone with two or three men. If he saw a breach, he would order his troops to charge into the area of the gap. When he climbed the hill, he saw behind the camp an island, before which lay a ford. He summoned some of the Turks' commanders and ordered them to cross above the camp by a way he described until they came to the island. Then they were to descend onto the island until they came against the Muslims' camp from behind. He also ordered them to begin (fighting) against the Iranians and the troops of al-Ṣaghāniyān and to leave the others, who were Arabs. He had identified them by their (tent) structures and their banners. He said to the detachment, "If the enemy (forces) stay within their trench but (then) draw near to you, we will enter their trench; if they stay in their trench, enter it against them from behind." The detachment went in against the Muslims from the Iranians' side, killing the Ṣaghān [1601] Khudhāh and the whole of his forces and taking possession of their goods. They also entered Ibrāhīm's camp, taking all that was in it. The Muslims gave up their order of battle to gather in a (certain) place, feeling (the likelihood of) annihilation. Suddenly, a cloud of dust and black earth rose, and it was Asad and his troops who had come to (aid) the Muslims. The Turks began to draw back from the Muslims to the place where the Khāqān was. Ibrāhīm was astonished at their withdrawal, since they had been victorious, having killed whom they killed and captured what they captured, while he had no hope in Asad.

Asad had hastened his journey, advancing until he stood on the hill upon which was the Khāqān. The Khāqān moved away in the direction of the mountain. Those who survived among those who had been with the heavy baggage went out to Asad. Many of their men had been slain; on that day were slain Barakah b. Khawlī al-Rāsibī and Kathīr b.[494] Umayyah, along with old men from the Khuzāʿah. The Ṣaghān Khudhāh's wife went out to Asad weeping for her husband, and Asad wept with her until the sound of him (weeping) became loud. The Khāqān moved on, leading the prisoners from Asad's troops in nooses and driving the camels, laden (with spoils), and the slave girls.

Muṣʿab b. ʿAmr al-Khuzāʿī and a group of men from among the inhabitants of Khurāsān resolved to intercept the enemy, but Asad restrained them, saying, "These are a people for whom the wind has become pleasing, and they have become savage; therefore, do not interfere with them." With the Khāqān was a man from the companions of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj whom he commanded to call out, "O Asad, is not that which you had in Transoxiana (now) a seat of war? You are most certainly extremely greedy. You were [1602] disengaged from al-Khuttal, which is the land of my fathers and forefathers." Asad responded, "It was as you saw. It may be that God will wreak vengeance on you."

Kūrmaghānūn,[495] who was one of the Turkish nobles, said, "I have not seen a day better than the Day of the Heavy Baggage (Train)." Someone asked him, "How is that?" He answered, "I gained great wealth and did not see an enemy fouler than the Arab 494. Text: Abū; read: bn (=b.), as in Cairo ed.

495. Vocalization unknown.

prisoners. When one of them would charge, he would hardly move from his place."

According to certain authorities: The Khāqān came against the heavy baggage. Asad departed (to rescue the baggage train). When the Khāqān looked out from the mountaintop, and the Turks saw the Muslims, they refrained (from attacking). They had fought the Muslims and then held back. (Instead,) they came against the Iranians who were with the Muslims and fought them, capturing their children. Every man among them put a boy or a girl on his horse behind him. Then they drew near Asad's camp at sunset.

Asad went with the men until he encamped with the heavy baggage. The Turks attacked Asad the morning of the next day, which was the day of the breaking of the fast,[496] and almost prevented the Muslims from (their) worship. Then the Turks went away. Asad proceeded to Balkh, encamping in its plain until the winter came. Then the troops scattered into their houses, while Asad entered the city. Regarding this campaign, it was said to him in Persian:

From Khuttalān you have come,
With a destroyed face you have come. [1603]
A fugitive you have come back,
Lowly and emaciated you have come.[497]

Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj was in the region of Tukhāristān and joined the Khāqān. When it was the eve of the (Feast of) Sacrifice,[498] Asad was told, "The Khāqān has encamped at Jazzah." Asad commanded signal fires (to be lit). After they were raised over the city, the men came from the country districts to the city of Balkh.[499] Asad arose in the morning, performed the worship and spoke to the people, saying:

"God's enemy, al-Ḥārith b. Surayj, has brought his tyrant to put out God's light and change His religion. But God will humiliate him, God willing. Your enemy, the dog, has taken of your brethren whom he has taken. But if God wishes to help you, neither your fewness nor your multitude will harm you. Therefore, seek God's 496. Shawwāl 1, 119(October 1, 737). For chronological difficulties, see Gibb, Arab Conquests, 81–2.

497. Compare above pp. 1492, 1494.
498. Dhū al-Ḥijjah 9, 119(December 7, 737). See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 83.
499. Text: Balj; read: Balkh, as in Cairo ed.

help." He also said, "It has reached me that the worshipper is as near as he can be to God when he puts his forehead (to the ground) to (worship) God.[500] I am coming down (from the pulpit) to put my forehead (to the ground). Therefore, pray to God and prostrate yourselves to your Lord, making (your) prayer to him sincere."

They did so, then raised their heads, not doubting victory. Then Asad came down from the pulpit, sacrificed, and consulted the men about going against the Khāqān. Some said, "You are a young [1604] man and are not of those who have (ever) feared to raid a sheep or a mount. You are taking a risk by your setting out." He responded, "By God, I will set out! Either victory or else martyrdom!"

It is said that the Khāqān drew support from Transoxiana, the inhabitants of Tukhāristān and Jabghūyah[501] al-Ṭukhārī, along with their princes and their shākiriyyah, to the number of thirty thousand. They descended on Khulm,[502] where there was a garrison under Abū al-ʿAwjāʾ b. Saʿīd al-ʿabdī. He skirmished with them so that they did not gain any victory from him at all. The enemy marched off in a state of defense on the road of Fayrūz Bakhshīn[503] of Ṭukhāristān. Abū al-ʿAwjāʾ wrote to Asad about their going.

Asad gathered the men together, causing to be read to them the letter of Abū al-ʿAwjāʾ and the letter of al-Furāfiṣah, the garrison commander at Jazzah, (written) after the Khāqān had passed his way. Then Asad consulted the men. Some said, "You (should) take to the gates of the city of Balkh (for your defense) and write to Khālid and to the Caliph, asking him for help." Others said, "You (should) take the road to Zamm and beat the Khāqān to Marw." Some said, "Rather, you (should) go out to them, seeking aid from God against them." The statement of these agreed with Asad's view and what he had resolved on about meeting them (in battle).

It is said that the Khāqān, when he separated from Asad, went up until he was in the land of Ṭukhāristān belonging to 500. This closely parallels a canonical hadith. See Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, s.v. Kitāb al-Ṣalāt, Bāb Mā Yuqāl fī al-Rukūʿ wa al-Sujūd.

501. Text: Jayghūyah; read: Jabghūyah, as in Cairo ed.

502. A small city two stages east of Balkh on the Khulm River, it still exists. See EI^{2}, s.v. Khulm.

503. Spelling and vocalization uncertain. Gibb has Peroz Nakhsher = Fayrūz Nakhshayr. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 83.

Jabghūyah.[504] When it was the middle of the winter, he advanced, passing by Jazzah, going to al-Jūzjān and sending out raiding parties. That was because al-Ḥārith b. Surayj told him that Asad would not resist and that he did not have a large force with him. Al-Bakhtarī b. Mujāhid, the mawlā of the Banū Shaybān, said to Asad, "Rather, send the cavalry out until they descend on al-Jūzjān." When he had sent out the cavalry, al-Bakhtarī asked him, "How did you find my opinion?" Asad said, "How did you find God's work when your opinion was adopted?" Asad took one hundred twenty thousand dirhams from Jabalah b. Abī Rawwād, commanding that the men be given twenty each. He had with him Khurāsānī and Syrian troops amounting to seven thousand men. He left as his deputy in charge of Balkh al-Kirmānī b. 'Alī,[505] commanding him not to let anyone leave its (walled) city, even if the Turks struck the city gate. Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Laythī, al-Qāsim b. Bukhayt al-Murāghī[506] of the Azd, Salīm b. Sulaymān, 'Amr b. Muslim b. 'Amr, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-'Atakī, 'Īsā al-A'raj al-Ḥanẓalī, al-Bakhtarī b. Abī Dirham al-Bakrī, Sa'īd al-Aḥmar, and Sa'īd al-Ṣaghīr, the mawlā of the Bāhilah said to Asad, "May God make the amīr prosper! Let us go forth! Do not insult our obedience!" At this, he allowed them (to go forth). Then he went out, encamping at one of the gates of Balkh, where a pavilion was set up for him (consisting of) two tents with two poles each, one of the tents abutting the other. He led the people in a worship of two prostrations, which he made lengthy. Then he faced towards Mecca and called out to the people, "Pray to God," making the invocation long and praying for victory. The people said "Amen" to his prayer. He said, "You will be given victory, by the Lord of the Ka'bah." Then he turned away from his prayer, saying three times, "You will be given victory, by the Lord of the Ka'bah, God willing." Then his crier announced, "God's protection is removed from any man from among the troops who transports a woman." They said, "Asad has only gone forth fleeing." Asad (himself) left behind Umm Bakr, the mother of his children, and his children. He looked about, and, behold, there was a servant [1605] [1606]

504. See note 501.

505. That is, Juday' b. 'Alī al-Kirmānī al-Ma'nī.

506. Or: Ibn Najīb. In 126/744, he urged clemency on Naṣr towards al-Kirmānī. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1863.

girl on a camel. He said, "Ask who this girl belongs to." One of the asāwirah went to ask, then came back and said, "To Ziyād b. al-Ḥārith al-Bakrī." Ziyād was sitting (with them). Asad frowned and said, "Will you not stop[507] until I harshly treat a man among you who is dear to me, beating his back and his front?" Ziyād said, "If she is mine, she is free. No, by God, O amīr, I do not have a woman with me, for this[508] is (only) an envious enemy."

Asad went on. When he was at the Bridge of 'Aṭā', he said to Mas'ūd b. 'Amr al-Kirmānī,[509] who was at that time the deputy of al-Kirmānī in charge of the Azd, "Help me in getting fifty men and mounts to leave behind on this bridge, so that they might not let anyone who crosses it return to it." Mas'ūd said, "From where can I (get) fifty men?" Asad thereupon commanded that he be flung down from his mount and also ordered that he be beheaded. But a group of men went to Asad to speak to him, so that he refrained from (harming) him. When Asad had crossed the bridge, he encamped in a suitable place, staying in it until it was morning. Then he wanted to spend the day (there), but al-'Udhāfir[510] b. Zayd said to him, "Let the amīr consider staying all day in this place so that the men may catch up." Thereupon [1607] Asad commanded departure, saying, "We have no need for latecomers!" Then he departed. In charge of his vanguard was Sālim b. Manṣūr al-Bajalī[511] with three hundred (men), who met three hundred of the Turks, a reconnaissance party of the Khāqān. Sālim captured their leader and seven (others) of them, while the rest escaped. The leader was brought to Asad. The Turk was weeping. Asad asked, "What makes you cry?" He answered, "I do not weep for myself, but I weep because of the destruction of the Khāqān." Asad asked, "How?" The Turk replied, "Because he has scattered his troops over what is between him and Marw."

507. Text: yantahūn; read: tantahūn, as in Cairo ed.

508. That is, the man who identified him as owner of the girl.

509. Doubtless a Ma'nī from the Azd and a close relative of Juday' b. 'Alī al-Kirmānī. See note 468.

510. Text: al-Ghudāfir; read: al-'Udhāfir, as in Cairo ed. He was of the Taym Allāh of the Bakr, not the Tamīm. See Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 353.

511. See note 469.

The Campaign of Kharīstān

Asad then went on until he stopped at al-Sidrah, a village by Balkh. In charge of the cavalry of the Ahl al-ʿĀliyah was Rayḥān b. Ziyād al-ʿĀmirī al-ʿAbdallī of the Banū ʿAbdallāh b. Kaʿb. Asad removed him, putting Manṣūr b. Sālim[512] in charge of the Ahl al-ʿĀliyah. Then he left al-Sidrah, encamping at Kharīstān. Asad heard the neighing of a horse and asked, "Whose is this?" He was told, "It belongs to al-ʿAqqār b. Dhuʿayr." Asad drew a bad omen from the man's name as well as his father's name and said, "Send him back." ʿAqqār said, "I will be killed going out against the Turks!" Asad answered, "May God kill you!" Then Asad went on until he overlooked the hot springs. Bishr b. Razīn—or Razīn b. Bishr—received him. Asad said, "Good news (bishārah) and sound judgement (razānah)![513] What do you have to report, O Razīn?" Razīn said, "If you do not help us, we will lose our city." Asad responded, "Say to al-Miqdām b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān to vie with my spear in excellence." Asad went on, encamping two *farsakh*s from the (capital) city[514] of al-Jūzjān. [1608]

Then we arose in the morning, the two cavalry forces having seen each other. The Khāqān asked al-Ḥārith, "Who is this?" Al-Ḥārith answered, 'This is Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā and his banner." It is said that scouts of the Khāqān returning to him told him that a spreading cloud of dust had risen from the direction of Balkh. The Khāqān summoned al-Ḥārith and said, "Did you not claim that Asad would not come out to resist? But this dust cloud has come from the direction of Balkh." Al-Ḥārith said, "This is the brigand whom I have told you is one of my companions." Thereupon the Khāqān sent out scouts, saying, "Look whether you see a raised seat or chairs on the camels." When the scouts came (back), they told him that they had seen these things with their own eyes. The Khāqān said, "Brigands do not carry raised seats and chairs. This is Asad who has come against you." Asad went on for a ghalwah whereupon Sālim b. Junāḥ met him and said, "Be of good cheer, O amīr, I have looked at them, and they do not reach four thousand (men). I hope that the Khāqān may be God's slaughter." Al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim, who was travelling along with Asad, said, 'O amīr, make your men set up camp.' But Asad struck his mount in the face, saying, "Had you been obeyed, O Mujashshir, we would not have arrived here." Then he went on not far and said, "O people of the morning, encamp!" They encamped, drawing their mounts near them and taking up arrows and bows. The Khāqān was in the open field in which he had passed that night.

512. See note 478.

513. Asad here makes a play on the man's name.

514. The capital of al-Jūzjān was either Anbār, now Sar-i-Pul; or more probably al-Yahūdiyyah, now Maymanah; or Kundaram, now Gurziwan, as Gibb thinks. He associates the nearby Kharīstān with Sān, a city in the mountains near Maymanah. See Le Strange, Lands, 423–6, map VIII opposite p. 335; Gibb, Arab Conquests, 84, 86 n.23; Barthold, Turkestan, 79.

According to 'Amr b. Abī Mūsā: Asad departed when he had performed the early morning worship. He passed through al-Jūzjān, which the Khāqān had devastated, to the extent that his horse-[1609] men had reached al-Shubūrqān.[515] The castles of al-Jūzjān were at that time submissive.[516] Al-Miqdām b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al-Ghāmidī came to Asad with his warriors and the forces of al-Jūzjān, he being its governor. They offered their services to Asad, but he said, "Remain in your city." However, Asad said to al-Jūzjān b. al-Jūzjān,[517] "Go with me." Al-Qāsim b. Bukhayt al-Murāghī was in charge of the order of battle. He put the Azd, the Banū Tamīm and al-Jūzjān b. al-Jūzjān along with his shākiriyyah on the right flank. He added to them the troops of Filasṭīn commanded by Muṣ'ab b. 'Amr al-Khuzā'ī and the troops of Qinnasrīn commanded by Maghrā'[518] b. Aḥmar. Al-Qāsim set the Rabī'ah on the left flank under Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn, joining to them the troops of Ḥimṣ under Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī[519] and the troops of al-

515. The nearest town of al-Jūzjān to Balkh, which it lies to the west of. Shubūrqān still exists under its ancient name. See Le Strange, Lands, 426.

516. Or: weak.

517. Apparently the son of the local ruler who rebelled against Qutaybah in 90(709), he reappears with Naṣr in 121(739). Ṭabarī, II/2, 1206, III/2, 1694.

518. Text: Ṣaghrā'; read: Maghrā'. His full name is Maghrā' b. Aḥmar b. Mālik b. Sāriyah al-Numayrī, a Qaysī from Qinnasrīn whose family appear in Iraq and Khurāsān. Maghrā' later went to Iraq to join the arch-Qaysī Yūsuf b. 'Umar al-Thaqafī in 123(741). See Ṭabari, III/2, 1719–25. For his cousin, see p. 1473 above.

519. Abū Khālid. A Yamanī Syrian commander who came to Khurāsān with Asad in 116–7(734–5), was acting governor of Khurāsān for a brief span in 120(738) and then went to Iraq, where he fought for the Umayyads against the 'Abbāsids but was spared at the capitulation of Wāsiṭ in 132(750) and joined the service of al-Manṣūr, where he is found until at least 146(763). See Ṭabarī, I/3. 68, 116, 125, 223–4, 291–2, Urdunn[520] under Sulaymān b. 'Amr al-Muqrī[521] from the Ḥimyar. In charge of the vanguard was Manṣūr b. Muslim al-Bajalī,[522] to whom he joined the forces of Damascus under Ḥamlah b. Nu'aym al-Kalbī.[523] He also joined to them the guard, the security force, and the servants of Asad.

The Khāqān placed on the right flank al-Ḥārith b. Surayj and his followers, the king of al-Sughd, the ruler of al-Shāsh, Kharā Bughrah (the father of Khānākhurrah,[524] who was the grandfather of Kāwūs[525]),the ruler of al-Khuttal, Jabghūyah and all the Turks. When the armies met, al-Ḥārith and those with him of the Sughdī troops, al-Bābiyyah[526] and others charged against the left flank (of the Muslims), in which were the Rabī'ah and two of the divisions of Syrian troops. Al-Ḥārith routed them, so that nothing stopped [1610] them before (they reached) Asad's tent. At this, the right wing, consisting of the Azd, the Banū Tamīm, and (the forces of) al-Jūzjān, came to their support. They had hardly reached the left flank before al-Ḥārith and the Turks fled. Then the Muslims attacked all together. Asad said, "O God, they have disobeyed me; but help them!" The Turks went (fleeing) through the land randomly, not turning against anyone. The Muslims pursued them for a distance of three *farsakh*s, killing whomever they could, until they reached their spoils, (from which) they carried off more than 155,000[527] sheep and many beasts of burden. The Khāqān took a road other than the main one into the mountains, while al-Ḥārith b. Surayj protected him. Asad overtook them about noon.

It is said than when Asad stood against the Khāqān on the Day of Kharīstān, a deep river lay between them. Asad ordered that his tent be taken up. A man of the Banū Qays b. Tha'labah said, 318, 327; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 328, II, 253; Ta'rīkh al-Khulafā', 211b.

---

520. Text: al-Azd; read: al-Urdunn. This is the only Syrian jund herein omitted. Al-Azd is never referred to as Ahl al-Azd.

521. Text: al-Maqrī; read: al-Muqrī.

522. See note 469.

523. He appears in a delegation from Naṣr to Hishām in 123(741). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1721–4.

524. Apparently the same as Khānākhurrah or Khārākhurrah, the Prince of Ushrūsanah in 178(794). See Ṭabarī, I/3, 631.

525. Ruler of Ushrūsanah to 207(822). See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1066.

526. Probably Sughdīs. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 87.

527. Probably better read as one hundred fifty thousand. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 205.

"O men of Syria! Is your opinion like this? If[528] the (enemy) forces appear, do you take up the tents?" Asad commanded that he be thrown down. The wind of war named "the light one" arose. God defeated them. They faced the direction of Mecca, praying to God and shouting, "God is Greater!" The Khāqān approached with nearly four hundred horsemen, (their faces) dyed red. A man called Sūrī said, "You are the king of al-Jūzjān only if you keep the Arabs safe. Whomever you see among the men of al-Jūzjān turning away (to flee), kill him." Al-Jūzjān said to 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Shikhkhir, "I certainly know my country and its roads. Will you participate in a matter that will cause the Khāqān to perish and for which you will be remembered as long as you live?" 'Uthmān asked, "What is it?" Al-Jūzjān continued, "That you follow me."
[1611] 'Uthmān said, "Yes." Al-Jūzjān took a road named Warādak,[529] so that they overlooked the Khāqān's round tents from safety. The Khāqān commanded the kettle drums to be beaten with the order to march away, but the fighting had flared so that the Turks could not depart. Then the drums were struck a second time, but they still could not (leave). Then they were beaten a third time, but (still) they could not (leave), owing to their being engaged. Ibn al-Shikhkhir and al-Jūzjān then charged the tents. The Khāqān turned away in flight, the Muslims taking possessior of the Turks' camp. The Turks left behind their pots, (still) boiling, and women, including some Arab and mawālī women, and some Turkish women. The Khāqān's horse sank into the mire with him, but al-Ḥārith b. Surayj protected him.

The Muslims did not know that it was the Khāqān. The Turks' camp was found crammed with every kind of silver vessel, and with Turkish women who play the cymbals. The eunuch tried to bear the Khāqān's wife away, but the Muslim troops prevented him from that. Therefore, he stabbed her with a dagger. They found her moving and took her shoes of quilted wool.

Asad sent the Turkish slave girls to the dihqāns of Khurāsān and rescued those of the Muslims who were in their hands. Asad remained (where he was) for five days.

The Turkish cavalry which had been scattered would come back, and Asad would capture them. Thus he took victory as his 528. Text idh; read: idhā, as in Cairo ed.

529. Vocalization uncertain.

spoil and returned to Balkh on the ninth day from his setting out. Ibn al-Sijf al-Mujāshi'ī said:

If you were to travel in the land measuring the land,
Measuring of it its length and its breadth,
You would not find one better in strength and destructive power
Than the amīr Asad, nor one sharper. [1612]
He brought goodness to us when he went forth,
Bringing together our unity which was scattered.
The Khāqān did not escape him except by running,
There had broken up of his multitudes that which had broken up.
O Ibn Surayj, you have found bitter herbs,
Bitter herbs by which the headache of sick people is cured.

Asad departed, encamping at Jazzah of al-Jūzjān on the next day. The Khāqān was at it also but departed, fleeing from Asad. Asad urged the men on, and many troops from the forces of Syria and the forces of Iraq answered his summons. He made Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī their commander. They set out, stopping to pass the night at a city named Ward[530] in the territory of Jazzah. They were hit by wind and rain and—it is said—by snow, wherefore they returned. The Khāqān went on his way, stopping at (the place of) Jabghūyah al-Ṭukhārī. Al-Bahrānī went back to Asad, who returned to Balkh. He met the Turkish cavalry that had been at Marw al-Rūdh when they were going off to raid Balkh. The Muslims slew whom they could of them. The Turks had reached the synagogue[531] of Marw al-Rūdh. On that day, Asad captured four thousand shirts of mail. When he reached Balkh, he ordered the people to fast (in thanksgiving) for God's having granted them victory.

Asad sometimes sent out al-Kirmānī with raiding parties. These did not cease to capture one, two, three and more men of the Turks. The Khāqān went away to Upper Ṭukhāristān and stayed with Jabghūyah al-Kharlukhī, strenghthening himself through him. He commanded kettle drums to be made. When they had [1613] dried and their sounds had become good enough, he departed for his own country. When he came to Ushrūsanah,[532] Kharā Bughrah[533]—the father of Khānākhurrah, who was the grandfather of Afshīn[534]—met him with entertainers and prepared presents for him, as well as mounts for him and his troops. The relations between the two of them, however, were strained. When the Khāqān returned defeated, Kharā Bughrah desired to ingratiate himself with him; therefore, he brought him everything he could. Then the Khāqān came to his own country and began to prepare for fighting and laying siege to Samarqand. He transported al-Ḥārith and his forces on five thousand horses and also distributed horses among the Turks' commanders.

530. Vocalization uncertain.
531. Or: church.

One day, the Khāqān played Kūrṣūl at backgammon for the stake of a partridge. Kūrṣūl al-Turqashī won the game and sought the partridge, saying, "A female!" while the other said, "A male!" Thus they fought each other. Kūrṣūl broke the Khāqān's hand, whereupon the Khāqān swore that he would certainly break Kūrṣūl's hand. Kūrṣūl was worn out and therefore withdrew. He gathered a multitude of his companions and attacked the Khāqān by night, killing him. When the Turks arose in the morning, they scattered, leaving him stripped. Zurayq[535] b. Ṭufayl al-Kushānī and the household of the Ḥamūkiyyūn, who are among the important Turkish nobles, came to the Khāqān to carry him away for burial and to do with him what is done with the like of him when he is slain. The Turks split into factions, making raids on one another. Some of them withdrew to al-Shāsh. When that happened, [1614] the people of al-Sughd became desirous of returning to their land. None of the Turkish horsemen who scattered in (the) raids came through safely except for Zarābin al-Kissī[536] He went safely until he reached Ṭukhāristān.

Asad had sent forth Sayf b. Waṣṣāf al-'Ijlī on horseback from 532. Text: Shurūsanah; read: Ushrūsanah, as usually in al-Ṭabarī, though Shurūsanah may be an alternative spelling, among others. See Le Strange, Lands, 474.

533. This suggests Kharā Bughrah was not on the campaign with the Khāqān, contradictiong the version given on p. 1609 above. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 471–2n.

534. The famous commander of al-Ma'mūn and al-Mu'taṣim, executed 226(841). For him and this family generally, see EI[2], s.v. Afshīn.

535. Or possibly Zarīn, as in Ms. B.

536. The name is perhaps corrupt; it could be Zarīn al-Kushānī and thus might refer to the person mentioned as Zurayq on the preceding page.

the city of Balkh. He travelled until he stopped at al-Shubūrqān, where Ibrāhīm b. Hishām was in charge of a garrison. The latter forwarded Sayf from al-Shubūrqān on the horses of the post, until he came to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, to whom he gave the news. On hearing of it, (the Caliph) Hishām reckoned the matter unlikely and therefore did not believe it. He said to al-Rabī',[537] his chamberlain (ḥājib), "Woe to you! This old man has brought us the greatest calamity if[538] he be truthful, though I do not think him truthful. Go visit him; then, ask him about what he says and return to me with that." Al-Rabī' went off to him to do that which he had been ordered to do. The messenger told him what he had told Hishām. Thereupon the Caliph was struck by a great concern, so that he summoned the man again and asked, "Who is al-Qāsim b. Bukhayt among you?" The man answered, "That (man) is the master of the camp." The Caliph said, "He has now come." The messenger said, "If he has come, then God has given victory to the Commander of the Faithful." Asad had sent al-Qāsim when God had given him victory. Al-Qāsim b. Bukhayt arrived at the door, shouting, "God is Greater." Then he entered, shouting, "God is Greater," while Hishām responded to his shout by shouting, "God is Greater," until Al-Qāsim reached him. Al-Qāsim then said, "Victory, O Commander of the Faithful!" and told him the news. Hishām came down from his raised seat and made a prostration of thanksgiving, which is for them is one prostration.

The Qaysiyyah were jealous of Asad and Khālid. They advised Hishām to write to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh to command his brother [1615] to send Muqātil b. Ḥayyān (to confirm the news). Thus he wrote to him. Asad summoned Muqātil b. Ḥayyān into the presence of the people and said, "Go to the Commander of the Faithful. Tell him what you saw with your own eyes. Say the truth, for you will not say other than the truth, God willing. Take from the treasury what you require." The people said, "In that case, he will not take anything." Asad said, "Give him so much of money and so much of clothing," equipping him. Then he went on his way

537. He is al-Rabī' b. Sābūr, the mawlā of the Banū al-Harīsh. More precisely, he was in charge of the privy seal (khātam) and also, from 109(727), the guard (ḥaras). His name indicates an Iranian origin. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 545; Kubaysī, 'Aṣr Hishām, 68–9, 85.

538. Text: idh; read: idhā, as in Cairo ed.

and came to Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik when he and al-Abrash were both sitting. Hishām asked him (what news he had). Muqātil said, "We campaigned in al-Khuttal, gaining a great spoil. Asad was warned about the Turks, but we did not concern ourselves with them until they overtook us, rescued some of what we had taken as spoils, and plundered part of our camp. Then they threw us back near Khulm. Our troops reached their winter quarters thereafter. Then we heard about the Khāqān's journeying to al-Jūzjān while we were yet fresh from having fought with the enemy. Asad brought us along until we met (the enemy) in a district between us and the land of al-Jūzjān. We fought them, they having captured some of the Muslims' families. They attacked our left, causing it to retreat. Then our right attacked them. God gave us victory over them so that we pursued them for several *farsakh*s, until we plundered the Khāqān's camp, and he was driven out of it."

Hishām had been reclining on his side but sat up straight at the mention of the Khāqān's camp. He said three times, "You plundered the Khāqān's camp?!" Muqātil said, "Yes." Hishām asked, "Then what?" Muqātil answered, "They entered al-Khuttal and [1616] went away." Hishām said, "Asad is certainly weak!" Muqātil interposed, "Gently, O Commander of the Faithful, Asad is not weak. He could not have endured (doing) beyond what he did."

Hishām asked him, "Your need?" Muqātil answered, "Yazīd b. al-Muhallab unrightfully took a hundred thousand dirhams from my father Ḥayyān." Hishām said to him, "I will not require you to provide a witness. Swear by God that it is as you said." Muqātil swore, whereupon Hishām restored the money to him from the treasury of Khurāsān, writing to Khālid that he write to Asad about it. Khālid wrote to him, at which Asad gave Muqātil a hundred thousand dirhams, which he divided among the heirs of Ḥayyān according to the Book of God and His requirements. It is said, rather, he wrote to Asad that he investigate that (matter) and, if what Muqātil had mentioned were true, that he be given a hundred thousand dirhams. He who brought (news of) the victory of Khurāsān to Marw was 'Abd al-Salām b. al-Ashhab b. 'Ubayd[539] al-Ḥanẓalī.

Asad sent a delegation to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh regarding his rout 539. Text: 'Utbah; read: 'Ubayd, as in Ms. B. He is the son of the famous scout of the Banū 'Abdallāh b. Dārim. See note 104.

(of the Turks) on the Day of Sān.[540] They had with them the Khāqān's round tents and the heads of the Turks who were slain. Khālid sent them on to Hishām, who made them swear they were telling the truth. Thus they swore, whereupon Hishām gave them gifts. Abū al-Hindī al-Asadī said to Asad commemorating the Day of Sān:

Abū Mundhir, you eagerly desired (certain) matters and hence took their measure, Persistently asking about them like a covetous bargainer. [1617]
No possessor of informed opinion among the people, when you compare him
With your own view is except like (a holder of) the opinion of dumb animals.
Abū Mundhir, if not for your going (to battle), there would have been no Iraq, nor would the Iranians' kings have been subordinated,
Nor would any rider have made the pilgrimage to God's house since pilgrimages have been made to it,
Nor would al-Baṭḥā'[541] have been inhabited after the seasons (of pilgrimage).
How many a dead man between Sān and Jazzah,
Having many powers, from among great kings,
Did you leave in the land of al-Jūzjān, whom beasts of prey
And eagles visit, that they may tear at the backs of necks?
(And how many) a possessor of subjects, in whom the sword took its course,
But who has a last breath of life, while birds of prey hover around him?
(And how many) a fugitive from us and a submitter to us,
A captive who endures fetters unknown?
Souls from the Tamīm and the 'Āmir redeemed you,
And from the Muḍar al-Ḥamrā', during difficult straits,
They[542] made the Khāqān covetous concerning us, so that [1618]
the followers he brought with him

540. A city of al-Jūzjān near Maymanah. See note 514.
541. A place near Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 446.
542. This can hardly refer to the Tamīm, 'Āmir, and Muḍar just mentioned in the preceding line.

Began hoping to get possession of spoils.

At his death, al-Sabal had charged Ibn al-Sā'ijī, at the time he made him his successor,[543] with three arrangements, saying:

"Do not treat the people of al-Khuttal high-handedly as I did, for I am a prince, but you are not a prince. You are only a man from among them. They will not bear on your account what they will bear from the princes. Do not cease demanding al-Ḥanash until you return him to your country, for he is the prince after me. Princes represent rule, and whenever the people have no rule, they are a vile mass. Do not make war on the Arabs, but trick them with every trick by which you can hold them at bay."

Ibn al-Sā'ijī responded to al-Sabal, "As for what you mentioned about my leaving aside high-handed behavior toward the people of al-Khuttal, I already know that. As for what you have enjoined regarding bringing al-Ḥanash back, the prince has spoken the truth. But as for your statement, 'Do not make war on the Arabs,' how can you forbid making war on them when you were the most warlike of princes toward them?"

Al-Sabal answered, "You have done well to ask about what you do not know. I have tried your strength compared with my strength but did not find you came up to my level. When I battled the Arabs, I did not escape except half dead. If you were to fight them, you would all perish in your first battle with them."

[1619] Al-Ḥanash had fled to China. It was Ibn al-Sā'ijī who informed Asad b. 'Abdallāh about the movement of the Khāqān. Thus Asad disliked making war on Ibn al-Sā'ijī.

In this year, al-Mughīrah b. Sa'īd[544] and Bayān[545] rebelled with a small party of men. Khālid arrested and executed them.

The Execution of al-Mughīrah b. Sa'īd and Bayān

As for al-Mughīrah b. Sa 'īd, he was—according to what has been 543. Or rather, regent for his son. See note 479.

544. Al-Ījlī or, according to Ibn Qutaybah, the mawlā of the Bajīlah. It is likely that he was a mawlā, as extreme Shī'itc ideas are attributed to him. His execution took place near Wāsiṭ. See Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn, II, 146–9; Mubarrad, Kāmil, I, 31; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1700.

545. Bayān b. Sam'ān al-Tamīmī, another Shī'ite. See Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn, II, 148.

reported—a sorcerer.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd[546]—Jarīr[547]—al-A'mash:[548] I heard al-Mughīrah b. Sa'īd say, "If I wanted to resurrect 'Ād, Thamūd[549] and many generations between them, I would resurrect them." Al-A'mash continued: Al-Mughīrah would go out to the graveyard and speak, at which the like of locusts would be seen on the tombs, or in any case, he said something like this.

According to Abū Nu'aym[550]—al-Naḍr b. Muḥammad[551]—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā:[552] A man from among the inhabitants of al-Baṣrah came to us seeking knowledge. He was staying with us. One day, I ordered my servant girl to buy two dirhams' worth of fish for me. Then I went off with the man from al-Baṣrah to al-Mughīrah b. Sa'īd. He asked me, "O Muḥammad, would you like me to tell you why your eyebrows are separated?" I answered, "No." He asked, "Would you like me to tell you why your family named you Muḥammad?" I replied, "No." He said, "Have you not sent your servant to buy two dirhams' worth of fish for you?" Then we rose and left him. [1620]

According to Abū Nu'aym: Al-Mughīrah used to study sorcery. Then Khālid al-Qasrī arrested, executed and hung him in public display.

According to Abū Zayd—Abū Bakr b. Ḥafṣ al-Zuhrī[553]—Muḥammad b. 'Aqīl—Sa'īd b. Mardāband, the mawlā of 'Amr 546. Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd b. Ḥayyān al-Tamīmī al-Rāzī d. 248(862). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 127–31.

547. Abū 'Abdallāh Jarīr b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Qurṭ al-Ḍabbī al-Rāzī 107(725) or 110(728)–188(804). He was born in a village near Iṣfahān and therefore probably a mawlā. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 75–7.

548. Abū Muḥammad Sulaymān b. Mihrān al-Kūfī, the mawlā of the Kāhil of the Asad, 60(680) or 61(681)–148(765). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 222–6; EI^{2}, s.v. al-A'mash.

549. Ancient Arabian peoples mentioned in the Qur'ān as destroyed by God for their iniquities.

550. Al-Faḍl b. 'Amr, nicknamed Dukayn, b. Ḥammād b. Zuhayr b. Dirham al-Mulā'ī al-Kūfī, the mawlā of the family of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Taymī, 130(748)–219(834). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 270–6; EI^{2}, s.v. Abū Nu'aym.

551. Probably Abū 'Abdallāh al-Marwazī, the mawlā of the 'Āmir of the Quraysh, d. 183(800). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 444–5.

552. Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Anṣārī al-Kūfī, d. 148(765), the judge of al-Kūfah for Yūsuf b. 'Umar al-Thaqafī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 301–3; Wakī', Quḍāh, III, 129–144.

553. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ al-Madanī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 188–9.

b. Ḥurayth:[554] I saw Khālid when he was brought al-Mughīrah and Bayān with six or seven men. He ordered his raised seat, whereupon it was brought out to the Friday mosque. He commanded bundles of reeds and tar to be brought. Then he ordered al-Mughīrah to take up a bundle, but the latter shrank from it faintheartedly and delayed. Lashes were rained down on his head, whereupon he took up the bundle, embracing it. He was tied to it; then tar was poured over him and over the bundle. Then fire was kindled on both of them, and they were consumed. Khālid ordered the followers (to do likewise), and they did so. He now commanded Bayān, the last of them, who hastened to come to the bundle and embrace it. Khālid said, "Woe to you! Do you act foolishly in everything? Did you not see this al-Mughīrah?" Then he burned him.

According to Abū Zayd: When Khālid slew al-Mughīrah and Bayān, he sent a messenger to Mālik b. A'yan al-Juhanī. He interrogated him, believed him regarding himself and released him. When Mālik was alone with those he trusted, among whom was Abū Muslim the (later) master of Khurāsān, he said:

I struck for him an open path between the two roads
And muddied the sun for him among those who muddy it.
[1621] I threw him into doubt when he questioned me,
As a letter sīn and its shīn are confused in handwriting.

Abū Muslim said when his affair appeared, "Had I found him, I would have killed him for his admission against himself."

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr[555]—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Al-Mughīrah b. Sa'īd rebelled with seven men who were called 'the servants.' Their rebellion took place outside of al-Kūfah. Khālid al-Qasrī, being told of their rebellion while he was on the pulpit, said, "Give me a drink of water!" Ibn Nawfal[556] reproached him

554. 'Amr b. Ḥurayth b. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Makhzūm, a wealthy notable of al-Kūfah. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 333.

555. His father was Abū Khaythamah Zuhayr b. Ḥarb b. Shaddād al-Nasā'ī, the mawlā of the Ḥarīsh, a Baghdādī traditionist. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 342–4; Ṭabarī, Indices, 15.

556. Abū Ma'mar Yaḥyā b. Nawfal al-Ḥimyarī, a Kūfan of an Arab father and non-Arab mother (muwallad). The incident referred to here is famous. See Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, I, 50, 122, II, 266–7, III, 205, Ḥayawān, II, 267, VI, 390; Mubarrad, Kāmil, I, 31–2, 54; Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn, III, 48, Shi'r wa Shu'arā', 741–5.

for that, saying:

O Khālid, may God not reward you with good,
And a penis in your mother's vagina as an amīr!
You wish for glory among the Qays and the Qasr,
As if you were from the leaders of the Banū Jarīr.[557]
Your mother is a servile non-Arab and your father a scoundrel, Lowly followers are not equal to the chiefs.
Jarīr is of the possessors of authentic Yamanī (blood),
Noble of origin, a possessor of great eminence,
While you claim to be from Yazīd,[558]
But have been removed as a yearling ewe or goat (when it is weaned).
You were before al-Mughīrah a wretched slave
Pissing out of fear of (mere) bellowing.
You said, owing to what had stricken you, 'Give me
A drink'; then you pissed on your raised seat,
Because of eight (men) and a man [1622]
Of great age who did not possess any helper.

In this year, Bahlūl b. Bishr,[559] nicknamed Kuthārah, led a Khārijite revolt and was killed.

The Rebellion and Execution of Bahlūl b. Bishr

According to Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā: Bahlūl would worship (much). He would have with him food the weight of a dāniq. He became famous for being bold with Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. He went forth intending to make the pilgrimage and ordered his servant to buy a dirham's worth of vinegar, but this servant came to him with wine (instead). Bahlūl ordered the servant to return and recover the dirham, but the shopowner did not fulfill his request. Bahlūl came then to the governor of the town, which was in the Sawād,[560] and spoke to him. The governor 557. The reference is to the descendents of Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī, whose house had the greatest prominence among the Bajilah before the rise of Khālid. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 224; Crone, Slaves, 114–5.

558. Khālid's grandfather.

559. Ya'qūbī gives as his name Bahlūl b. 'Umayr al- Shaybānī. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 387.

560. The alluvial plane of Iraq. See EI[1], s.v. al-Sawād.

said, "Wine is better than you and your people." Bahlūl went on with his pilgrimage until he finished it, and was now resolved to rebel against the authorities. At Mecca, he met those having a like opinion. They made an appointment with each other (to meet) in one of the villages of the district of al-Mawṣil. Forty men gathered there, making al-Bahlūl their amīr. They unanimously resolved not to pass anyone without telling him that they had come from Hishām to take up certain administrative posts and[561] that he had sent them to Khālid so that the latter might install them in their offices. Thus they did not pass an official but that they in-[1623] formed him of that (arrangement) and took mounts belonging to the post.

When they reached the town in which the servant had sought to buy vinegar but had been given wine, Bahlūl said, "Let us begin with this governor who said what he said." But his companions said to him, "We want to kill Khālid! If we start with this one, we will become known, and Khālid and others will be warned about us. Therefore, we adjure you by God that you (not) kill this one, for then Khālid—who tears down mosques, builds synagogues and churches, appoints Zoroastrians in preference to Muslims, and gives Muslim women in marriage to dhimmīs—would escape from us. It may be that we will kill him, and God will thereby deliver us from him." Bahlūl answered, "By God, I will not discard what is obligatory for me for what follows! I hope to kill this one who said to me what he said and to catch up with Khālid and to kill him (too). If I leave this one and come to Khālid, our business will become known, so that this one will escape. God has said, 'Fight those of the unbelievers who are near to you, and let them find endurance in you!'"[562] His companions said, "As you decide."

Thus they came to the governor and slew him. Thereby being warned of them and knowing that they were Khārijites, the people hastened to the road in flight. Meanwhile, postal riders went forth to Khālid, telling him that some Khārijites had rebelled, but they did not yet know who was their leader. Khālid went forth

561. Text: wajjahahum; read: wa wajjahahum, as in Cairo ed., relying on other manuscript evidence.

562. Qur'ān 9:123.

from Wāsiṭ, until he came to al-Ḥīrah.[563] At that time, he was with troops, as in those days a Syrian commander from the Banū al-Qayn had arrived with an army which had been sent as aid for Khālid's governor of India, and these were encamped at al- [1624]
Ḥīrah. Owing to that, Khālid headed for it. Then he summoned their commander, saying, "Fight these rebels! Whoever kills one of their men, I will give him a stipend in addition to that received in Syria and will excuse him from going forth to the territory of India." Going out to the land of India was onerous to them, therefore they hastened to accept that offer, saying, "We will kill that bunch and return to our own country."

Thus al-Qaynī went against the Khārijites with six hundred men, to whom Khālid joined two hundred from the security forces of al-Kūfah. They met on the Euphrates. Al-Qaynī arranged his troops and dismissed the Kūfan security forces, saying, "Do not be with us." He only intended by that that he and his men be left alone with the enemy. As such, the victory would be theirs without (the help of) others, owing to what Khālid had promised them. Bahlūl came out against them and asked who their commander was, so that he might learn his location. Then he waited for him with a black standard. After this, he bore down on him, stabbing him in the gap in his armor and running him through. Al-Qaynī said, "You have slain me, may God kill you!" Bahlūl said, "To the hellfire, may God banish you!" The Syrian troops then fled with the security forces of al-Kūfah until they reached the gate of al-Kūfah, while Bahlūl and his men kept killing them. As for the Syrians, they were on fleet horses and thus escaped them. But as for the Kūfan security forces, he overtook them. They said, "Fear God regarding us, for we are forced, compelled!" But he began smiting their heads with spears, saying, "Catch up! Deliverance! Deliverance!"

Al-Bahlūl found on al-Qaynī a money bag, which he took. In al-Kūfah were six persons who held the opinion of al-Bahlūl. They went out in his direction intending to join him but were slain. Al-Bahlūl went forth to where they were, carrying the money bag [1625] with him. He said, "Who slew these persons, so that I may give him these dirhams?" Thereupon this one began to say, "I did," and that one, "I," until he learned who they were, while they thought that he had come from Khālid to give them money for their slaying of those who were slain. Then Bahlūl asked the people of the village, "Did these speak the truth? Did they slay the band?" They answered, "Yes." Bahlūl had feared that they claimed it out of greed for money. He said to the people of the village, "You go away." Then he ordered those (who had slain his followers) to be killed. His companions faulted him, but he argued with them until they accepted his argument.

563. A famous Iraqi city beside al-Kūfah near the Euphrates. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Ḥīra.

Khālid heard of the defeat of the force (of al-Qaynī) as well as the news of those killed from the people of Ṣarīfīn.[564] Therefore, he dispatched a commander from the Banū Shaybān, one of the sons of Ḥawshab b. Yazīd b. Ruwaym.[565] He met the enemy between al-Mawṣil and al-Kūfah, but al-Bahlūl dealt with (his) force severely, whereupon the commander said, "I beg of you on behalf of our close relationship, for I am going over to (you), seeking refuge." At this, Bahlūl left him alone while his men were defeated. They came to Khālid, who was staying at al-Kūfah, waiting. Nothing frightened him except the routed army suddenly coming upon him.

Al-Bahlūl set off on the same day heading for al-Mawṣil. The governor of al-Mawṣil was afraid of him and therefore wrote to Hishām that rebels had gone out to create havoc and ruin and that he did not feel that his province was safe. He asked him for troops with which to fight them. Hishām wrote back to him, "Send Kuthārah b. Bishr against them." Hishām did not know al-Bahlūl except by his nickname. At this, the governor wrote to [1626] him, "The rebel is Kuthārah!"

Then al-Bahlūl said to his followers, "By God, we will not do anything to the son of the Christian woman (meaning Khālid). I did not rebel except for God. Therefore, why do we not seek out the head who has given power to Khālid and Khālid's relations?" Thereupon he set out, heading for Hishām in Syria. Hishām's gov-

564. Apparently the large village next to 'Ukbarā' on the Tigris on the way from al-Kūfah to al-Mawṣil. Presumably it belonged then to al-Kūfah, which accounts for Yāqūt's seeming duplication of it. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 403–4.

565. Al-Shaybānī. Ḥawshab had had charge of al-Ḥajjāj's security force in al-Kūfah. For his complete nasab, see Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 147, II, 322; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 325.

ernors feared he would break out in anger if they let al-Bahlūl pass through their lands in order to reach Syria. Thus Khālid mobilized against him troops from the inhabitants of Iraq. The governor of al-Jazīrah mobilized against him troops from the inhabitants of al-Jazīrah, and Hishām dispatched troops from the inhabitants of Syria. They gathered at a monastery between al-Jazīrah and al-Mawṣil. Bahlūl advanced until he reached them. It is said that they met at al-Kuḥayl[566] below al-Mawṣil. Bahlūl advanced to encamp at the gate of the monastery. His opponents said to him, "Draw back from the gate of the monastery so that we may come out to (fight) you." Thereupon he moved aside, and they emerged. When he saw their multitude, while he had only seventy (men) with him, he made right and left wings of his followers and asked (his opponents), "Does every one of you hope to kill us and then go back to his hometown to find his family safe?" They answered, "We hope for that, God willing." Then one of them attacked him, but Bahlūl slew him and said, "As for this one, he will never go back to his family!" He did not cease persisting in that until he had slain six of their men. At this, they were beaten and reentered the monastery, whereupon Bahlūl besieged them.

But reinforcements came to his opponents, so that they were twenty thousand. His followers said to him, "Should we not slaughter our mounts, then attack them in one charge?" He answered, "Do not do so until we offer to God an excuse for holding back from (slaughtering) our mounts for as long as we have held back."[567] The rebels fought the government forces all day long into the late afternoon, until they had left many killed and wounded [1627] among them. Then Bahlūl and his followers slaughtered their riding beasts, went on foot and drew their swords against their enemy, causing them injury. Bahlūl's followers were mostly slain, while he fought on, defending his men. A man from the Jadīlah of the Qays nicknamed Abū al-Mawt[568] attacked him, stabbing him and knocking him down. Those of Bahlūl's followers who survived came to him and said to him, "Designate someone to be in charge after you." Bahlūl said, "If I perish, the Commander of the Faithful is to be Di'āmah al-Shaybānī. If Di'āmah perishes, the Commander of the Faithful is to be 'Amr al-Yashkurī." But Abū al-Mawt had only struck al-Bahlūl by stealth. Bahlūl died the same night. When his companions arose in the morning, Di'āmah fled and left them. A man from their poets said:

566. A city on the west side of the Tigris between the mouths of the two Zāb rivers. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 439.

567. That is, "Let us fight well for as long as we can before we slaughter our mounts to prevent their capture and make a desperate last charge."

568. That is, the Father of Death, not a normal patronymic.

Di'āmah is the worst Commander of the Faithful,
A pillar[569] who in war is the worst of supports.

Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays[570] said, eulogizing Bahlūl and his followers:

I have been given in exchange, after Abū Bishr and his companions,
A people who are helpers with the divisions against me,
As if they were not of our comradeship,
Nor were intimate friends of ours yesterday.
O eye, shed your tears in continuous flow
And weep on our behalf for companions and brothers who have departed,
They left for us the outward appearance of the world and its hidden aspect
And have become neighbors in gardens of immortality.

According to Abū 'Ubaydah: When Bahlūl was slain, 'Amr al-Yashkurī went out in rebellion but was soon killed. Then al-'Anazī,[571] the companion of al-Ashhab—and by this he was known—rebelled against Khālid with sixty men. Khālid dis-[1628] patched al-Simṭ b. Muslim al-Bajalī against him with four thousand (men). They met in the vicinity of the Euphrates. Al-'Anazī attacked al-Simṭ, but the latter smote him between his fingers, so that he threw down his sword, his hand being paralyzed. After this, al-Simṭ charged al-'Anazī's men, and the Ḥarūriyyah were defeated. The slaves of the people of al-Kūfah and their vulgar people met them and threw stones at them until they slew them.

569. Di'āmah means 'pillar' or 'support' in Arabic.

570. Al-Shaybānī, the famous Khārijite leader who subjugated Iraq in 127(745) and fell fighting Marwān b. Muḥammad in 128(746). See EI[2], s.v. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al- Shaybānī.

571. Ibn al-Athīr has al-Bakhtarī. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 212.

The Execution of Wazīr al-Sakhtiyānī

According to Abū 'Ubaydah: Then Wazīr al-Sakhtiyānī rebelled against Khālid with a small number of men. His rebellion took place at al-Ḥīrah. He would not pass by a village but that he would burn it, nor by a person but that he would kill him. He got control over what was there and over the treasury. Khālid sent against him a commander from among his companions and a detachment from the security forces of al-Kūfah. They fought him, while he had with him a very small number of men. Wazīr fought on until most of his companions were slain and he was badly wounded. He was taken captive half-dead and brought to Khālid. He approached Khālid, admonishing him and reciting for him verses from the Qur'ān. What Khālid heard from him pleased him, so that he refrained from killing him, but rather he incarcerated him in his prison. During his nights, Khālid kept sending for Wazīr to be brought to him so that he might converse with him and ask him questions. That reached Hishām and so Khalīd was denounced to him. It was said, "He has taken a Harūrī who has killed, burned and plundered property, has allowed him to live and has (even) adopted him as a companion for evening entertainment." Hishām became enraged and wrote to Khālid, cursing him and saying, "Do not allow an offender who has killed, burned, and plundered property to live." Khālid used to say, "I console myself with his company against death," owing to what he would hear of his elucidation and eloquence. He wrote to Hishām regarding him and softened (the seriousness of) the matter—and it is said, rather, he did not write but delayed his affair and put it [1629] off—until Hishām wrote to him rebuking him and commanding him to execute Wazīr and burn him. When (such) a command of resolve which he could not put off came to Khālid, he sent for Wazīr and for the small number of men of his companions who had been taken with him. Then he ordered that they be brought into the mosque. Bundles of reeds were also brought in, to which they were tied. Then tar was poured over them, and they were brought out and set up in the courtyard, where fire was tossed onto them. There was not one of them but that he was troubled and showed anxiety, all except for Wazīr, who did not move and kept reciting the Qur'ān until he died.

In this year, Asad b. ʿAbdallāh campaigned in al-Khuttal. In it, Asad slew Badr Ṭarkhān, the prince of al-Khuttal.

Asad's Campaign against al-Khuttal: This Campaign and the Reason for His Killing Badr Ṭarkhān

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his authorities whom we have mentioned before: Asad campaigned against al-Khuttal—it was the campaign against Badr Ṭarkhān—dispatching Muṣʿab b. ʿAmr al-Khuzāʿī to it. Muʿsab kept going along until he encamped near Badr Ṭarkhān, who sought safe conduct for the purpose of going forth to Asad. Muṣʿab responded positively, whereupon Badr Ṭarkhān went forth to Asad to ask him for certain things, but Asad held back. Then Badr Ṭarkhān asked him that he accept from him [1630] one million dirhams. Asad responded to him, "You are a stranger from the people of al-Bāmiyān.[572] Leave al-Khuttal as you entered it." Badr Ṭarkhān said to him, "You entered Khurāsān on ten readied mounts, but if you were to leave it today, you would not be transported by (even) five hundred camels. Besides that, I entered al-Khuttal with something; therefore, give that thing back to me so that I may go out of al-Khuttal as I entered it." Asad said, "What is that?" Badr Ṭarkhān said, "I entered it as a youth, winning wealth by the sword, while God provided a family and children. Therefore, give me back my youth so that I may leave al-Khuttal. Do you think I should abandon my family and children? What would my survival be (worth) after my family and children?" Thus Asad became angry.

Badr Ṭarkhān trusted in the guarantee of safe conduct. But Asad said to him, "I will put a seal on your neck, as I fear for you on account of the treachery of the troops." Badr Ṭarkhān said, "I do not want that. I will be satisfied from your side by a man who will convey me to Muṣʿab." But Asad only wanted to put a seal on his neck. Thus he put a seal on his neck and turned him over to Abū al-Asad, his mawlā. Abū al-Asad set out with him until he reached al-Muṣʿab's camp in the evening. Salamah b. Abī ʿAbdallāh was among the mawālī with Muṣʿab. Abū al-Asad came to Salamah while he was putting the siege engine in its place. Salamah asked Abū al-Asad, "What has the amīr done in the matter of Badr Ṭarkhān?" Abū al-Asad then related what Badr Ṭarkhān had proposed, Asad's refusal of that and his sending Badr Ṭarkhān with him to al-Muṣ'ab so that the latter might let him enter the fortress. Salamah said:

572. A city south of Balkh deep in the Ghūr mountains. See EI^{2}, s.v. Bāmiyān.

"The amīr has not done right in what he has done. He will reconsider that and regret (it). Rather, he should have taken what [1631] Badr Ṭarkhān offered him, or held him without letting him enter his fortress. For we only have entered it by bridges which we set up and narrows which we repaired.[573] The hope of peace has kept him from sallying out against us. But if he despairs of peace, he will not leave aside any effort (against us). Therefore, leave him in my tent tonight. Do not go off with him to al-Muṣ'ab, for as soon as he sees him, he will allow him to enter his fortress."

Thus Abū al-Asad and Badr Ṭarkhān remained in Salamah's tent. Asad advanced with the men along a narrow way where the troops became cut off from one another. Asad passed on until he reached a river. He had become thirsty. Not having with him any of his servants, he called for water. Al-Sughdī b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān Abū Ṭu'mah al-Jarmī[574] had a shākirī with him. The shākirī had a Tibetan horn. Al-Sughdī took the horn, put some parched barley in it, poured water from the river on it, and shook it. He then gave Asad and a group of the troops' leaders a drink from it. Next, Asad alighted in the shade of a tree, summoning a man from his guards, that he might rest his head on the guardsman's thigh. Al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī came up leading his horse until he sat down opposite him, where Asad was looking. Asad asked him, "How are you, O Abū al-'Adabbas?" Al-Mujashshir replied, "Badr Ṭarkhān was in our hands. He offered what he offered, but neither did the amīr accept from him what he offered him, nor did he tighten his grip on him. Rather, he let him go, command- [1632] ing that he be brought into his fortress, owing to what he has—he claims—of good faith."

Asad regretted (his act) at (hearing) that. He summoned a guide from the people of al-Khuttal and a man from the Syrian forces 573. This probably refers to filling in the moat. Apparently the fortress had been partially taken.

574. His personal name probably Muḥammad. He later appears as a Yamanī leader in the civil strife of 128(746)–129(747). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1924–6, 1971.

who was skilled at getting through and had a brisk horse. The two of them were brought to him. He said to the Syrian, "If you overtake Badr Ṭarkhān before he enters his fortress, you will get a thousand dirhams. The two then set off until they came to Muṣ'ab's camp. The Syrian called out, "What has the lout done?" He was told, "(He is) with Salamah." The guide went back to Asad with the news. The Syrian stayed with Badr Ṭarkhān in Salamah's tent. Asad sent for Badr Ṭarkhān, transferring him (back) to himself. When Asad reviled him, Badr Ṭarkhān knew that he had broken his pledge. Therefore, he threw a pebble toward the sky saying, "This is God's pledge!" He took another and threw it toward the sky, saying, "This is Muḥammad's pledge!" He began to do likewise with the pledge of the Commander of the Faithful and the pledge of the Muslims. Asad ordered that his hand be cut off. Asad said, "Who here is of the relations of Abū Fudayk?" —a man from the Azd whom Badr Ṭarkhān had slain. A man from the Azd stood up and said, "I am." Asad said, "Behead him!" The Azdī did so. Asad then overcame the greater castle. Above it, a small castle remained, in which were Badr Ṭarkhān's children and possessions, but Asad did not reach it. Asad dispersed his cavalry in the valleys of al-Khuttal.

[1633] Asad arrived at Marw, where Ayyūb b. Abī Ḥassān al-Tamīmī[575] was governor. He dismissed him, appointing (instead) Khālid b. Shadīd, his own paternal cousin. When he went away to Balkh, he heard that 'Umārah b. Ḥuraym had married al-Fāḍilah bt. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. He wrote to Khālid b. Shadīd, saying, "Compel 'Umārah to divorce the daughter of Yazīd. If he refuses, whip him a hundred lashes." Therefore, Khālid sent a message to 'Umārah, who came while al-'Udhāfir b. Zayd al-Taymī was with Khālid. Khālid ordered 'Umārah to divorce al-Fāḍilah, which he did after an (initial) refusal. 'Udhāfir said, "By God, 'Umārah is the champion of the Qays and its lord. Al-Fāḍilah is no more splendid than he." That is to say, she was not nobler than he was. Khālid b. Shadīd died and was succeeded by al-Ash'ath b. Ja'far al-Bajalī.[576]

In this year, al-Ṣuḥārī b. Shabīb[577] rebelled as a Khārijite at 575. He seems to have had interests in al-Sughd, where he appears with Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī in 104(722). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1444.

576. Text: al-Najalī; read: al-Bajalī, as in Cairo ed.

577. Al-Shaybānī, the son of the notorious Kūfan Khārijite Shabīb b. Yazīd

Jabbul.[578]

The Story of al-Ṣuḥārī b. Shabīb

According to Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā: Al-Ṣuḥārī b. Shabīb came to Khālid (b. 'Abdallāh) requesting a stipend. Khālid said, "What would the son of Shabīb do with a stipend?" Therefore, Ibn Shabīb took his leave of him and departed. Khālid repented, fearing that he would cause an outbreak against him. Thus he sent a message to him, summoning him. Al-Ṣuḥārī said, "I was at his place before." But the messengers refused to leave him alone, wherefore he drew his sword against them. At this, they left him, while he rode off, going until he passed beyond Wāsiṭ. [1634] Then he slaughtered his horse and boarded a skiff to hide his location. Then he headed toward a band of the Banū Taym Allāt b. Tha'labah who were at Jabbul. He came to them girded with his sword and told them his story and the story of Khālid. They said to him, "What did you hope for by a stipend? You would have been better off to go in to the son of the Christian woman and smite him with your sword!" Al-Ṣuḥārī said, "By God, I did not want the stipend; I did not want except to reach him so that he would know who I was. Then I would assassinate the son of the Christian woman for his having killed so-and-so"—before that, Khālid had tortured to death a man from those of the Ṣufriyyah[579] who stayed at home. Then al-Ṣuḥārī called on them to rebel with him. Some of them answered him positively; others said, "We will wait," while others refused, saying, "We are in good circumstances." When he saw that, he said:

I did not seek the stipend from him except,
Out of eagerness to kill him, to get at him
And to relieve the earth from him and from whomever Creates havoc in it and inclines away from right.
Every stubborn oppressor I see
Has abandoned right and follows waywardness as sunnah.

(26/647)–77(696) or 78(697)]. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 327; Ṭabarī, II/2, 972.

578. A small town on the east bank of the Tigris in the Lower Nahrawān district about halfway between Wāsiṭ and al-Madā'in. See Le Strange, Lands, 38 and map II.

579. One of the Khārijite parties. See EI[1], s.v. Ṣufriyya.

I am sacrificing myself for my Lord,
Abandoning talk among the people and gossip.
Giving up my family and wealth, I hope for Family and wealth in gardens of immortality.

About thirty men gave him the oath of allegiance. He rebelled at Jabbul, then set out until he came to al-Mubārak.[580] That reached Khālid, who said, "I was afraid he might do this." Then Khālid sent troops against him. They met al-Ṣuḥārī in the district of al-Manādhir.[581] He fought them fiercely, but then they enveloped him, killing him and all of his companions.

Pilgrimage and Governors

[1635] According to Abū Ja'far: In this year, Abū Shākir Maslamah b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik led the pilgrimage. Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī[582] made the pilgrimage with him in this year. The governor of al-Madīnah, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if in this year was Muḥammad b. Hishām. In charge of Iraq and the East was Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī. Khālid's governor in charge of Khurāsān was his brother Asad b. 'Abdallāh. It has been said that Asad perished in this year, leaving as his successor in charge of Khurāsān Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī. It has also been stated that Asad, the brother of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, only perished in the year 120. In charge of Armenia and Ādharbayjān was Marwān b. Muḥammad.

580. A town about five farsakhs below Jabbul on the east bank of the Tigris opposite Nahr Sabūs. See Le Strange, Lands, 38.

581. Two districts just north of al-Ahwāz in Khūzistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 239, 242n.

582. The famous Madīnan scholar. See EI[1], s.v. al-Zuhrī.

The Events of the Year

120

(DECEMBER 29, 737—DECEMBER 17, 738)

Among these was the summer campaign of Sulaymān b. Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik, in which he reportedly captured Sindirah;[583] the campaign of Isḥāq b. Muslim al-ʿUqaylī,[584] who captured the castles of Tūmānshāh and devastated his land; and the campaign of Marwān b. Muḥammad against the land of the Turks.

In this year was the death of Asad b. ʿAbdallāh, according to the statement of al-Madāʾinī.

The Reason for Asad's Death

The reason for it: He reportedly had an internal abcess.[585] He attended (the feast of) al-Mihrijān while he was at Balkh, when the amīrs and dihqāns brought him presents. Among those who came to him was Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥanafī, his governor

583. This would appear to be the same as the fortress of Sideroun mentioned by Theophanes, but it cannot be further identified. See Theophanes, Chronicle, 103; Brooks, "Arabs in Asia Minor," Hellenic Studies, XVIII, 201.

584. A Jazarī lieutenant of Marwān b. Muḥammad, he was in charge of Armenia in 132[750] when he switched sides to join the ʿAbbāsids, becoming thereby one of al-Manṣūr's prominent companions. His family was prominent for generations. See Crone, Slaves, 106.

585. Ar. dubaylah. Also: a tumor. The exact nature of the disease, usually fatal, is unclear. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. d-b-l.

[1636] of Herat and Khurāsān, and the dihqān of Herat. The two of them brought him a gift valued at a million (dirhams). Among that which they brought were a fortress of silver, a fortress of gold,[586] pitchers of gold, pitchers of silver, and large dishes of gold and silver. The two of them came forward as Asad was sitting on the raised seat and the nobles of Khurāsān on the chairs. They set down the two fortresses, then put behind them the pitchers, large dishes and silk garments[587] of Marw, Qūhistān[588] and Herat, until the cloth spread out (for the feast) was filled. Among what the dihqān brought Asad was a ball of gold. Then the dihqān stood to deliver a speech and said:

"May God make the amīr prosper! We Iranian people ruled the world for four hundred years. We ruled it with forbearance, reason, and dignity, though there was not among us a clear book nor a God-sent prophet. (Great) men with us were three. (First) is one fortunate in nature; wherever he goes, God conquers through him. (Second) is a man whose manly qualities have been completed in his house; if he is like that, he will be welcomed, greeted, exalted, given command, and advanced. (Third) is a man whose heart is big and whose hand is open (with generosity), so that he is wished for; if he is like that, he will be given command and advanced. God has put in you the characteristics of these three by whom we ruled for four hundred years, O amīr. We do not know of any-[1637] one who is more perfect in leadership than you. You have kept your household, entourage, and mawālī in line so that there is not one of them who can transgress against either a little man or a great one, a rich man or a poor one. This is perfection of leadership. Then, you have built arched halls in the deserts to which one visitor comes from the east, another from the west. Neither of them finds a fault, but rather they say, 'Glory be to God! How excellent is that which has been built!' Included in your natural good fortune is that you met the Khāqān when he was leading a hundred thousand men and accompanied by al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. You defeated him, made him flee, killed his men, and plundered

586. These must be models.

587. Dozy mentions that Marw was famous for these garments. See Dozy, Vêtements, 113n.

588. The mountainous district south of Naysābūr. See Le Strange, Lands, 352–63.

his camp. As for your big-heartedness and open-handedness, we do not know which of two kinds of wealth is more delightful to you: wealth that has come to you or wealth which has gone forth from you. Indeed, you are more delighted by that which has gone forth!"

Asad laughed and said, "You are the best of Khurāsān's *dihqān*s and the most excellent in giving." Asad gave him an apple which was in his hand. The dihqān of Herat prostrated himself before Asad. Asad fell silent looking at those gifts. He looked to his right, saying, "O 'Udhāfir b. Yazīd![589] Command someone to bear away this gold fortress." Then he said, "O Maghrā'[590] b. Aḥmar, head of the Qays!—or he said, of Qinnasrīn—Command someone to bear this fortress away." Then he said, "O so-and-so, take a pitcher," and, "O so-and-so, take a pitcher." He gave away the large dishes until two large dishes remained. He said, "Stand up, O Ibn al-Ṣaydā', and take a little dish." Ibn al-Saydā' took one, lifted it to test its weight, then put it down. Then he took the other one and [1638] lifted it, testing its weight. Asad asked him, "What is the matter?" Ibn al-Ṣaydā' answered, "I will take the heavier one." Asad said, "Take them both together." He gave also to the lesser officers and to those who had performed outstandingly in war. Abū al-Ya'fūr, who used to go before the ruler of Khurāsān in military campaigns, rose and called out, "Onward, to the road!" Asad said, "How excellent is that which you have called attention to regarding yourself! Take two silken garments." Maymūn al-'Adhdhāb[591] stood up, saying, "To me, to your left, to the thoroughfare!" Asad said, "How excellent is that which you have called attention to regarding yourself! Take a silken garment."

Asad gave away all that was on the cloth spread on the ground. Nahār b. Tawsi'ah said:

You (people) are few when one who rewards summons to war,
But on the morning of al-Mihrijān you are many.

Then Asad fell sick, but, recovering somewhat, he came out one day and was brought the first pears that came (that season). He fed the people from them one by one. He took a pear and threw 589. Elsewhere given Ibn Zayd. See note 510.

590. Text: Ma'n; read: Maghrā', as elsewhere.
591. That is, the one who carried out punishments.

it to Khurāsān, the dihqān of Herat, whereupon Asad's internal abscess ruptured (from the strain), causing him to perish. He left as his successor Ja'far al-Bahrānī—who is Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah—in the year 120. The latter held office for four months. The appointment of Naṣr b. Sayyār came in Rajab of the year 121. Ibn 'Irs al-'Abdī said:

A herald has announced the death of Asad b. 'Abdallāh,
And the heart has been shocked for the obeyed king.
At Balkh, destiny met (him), coming by night;
The decree of your Lord cannot be held back.
Pour forth tears, O eye, in a generous flow.
Does not the sundering of the union make you sad?
His death came to him inside of Ṣīgh,[592]
[1639] And how many a brave hero is at al-Ṣīgh!
Regiments that answered the summoner
Upon lightly loaded, freely raiding, quick-stepping mounts.
You were given abundant rain; you were yourself rain
Bringing forth rich pasturage for the seeker of wholesome pasture.

Sulaymān b. Qattah, the mawlā of the Banū Taym b. Murrah,[593] who was a friend of Asad, said:

God has watered Balkh, the plain of Balkh and its rugged ground,
And the two Marws[594] of Khurāsān with clouds filled to excess.
I am not concerned about your being watered by it, but about [illegible]t
In which they have buried noble remains and bones,
A contender with great peoples who cuts them down,
A seeker of vengeance, mighty like a lion, huge.
He would give his sword its due in war,

592. The seat of Asad's estates in Khurāsān, presumably beside Balkh. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 439.

593. Also said to be al-'Adawī, he was a Baṣran traditionist (muḥaddith) famed for his poetry. See Ibn Qutaybah, Shi'r wa Shu'arā', 62. He must have been quite old if he is the same as the Sulaymān b. Qattah who was quoted by al-Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr (d. 72(691)). See Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 165. Elsewhere he is even said to have heard Mu'āwiyah (d. 60(680)) and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ (d.ca. 43(664)), though this can hardly be correct. Qattah was his mother. See Dhahabī, Siyar, IV, 596.

594. That is, Marw al-Shāhjān, the provincial capital, and Marw al-Rūdh.

And water the straightened Zā'ibī[595] spearhead (with blood).

According to Abū Ja'far: In this year, the party of the Banū al-'Abbās in Khurāsān sent Sulaymān b. Kathīr to Muhammad b. 'Alī b. al-'Abbās to inform him about their activity and its current state.

The Reason for the Khurāsānīs' Sending Sulaymān b. Kathīr to Muḥammad b. 'Alī

The reason for that was the anger of Muḥammad b. 'Alī against those of his party who were in Khurāsān, owing to their having obeyed Khidāsh, whose story we have referred to before, and their [1640] acceptance from him of those lies that were transmitted on his authority. Therefore, Muḥammad ceased writing to them. When his letter was slow in coming to them, they met, making mention of that among themselves. They resolved on the appointment of Sulaymān b. Kathīr to meet Muḥammad regarding their activity, to inform him about themselves, and to return to them with what he answered. Sulaymān b. Kathīr—according to what has been reported—came to Muḥammad b. 'Alī while the latter was alienated from those of his party who were in Khurāsān. Sulaymān told him about them. Muḥammad rebuked them on account of their following Khidāsh and what he had summoned them to, saying, "May God curse Khidāsh and those who follow his religion!" Then he sent Sulaymān away to Khurāsān. He also wrote them a letter to be taken by him. Sulaymān came to them with the letter, which was sealed. They broke its seals but found nothing in it except, "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful."[596] That was hard for them (to bear), and they (now) knew that what Khidāsh had brought them was at variance with the command of Muḥammad b. 'Alī.

In this year, Muḥammad b. 'Alī sent Bukayr b. Māhān to his party in Khurāsān after Sulaymān b. Kathīr had departed from him to them. He wrote a letter (for Bukayr to take) with him to them, telling them that Khidāsh had led his party to a position at variance with his own. Bukayr came to them with his letter, but they did not believe him and made light of him. Bukayr went back to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, who sent with him rods covered some with iron and some with brass. When Bukayr came (again) to them, he gathered the nuqabāʾ[597] and the faction, giving a rod to each man among them. Thus they learned that they had been at variance with his position, whereupon they came back repenting.

595. Referring to a town of Zā'ib. See Fayrūzābādī, Muḥīt, s.v. z-'-b.
596. This formula opens all Muslim Arabic letters.

[1641] In this year, Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik dismissed Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh from all of the offices to which he had appointed him.

The Reason for Hishām's Dismissal of Khālid al-Qasrī

(Sundry) statements have been given about that. We will mention those which have reached us containing a report on that subject.

It has been said regarding that: Farrūkh Abū al-Muthannā had assumed an obligation for the estates of Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik in a place called Rustāq al-Rummān or Nahr al-Rummān. He was called thereby Farrūkh al-Rummānī. His position was hard for Khālid to bear. Khālid said to Ḥassān al-Nabaṭī,[598] "Woe to you! Go forth to the Commander of the Faithful and (ask him to) increase the payment (required) of Farrūkh." After this, he increased it against him by a million dirhams.'" Hishām then sent out two men from among the honest inhabitants of Syria to take possession of the estates. Ḥassān thereby became more burdensome to Khālid than Farrūkh. Therefore, Khālid began to do harm to him. Ḥassān said to him, "Don't alienate me, for I am your disciple." But Khālid refused except to do him injury. When Ḥassān came to Khālid, the latter broke the dikes to flood the estates (that Ḥassān was responsible for). Then Ḥassān went to Hishām to say, "Khālid has broken the dikes to flood your estates." Hishām sent a man to look at them. Then the man came back to Hishām, telling him (the news). Ḥassān said to one of Hishām's servants, "If you will speak a word which I will tell you where Hishām will hear it, you will receive from me a thousand dinars." The servant said, 597. The twelve highest-ranking leaders of the party in Khurāsān.

598. He had charge of great land reclamation projects in Iraq. He last appears in 126(744) in the entourage of the Caliph al-Walīd b. Yazīd. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 252n, 331, 333; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1779.

"Hurry the one thousand to me (now) and I will say what you wish." Thereupon Ḥassān paid him and said to him, "Make one [1642] of Hishām's boys cry. When he has cried, say to him, 'Be quiet! By God, it is as if you are the son of Khālid al-Qasrī, whose income is thirteen million (dirhams).'" He made Hishām hear that, but the latter disregarded it. Following that, Ḥassān came in to him. Hishām said to him, "Draw near to me," whereupon Ḥassān drew near. He asked him, "How much is Khālid's income?" Ḥassān answered, "Thirteen million (dirhams)." Hishām asked, "How is it that you did not tell me about this?" Ḥassān replied, "Did you ask me?" This thought became established in Hishām's mind, so that he resolved to dismiss Khālid.

It has been said that Khālid used to say to his son Yazīd. "You are not less than Maslamah b. Hishām, for you most certainly outshine the people in three things the like of which no one else can boast of: I have controlled the Tigris with dikes, I have the honor of providing water to the pilgrims at Mecca, and I hold the governorship of Iraq."

It has been said that the only thing that made Hishām angry with Khālid was: A man from the Quraysh went in to Khālid, whereupon the latter made light of him, upbraiding him. The man then wrote to Hishām to complain, whereupon Hishām wrote to Khālid:

"Now then: The Commander of the Faithful—even if he has left your hand free, as well as your policy, with regard to those whose rule he has entrusted you with and made you the keeper of, owing to that which he has hoped for of your competence and that which he has relied on of the excellence of your management—has not laid before you the eminent man of his household in order for you to trample him with your foot, nor for you to look sharply at him with your glance. Indeed, when you have turned your tongue against their eminent man in Iraq with reproach, seeking thereby to lessen his importance and to scorn his standing, how could you claim to have dealt fairly with him? That has even brought you out to using rude language toward him in the public audience, not [1643] even moving aside for him, when you saw him approaching, from the middle of your elevated seat which God has made smooth for you! Among your people is he who surpasses you in his personal merit and who overwhelms you by his priority. You obtained your seat by means of the family of 'Amr,[599] who elevated (you) from your lowliness, and in particular made you equal to the branches of the best tribes and their chiefs before the Commander of the Faithful. You have even settled on a mountain whence you have begun to look down on them with boastful pride. This (is your position), if your paltry gratitude does not cause you to roll down smashed and fallen. O son of the woman among your people who takes the scurf off her head with a comb,[600] should you not have highly esteemed the man of the best tribe when he entered your presence, should you not have made ample place for him to sit when you saw him approach and should you not have withdrawn from the center of your couch to honor him? Should you not have conversed with him, facing him with your joyful countenance, in order to honor the Commander of the Faithful? When he was seated comfortably, you should have chatted with him amiably, exalting his close relationship (to the Caliph) and acknowledging his right, for he is the tooth and tusk of the two houses, as well as the son of the patriarch of the house of Abū al-'Āṣ and of Ḥarb and their eminent man. The Commander of the Faithful swears by God to you that if not for the esteem you were held in before and (if not) that he would hate to see the malicious rejoicing of your enemy over you, he would most certainly have abased you as much as he raised you, so that he would have returned you to a condition by which you would miss (even) the needy people in your Iraq and the crowding of processions at your door. How close I am to making you a follower of he who was a follower of you!

"Therefore, arise in any case when the messenger of the Com-[1644] mander of the Faithful meets you with his letter, whether at night or day, and go walking on your feet with those of your servants who are with you, until you stand at Ibn 'Amr's door ignomin-

599. That is, 'Amr al-Ashdaq b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, the son of 'Uthmān's governor of al-Kūfah and famous as a rebel executed by 'Abd al-Malik. Khālid's father 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd al-Qasrī had been the chief of 'Amr's security force (shurṭah). The Qurashī in question here is one of 'Amr's sons, probably Sa'īd b. 'Amr, who had been with his father during his revolt and subsequently migrated to al-Madīnah and al-Kūfah, whence he paid a visit at an advanced age in 126/744 to the anti-Yamanī Caliph al-Walīd b. Yazīd. See Dhahabī, Siyar, V, 200-1; Zubayrī, Nasab, 178-80, 182. Khālid's offence is not merely maltreatment of an Umayyad but the ingratitude of a client to the son of his patron as well.

600. Ar. mujarrishah. This could be read simply as mujarrasah, a disgraced woman, though this has no support either from ancient texts or modern editors.

iously, seeking permission to enter to justify yourself to him, whether he lets you in or denies you (entry). If feelings of mercy move him, he will bear your (presence). But if disdain and scorn keep him from giving you access to him, then stand by his door for a year, neither moving aside nor retiring. Your matter will be up to him after that, whether he dismisses (you) or appoints (you) to office, whether he takes his revenge (on you) or pardons (you). May God curse you as one trusted with confidence (betrayed)! How many are your faults! How unseemly to people of noble station are your expressions, which have not ceased reaching the Commander of the Faithful, owing to your risking them against one who is more deserving of that which you have of the governorship of the two major cities of Iraq, as well as more senior and more righteous. The Commander of the Faithful has written to his paternal cousin regarding that which he has written to you about his disapproval of you, so that he may give his opinion regarding pardoning you or remaining angry with you. The Commander of the Faithful has given him jurisdiction in that, and he is responsible for it. He will be held praiseworthy by the Commander of the Faithful whichever of the two he brings to you, with success, God willing."

His letter to Ibn ʿAmr:

"Now then. Your letter has reached the Commander of the Faithful, who has understood what you mentioned concerning Khālid's upbraiding you in public audience while despising your station, belittling your relationship to the Commander of the Faithful and your sympathetic feelings toward the Caliph as a result of family ties. (I have also understood) your refraining from (answering) him, thereby exalting the Commander of the Faithful and his authority, and thereby holding fast to the bonds of protection given by obedience to him. (This you did) despite the painfulness of what befell you owing to Khālid's reprehensible words, the malevolence of his speech, and his continuing to attack you, [1645] though you were silent towards him, (while he was) enjoying to the full that the Commander of the Faithful had freed his tongue, loosened his reins, raised up his lowliness, and elevated (him from) his obscurity. Just so you, the family of Saʿīd, in cases like this, when exposed to the babbling of riffraff and the foolishness of their minds, are mute, not (trying to) silence (your opponents), but rather having a forbearance which would lighten the weight of the mountains.

"The Commander of the Faithful commends your exaltation of him and your respect for his authority and his thanks. He has also made over to you the matter of Khālid regarding your removing him or confirming him in office. If you dismiss him, your dismissal will be effected. If you confirm him, that will be a benefit from you to him that the Commander of the Faithful will not thank you for. The Commander of the Faithful has written to him that which will bring him to his senses. It commands him to come to you on foot in whatever condition the letter of the Commander of the Faithful finds him—whether the messenger sent to him happens to meet him in the night or the day—until he stands by your door, whether you admit him or block him, whether you confirm him in office or dismiss him. The Commander of the Faithful has authorized his messenger to beat him on the head with twenty lashes in your presence, unless you dislike that happening to him owing to your respect for his past service to you. Whichever of the two you decide to effect, the Commander of the Faithful will agree (to it) and will love it, in accordance with your righteousness, the greatness of your esteem, your relationship, and your ties of blood, according to what he intends with regard to enforcing the rights of the family of Abū al-ʿĀṣ[601] and Saʿīd. Therefore, write to the Commander of the Faithful about whatever you like, whether you begin (the correspondence) or respond. (Do this) both to converse and to pass along requests from your family, who are members of the Commander of the Faithful's own household, to you [1646] concerning their needs. For modesty may have kept them from obtaining these before, owing to the distance of their homes from the Commander of the Faithful and the paucity of their opportunity for traveling to bring their needs to his attention. You ought not to be ashamed of (applying to) the Commander of the Faithful, nor be afraid of repeating their requests to him, owing to the status of their relationship, their stations, and their noble lineages. Whether seeking a grant, asking for help, making a request, or asking for more, you will find the Commander of the Faithful to be swift to (respond to) you in good faith, owing to his desire to cement your relationship (through gifts) and to enforce your rights. The Commander of the Faithful seeks God's help to accomplish what he intends and turns to Him hoping for help to effect the right of his blood relationship. He trusts in Him and has confidence in Him. God is his Ally and his Master. Peace."

601. A mistake for al-ʿĀṣ. See note 599.

It has been said that Khālid would often in mentioning Hishām say, "The son of the retarded woman". The mother of Hishām used to behave foolishly. We have mentioned her story already.

It has been reported that Khālid wrote a letter to Hishām which enraged him. Hishām wrote back to him, "O son of Umm Khālid, it has reached me that you say, 'The governorship of Iraq is not an honor for me.' O son of a stinking woman, how is the governorship of Iraq not an honor for you, when you are from the small, contemptible Bajīlah? Rather, by God, I think that the first who comes unto you from the Quraysh will bind your arms to your neck."

It has been reported that Hishām wrote to him, "I have heard about what your saying, 'I am Khālid b. 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Asad b. Kurz; I am not the most noble of the five.'[602] Rather, by God, I will send you back to your mule and your Fayrūzī[603] hood." [1647]

It has been reported that it reached Hishām that Khālid would say to his son, "How will you be when the sons of the Commander of the Faithful need you?" At this, anger appeared on Hishām's face.

It has been said that a man of the people of Syria came to Hishām to say, "I heard Khālid mentioning the Commander of the Faithful by that which should not escape from two lips." Hishām interjected, "He said, 'The crosseyed one.'" The man said, "No, rather he said worse than that." Hishām asked, "What is it?" The man said, "I will never say it." Hishām did not cease hearing about Khālid that which he disliked until his attitude toward him changed.

It has been reported that a dihqān entered the presence of Khālid and said, "O amīr, your son's income has exceeded ten million (dirhams). I fear that this may reach the Commander of the Faithful and that he may consider it too much. The people love your body, but I love your body and your soul." Khālid responded, "Asad b. ʿAbdallāh has spoken to me in the same vein, and you put him up to it!" The dihqān said, "Indeed." Khālid said, "Woe to you! Leave my son alone, for it may be that he will seek a dirham and not be able to get it." Then, when the matters communicated to him about Khālid that he did not like became too many for him, Hishām resolved to dismiss him. But when he decided on that, he hid what he had decided to do to him by his command.

602. That is, "I did not ennoble my family, but it already had high standing."

603. This probably refers to a town that produced the garment, possibly the village of Fayrūz near Ḥimṣ. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 233.

The Action of Hishām in Removing Khālid When His Resolve to Dismiss Him Had Become Firm

According to ʿUmar—ʿUbayd b. Jannād—his father and certain scribes: Hishām concealed Khālid's dismissal. He wrote to Yūsuf [1648] in his own handwriting while the latter was the governor of the Yaman, (telling) him to come (to Iraq) with thirty of his companions. Yūsuf went forth until he reached al-Kūfah, alighting for rest during the night near it. Ṭāriq, Khālid's deputy in charge of the kharāj, had just circumcised his son, giving him a thousand excellent horses, a thousand slave youths, and a thousand slave girls, besides money, clothes and other things. The night patrol passed by Yūsuf and his companions while Yūsuf was performing his worship and the odor of perfume was emanating from his robes. The watchman asked, "Who are you?" They answered, "Travelers." He asked, "Where are you headed for?" They replied, "A certain place." Then the patrol came to Ṭāriq and his companions, and said, "We have seen a group whom we are unacquainted with. We think we ought to kill them, for if they are rebels, we will be delivered from them, while if they are going to (attack) you, we will learn that so that you will be ready with regard to them." But they forbade them to kill them. The patrol returned to its rounds. While it was still dark in the early morning, Yūsuf had moved on and gone to the dwellings of the Thaqīf, and thus the night patrol passed by them. The watchman asked, "Who are you?" They answered, "Travelers." He asked, "Where are you headed for?" They replied, "A certain place." The patrol came to Ṭāriq and his companions, and said, "They have gone to the dwellings of the Thaqīf. We think we should kill them." But they forbade them.

Yūsuf commanded one of the Thaqafīs, saying, "Gather for me whoever is in al-Kūfah from the Muḍar," and he did so. Yūsuf entered the mosque with the dawn and ordered the mu'adhdhin to call for the worship service to begin, but the latter said, "Not until the imām comes." At this, Yūsuf roughly shoved him aside and called for the worship service to start. Yūsuf stepped forward and [1649] recited, "When the event befalls,"[604] and, "A questioner asked."[605] Then he sent (forces) to Khālid, Ṭāriq and their companions, so that they were taken away while the pots were boiling.

According to 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Rabī' b. Sābūr, the mawlā of the Banū al-Ḥarīsh, to whom Hishām had entrusted the privy seal along with the guard: A letter came to Hishām from Khālid, making him angry. Also on that day, Jundab, the mawlā of Yūsuf b. 'Umar came to him with Yūsuf's letter. Hishām read it and then said to Sālim, the mawlā of 'Anbasah b. 'Abd al-Malik,[606] "Answer him in your own words." Hishām himself wrote a small note in his own handwriting. Then he said to me, "Bring me Sālim's letter." Sālim was in charge of the correspondence office. I brought his letter to Hishām, who put the small note inside it. Then, he said to me, "Seal it," and I did so. Then he summoned Yūsuf's messenger and said, "Your master certainly has an aggressive disposition and makes requests above his station." Then he said to me, "Rip up his clothes." Then he ordered that he be whipped. After that he said, "Take him away from me and give him the letter." Thus I gave him the letter, saying to him, "Woe to you! Make your escape!"

Bashīr b. Abī Thaljah of the inhabitants of al-Urdunn, who was Sālim's deputy, doubted (the matter), saying "This is a trick. He [1650] has made Yūsuf the governor of Iraq." He wrote to a subordinate of Sālim in charge of Ajamat Sālim,[607] who was called 'Iyāḍ, saying, "Your family have sent you a Yamanī robe. When it comes to you, put it on and praise God. Inform Ṭāriq of that." Thus 'Iyāḍ sent 604. Qur'ān 56:1. The title of the chapter is meant, so that he also would have recited the succeeding verses.

605. Qur'ān 70:1. The rest of the verse is, "...concerning a torment about to befall."

606. Abu al-'Alā'. Ibn Khayyāṭ calls him the mawlā of Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik. He was still in office at Hishām's death in 125(743) and was influential with the Caliph. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1729–31; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 545.

607. Or: Sālim's canebrake. But it appears to be a place name in Iraq.

a letter to Ṭāriq b. Abī Ziyād.[608] Bashīr regretted his letter and wrote to ʿIyāḍ, "Your family have decided to keep back the robe. Therefore, do not rely on it." ʿIyāḍ then brought the latter letter to Ṭāriq. Ṭāriq said, "The news is in the first letter, but your master has regretted (sending it) and fears that the news may leak out." Having written this down, Ṭāriq rode from al-Kūfah to Khālid, who was at Wāsiṭ. He traveled for a day and a night, reaching him in the morning. Dāwūd al-Barbarī, who was in charge of admission to Khālid's presence and of his guard as well as being in charge of the correspondence office, saw Ṭāriq. Dāwūd informed Khālid, who became angry, saying, "He has come without permission!" But he admitted him.

When he saw him he asked, "What has brought you?" Ṭāriq replied, "A matter in which I erred." Khālid asked, "What is it?" Ṭāriq answered, "The death of Asad, may God have mercy on him. I wrote to the amīr to tender my condolences to him regarding Asad, but I ought to have come to him walking." At this, Khālid softened and his eye shed a tear. He said, "Go back to your work." Ṭāriq said, "I wished to mention a subject to the amīr in private." Khālid said, "There is no secret of which Dāwūd is not aware." Ṭāriq said, "It is a matter relating to myself." Dāwūd became angry and went out. Ṭāriq told Khālid, who asked, "What do you think?" Ṭāriq answered, "You (should) ride to the Commander of the Faithful to apologize to him for anything that may have reached him about you." Khālid said, "What an evil man I would be then, if I rode to him without his permission." Ṭāriq [1651] said, "Then another thing." Khālid inquired, "What is it?" Ṭāriq replied, "You travel in your province while I go ahead of you to Syria to ask permission of him for you. You will not have reached the farthest borders of your province before his permission comes to you." Khālid said, "Not this either." Ṭāriq said, "Then I will go and guarantee to the Commander of the Faithful all that has been lost in these years. Afterwards I will personally bring you your (re)appointment." Khālid asked, "How much does it amount to?" Ṭāriq answered, "One hundred million (dirhams)." Khālid asked, "Where will I get this? By God, I would not find ten thousand dirhams." Ṭāriq said, "I and Saʿīd b. Rāshid will bear forty million dirhams, al-Zaynabī and Abān b. al-Walīd[609] twenty million, and the rest will be apportioned among the subordinate officials." Khālid said, "In that case, I would most certainly be vile, if I gave a group of people something then went back on it." Ṭāriq said, "That we only protect you as well as protect ourselves with our money, so that we may resume our life of this world, and that (its) blessing may remain upon you and upon us, is better than someone coming to demand from us our money, which is with the merchants of the people of al-Kūfah. They would hold aloof and wait, so that we would be killed and they would consume that money." But Khālid refused. Ṭāriq took leave of him weeping. He said, "This is the last time we will meet in this world."

608. Text: Ziyādh; read; Ziyād, as in Cairo ed.

When he had gone on his way, Dāwūd entered. Khālid told him what Ṭāriq had said. Dāwūd declared, "He knew that you would not go forth without permission. Thus he wanted to deceive you and go to Syria to take hold of Iraq, he and the son of his brother, Sa'īd b. Rāshid." Ṭāriq returned to al-Kūfah, while Khālid went out to al-Ḥammah.

Yūsuf's messenger came to him in Yaman. Yūsuf asked, "What do you bring?" The messenger said, "Evil. The Commander of the Faithful is angry. He has beaten me and did not write the answer to your letter; this is the letter of Sālim, the secretary of the correspondence office." Yūsuf opened the letter and read it. When he reached the end of it, he read the note of Hishām in the latter's own handwriting saying, "Go to Iraq, for I have now appointed you to it. Beware lest anyone learn of that. Arrest the son of the Christian woman and his officials and cure me of them." Thereupon Yūsuf said, "Look for a guide knowledgeable about the road." He was brought a number and chose a man from among them. He set out the same day, leaving as his successor in Yaman his son al-Ṣalt,[610] who saw him off. When he wanted to go back, he asked him, "Where are you headed for?" Yūsuf beat him a hundred lashes, saying, "O son of a stinking woman, is it hidden from you when I finally find a firm position?" Yūsuf then went on. Whenever he would come upon two (diverging) roads, [1652]

609. He was later in charge of the security force of Ismā'īl b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī in al-Kūfah briefly in 127(745). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1902.

610. He was slain by Khārijites in the Yaman 129(747). See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 583.

he would ask (about them). If he was told, "This one is for Iraq," he would say, "Take the way to Iraq," until he arrived at al-Kufah.

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Bishr b. 'Īsā—his father—Ḥassān al-Nabaṭī: I arranged for a physician for Hishām. I was in his presence while he was looking at that physician when he asked, "O Ḥassān, how long does it take someone to reach Iraq from the Yaman?" I answered, "I do not know." He said:

I gave you a decisive order but you disobeyed me
And hence have become deprived of rule, regretful.

It was only a little while before Yūsuf's letter came from Iraq. He had reached it, that being in Jumādā al-Ākhirah of the year 120.

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Sālim Zunbīl: When we reached al-[1653] Najaf,[611] Yūsuf said to me, "Go bring me Ṭāriq." I could not refuse him. I said inside myself, "Who do I have to range against Ṭāriq and his power?" Then I came to al-Kūfah. I said to the servants of Ṭāriq, "Ask leave for me to (see) Ṭāriq," but they beat me. Thereupon I shouted to him, "Woe to you, O Ṭāriq! I am Sālim, the messenger of Yūsuf. He has come to Iraq." At this, he came forth shouting at his servants, "I am coming to him."

It has been related that Yūsuf said to Kaysān, "Go bring Ṭāriq to me. If he comes, transport him on the pack saddle of an ass. If he does not come, drag him to me." At al-Ḥīrah, I[612] came to the house of 'Abd al-Masīḥ,[613] who was the chief of the people of al-Ḥīrah. I told him, "Yūsuf has arrived in Iraq. He commands you to bind Ṭāriq and bring him to him." He went forth with his sons and servants until they came to Ṭāriq's residence. Ṭāriq had a brave servant who had brave servants armed and equipped. The servant said to Ṭāriq, "If you give me permission, I will go forth along with those with me against these and kill them. Then you may flee headlong, going whither you will." But Ṭāriq admitted Kaysān and said, "Tell me about the amīr. Does he want money?" Kaysān answered, "Yes." Ṭāriq said, "I will give him what he asks for." They traveled to Yūsuf and arrived at al-Ḥīrah. When Yūsuf 611. A town four miles west of al-Kūfah still in existence. See Le Strange, Lands, 76.

612. That is, Kaysān.

613. Probably al-Ghassānī, a descendent of the 'Abd al- Masīḥ who surrendered al-Ḥīrah to the Muslims in 12(633). See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 207, II, 126.

saw him with his own eyes he beat him severely—it is said five hundred lashes.

Yūsuf entered al-Kūfah and sent 'Aṭā' b. Muqaddam[614] to Khālid at al-Ḥammah.

According to 'Aṭa': I came to the ḥājib (chamberlain) and said, "Ask permission for me to see Abū al-Haytham." He went in, his face being changed. Khālid asked him, "What is the matter with you?" He answered, "(Only) good." Khālid said, "You have not brought good." The ḥājib said, "'Aṭā' b. Muqaddam. He said, 'Ask permission for me to see Abū al-Haytham.'" Khālid said, "Let him in." Thus I went in. Khālid said, "The woe of her mother is a fit of anger."[615] I did not settle down until al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt[616] entered and sat with Khālid, who said to him, "There is no one who would succeed me more beloved to me than your family." [1654]

Yūsuf delivered a speech in al-Kūfah, saying, "The Commander of the Faithful has ordered me to arrest the officials of the Christian woman's son and to cure him of them. I will do so and more, by God. O people of Iraq, I will most certainly slay your hypocrites by the sword and your criminals and transgressors by torture." Then he descended (from the pulpit) and went to Wāsiṭ. He was brought Khālid while he was at Wāsiṭ.

According to 'Umar—al-Ḥakam b. Naḍr—Abu 'Ubaydah: When Yūsuf imprisoned Khālid, Abān b. al-Walīd obtained the promise of his release from him for nine million dirhams. Then Yūsuf regretted that. He was told, "Had you not done so, you would have taken a hundred million dirhams." Yūsuf said, "I will not turn back when I have pledged my tonque to something." Khālid's friends informed Khālid (of what they had done). He said, "You did wrong when you gave him at the first moment nine million. I do not feel secure that he will not take it and then come back to you (for more). Therefore, go back." They came to Yūsuf, saying, "We have told Khālid, but he did not consent to what we have brought together. He told us that he is not able to pay the money." Yūsuf 614. He lived into the reign of al-Mahdī (158(775)–169(785)) at least. See Ṭabarī, I/3, 588.

615. Or: "The woe of her mother is Sukhṭah," though Sukhṭah is not a known feminine name, but neither is the word attested in the dictionaries. Probably it is an obscure proverb.

616. Al-Thaqafī, of the family of Yūsuf and al-Ḥajjāj, he was governor of al-Kūfah for Yūsuf in 122(740). See Crone, Slaves, 150.

responded, "You and your master know better. As for myself, I will [1655] not revoke my promise to you. If you go back on your offer, I will not stop you." They said, "We have withdrawn it." Yūsuf asked, "Have you done so?" They said, "Yes." He said, "The breach has come from you. By God, I will not be satisfied with nine million nor its like, nor twice its like." He took more than that. It has been said that he took a hundred million.

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī[617]—Ibn 'Ayyāsh:[618] Hishām resolved to dismiss Khālid. The reason for that: Khālid acquired property and dug canals, so that his income reached twenty million (dirhams). Among his estates were: Nahr Khālid, which produced an (annual) income of five million (dirhams), Bājawwā,[619] Bārummānā, al-Mubārak, al-Jāmi', Kūrat Sābūr and al-Ṣilḥ.[620] He would often say, "By God, I am unjustly treated. There is nothing under my feet except that it belongs to me"—meaning that 'Umar[621] had made over a quarter of al-Sawād to the Bajīlah.

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī—al-Ḥasan b. 'Umārah[622] —al-'Uryān b. al-Haytham:[623] I would often say to my companions, "I reckon that this man[624] has been gotten rid of. The Quraysh will not bear this one and his like, for they are an envious people, while this one makes known what he makes known." One day I said to him: "O amīr, the people have turned to you with their harsh glances. It is the Quraysh. There is not any compact between you and them. They may find an escape from you, but you will find no [1656] escape from them. I adjure you by God that you write to Hishām to tell him about your wealth and to offer him whatever he would like from it. How able you are to take up the like of it! Meanwhile,

617. Al-Thu'alī ca. 130(747)–206(821) or 207(822), he was a Kūfan historian and genealogist who lived in Wāsiṭ. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 272.

618. He is 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh al-Mantūf al-Hamdānī al-Murhibī, a Kūfan transmitter. See Ṭabarī, Indices, 333; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, III, 128.

619. A place near Babylon by al-Quff. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 314.

620. A canal flowing east from the Tigris seven *farsakh*s above Wāsiṭ. Also, its district. See Le Strange, Lands, 38.

621. That is, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. He is said to have made this grant after the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. See Donner, Islamic Conquests, 242.

622. Abū Muḥammad al-Kūfī, the mawlā of the Bajīlah, d. 153(770), the judge of Baghdad for al-Manṣūr. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 304–8.

623. Al-Nakha'ī al-Kūfī. He had charge of Khālid's security force in al-Kūfah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 190–1.

624. That is, Khālid.

he will not consider you wanton, even if he is eager for that. By my life, that some goes and some is left is better than that it all go. It would not be better in what is between you and him that he take all of it. I am apprehensive that an unjust or envious person may come to him and that he may accept (accusations against you) from that person. That you give to the Caliph through willful obedience is better than that you give to him through compulsion."

Khālid responded, "You are not an accuser,[625] and that will never happen." I said, "Hearken to me and make me your messenger. By God, he will not untie a knot except that I will bind it more strongly, nor will he tie a knot but that I will undo it." But Khālid said, "By God, we will not give in humiliation." I asked, "Did you have these estates except during his rule? Can you refuse him to take them?" Khālid answered, "No." I said, "Then anticipate him, for he will keep them for you and thank you for them. If you were not obliged to him for other than what he started you with, you would deserve to keep it," Khālid said, "No, by God, that will never be." I said, "Whatever you will do if he dismisses you and takes your estates, do (now), for his brothers, his sons, and his household have anticipated you, constantly speaking to him about you, though they are obliged to you for favors which are manifest to you. Then, make up for your faults by completion of what you have done of your favors to Hishām." He said, "I see what you are [1657] saying. But there is no way to achieve that." Al-'Uryān would say: It is as if you were with him when he was removed, his money was taken and he was falsely charged with crimes. Then he would not profit by anything. That is how it was.

According to al-Haytham—Ibn 'Ayyāsh: Bilāl b. Abī Burdah, who was his governor in charge of al-Baṣrah, wrote to Khālid when Hishām's reproof reached him, "Something has happened which I find no escape from talking to you about personally. If you decide to give me permission, it is only a night and its day to you, a day with you and a night and its day to go back." Khālid wrote to him, "Come, if you like." Thus Bilāl himself and two mawlās of his rode on swift-footed asses, travelling a day and a night. Then he performed the sunset worship at al-Kūfah, which was (a distance of) eighty farsakhs (from al-Baṣrah). Khālid was informed of his place and came to him, having put on a turban.

625. Or: accused.

Khālid said, "O Abū 'Amr, you have tired yourself out!" Bilāl said, "Indeed." Khālid asked, "When did you leave al-Baṣrah?" Bilāl answered, "Yesterday." Khālid asked, "Is it true what you say?" Bilāl replied, "By God, it is what I said." Khālid inquired, "What has wearied you?" Bilāl answered, "That which reached me about the reproof of the Commander of the Faithful and his statement, as well as that which his sons and his household desire concerning you. If you think fit, I will face him to offer him some of our wealth. Then, we will invite him to (take) of it what he likes, we ourselves being agreeable to it. Then, I will offer him your wealth. Whatever he takes from it will be for us to recoup later." Khālid responded, "I[626] do not accuse you, but I will look into it." Bilāl said, "I fear that you may be dealt with swiftly." Khālid said, "Certainly not." Bilāl said, "The Quraysh are those whom you know about, especially their speed in acting against [1658] you." Khālid said, "O Bilāl, by God, I will never give anything under compulsion." Bilāl asked, "O amīr, may I speak?" Khālid answered, "Yes." Bilāl said, "Hishām is more justified than you. He will say, 'I appointed you when you had nothing. Do you not think it right that you offer to me some of what has become yours?' I fear that Ḥassān al-Nabaṭī will make attractive to him that which you will not be able to overtake. Therefore, seize (the opportunity of) this period of time." Khālid responded, "I am considering that. Now go back rightly guided."

Bilāl went back, saying, "It is as if you are with this man when there has been sent to him a man who is a foreigner and a spurious intruder, who is violent, of a detestable nature, stupid in religion, shameless, who is seized with deep-rooted hatreds and blood-feuds." He[627] was as he said.

According to Ibn 'Ayyāsh: Bilāl had taken up a house in al-Kūfah. He only asked Khālid for permission to come so that he might look over his house. But he did not stay in it except in chains. Since then, the house has been made into a prison to this day.

According to Ibn 'Ayyāsh: Khālid would give a sermon and say, 626. Or: "He has not accused you!"

627. This refers to Yūsuf b. 'Umar.

"You have claimed that I have made prices expensive for you. May God's curse be upon he who makes them dear!" Hishām had written to Khālid, "Do not sell anything of the crops until the crops of the Commander of the Faithful have been sold, so that a measure of grain may reach a dirham."

According to al-Haytham—Ibn 'Ayyāsh: The governorship of Khālid began in Shawwāl of the year 105. Then he was dismissed in Jumādā I of the year 120.

In this year, Yūsuf b. 'Umar came to Iraq as its governor. I have previously mentioned the reason for his governorship of it. [1659]

In this year, Yūsuf b. 'Umar made Juday' b. 'Alī al-Kirmānī governor of Khurāsān, removing Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah.

It has been said that Yūsuf, when he came to Iraq, wanted to appoint Salm b. Qutaybah[628] governor of Khurāsān. He wrote to Hishām about that, asking him permission to effect it. Hishām wrote (back) to him, "Salm b. Qutaybah is a man who does not have a tribe in Khurāsān. Had he had a tribe in it, his father would not have been killed there."

It has been said that Yūsuf wrote to al-Kirmānī, appointing him to the governorship of Khurāsān, (and sent the letter) with a man of the Banū Sulaym who was at Marw. The Sulamī went out to the people to give them a sermon. He praised God and lauded him. He mentioned Asad, his coming to Khurāsān, what they had suffered of fatigue and discord and what had been done for them at Asad's hand. Then he made kind mention of his brother Khālid, praising him. He also mentioned Yūsuf's arrival in Iraq and urged the people to obedience and adherence to unity. Then he said, "May God forgive the dead one"—meaning Asad—"and may God pardon the one dismissed and bless the one who has come." Then he descended (from the pulpit).

In this year, al-Kirmānī was dismissed from Khurāsān, whose governorship was assumed by Naṣr b. Sayyār b. Layth b. Rāfi' b. Rabī'ah b. Jurayy b. 'Awf b. 'Āmir b. Junda[629] b. Layth b. Bakr b.

628. Al-Bāhilī, he was a prominent son of the great Qutaybah b. Muslim and governed al-Baṣrah near the end of Umayyad rule, as well as both al-Baṣrah and al-Rayy for al-Manṣūr. See Crone, Slaves, 137.

629. Ibn al-Kalbī has Naṣr b. Sayyār b. Rāfi' b. Judayy b. Rabī'ah b. 'Āmir b. Hilāl b. 'Awf b. Junda'. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 40. The same without b. Hilāl is given by Ibn Ḥazm. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 183–4.

ʿAbd Manāh b. Kinānah. His mother was Zaynab bint Ḥassān of the Banū Taghlib.

The Reason for Naṣr b. Sayyār's Governorship of Khurāsān

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: When (news of) [1660] the death of Asad b. ʿAbdallāh reached Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik, he consulted his companions about a man who would be suitable for Khurāsān. They indicated various groups of men, writing down their names for him. Among those who were written down for him were: ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr, Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir al-Riqāshī, Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Laythī, Qaṭan b. Qutaybah b. Muslim, and al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī, one of the Banū Ḥarām. As for ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr, Hishām was told, "He is a drinker." Hishām was also told, "Al-Mujashshir is a decrepit old man," while it was said to him, "Ibn Ḥuḍayn is a man in whom there is haughtiness and pride." It was said to him as well, "Qaṭan b. Qutaybah is a seeker of revenge." Thereupon he chose Naṣr b. Sayyār. He was told, "Naṣr has no tribal grouping in Khurāsān." At this, Hishām declared, "I will be his tribal grouping," and appointed him governor.

Hishām sent Naṣr's appointment with ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Salīṭ b. ʿUqbah[630] al-Hiffānī, of the Hiffān b. ʿAdī b. Ḥanīfah. ʿAbd al-Karīm brought his appointment, having with him his secretary Abū al-Muhannad, the mawlā of the Banū Ḥanīfah. When he arrived in Sarakhs,[631] no one knew about him. Ḥafṣ b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbbād al-Taymī, the brother of Tamīm b. ʿUmar was in charge of Sarakhs. Abū al-Muhannad gave Ḥafṣ the news, whereupon Ḥafṣ dispatched a messenger and had him conveyed to Naṣr. Ibn Salīṭ having reached Marw, Abū al-Muhannad gave the news to al-Kirmānī. Al-Kirmānī dispatched Naṣr b. Ḥabīb b. Baḥr b. Māsik [1661] b. ʿUmar al-Kirmānī to Naṣr b. Sayyār. But Ḥafṣ's messenger preceded him to Naṣr b. Sayyār, becoming the first to greet him with the title of rule. Naṣr said to him, "Perhaps you are (only) a crafty

630. This element is given elsewhere as b. ʿAṭiyyah, which is probably correct. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 552; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 341.

631. A still-existing city currently on the border of the extreme northeast of Iran and of Soviet Turkmenistan. See Le Strange, Lands, 395–6.

poet," and gave the letter (back) to him.

Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah had appointed 'Amr b. Muslim governor of Marw, while he removed al-Kirmānī. He appointed Manṣūr b. 'Amr governor of Abrashahr and appointed Naṣr b. Sayyār governor of Bukhārā.

According to Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah: I summoned Naṣr some days before his appointment came, and proposed to him that I appoint him governor of Bukhārā. He consulted al-Bakhtarī b. Mujāhid. Al-Bakhtarī, who was the mawlā of the Banū Shaybān, said to him, "Do not accept it." Naṣr asked, "Why not?" Al-Bakhtarī answered, "Because you are the chief of Muḍar in Khurāsān. It is as if your appointment over all of Khurāsān has come." When his appointment came, he sent a messenger to al-Bakhtarī. Al-Bakhtarī said to his companions, "Naṣr b. Sayyār has assumed the governorship of Khurāsān." When al-Bakhtarī then came to him, he greeted him as amīr. Naṣr asked him, "How did you know?" Al-Bakhtarī replied, "When you sent a messenger to me, though before that you used to come to me yourself, I knew that you had assumed the governorship."

It has been said: Hishām said to 'Abd al-Karīm when the news about Asad b. 'Abdallāh, regarding his death, reached him, "Whom do you think we should appoint to Khurāsān? For it has reached me that you have knowledge about it and its people."

According to 'Abd al-Karīm: I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, as for the man of Khurāsān in regard to resoluteness and courage, he is al-Kirmānī." Hishām turned his face away, saying, "What is his name?" I said, "Juday' b. 'Alī." He said, "I have no need for him," having drawn an ill omen (from his name).[632] He next said, "Name someone else for me." I said, "The experienced, eloquent one, Yaḥyā b. Nu'aym b. Hubayrah al-Shaybānī, Abū al-Maylā'." He said, "The frontiers will not be blocked with the Rabī'ah." [1662]

According to 'Abd al-Karīm: I said to myself, "He dislikes the Rabī'ah and the Yaman; therefore, I will throw the Muḍar at him." I said, "'Aqīl b. Ma'qil al-Laythī,[633] if you would forgive a weakness." He asked, "What is it?" I replied, "He is not chaste." He said, "I have no need of him." I said, "Manṣūr b. Abī al-Kharqā' al-Sulamī, if you would forgive a negative characteristic, for he is ill-omened." Hishām said, "Other than him." I said, "Al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī, sensible, brave, who has sound thinking despite his being somewhat of a liar." He responded. "There is no good in lying." I said, "Yaḥyā b. Ḥudayn." He said, "Did I not tell you that the frontiers will not be blocked with the Rabī'ah?" Whenever I mentioned the Rabī'ah and the Yaman, he turned away.

632. The name Juday' is a diminutive for "one whose nose is cut off."

633. 'Aqīl b. Ma'qil b. Ḥassān, a close relative of Naṣr b. Sayyār. He was killed by Abū Muslim in 130/748 after having been a companion of Naṣr. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 128; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 354–6; Ṭabarī III/2, 1989.

According to 'Abd al-Karīm: I held back mentioning Naṣr, though he was the most manly of the group, as well as the most resolute of them and the most knowledgeable of them about governmental policy. I said now, "Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Laythī." Hishām said, "He's the one for it." I said, "If you would forgive one thing, for he is chaste, experienced and sensible." He said, "What is it?" I said, "There are few of his tribal group there." Hishām said, "May you have no father! Do you want a tribal group more numerous than me? I will be his tribal group."[634]

According to others: When Yūsuf b. 'Umar arrived in Iraq, he said, "Show me a man whom I may make governor of Khurāsān." His companions suggested to him Maslamah b. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim,[635] Qudayd b. Manī' al-Minqarī,[636] Naṣr b.
[1663] Sayyār, 'Amr b. Muslim, Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim, Manṣūr b. Abī al-Kharqā', Salm b. Qutaybah, Yūnus b. 'Abd Rabbihi,[637] and Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥman al-Qushayrī.[638] Yūsuf

634. Curiously, the same is said about Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī having no tribal grouping on his appointment in 86[705]. Actually, both the Bāhilah and the Layth seem to have been quite numerous in Khurāsān, judging by the frequency with which their members are mentioned there. See Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 128; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 429–30.

635. Al-Sulamī. See note 50.

636. Naṣr b. Sayyār's father-in-law, of a very noble Tamīmī lineage. He appears in Naṣr's entourage in 126[744] and 128[746]. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 76; Ṭabarī, III/2 1865, 1889, 1921–2, 1925.

637. A stalwart supporter of Naṣr until his execution by Abū Muslim in 130[748]. Possibly the son of 'Abd Rabbihi b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr al-Laythī. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1235, III/2, 1846, 1920, 1929, 1989, 1995. Pace Crone, Slaves, 53, 241–2, his mention here requires an Arab lineage.

638. A son of the fiscal governor of Khurāsān under 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, Ziyād governed Naysābūr for Naṣr and in 130[748] resisted Abū Muslim's forces as Naṣr's governor of Balkh. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1409, 1442, 1997–9; Ibn al- Kalbī, Jamharah, I, wrote a letter with their names to Hishām, praising the Qaysīs. He put Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Kinānī as the last of those whose names he wrote. Hishām said, "Why is the Kinānī the last of them?" There was in Yūsuf's letter to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, Naṣr has only a small tribal group to support him in Khurāsān." Hishām wrote back to him, "I have understood your letter and your praise for the Qaysīs. You have mentioned Naṣr and the smallness of his tribal group. How can it be small when I am his tribal group? Rather, you have preferred the Qaysīs to me, but I prefer the Khindif to you. Send forth the appointment of Naṣr, for the Commander of the Faithful will not make his tribal grouping less, let alone that the Tamīm are the most numerous of the people of Khurāsān."[639] Hishām wrote to Naṣr that the latter might correspond with Yūsuf b. 'Umar. Yūsuf sent Salm as an emissary to Hishām, praising him, but Hishām did not appoint him. Then Yūsuf sent Sharīk b. 'Abd Rabbihi al-Numayrī as an emissary, praising him so that Hishām would appoint him governor of Khurāsān, but Hishām refused him.

Naṣr sent al-Ḥakam b. Yazīd b. 'Umayr al-Usayyidī[640] from Khurāsān as an emissary to Hishām. Naṣr praised him. Yūsuf beat him and prevented him from going forth to Khurāsān. When Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah[641] came (to power later) he made al-Ḥakam b. Yazīd his governor of Kirmān. Hishām sent the appointment of Naṣr with 'Abd al-Karīm al-Ḥanafī, who had with him his secretary Abū al-Muhannad, the mawlā of the Banū Ḥanīfah. When he came to Sarakhs, snow had fallen; therefore, he stayed, lodging with Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar b. 'Abbād al-Taymī. He told him, "I have brought the appointment of Naṣr as governor of Khurāsān." Ḥafṣ was at that time the governor of Sarakhs. Ḥafṣ summoned his servant, mounted him on a horse and gave him money, saying to him, [1664]

105, II, 127, 606.

639. This refers to the fact that the Tamīm are closer to Naṣr than to the Qays in the tribal genealogy of the Mudar, and hence Naṣr would be more likely to garner their support than a Qaysī, especially since he was married to at least two Tamīmī women. See note 65.

640. Text: al-Asadī; read: al-Usayyidī. See Crone, Slaves, 167, where he is incorrectly identified as a candidate of Yūsuf b. 'Umar rather that Naṣr. For the vocalization of Usayyidī, also given erroneously by Crone, see Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 48–9.

641. Abū Khālid al-Fazārī, the governor of Iraq for Marwān b. Muḥammad, he was killed in Wāsiṭ by the 'Abbāsids in 132[750]. See Crone, Slaves, 107.

"Fly, and kill the horse (if need be). If it falters under you, buy another than it so that you may reach Naṣr." The servant went forth until he came to Naṣr at Balkh. Finding him in the market, he gave him the letter. Naṣr asked him, "Do you know what is in this letter?" He replied, "No." Naṣr grasped it in his hand and retired to his house.

The people said, "Naṣr's appointment to Khurāsān has come to him." A group of his intimates came to him to ask him. He replied, "Nothing has come to me," and thus he remained that day. On the next day, there came to him Abū Ḥafṣ b. ʿAlī, one of the Banū Ḥanẓalah, who was his relative by marriage, since Abū Ḥafṣ's daughter was his wife. Abū Ḥafṣ was tall and fickle and had much wealth. He said to Naṣr, "The people have been talking and saying much about your governorship. Has something come to you?" Naṣr answered, "Nothing has come to me." Thereupon Abū Ḥafṣ stood up to go out, but Naṣr said, "Stay in your place." He read him the letter. Abū Ḥafṣ said, "Ḥafṣ would not write to you other than the truth." While he was speaking to him, ʿAbd al-Karīm suddenly asked permission to enter. ʿAbd al-Karīm presented his appointment to him, whereupon Naṣr rewarded him with ten thousand dirhams.

Then Naṣr put Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim in charge of Balkh, and put Wassāj b. Bukayr b. Wassāj[642] in charge of Marw al-Rūdh, al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥashraj[643] in charge of Herat, Ziyād b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī in charge of Abrashahr, Abū Ḥafṣ b. ʿAlī, his father-in-law, in charge of Khwārizm and Qaṭan b. Qutaybah in charge of al-Sughd. A man from the Syrian troops said, "I never saw tribal favoritism like this." Naṣr said, "Yes (you did), that which was before this." For four years, he did not appoint [1665] anyone but a Muḍarī. Khurāsān throve with a prosperity the like of which it had not enjoyed before that. Naṣr lowered the kharāj and performed the duties of ruling and tax collecting well. Sawwār b. al-Ashʿar said:

Khurāsān has become safe after fear

642. Text: Wishāḥ b. Bukayr b. Wishāḥ; read: Wassāj b. Bukayr b. Wassāj, as in Ms. B. His nisbah is al-ʿUṭāridī. He is the son of a governor of Khurāsān. See note 254.

643. Al-Jaʿdī. He appears as a poet in 126(744). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1857; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 106, II, 112.

Of the oppression of every tyrant covetous of rule.
When news of what it had met came to Yūsuf,
He chose Naṣr for it, Naṣr b. Sayyār.

Naṣr b. Sayyār said regarding those who disliked his rule:

Console yourself for love; you will not be blamed.
Likewise anxiety will not seize you.
Have you, if Kabīrah has become wrathful after nearness,
Stayed in love with her, and has sickness touched you?
She holds out hope today for that which she promised recently
And the noble have been disappointed in the expectation of her appointments.
Have you not seen that what women who shun adornment do
Is difficult, talk not looming[644] about it?
My obedience refused me, as my bravery refused me,
Along with my triumph when the contest is fought.
We cause neither one who takes refuge with us to perish,
Nor personal merit when right has been lost,
Nor do we overlook treachery, but we ourselves
Keep good faith, so that we are not blamed.
Our Caliph is he whose hands have won
The cup of praise, and he is the magnanimous king.
We dominate them through him, and we have over them—
If we say (it) tremendous noble qualities. [1666]
Abū al-ʿĀṣ is his ancestor, and ʿAbd Shams,
Ḥarb and the generous, noble lords,
And Marwān, the father of the Caliphs, upon whom Praise is exalted, he being a standard for them.
Among us is the house of the Caliph of the All-Compassionate, Whose two houses are the Holy[645] and the Inviolable.[646]
We are the noblest ones, if our genealogy is mentioned,
And the first of terrestrial beings and the chief.
There has come into our possession from every subtribe
The noses of the living beings (by which they are led) and the reins.

644. Text: yurīgh; read: yarī', as Mss. B, BM, and in the Cairo ed.
645. That is, the sanctuary at Jerusalem, containing the Dome of the Rock and the al-Aqṣā mosque.
646. That is, the sanctuary at Mecca containing the Ka'bah.

We have hands by which we do good and we exhaust,
And hands in whose foreparts are swift (swords),
And violent strenght in war when we meet (the enemy),
When the warner in it is ever the sword.

Naṣr's appointment came to him in Rajab of the year 120.[647] Al-Bakhtarī said to him, "Read your appointment and deliver a sermon to the people." Thus Naṣr delivered a sermon to the people. He said in his sermon, "Stick, O companions of ours, to your way, for we have come to know your good and your evil."

Pilgrimage and Governors

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl led the pilgrimage.

I heard this from Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.

It has been said that he who led the pilgrimage in it was Sulaymān b. Hishām. It has also been said that Yazīd b. Hishām[648] led the pilgrimage.

The governor in this year of al-Madīnah, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if was Muḥammad b. Hishām. In charge of Iraq and the whole East was Yūsuf b. 'Umar. In charge of Khurāṣān was Naṣr b. Sayyār, though it has been said it was Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah. In charge of al-Baṣrah [1667] was Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī[649] on behalf of Yūsuf b. 'Umar. In charge of its judiciary was 'Āmir b. 'Abīdah al-Bāhilī.[650] In charge of Armenia and Ādharbayjān was Marwān b. Muḥammad. In charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah was Ibn Shubrumah.[651]

---

647. This date clashes with the statement that 'Abd al-Karīm, Hishām's messenger, was held up by snow at Sarakhs. See above, p. 1663.

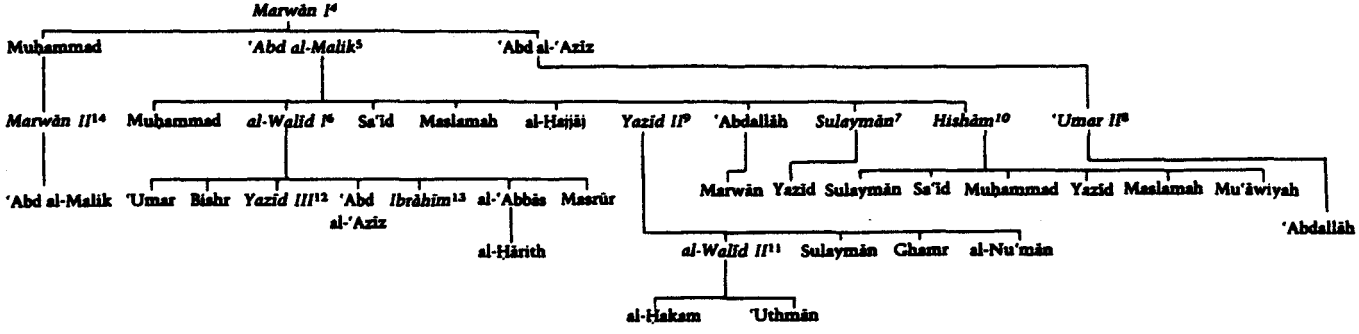
648. Al-Afqam, the son of the Caliph Hishām by his wife Umm Ḥakīm. He was arrested by al-Walīd b. Yazīd in 125(743), then was one of the first to render the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd in 126(744). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1776, 1835; Zubayrī, Nasab, 167.

649. Abū al-'Aj. He was the head of the security force (shurṭah) for al-Walīd b. Yazīd's governor of Damascus in 126(744). See Crone, Slaves, 151.

650. He was in office until 126(744). See Wakī', Quḍāh, II, 42–3; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1698, 1875.

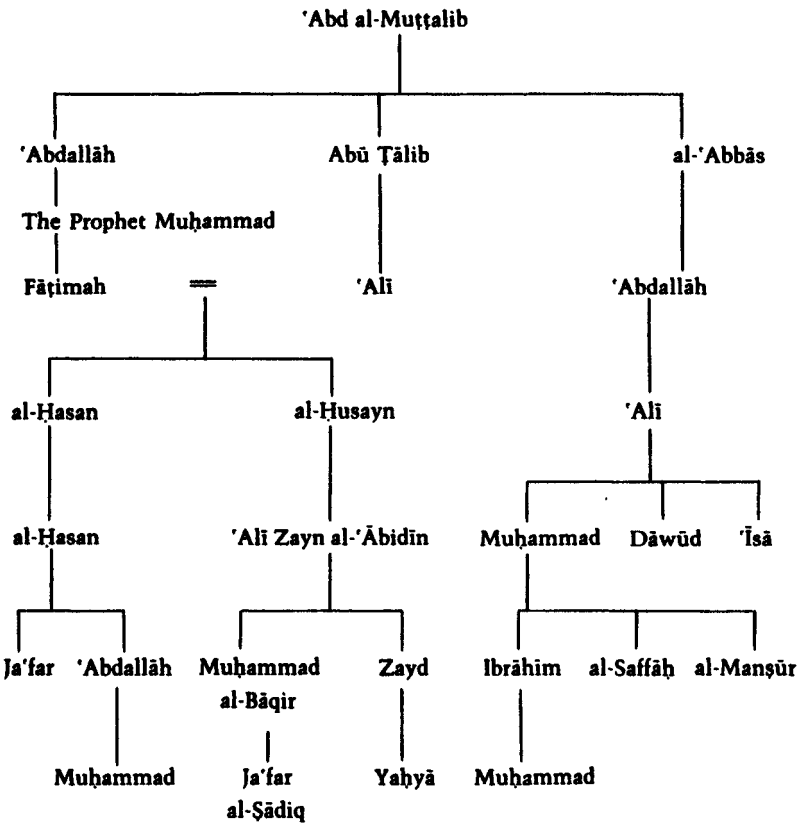
651. He is 'Abdallāh b. Shubrumah al-Ḍabbī 72(691)–144(761). Appointed by Yūsuf b. 'Umar as judge of al-Kūfah, he was sent by Yūsuf to govern Sijistān in 122(740). He is one of the greatest Kūfan jurists (fuqahā'). See Wakī', Quḍāh, III, 36–129; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1717; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 250–1.

The History of al-Ṭabarī



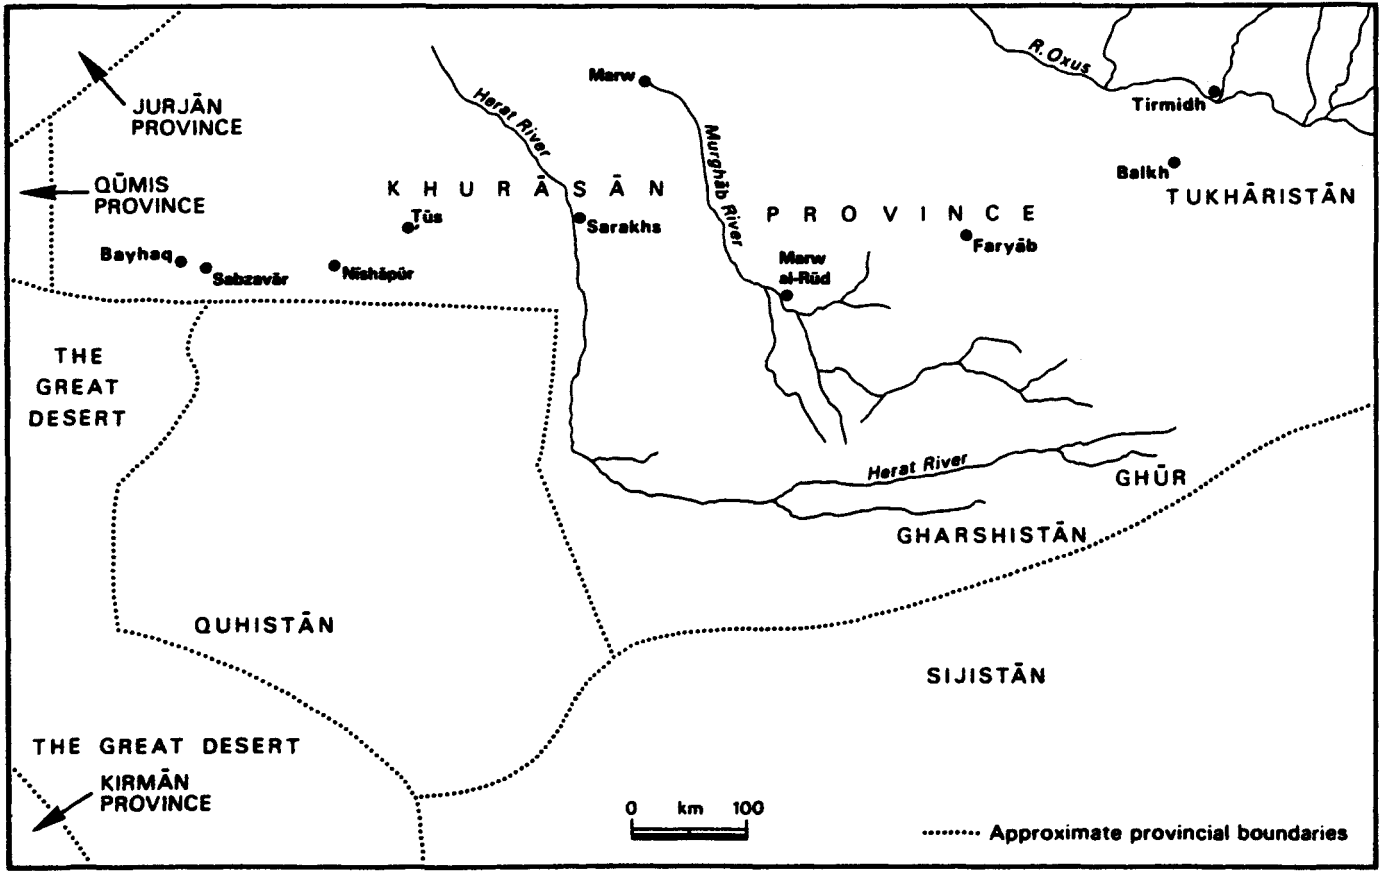
VOLUME XXVI

The Waning of the Umayyad Caliphate



TRANSLATED BY CAROLE HILLENBRAND

Table I. Genealogy of the Later Umayyads



Notes:
Italics denote an Umayyad caliph.
The numbers by the names of the caliphs denote the chronological order of their rule.
This table is not comprehensive. It includes the names of those Umayyads mentioned in this volume of al-Ṭabarī's history.

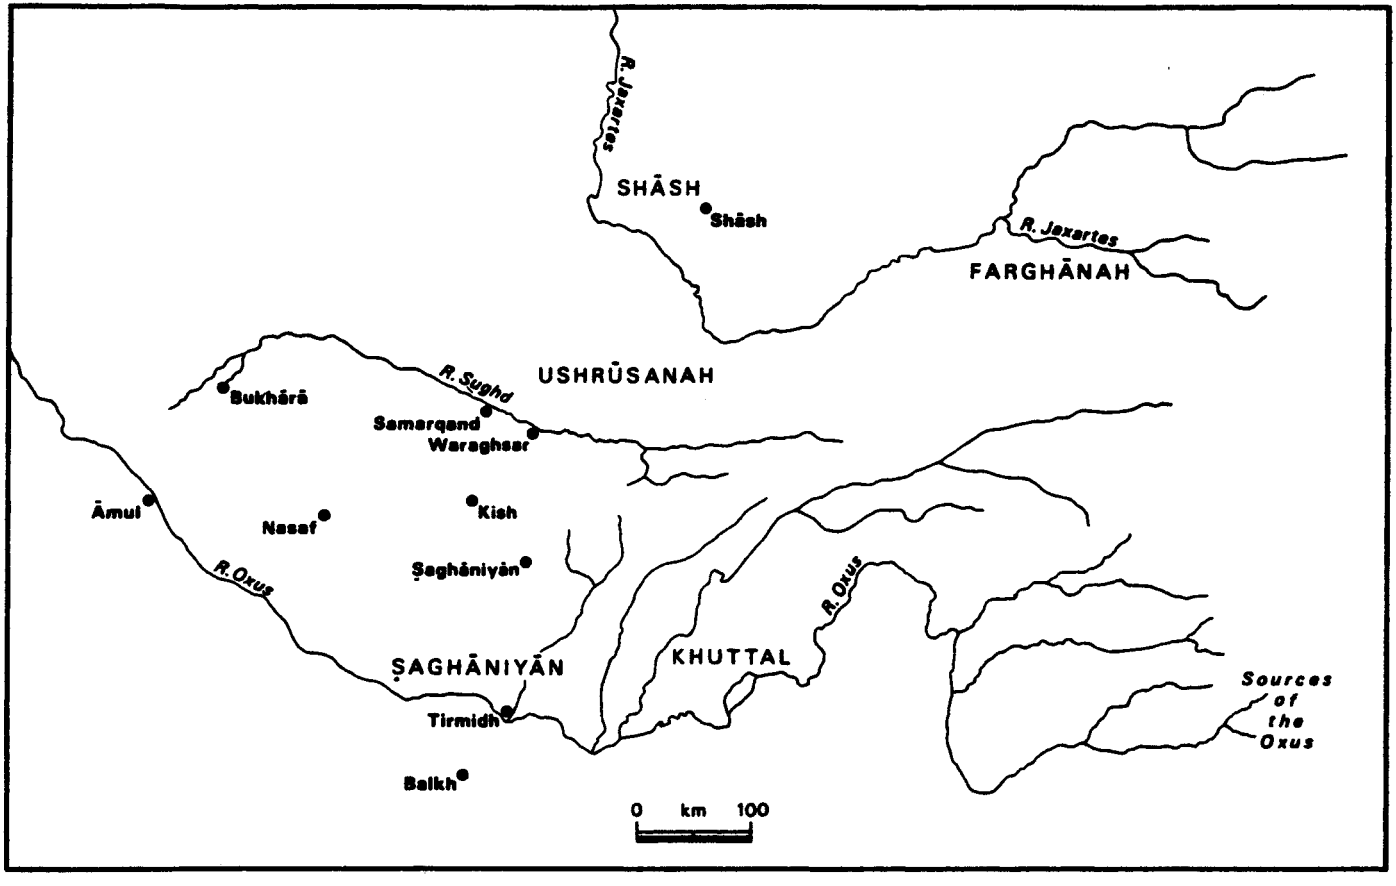


Table II. Genealogy of the Prophet's Family (The Shī'ah and the 'Abbāsids)

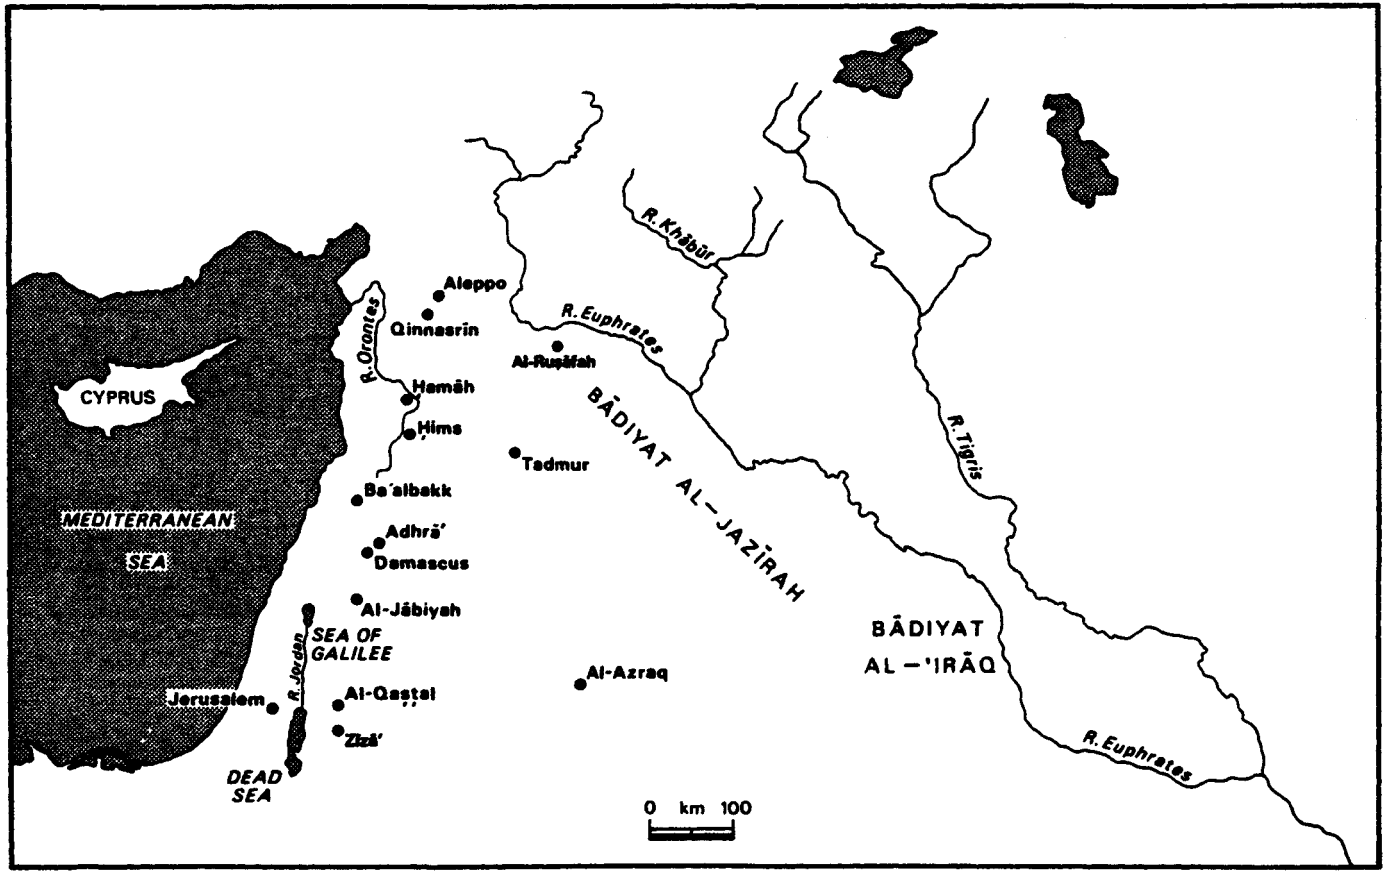
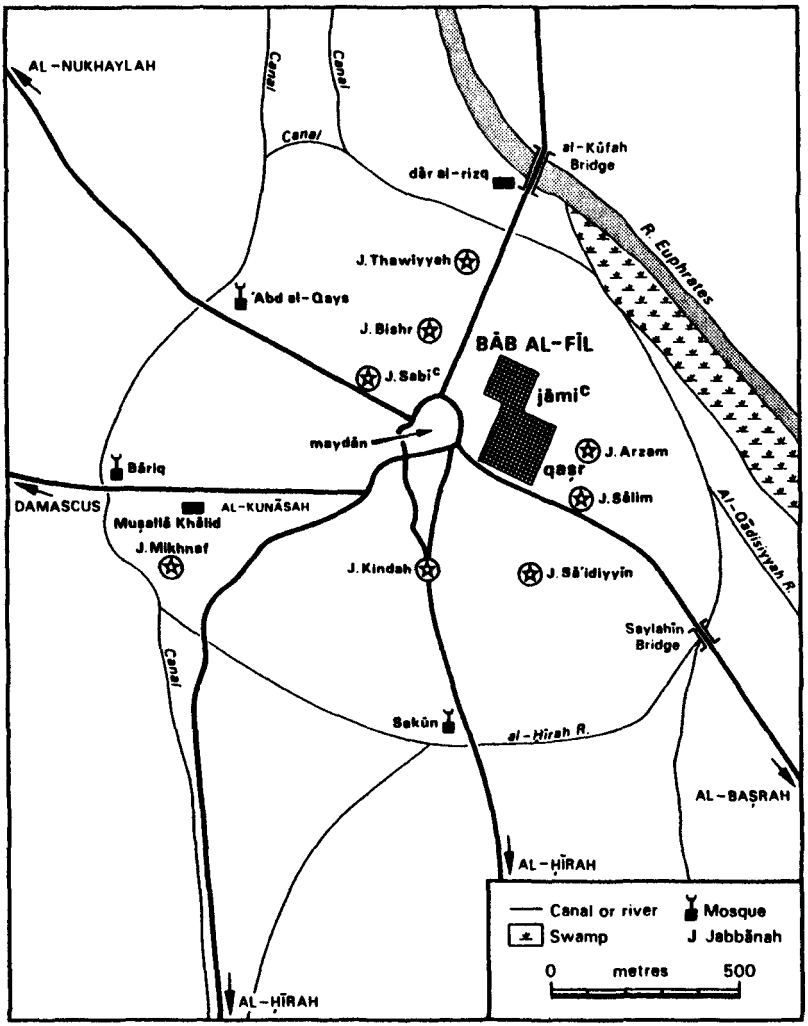


The names shown here are only those of importance to this volume of al-Ṭabarī's history.



Map I. Khurāsān

Map II. Transoxiana

Map III. Syria in the Umayyad Period

Map IV. Al-Kūfah and Its Environs

The Events of the Year [1667]

121

(December 18, 738–December 6, 739)

Among the events taking place during this year were the raid into Byzantium of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik,[1] during which he conquered Maṭāmīr,[2] and the raid into the country of the Lord of the Golden Throne[3] by Marwān b. Muḥammad.[4] Marwān captured

1. There is some confusion in the sources as to which Maslamah conducted this raid. It is more likely that the Umayyad commander concerned here was the experienced Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik who had conducted a number of campaigns into Asia Minor and Armenia and had been governor of the Jazīrah, Armenia, and Āzarbāyjān. This is the view of Ibn Khayyāṭ (II, 367) and al-Ya'qūbī (Historiae, II, 395). For the career of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik, cf. Shaban, Islamic History, I, 136ff; Wellhausen, 316–19; Crone, 125.

2. The word maṭāmīr means underground caves or cellars, often used for storing corn (cf. Freytag, 381). Here, however, Maṭāmīr appears to be a specific place, probably identifiable with the famous caves in Cappadocia. This is the name given to them by E. Honigmann (Die Ostgrenze des Byzantinischen Reiches, 45–46). Brooks definitely thinks Maṭāmīr is a place name ("The Arabs in Asia Minor (641–750) from Arabic sources," JHS XVIII (1898): 201).

3. Ṣāḥib sarīr al-dhahab. The area of the Sarīr whom Wiet identifies as the Avars was visited by Ibn Rustah some time before 290 (902) and is to be identified as Daghestan. According to Ibn Rustah, "the king possesses a golden throne (sarīr) and a silver throne." The people were thus named because of the throne story. Cf. Ibn Rustah, Les Atours, trans. by G. Wiet, 165; Ḥudūd, 447–50; V. Minorsky, A History of Sharvān and Darband, 167–68.

4. Since 115 (733–34) Marwān b. Muḥammad b. Marwān had been governor of his fortresses and laid waste his land. He submitted to Marwān, having agreed to give him as jizyah[5] one thousand slaves.[6] Marwān took a pledge from him on that basis and reinstated him in control of his territory.

In this year al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad was born.[7]

In this year Zayd b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was killed.[8] Al-Wāqidī[9] said this was in Ṣafar 121 (January 17–February 14, 739), whilst Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī)[10] claimed that he was killed in Ṣafar 122 (January 6–February 4, 740).

The Reason for [Zayd b. 'Alī's] Death, an Account of His Circumstances, and the Cause of His Rebellion[11]

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī[12]—'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh:[13] [1668] Zayd b. 'Alī, Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib[14] and Dāwūd b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās[15] went to see Khālid b. 'Abdallāh,[16] when he was governor of Iraq. Khālid gave them

---

Armenia, whence he conducted raids into the Caucasus. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 367; al-Ṭabarī, II, 1431–32. For an account of his career, cf. Shaban, Islamic History, I, 144–45, 160–64; Wellhausen, 370–96.

5. Poll-tax payable to the Muslims by the "People of the Book." For a fuller definition, cf. EI[2], s.v. (C. Cahen). Cf. also n. 105 and n. 107.

6. Literally, "one thousand heads."

7. Al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh, the brother of the 'Abbāsid caliphs al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr. Cf. EI[2], s.v. (K. Zetterstéen).

8. Cf. the genealogical table of the 'Alids.

9. Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī (130–207/748–823), the famous historian and author of the Kitāb al-Maghāzī. Cf. Duri, 37; EI[1], s.v. (J. Horovitz).

10. Abū al-Mundhir Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, an important and prolific scholar of history and genealogy. Cf. Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 205–13; Sezgin, I, 268, 271; Duri, 146–48.

11. For other accounts in primary sources of the rebellion of Zayd b. 'Alī, the great-great-grandson of the Prophet, cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 229–59; al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 127–51; Ibn A'tham, V, 108–25; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 390–91; Fragmenta, 92–100; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 467–71.

12. The famous historian and genealogist, d. 206 (821) or 207 (822). Cf. Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 216–19; Duri, 53–54; Sezgin, I, 272.

13. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh b. al-Rabī'ah, a muḥaddith. Cf. Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 68.

14. Cf. the genealogical table of the 'Alids.

15. Cf. the genealogical table of the 'Abbāsids.

16. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī had been appointed governor of Iraq in 105 (723–24) or 106 (724–25). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1471. He fell from power in 120 (738), so this incident must have occurred before that date.

money and they returned to Medina. When Yūsuf b. 'Umar[17] became governor, he wrote to Hishām listing their names and telling Hishām what Khālid had given them.[18] Yūsuf also mentioned that Khālid had bought land in Medina from Zayd b. 'Alī for ten thousand dīnārs and that he had then handed the land back to Zayd. Hishām[19] wrote to the governor of Medina[20] asking him to send the men to him. This he did. Hishām questioned them and they admitted that they had been given money, but they denied everything else. Then Hishām asked Zayd about the land (in Medina) and he denied the allegation. The men then took an oath before Hishām and he believed them.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—Abū Mikhnaf:[21] The affair of Zayd b. 'Alī began as follows. Yazīd b. Khālid al-Qasrī[22] claimed that he was owed money from Zayd b. 'Alī, Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, Dāwūd b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, Ibrāhīm b. Sa'd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf al-Zuhrī and Ayyūb b. Salmah b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī. Yūsuf b. 'Umar wrote about them to Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. Zayd b. 'Alī was at that time in al-Ruṣāfah[23] in litigation with the sons of al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib about the ṣadaqah of the Prophet of God[24] and Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. 'Alī was with Zayd. When the letters of Yūsuf b. 'Umar reached Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, he wrote to the men concerned

---

For Khālid's career, cf. Gabrieli, Califfato, 5–34; *EI*², s.v. (G. R. Hawting); al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 53–63; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, II, 275 ff.

17. Yūsuf became governor on the dismissal of Khālid al-Qasrī. Cf. Dīnawarī, 339; Fragmenta, 92. For the career of Yūsuf b. 'Umar, cf. *EI*¹, s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Hawting, 82–83, 96–97.

18. Bi-mā ajazahum bihi. Cf. line 2, fa-ajāzahum.

19. Umayyad caliph, ruled 105–25 (726–43). Cf. *EI*², s.v. (F. Gabrieli).

20. Ibrāhīm b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī, the maternal uncle of the caliph Hishām.

21. The famous genealogist and historian (d. 157/774). Cf. U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf; Duri, 43–44.

22. There is confusion in the sources as to whether it was Khālid, his son Yazīd, or both who made the allegations. Whichever of the two made the claims about the money did so under torture. Cf. Ibn A'tham, VIII, 108; al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 133; Fragmenta, 93.

23. Hishām's preferred place of residence. Cf. the fuller discussion in n. 426.

24. Fī ṣadaqat rasūl Allāh. This phrase is used in other sources. Cf. Shaykh al-Mufid, 402; Fragmenta, 92. Zayd was appointed by his brother Muḥammad to represent the Ḥusaynids in litigation against the Ḥasanids. Later on, al-Ṭabarī uses the term wuqūf 'Alī when probably referring to the same litigation. Cf. n. 35. Cf. *EI*², "Fadak" (L. Veccia Vaglieri); Hrbek, "Muḥammads Nachlass und die Aliden," 145, 148; *EI*¹, "Ṣadaḳa" (T. H. Weir).

stating that Yūsuf b. 'Umar had written to him about a sum of money which Yazīd b. Khālid claimed they owed him. They denied it, so Hishām said to them: "We will send you to Yūsuf so [1669] that he may bring you and your accusers together." Zayd b. 'Alī said to Hishām: "I implore you by God and kinship not to send me to Yūsuf b. 'Umar." Hishām said: "What is it that you fear from Yūsuf b. 'Umar?" Zayd said: "I am afraid that he will act aggressively toward me."

Hishām replied, "Yūsuf cannot do that," called his scribe, and wrote to Yūsuf b. 'Umar as follows:[25] "Now when these persons come to you, bring them and Yazīd b. Khālid al-Qasrī together; if they admit the allegations made against them, send them to me. If they deny them, ask Yazīd for proof. If he does not produce the proof, then following the afternoon prayer make them swear in the name of the One God that Yazīd b. Khālid al-Qasrī did not entrust them with any deposit and that he is entitled to nothing from them. Then let them go." They said to Hishām: "We are afraid that Yūsuf will go against your letter and will act aggressively toward us." Hishām said: "Not at all! I will send one of the guards with you to make sure that Yūsuf carries out this order and expedites the matter." They said: "May God reward you for honoring the ties of kinship! You have judged fairly." Then Hishām sent them to Yūsuf but he kept back Ayyūb b. Salmah, because Hishām's mother was the daughter of Hishām b. Ismā'īl b. Hishām b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī, and Ayyūb was one of Hishām's maternal uncles. So the caliph did not want him involved at all in that suspicious matter.[26]

When they came to Yūsuf, they were ushered into his presence. Yūsuf sat Zayd b. 'Alī near him and questioned him in a kindly manner. Then he asked the men about the money and they all denied it, saying: "Yazīd did not leave any money with us nor is he owed anything from us." Then Yūsuf brought Yazīd b. Khālid out (of prison) to them and he put him and them together. Yūsuf [1670] said to Yazīd: "This is Zayd b. 'Alī and this is Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. 'Alī and this is so-and-so and this is so-and-so against whom you have made the allegations that you have made." Yazīd said: "I am not owed any sum, either small or great, from them." Yūsuf said: "Are you ridiculing me or the Commander of the Faithful?" Then Yūsuf tortured Yazīd so much that day that he thought he had killed him. He took the other men to the mosque when the afternoon prayer was over and made them take an oath. When they had sworn an oath to him, he ordered these men to be flogged, with the exception of Zayd b. 'Alī, from whom he withheld his hand. He did not dare to do anything (more) with them and he wrote to Hishām informing him of the situation.[27] Hishām replied that he should make them swear an oath and release them. So Yūsuf set them free. They left and went to Medina but Zayd b. 'Alī stayed in al-Kūfah.

25. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 135; Ibn A'tham, VIII, 109.
26. Qarf. The variant reading from MSS. BM and O, qadhf ("calumny"), also makes good sense.

According to 'Ubayd b. Jannād—'Aṭā' b. Muslim al-Khaffāf: Zayd b. 'Alī dreamt that he lit a fire in Iraq which he extinguished, and that thereafter he died. This frightened him and he said to his son Yaḥyā: "My son, I have had a dream that frightened me." So he told him about it. Then came the letter from Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik requesting his presence. Zayd went and Hishām said to him: "Go to your amīr,[28] Yūsuf." Then Zayd said to him: "I implore you, for God's sake, O Commander of the Faithful! By God, if you send me to him, I am not sure that you and I will ever again meet alive on the face of the earth." Then Hishām said: "Go to Yūsuf as you have been commanded to do." So Zayd went to him.[29]

Some reports said that Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik summoned Zayd from Medina only because of the letter from Yūsuf b. 'Umar.

According to Abū 'Ubaydah:[30] The reason for Hishām's summoning Zayd was that when Yusuf b. 'Umar tortured Khālid b. 'Abd Allāh, Khālid claimed that he had deposited a great deal of money with Zayd b. 'Alī, Dāwūd b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās and two men of the Quraysh, one of whom was a Makhzūmī and [1671]

27. Ibn al-Athīr's account is clearer (V, 172).
28. For the use of the term amīr, cf. EI[2], s.v. (A. A. Duri).
29. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 231.
30. Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā (110–210/728–825) was a scholar of wide-ranging activities, highly praised by al-Iṣfahānī, Ibn al-Nadīm, and al-Jāḥiẓ. Cf. Duri, 55–56; Sezgin, I, 265.

the other a Jumaḥī. Yūsuf wrote to Hishām about this and Hishām thereupon wrote to his maternal uncle Ibrāhīm b. Hishām, who was his governor in Medina, ordering him to bring the men to him. Ibrāhīm b. Hishām summoned Zayd and Dāwūd and asked them about what Khālid had said. They swore that Khālid had not deposited anything with them. Ibrāhīm said: "In my view, you are telling the truth, but the letter from the Commander of the Faithful has come with these instructions and I am obliged to carry out his orders." He took them to Syria and they swore an inviolable oath that Khālid had never deposited anything with them. Dāwūd said: "I came to Khālid in Iraq and he ordered 100,000 dirhams[31] for me." Hishām said: "In my view the two of you are more truthful than Ibn al-Naṣrāniyyah.[32] Go to Yūsuf so that he may bring you and Khālid together; then expose him as a liar before Yūsuf."

It was said that Zayd only went to Hishām to litigate against his paternal cousin ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī. This account came from Juwayriyah b. Asmāʾ[33] who said: "I saw Zayd b. ʿAlī and Jaʿfar b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan disputing[34] over the guardianship of the endowments (wuqūf) of ʿAlī.[35] Zayd was arguing on behalf of the Ḥusaynids and Jaʿfar was arguing on behalf of the Ḥasanids.
[1672] Jaʿfar and Zayd used all the arguments at their disposal[36] in the presence of the governor, and then they stood up and never spoke another word about the disagreement between them. When Jaʿfar died, ʿAbdallāh said: "Who will take on Zayd for us?" and Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan said: "I will take him on for you." Then ʿAbdallāh said: "Not at all! We fear your tongue and your hand. I will do it." Ḥasan said: "In that case you will not achieve your aim or

31. Cf. *EI*², "Dirham" (G. C. Miles).

32. Khālid was often called Ibn al-Naṣrāniyyah and was accused inter alia of pro-Christian sympathies. He was said to have built a church for his Christian mother behind the mosque in al-Kūfah. Cf. Hawting, 81–82, and Hell, 33, quoting Farazdaq, Dīwān, 451: bana biʿatan fīhā al-ṣalību li-ummihi ("he built a church in which is the cross, for his mother").

33. Juwayriyah b. Asmāʾ b. ʿUbayd al-Baṣrī, d. 173 (789), who transmitted reports from his father. Cf. Sezgin, II, 94.

34. Jaʿfar argued the Ḥasanid case. After he died, his place was taken by ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 231.

35. Cf. n. 24.

36. Yatabālaghāni . . . ilā kulli ghayah. An alternative translation might be: "They were extremely skillful in argument."

win your argument." 'Abdallāh said: "As far as my argument is concerned, I will win it." Then Zayd and 'Abdallāh went off to contest the dispute before the governor, who at that time, according to some reports, was Ibrāhīm b. Hishām.[37]

'Abdallāh said to Zayd: "Do you want to obtain this[38] when you are only the son of an Indian slave-girl?" Zayd retorted: "Ismā'īl was the son of a slave-girl and he obtained more than that," and 'Abdallāh fell silent. They both went to extremes in their arguments that day. On the morrow the governor summoned them together with the Quraysh and the Anṣār[39] and they contested their dispute afresh. One of the men of the Anṣār objected and intervened between them. Zayd said to him: "What are you doing intervening between us? You are a man from the Qaḥṭān."[40] He said: "By God, I am better than you not only as a person but also so far as my father and mother are concerned." Zayd fell silent but a man of the Quraysh intervened on his behalf and said: "In the name of God, you have lied! He is better than you as a person and also in respect to his father and mother, from beginning to end, above the earth and beneath it." The governor said: "What has this to do with you?" The Qurashī[41] took a handful of stones, threw them on the ground and said: "By God, I do not have any patience with this." At this point, 'Abdallāh and Zayd realized that the governor harbored malicious intentions toward them. 'Abdallāh made as if to speak but Zayd asked him not to do so and he was silent. Then Zayd said to the governor: "By God, you have brought us together on a matter for which neither Abū Bakr nor 'Umar would have brought us together. I [1673]

37. The editor notes (1672, n. g) that Ibrāhīm b. Hishām was dismissed in 114 (732) and replaced by Khālid b. 'Abd al-Malik, who governed until 118 (736).

38. Aṭṭma'u an tanālahā. This is either a reference to the wilāyat wuqūf 'Alī (the guardianship of 'Alī's endowments), which has already been mentioned, or to the caliphate. One of the accounts from al-Balādhurī refers specifically to the caliphate: aṭṭma'u fī al-khilāfah (Ansāb, 230).

39. "The Helpers." The term was originally used to designate the men of Medina who supported the Prophet. In Umayyad times, the Anṣār formed a "pious opposition" to the regime. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt).

40. Qaḥṭān was the legendary forefather of the "Southern" tribes just as Quḍā'ah was the ancestor of the "Northerners." Cf. *EI*², s.v. (A. Fischer-A. K. Irvine).

41. 'Abdallāh b. Wāqid b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Cf. p. 11.

call God to witness that I will not litigate before you again on this matter, either rightly or wrongly, as long as I live." Then Zayd said to 'Abdallāh: "Get up, cousin." So they stood up and the people dispersed.

Some sources said that Zayd continued litigating against Ja'far b. Ḥasan and then against 'Abdallāh after him until Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik made Khālid b. 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam governor of Medina. Zayd and 'Abdallāh were in litigation and 'Abdallāh spoke rudely to Zayd saying: "You son of a Hindu woman!"[42] Zayd laughed it off and said: "You've done it now, Abū Muḥammad." Then he retaliated by mentioning 'Abdallāh's mother in some (disparaging) connection.[43]

According to al-Madā'inī:[44] When 'Abdallāh said that to Zayd, Zayd said: "Yes, indeed. By God, she was patient after the death of her master. She never crossed her threshold, whilst other women[45] were not as patient." Zayd repented and was ashamed of what he had said about his aunt[46] and he did not go in to see her for a time. She sent a message to him saying: "I know, nephew, that you feel about your mother just as 'Abdallāh feels about his mother."

Some sources said that Fāṭimah sent a message to Zayd: "If 'Abdallāh has insulted your mother, then you insult his mother." She said to 'Abdallāh: "Did you say such-and-such about Zayd's mother?" He said: "Yes." She said: "O wretched man to have done that! By God, she was the best woman of our kinsfolk."

It is reported that Khālid b. 'Abd al-Malik said to Zayd and 'Abdallāh: "Give us a break until tomorrow morning, for I am not the son of 'Abd al-Malik if I cannot decide between you." During the night the city (Medina) seethed like a cauldron.[47] Some said

---

42. "You son of the Sindī woman": MS. B and Ibn al-Athīr, V, 172. In one report from al-Balādhurī, 'Abdallāh calls Zayd's mother "a witch" (sāḥirah) (Ansāb, 230). Zayd's mother was a slave given by al-Mukhtār to 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 127.

43. Al-Balādhurī quotes in the mouth of Zayd a scabrous story about 'Abdallāh's mother. Cf. Ansāb, 230.

44. Al-Madā'inī, the famous historian, d. 225 (839). Cf. Duri, 48; EI[1], s.v. (C. Brockelmann); EI[2], s.v. (U. Sezgin).

45. According to Ibn al-Athīr, Zayd is referring here to his aunt who married again after the death of her husband (V, 172).

46. Fāṭimah bint al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī.

47. For an almost identical account, cf. Fragmenta, 92–93.

one thing and others another. Some said Zayd had said such-and-such and others said 'Abdallāh had said such-and-such. The next [1674] morning Khālid held an audience in the mosque and the people assembled, some gloating, some grieving, and Khālid called the two of them, wanting them to insult one another. 'Abdallāh made as if to speak, so Zayd said: "Don't hurry, Abū Muḥammad! Zayd will free all his slaves before he ever litigates with you in front of Khālid." Then Zayd went up to Khālid and said to him: "Khālid, you have assembled the descendants of the Prophet of God in a way in which Abū Bakr and 'Umar would never have done." Khālid said: "Is there no one here to answer this fool?" Then one of the Anṣār from the family of 'Amr b. Ḥazm spoke and said: "You descendant of the 'dustman' ('Alī)[48] and of that fool Ḥusayn! Can't you see that you have a duty to the governor and that you owe him obedience?" Zayd retorted: "Shut up, Qaḥṭānī, we don't reply to the likes of you." The man said: "Why are you shunning me? By God, I am better than you and my father is better than your father and my mother is better than your mother." Zayd laughed it off and said: "O tribe of Quraysh! This religion has gone, but has honorable lineage gone too? By God, the religion of the people may disappear, but their honorable lineage does not." Then 'Abdallāh b. Wāqid b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said: "You are a liar, you Qaḥṭānī! By God, he is better than you as a person and in respect of his father and mother and in every way." He spoke about Zayd for a long time and the Qaḥṭānī said: "Leave us alone, Ibn Wāqid." Then Ibn Wāqid took a hand- [1675] ful of stones and threw them on the ground and said: "By God, I have no patience with this," and he stood up (and left).

Then Zayd went to Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. Hishām began by not allowing Zayd into his presence, so Zayd complained in writing to Hishām, and whenever he did so Hishām wrote at the bottom of it: "Go back to your amīr." Zayd said: "By God, I won't go back to Khālid ever again. I am not asking for money. I am only a litigant." Then one day, after a long delay, Hishām allowed Zayd in to see him.

---

48. Literally, "O descendant of Abū Turāb" ("father of dust," "dustman"). This was a name given contemptuously to 'Alī by his enemies, but it was later interpreted as an honorific and legends developed on this theme. Cf. *EI*², "'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib" (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah[49]—Ayyūb b. 'Umar b. Abī 'Amr[50]—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Zuhrī: When Zayd b. 'Alī went to Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, his chamberlain (ḥājib)[51] informed the caliph that Zayd was there. Hishām went up to a long upper chamber of his, and then allowed Zayd in. He ordered a servant to walk behind Zayd and told this man not to let Zayd see him and to listen to what Zayd said. (The servant said): "I followed Zayd up the stairs. He was stout and he stopped on some of the stairs and said: 'By God, anyone who loves this world will be humiliated.'" When Zayd came to Hishām, the latter met Zayd's demands and Zayd departed for al-Kūfah.[52] Hishām forgot to ask the servant what had happened until a few days had elapsed. Then Hishām inquired and the servant told him. Hishām turned to al-Abrash,[53] who said: "By God, may the first news that reaches you be that of his removal!" That was the first news to reach Hishām, and it happened as al-Abrash had said it would.

It was reported that Zayd took an oath on some matter before [1676] Hishām, who said to him: "I don't believe you." Zayd replied: "O Commander of the Faithful, God does not make it a prerequisite that He should be pleased with someone in order to elevate him nor does He make His displeasure a reason for bringing him low."[54] Hishām said to him: "I have heard that you are thinking of the caliphate and wanting it; but you will not obtain it, since you are the son of a slave girl." Zayd replied: "I have an answer for you, O Commander of the Faithful." Hishām said: "Speak." Zayd went on: "Nobody is closer to God nor more exalted in rank with Him than a prophet whom He has sent. Ismā'īl was amongst

---

49. Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah al-Numayrī (d. 264/877), historian and muḥaddith. Cf. Sezgin, I, 345; Rosenthal, 386.

50. 'Umar in the text. The editor later corrects it in Introductio, p. DCCX.

51. On the office of ḥājib, cf. EI[2], s.v. (D. Sourdel).

52. An important garrison town (miṣr) in early Islamic times. For a further discussion of al-Kūfah, cf. n. 221 and n. 233.

53. Al-Abrash Sa'īd b. al-Walīd al-Kalbī. For stories about his dealings with Hishām, cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, I, 74, 148; II, 124; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, II, 121; X, 62; al-Jahshiyārī, 37.

54. Zayd is presumably implying that just because Hishām is caliph, God is not necessarily pleased with him. Cf. Shaykh al-Mufīd, 404; Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 67. Al-Mas'ūdī has "No one is too high or too humble to dispense with fearing God" (Murūj, V, 468).

the best of the prophets and was the ancestor of the best of them, Muḥammad. Ismā'īl was the son of a slave girl and his brother was born of a pure woman, just as you were; but God chose Ismā'īl in preference to his brother and caused the best of mankind to come forth from him and no one disputes that. A man whose ancestor was the Prophet of God should not therefore be ignored, whoever his mother was." Then Hishām said to him: "Get out." Zayd said: "I am leaving and you will not see me (again) except where you do not want to see me." Sālim[55] said to him: "O Abū Ḥusayn, this is certainly not what is expected of you."

The account now goes back to the narrative of Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—Abū Mikhnaf: The Shī'īs[56] began to rally behind Zayd and to put pressure on him to rebel, saying: "We hope that you will be al-Manṣūr[57] and that this will be the time when the Banū Umayyah will perish." Zayd stayed in al-Kūfah and Yūsuf b. 'Umar began asking questions about him and was told that Zayd was there. Yūsuf sent a message to Zayd asking him to leave. Zayd said that he would do so, but he made the excuse that he was ill and he delayed a good while. Then Yūsuf asked about Zayd again, and he was told that he was still living in [1677] al-Kūfah and that he had not gone away. Yūsuf sent a message to Zayd, urging him to come in person. Zayd fobbed him off with the excuse that he had things to buy and he told Yūsuf that he was preparing himself (for the journey). Zayd now realized how persistent was Yūsuf's interest in him, so he got ready and went as far as al-Qādisiyyah.[58]

Some sources say that Yūsuf sent a messenger with Zayd who took him as far as 'Uthayb.[59] The Shī'īs joined him there and said

---

55. This is probably a reference to Sālim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, Hishām's kātib, who was in charge of the dīwān al-rasā'il. The Leiden index differentiates between Sālim the kātib and another Sālim, the mawlā of the 'Anbasah. For a clear discussion of the names and identity of Sālim, cf. Grignasci, 12–13.

56. Cf. a similar account in Ibn A'tham, VIII, 110–11.

57. "The one to whom victory is given." Cf. n. 206.

58. Two towns bear this name. This is a reference to the large hamlet five leagues west of al-Kūfah, the first stage on the road to Mecca. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 76, 83.

59. 'Uthayb was 6 mīls (12 km) from al-Qādisiyyah and was a fortified place in the desert. Cf. Ibn Rustah, 202.

to him: "Why are you leaving us, when you have 100,000 men of al-Kūfah fighting on your side tomorrow with their swords and there is only a small number of Syrians against you? Even if one of our tribes like Madhḥij or Hamdān or Tamīm or Bakr joined them, there would still be enough men for you to deal with them if God Almighty wills it so. We implore you by God to come back." They kept on urging Zayd until they brought him back to al-Kūfah.[60]

Accounts other than that of Abū Mikhnaf come from 'Ubayd b. Jannād—'Aṭā' b. Muslim: When Zayd b. 'Alī went to see Yūsuf, Yūsuf said to him: "Khālid has claimed that he has entrusted money to you." Zayd said: "How would anyone who cursed my ancestors from his pulpit entrust money to me?" Then Yūsuf sent a messenger to Khālid and the latter came to him wearing a cloak ('abāh). Yūsuf said: "This is Zayd. You have alleged that you deposited money with him and he has denied it." Khālid looked at both of them, and then he said (to Yūsuf): "Do you want to add to your crime against me a crime against this man? How would I entrust money to him when I curse him and his ancestors from the pulpit?" Yūsuf cursed him and sent him away.

Abū 'Ubaydah's account is as follows: Hishām believed Zayd [1678] and the other men against whom Yūsuf had made accusations and he sent them to Yūsuf. Hishām said: "They have sworn oaths to me and I have accepted their oaths and have pronounced them innocent in regard to the money. I have sent them to you only so that you may bring them and Khālid together so that they may prove him a liar." Then Hishām gave them presents.

When they came to see Yūsuf, he received them hospitably and treated them well. He sent for Khālid, who was duly brought in. Yūsuf said to Khālid: "These people have sworn oaths and this is the letter from the Commander of the Faithful exonerating them. Do you have any proof about what you have alleged?" Khālid had no proof, and the men said to him: "What made you do what you did? Khālid said: "Yūsuf tortured me severely and I made the allegation that I made, hoping that God would give me relief before you arrived."[61] Then Yūsuf released them. The two men of 60. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 135.

61. Cf. Fragmenta, 94–95.

Quraysh, the Jumaḥī and the Makhzūmī, went to Medina and the two Hāshimīs, Dāwūd b. ʿAlī and Zayd b. ʿAlī, stayed behind in al-Kūfah.

It was reported that Zayd stayed in al-Kūfah for a period of four or five months. Yūsuf then ordered him to leave and wrote to his agent (ʿāmil)[62] in al-Kūfah—Yūsuf being at that time in al-Ḥīrah[63]—ordering him to harass Zayd. Zayd said that he was in litigation with some of the family of Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh[64] about money in Medina. Yūsuf's agent wrote to him about this and Yūsuf let Zayd stay on a few days. Then the news reached Yūsuf that the Shīʿīs were rallying to Zayd. So Yūsuf wrote to his agent saying: "Send Zayd away and don't allow him to stay any longer. If he asserts that he is in litigation, then let him appoint an agent and choose a trustee to take his place in the legal proceedings." A group of people, amongst whom were Salamah b. Kuhayl, Naṣr b. Khuzaymah al-ʿAbsī, Muʿāwiyah b. Isḥāq b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah al-Anṣārī, Ḥujayyah b. al-Akhlaj al-Kindī,[65] and other Kūfan leaders, had given Zayd the oath of allegiance. [1679]

When Dāwūd b. ʿAlī discovered this, he said to Zayd: "Cousin, don't let these men make you delude yourself, for you should learn a lesson from the members of your family and the way in which these people (the Kūfans) let them down." Zayd said: "Dāwūd, the Umayyads have been inordinately proud and pitiless." Dāwūd continued speaking (to Zayd) in this way until Zayd decided to leave (al-Kūfah) and they both went as far as al-Qādisiyyah.

According to Abū ʿUbaydah: The Kūfans followed Zayd to al-Thaʿlabiyyah[66] and they said to him: "We are forty thousand. If

---

62. For this term, which was used for a variety of government officials, including the governor of a province and the director of finances in a provincial centre, cf. *EI*², s.v. (A. A. Duri).

63. Al-Ḥīrah, situated close to the Euphrates and to the southeast of present-day Najaf, was the center of Lakhmid power in the late Sasanian period. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 75; *EI*², s.v. (I. Shahid).

64. One of the Companions of the Prophet. Cf. *EI*¹, s.v. (G. Levi della Vida).

65. The text has al-Akhlaj. This is emended by the editor to al-Ajlaḥ (Introductio, p. DCCX).

66. A town on the road from Iraq to Mecca, between Biṭāniyyah and Khuzaymiyyah. In ʿAbbāsid times it was one-third of the route from Baghdad to Mecca. Cf. Ibn Rustah, 204.

you return to al-Kūfah everyone will join you." They made covenants with him and swore inviolable oaths. Then Zayd began to remonstrate: "I am afraid that you will desert me and hand me over, as you did with my father and grandfather." So they swore further oaths to him (that they would not desert him). Then Dāwūd b. 'Alī said: "Cousin! These men will let you down! Did they not desert someone who was dearer to them than you, your great-grandfather 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, so that he was killed? Then they gave the oath of allegiance to al-Ḥasan[67]; after that they attacked him, snatched his cloak from round his neck, plundered his tent, and wounded him. Moreover, did they not force your grandfather al-Ḥusayn to rebel? They made binding oaths to him, then they deserted and abandoned him and were not satisfied until they had killed him. So don't do it and don't go back (to al-Kūfah) with them." Then the Kūfans said: "This man doesn't want you to be victorious. He is claiming that he and the members of his family are more entitled to this authority than you."
[1680] Zayd b. 'Alī said to Dāwūd: "'Alī had Mu'āwiyah,[68] with his sagacity and cunning,[69] and the Syrians fighting against him and al-Ḥusayn had Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah[70] fighting against him, and the situation went in their favor." Dāwūd said: "I am afraid that if you go back with them nobody will be more violent toward you than they will be, but you know best." Then Dāwūd went to Medina and Zayd returned to al-Kūfah.

According to 'Ubayd b. Jannād—'Aṭā' b. Muslim al-Khaffāf: Hishām wrote to Yūsuf telling him to send Zayd to his own town, since whenever he lived in any other town and summoned his followers they responded to his call. So Yūsuf sent him away and when he had got as far as al-Tha'labiyyah or al-Qādisiyyah, the wretches, that is, the Kūfans, caught up with him, brought him back (to al-Kūfah), and gave the oath of allegiance to him. Salamah b. Kuhayl[71] came to him and asked permission to see him.

---

67. The Prophet's grandson. Cf. the genealogical table of the 'Alids.

68. The first Umayyad caliph, who ruled from 41 to 60 (661–80).

69. Bi-dahā'ihi wa-nakhrā'ihi. The two words are synonyms. Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, III, 715.

70. The second Umayyad caliph, who ruled from 60 to 64 (680–83). During his reign (in 61/680) the Prophet's grandson, al-Ḥusayn, was martyred at Karbalā'.

71. For the conversation between Salamah and Zayd, cf. also Fragmenta, 95–96.

This he was allowed to do. He mentioned Zayd's kinship with the Prophet of God and his rightful claim and he spoke well. Zayd replied and he too spoke well. Then Salamah said to him: "Give me permission to speak frankly." Zayd said: "God forbid that the likes of you should ask the likes of me for permission to speak." Salamah only wanted his companions to hear that. Then Zayd said: "You can go ahead." Salamah said: "I beseech you, by God! How many people have given the oath of allegiance to you?" Zayd replied: "Forty thousand." Salamah went on: "How many gave the oath of allegiance to your grandfather?" and Zayd replied "Eighty thousand." Then Salamah inquired: "How many remained with him?" and Zayd said "Three hundred." Then Salamah said: "I adjure you by God, is it you or your grandfather who is the better man?" and Zayd answered: "My grandfather." Then Salamah asked: "Who are the better men, the companions with whom you have rebelled or the companions with whom your grandfather rebelled?" Zayd replied: "The companions with [1681] whom my grandfather rebelled." Salamah said: "Do you expect that these men will keep faith with you when those men acted treacherously with your grandfather?"

Zayd said: "They have given the oath of allegiance to me and the oath of allegiance is binding on me and them." Thereupon Salamah said: "Will you allow me to leave the town?" Zayd asked "Why?" Salamah responded: "I cannot guarantee that if anything happens to you I could control myself."[72] Zayd said: "I grant you permission (to leave)". Salamah then went to al-Yamāmah[73] and Zayd rebelled, was killed, and was put on a cross. Hishām wrote to Yūsuf blaming him for allowing Salamah b. Kuhayl to leave al-Kūfah, saying, "Salamah's staying (in al-Kūfah) would have been better for you than your having such-and-such a number of cavalry with you."

According to 'Umar—Abū Isḥāq—a shaykh of the people of Iṣfahān: 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan wrote to Zayd b. 'Alī as follows:

> Cousin! The Kūfans are puffed up with wind on the outside and weak inside. They are loud when circumstances are easy

72. Lā amliku nafsī. Fragmenta, 96, has lā ahliku nafsī ("I would not destroy myself").

73. District of Central Arabia. Cf. EI[1], s.v. (A. Grohmann).

and impatient when you meet them. Their tongues go ahead of them but their hearts do not accompany them. They do not spend their nights preparing for possible misfortunes nor will they bring about a hoped-for change of government. They have sent me a succession of letters inviting me, but I have remained deaf to their summons and in sheer despair and rejection of them have draped my heart with a cloth so as not to remember them. There is no way to describe them except in the words of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib: "If you are left to your own devices you rush in (recklessly). If you are attacked, [1682] you collapse. When people gather round an imām you join in (but) once you have answered the call to rebel, you (then) beat a retreat."[74]

It was related that Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik wrote to Yūsuf b. 'Umar about Zayd b. 'Alī as follows:[75]

Now to our topic. You know what love the Kūfans feel for the members of this family. You know that the Kūfans have placed them in positions where they should not be, because they have made obedience to them an obligation on themselves. They have put them in charge of the statutes of their religion and they have falsely attributed to them a knowledge of what is to come, until, thanks to the fragmented state of the community, they have brought them to a situation in which they have incited them to rebel. Zayd b. 'Alī came to the Commander of the Faithful on the matter of the lawsuit of 'Umar b. al-Walīd, and the Commander of the Faithful settled the matter between them. The Commander of the Faithful found Zayd argumentative, eloquent, able to embellish and mold speech, and to attract men by the sweetness of his tongue. (Zayd achieved this) by virtue of the many solutions in arguments and the sharp, forceful (verbal) attacks he produces against his opponent to obtain victory. Send him quickly to the Ḥijāz[76] and do not let him stay with you. For if the people lend him their ears, so that he fills them, because of the softness of his speech and the sweetness of his diction as well as the appeal of his kinship with the Prophet of God, he will find the Kūfans inclined toward him, their hearts not [1683] slow, their minds[77] far from tranquil, and their religious oaths no longer honored.

74. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 241. Parts of this are susceptible to more than one interpretation. The meaning of ṭa'antum is especially difficult. However, in view of the fact that the other parts of 'Alī's statements are in the form of sharp contrasts, ṭa'ana has been translated as "to join in" (Cf. Lane, I, 1855). Other possible translations would include "you defame (him)" or even "you go away." (Cf. Lane, loc. cit.).

75. Al-Balādhurī has a shorter version of this letter from Hishām to Yūsuf. Al-Balādhurī attributes the letter to Sālim (Ansāb, 238).

I would rather take repressive measures against Zayd which will harm him, and send him away and cast him off, thereby ensuring communal safety, the prevention of bloodshed, and security against division, than see a situation in which their (the people's) blood is shed, discord is spread amongst them, and their offspring cut down.[78] Communal unity is God's firm covenant, true obedience to Him and His most secure support.[79] So I am leaving the leaders of the Kūfans to you. Threaten them with flogging and confiscation of their wealth, and those of them who have any contract or covenant (with me) will be slow to join up with Zayd. The only people who will be swift to rally to him, delighting in strife, will be the rabble, the masses, people impelled by dire need and those who are in league with Satan and who have been enslaved by him. So threaten them publicly, lash them with your whip and unsheath your sword amongst them. Terrorize the leaders before those of middle rank and those of middle rank before the common people. Know that you stand at the door that leads to union, that you are summoning the people to obedience, that you are promoting unity and doing your utmost to maintain God's covenant. So do not flinch from their large numbers but make as your stronghold in [1684] which you take refuge, and as your hiding place from which you emerge, your trust in your Lord, your zeal for your religion, your desire to preserve communal unity, and your

76. The northwestern part of the Arabian peninsula. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (G. Rentz).
77. Aḥlāmuhum. Cf. Qur'ān 52, v. 32.
78. Qaṭ'u naslihim. It is possible that the phrase has to do with qaṭ'u raḥmihi ("the severing of the ties of kinship"). Cf. Freytag, 509.
79. Cf. Qur'ān 2, v. 255.

hostility and animosity toward anyone who wants to break down this door through which God has commanded us to enter.

Indeed, the Commander of the Faithful has exonerated Zayd and has pronounced judgment, decreeing indemnity for him. Zayd's only chance of claiming a right that is his and of saying that he has been deprived of his own portion, either as permanent booty (fay')[80] or as a gratuity for those related to him is, as the Commander of the Faithful fears, by causing the rabble to undertake something that would probably make them more wretched and misguided (i.e., rebellion). (The exonerating of Zayd) makes them more secure, (makes) the Commander of the Faithful stronger, and makes it easier for him to protect and preserve true religion.[81] For he does not want to see in his community a disruptive situation which could become the reason for their punishment and perdition. Therefore, he will consider long and carefully and will prepare himself to make the right decision; he will steer them away from the abodes of fear, draw them toward right paths, and turn them away from places of perdition, just as a tender father does with his child or a kind shepherd with his flock.

Know that a means to gain the upper hand over them and to render yourself worthy of assistance from God, if they do disobey, is to meet their demands in full, to give money to their children, and to forbid your army to attack their women [1685] and their houses. So seize the chance to please God on the path on which He has placed you. There is no sin more quickly punished than injustice; the devil has ensnared these people and led them astray toward it and has guided them to it. He who sets his face against injustice approaches most closely to infallibility. The Commander of the Faithful calls on God for help against these people and against his other subjects of like mind, and he calls on his God and his Lord and his Friend to set to rights that which is corrupt in them and to bring them speedily to salvation and deliverance. Verily He is the Listener, the One near at hand.

---

80. In pre-Islamic times a term used for chattels taken as booty. For its usage in the early Islamic period, cf. *EI*², s.v. (F. Løkkegaard).

81. This passage is discussed at length in Appendix I.

The narrative returns to the account of Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī):[82] Zayd returned to al-Kūfah and went into hiding. When he wanted to go back to al-Kūfah, Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib said to him: "May God grant you wisdom, O Zayd, when you rejoin your people. Do not accept the word of any of those who are inviting you to do as they suggest, for they will not keep faith with you." However, Zayd did not accept that advice from him and returned to al-Kūfah.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf: When Zayd returned to al-Kūfah, the Shī'īs came rallying round him and gave the oath of allegiance to him, until his register numbered fifteen thousand men. Zayd stayed in al-Kūfah some ten months, although he was in al-Baṣrah for about two months of that period and then he came to al-Kūfah where he stayed.[83] He sent men to the people of the Sawād[84] and of al-Mawṣil inviting them to join him.

When Zayd came to al-Kūfah, he married the daughter of Ya'qūb b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī, one of the Banū Farqad, and he also married the daughter of 'Abdallāh b. Abī al-'Anbas al-Azdī. The reason for his marrying her was as follows:[85] her mother, Umm [1686]
'Amr, daughter of al-Ṣalt, was of the Shī'ī persuasion. She heard where Zayd was and she went to greet him. She was a corpulent, good-looking, fleshy woman who was already getting on in years, although she did not look her age. When she went in to see Zayd b. 'Alī and greeted him, he thought that she was a young woman. She chatted to him and she was the most eloquent of people and most beautiful in appearance. Zayd asked her about her lineage and she told him about it and she informed him who her family were. Zayd then said to her: "May God's mercy be upon you, how would you like to marry me?" She said to him: "By God, may He have mercy on you, you are the one I would like to marry, if I were in a position to do so." Zayd rejoined: "What prevents you from doing so?" She said: "What prevents me from doing so is that I am too old." Zayd said to her: "Not at all! I am satisfied.

82. Cf. p. 13.

83. Al-Balādhurī's account is clearer: "He stayed in al-Kūfah about ten months and went to al-Baṣrah and stayed there for two months" (Ansāb, 237). Cf. also al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 135.

84. The alluvial plain of southern Iraq. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 24.

85. This anecdote is also given by Ibn A'tham, VIII, 112.

You are far from being too old."[86] She said: "May God have mercy on you! I know myself better than you do and I know better what time has done for me. If I were to marry one day, I would not prefer anyone else to you. But I do have a daughter, whose father was my paternal cousin and who is more beautiful than I am. I will give her to you in marriage, if you like." He said to her: "I will be satisfied if she is like you." She said: "Her Creator and Maker was not content to make her like me, so He made her whiter, more good-looking, more corpulent, and finer than me in coquettishness and form." Zayd laughed and said to her: "You have been blessed with your full share of eloquence and fine speaking. How does her eloquence compare with yours?" She said: "I am not sure about that, because I grew up in the Ḥijāz and [1687] my daughter grew up in al-Kūfah, so I don't know. Perhaps my daughter speaks as the Kūfans do." Zayd said: "I don't object to that." Then he arranged a meeting with her, came to her, and contracted a marriage with her. Then he went in to her. She bore him a daughter, after which she died. As for Zayd, he was madly in love with her.

Zayd b. 'Alī lived in various houses in al-Kūfah:[87] in his wife's house with the Azd on one occasion, with his Sulamī sons-in-law on another occasion, once with Naṣr b. Khuzaymah from the Banū 'Abs, and once with the Banū Ghubar. Then he moved from the Banū Ghubar to the house of Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq b. Ḥārithah al-Anṣārī at the far end of the Jabbānah of Sālim al-Salūlī.[88] He also lived with the Banū Nahd[89] and the Banū Taghlib near the mosque of the Banū Hilāl b. 'Āmir. He remained there, receiving the oath of allegiance from his followers. The oath of allegiance

86. An alternative translation might be: "I would be satisfied, as long as (mā) I could keep you (ub'iduki) from growing old."

87. For the subsequent accounts of Zayd's revolt in al-Kūfah, the researches of Massignon and Djaït are invaluable in clarifying the topography and tribal organization of the town.

88. There were a number of jabbānāt at al-Kūfah. Massignon translates jabbānah as "tribal cemetery," but states that such open spaces were used for public ceremonies and for mobilizing troops ("Explication," 347–48). Djaït plausibly suggests that the jabbānah was not a cemetery but a space used for public prayer on special occasions and also for mobilizing the tribesmen (Yamanites, 176–77). The Jabbānah Sālim al-Salūlī mentioned here belonged to the Banū 'Āmir of Qays (cf. Massignon, loc. cit.).

89. Ibn al-Athīr has the Banū Hind (Kāmil, V, 177).

which he made with the people was as follows:[90] "We summon you to the Book of God and the sunnah[91] of His Prophet, and to wage war against those who act tyrannically, to defend those who have been oppressed,[92] to give pensions to those who have been deprived of them, to distribute this booty (fay') equally amongst those who are entitled to it, to make restitution to those who have been wronged, to bring home those who have been detained on the frontiers, and to help the ahl al-bayt[93] against those who have opposed us and disregard our just cause. Do you swear allegiance on that basis?" If they said "Yes," Zayd would place his hand on theirs[94] and he would say: "The pledge, treaty, and covenant of God and the covenant of His Prophet are upon you so that you keep your allegiance to me, fight my enemy, and act in good faith toward me both secretly and publicly." If they said "Yes," Zayd would rub his hand on their hands[95] and would say: "May [1688] God be our witness." The situation remained like this for some ten months. When the time for his uprising drew near, he ordered his followers to make their preparations. Those who wanted to keep faith and rebel with him began to get ready and his activities became widely known amongst the people.

In this year Naṣr b. Sayyār[96] raided Transoxiana twice, then he raided it a third time[97] and killed Kūrṣūl.[98]

---

90. Versions of this oath are given by Ibn A'tham (VIII, 113) and al-Balādhurī (Ansāb, 237–38).

91. Muḥammad's sunnah comprises his deeds, sayings, and unspoken approval. Cf. EI[1], s.v. (A. J. Wensinck).

92. Cf. Qur'ān 28, vv. 4–5.

93. The family of the Prophet.

94. Literally, "on his hand."

95. Again the plural has been used here for consistency.

96. The last Umayyad governor of Khurāsān, appointed by Hishām in 120 (738).

97. It is likely that these three campaigns were spread out over a number of years (121–23/739–41); cf. Gabrieli, Califfato, 66.

98. For the career of Kūrṣūl, a Türgesh leader, cf. Gibb, 85, 91. Gibb believes that al-Ṭabarī's narrative here, which attributes the capture of Kurṣūl to Naṣr b. Sayyār, is later Muslim glorification of Arab achievements. He adds that if Kūrṣūl is to be identified with Bagha Ṭarkhān, he was executed by the Chinese in 126 (744). Gabrieli accepts al-Ṭabarī's account (Califfato, 66 ff.).

The Raids of Naṣr b. Sayyār[99]

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—his shaykhs: Naṣr raided Transoxiana from Balkh[100] in the region of the Gate of Iron,[101] then he returned to Marw[102] and delivered the following sermon (khuṭbah):

> Verily, Bahrāmsīs[103] was the protector of the Magians (majūs); he favored them, protected them and put their burdens[104] on the Muslims. Verily, Ashbdād son of Gregory was the protector of the Christians, just as Aqiva the Jew protected the Jews. But I am the protector of the Muslims. I will defend them and shield them and make the polytheists carry their burdens. Nothing less than the full amount of the kharāj[105] as written and recorded will be accepted by me. I have placed Manṣūr b. 'Umar b. Abī al-Kharqā as agent ('āmil) over you and I have ordered him to act justly toward you. If there is a man amongst you who is a Muslim and from whom jizyah has been levied, or who has been charged an excessive amount of kharāj, thus lightening the burden for the poly-> [1689] theists, then let him raise that with Manṣūr b. 'Umar so that he may take the burden away from the Muslim and impose it on the polytheist.

By the following Friday, Manṣūr had dealt with thirty thousand Muslims who had been paying the jizyah and eighty thousand

---

99. For the activities of Naṣr b. Sayyār in Central Asia, cf. Gibb, 88–99; van Vloten, 71–72; Wellhausen, 473–86; Gabrieli, Califfato, 27–70.

100. A city now in Afghanistan. According to al-Ya'qūbī, Balkh was the greatest city of Khurāsān (Buldān, trans. by G. Wiet, 100). Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 420–22.

101. Bāb al-Ḥadīd, the famous "Iron Gate," two marches to the north of Hāshimjird. This defile in the mountains was the thoroughfare between Samarqand and India. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 441–42.

102. Marw al-Shāhijān, the important city of medieval Khurāsān. The epithet al-Shāhijān was used to distinguish it from Marw al-Rūd. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 397–403; *EI*², s.v. (A. Yakubovski-C. E. Bosworth).

103. Bahrāmsīs had been appointed Marzubān of Marw by Muslim b. Sa'īd al-Kilābī in 105 (723–24). It was Muslim's policy to appoint officials acceptable to the Persians. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1462.

104. I.e. taxation.

105. It is difficult to define exactly the use of such terms as kharāj and jizyah in this period and area. Cf. Van Vloten, 72; *EI*², "Kharādj" (Cl. Cahen).

polytheists[106] who had been exempted from the jizyah. He imposed the jizyah on the polytheists and removed it from the Muslims. Then he readjusted the kharāj, allocating it properly, and reassessed the amount (of tribute) payable in accordance with the peace treaty (ṣulḥ). In the time of the Umayyads, the revenues of Marw amounted to one hundred thousand dirhams, not including the kharāj.[107]

Naṣr b. Sayyār made a second raid to Waraghsar[108] and Samarqand[109] and returned to Marw. He then went out on a raid from Marw a third time, to al-Shāsh,[110] but Kūrṣūl, accompanied by fifteen thousand men, prevented him from fording the river, which was the river at al-Shāsh. Kūrṣūl was paying each of his men per month one piece of silk, which at that time was worth twenty-five dirhams. The two armies remained a bowshot apart and Kūrṣūl prevented Naṣr from crossing to al-Shāsh. Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj was at that time in Turkish territory and he had come with the Turks[111] and was positioned opposite Naṣr. He shot a short arrow at Naṣr who was sitting on his litter (sarīr)[112] on the river bank. The arrow hit a servant of Naṣr's in the side of the mouth while he was performing Naṣr's ablutions. Naṣr got down from his litter and shot an arrow at a horse belonging to one of the Syrians and it fell dead.

---

106. Literally, "Thirty thousand Muslims who had been paying the jizyah and eighty thousand polytheists who had been exempted from the jizyah came to him."

107. For a clear summary of the preceding fiscal situation in Khurāsān and of this celebrated tax reform introduced by Naṣr b. Sayyār, cf. Hawting, 106. Cf. also Wellhausen, 477–82; Gabrieli, Califfato, 68. Here Naṣr established that all cultivators of taxable land, whatever their religious affiliation, would be liable to pay land tax (kharāj) and that non-Muslims only would pay poll tax (jizyah).

108. A large village between Banjīkath and Samarqand. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 465, 467.

109. For this important Central Asian city, cf. EI[1], s.v. (H. H. Schaeder).

110. Nowadays Tashkent. The medieval city of al-Shāsh lay to the west of Farghānah, on the right bank of the Jaxartes. It was the greatest of the Arab towns beyond the Jaxartes. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 480–82.

111. In 116 (734) al-Ḥārith b. Surayj from the Banū Tamīm had led a revolt of Arabs and Soghdian mawlās against the Umayyads and in support of the rights of the mawlās (non-Arab Muslims). Al-Ḥārith was willing to collaborate with the Türgesh with whom he eventually took refuge. Cf. Gibb, 76–85; Hawting, 86–88, 107–09; Shaban, 'Abbāsid revolution, 118–22; EI[2], s.v. (M. J. Kister).

112. For the meanings of sarīr, cf. Sadan, 32–41.

[1690] Then Kūrṣūl crossed with forty men and made a night raid on Naṣr's camp, driving away some sheep which belonged to the people of Bukhārā. (This was possible because) the Bukhārans were at the rear and it was a dark night when Kūrṣūl went round the camp. Naṣr had with him men from Bukhārā, Samarqand, Kish,[113] and Ushrūsanah[114] and they numbered twenty thousand. Naṣr made the following proclamation to his tribal units:[115] "Let nobody leave his tent; hold firm to your positions."

'Āsim b. 'Umayr, who was in charge of the jund[116] of the people of Samarqand, was outside (the camp) when the army of Kūrṣūl passed. The Turks had shouted (as they went) and the people in the camp thought that the Turks had all crossed (the river).[117] Then still more of Kūrṣūl's troops passed by, and 'Āsim attacked the last of these. He captured a man who was one of their kings and the lord of four thousand tents (qubbah), and they took him to Naṣr. He was an old man who had a lifetime of fighting[118] behind him. He was wearing brocade gaiters with rings of metal in them and a silk qabā' hemmed with brocade. Naṣr asked him who he was and he told Naṣr that he was Kūrṣūl. Naṣr said to him: "Praise be to God who has enabled us to get hold of you, you enemy of God!" Kūrṣūl said: "What do you hope for by killing an old man? I will give you one thousand Turkish camels[119] and one thousand draft horses[120] with which to strengthen your army. So let me go." Naṣr asked the Syrians and the Khurāsānīs around him for their opinion and they said that he should let Kūrṣūl go. Then Naṣr asked Kūrṣūl: "How old are you?" He said: "I do not know." Naṣr said: "How many raids have you made?" and Kūrṣūl answered, "Seventy-two." Naṣr said: "Were you present at the

---

113. Kiss in the text. This should be identified as Kish (or Kishsh), which was later called Shahr-i Sabz and lies to the south of Samarqand. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 469.

114. The province of Ushrūsanah lay to the east of Samarqand. There was a city of the same name. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 474–76.

115. Akhmās, plural of khums ("fifths"). From 50 (670), Arab tribal settlements were divided into quarters or fifths. Cf. Crone, 31.

116. A regular regiment of soldiers under a qā'id. Cf. Crone, 38.

117. The sequence of events in this passage is rather obscure.

118. Literally, "who had trailed his coat of mail for a (life-) span."

119. Ibn al-Athīr (V, 177) has four thousand camels.

120. Birdhawn: the heavy Persian warhorse.

Day of Thirst (Yawm al-'Atash)?" [121] and Kūrṣūl said: "Yes." [1691] Naṣr said: "Even if you were to give me everything on which the sun rises, you would not escape me now that you have said that you were present at that battle." Naṣr said to 'Āsim b. 'Umayr al-Sughdī: "Get up, disarm and seize him." When Kūrṣūl realized that he was going to be killed, he said: "Who was it who took me prisoner?" Naṣr said laughing: "Yazīd b. Qurran al-Ḥanẓalī"[122] and he pointed to him. Kūrṣūl said: "He can't wash his backside properly"—or, according to another report, he said: "He cannot stop his urine,"[123]—"so how could he have taken me prisoner? Tell me who it really was who captured me, for I am worth killing seven times." He was then told that it was 'Āsim b. 'Umayr. Kūrṣūl said: "I will not feel the pain of death if the person who took me prisoner is a (true) Bedouin horseman." Then Naṣr killed him and crucified him upon the river bank. (The narrator said): 'Āsim b. Umayr, who had the sobriquet al-Hazārmard,[124] was killed at Nihāwand[125] in the lifetime of Qaḥṭabah.[126]

When Kūrṣūl was killed, the Turks were in disarray.[127] They went to his quarters and burnt them. They cut their ears and tore the skin on their faces[128] and began weeping over him. When evening came and Naṣr wanted to leave he sent someone to Kūrṣūl with a bottle of naphtha (naft), which he poured over him. He then set fire to the body lest people should take away his bones.

---

121. The defeat of Muslim b. Sa'īd al-Kilābī and the Arab troops in 106 (724) by the Türgesh and rebel Soghdians was called "The Day of Thirst." It was a major military disaster for the Arabs. Cf. Gibb, 64–67; Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 106–07; al-Ṭabarī, II, 1480.

122. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1569.

123. These expressions denote contempt at a man's lack of manly qualities in war. Cf. Gloss., p. CXLIV.

124. The word denotes either "having one thousand men under him" or "as strong as one thousand men." A number of other warriors were given this epithet. Cf. F. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 128.

125. Nihāwand was a city some forty miles south of Hamadān. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 196–97.

126. Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb al-Ṭā'ī was appointed by the imām Ibrāhīm as military commander of the Hāshimiyyah. Qaḥṭabah and his son defeated the Umayyad forces at Nihāwand in Dhū al-Qa'dah 131 (June 22–July 22, 749). Cf. Wellhausen, 540; al-Ṭabarī, III, 7–8.

127. Takhaddarū: cf. Gloss., p. CCXIV.

128. Wa-jarradū wujūhahum. Nöldeke prefers a variant in the apparatus: wa-khadadū wujūhahum. Cf. Gloss., p. CCXIV.

(The narrator commented): This action upset the people more than Kūrṣūl's killing. Then Naṣr went up to Farghānah[129] and took from there thirty thousand captives.

[1692] According to 'Anbar b. Bur'umah al-Azdī: Yūsuf b. 'Umar wrote to Naṣr as follows: "Go to the man who has fixed himself in al-Shāsh,"[130] meaning al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. "If God gives you victory over him and the people of al-Shāsh, lay waste their country and take their children captive, but take care not to get into a situation from which the Muslims cannot extricate themselves."[131] Naṣr called the people, read the letter to them and asked them their opinion. Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn said: "Fulfill the decree of the Commander of the Faithful and the order of the amīr (i.e., Yūsuf)." Naṣr said: "Yaḥyā, in the time of 'Āsim you said something[132] which reached the caliph and you obtained favor by that. He increased your salary, he gave stipends to the members of your family, and you achieved high rank. So you said to yourself: 'Why don't I say the same thing now?' Off you go, Yaḥyā. I have appointed you as my advance party." The people went up to Yaḥyā and reproached him. Naṣr then said: "What disaster[133] could be worse than that we should have to travel while they (the enemy) can stay where they are?" Then he went to al-Shāsh and al-Ḥārith b. Surayj came to him and set up two 'arrādahs[134] against the Banū Tamīm. When he was told that they were the Banū Tamīm,[135] he moved the 'arrādahs and set them up against the Azd.—Another report said that it was against Bakr b. Wā'il.

---

129. The city of Farghānah, otherwise known as Akhsīkath, lay on the north bank of the Jaxartes. There was a province of the same name. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 477, and map opposite p. 433.

130. Sir ilā hādhā al-ghāriz dhanabahu bi-al Shāsh (lit., "go to that one who sticks his tail in al-Shāsh"). Cf. the example aqāma bi-arḍinā wa-gharaza dhanabahu ("he stayed in our land and remained fixed"). Cf. Lane, I, 980.

131. Warṭat al-Muslimīn. Warṭah means literally slime or thin mud into which sheep or goats fall and from which they cannot extricate themselves. Cf. Lane, I, 2938.

132. In 106 (724) Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn al-Bakrī had advised 'Āṣim to stand firm against al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. Wellhausen describes him as "the most esteemed leader of the Bakr." Cf. Wellhausen, 467, 487.

133. Again the word used is warṭah. Naṣr is being sarcastic about the warning Yūsuf b. 'Umar has given him in his letter.

134. For a definition of 'arrādah and manjanīq, both medieval artillery machines, cf. EI[2], "'Arrādah" (C. Cahen).

135. I.e., al-Ḥārith's own people.

Al-Akhram, who was a Turkish horseman,[136] made a raid on them and the Muslims killed him, taking prisoner seven of his companions. Naṣr b. Sayyār ordered that al-Akhram's head should be shot amongst the enemy troops with a manjanīq. When they saw the head, they made a great din and fled in disarray. Naṣr went back and wanted to cross the river but he was prevented from doing so. Abū Numaylah Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbbār said:

When Naṣr returned after his absence, we felt [1693] like someone who watches a storm until the rain sheets down on him.
When it stopped, there abated with it a cold drenching climax[137] which threatened the destiny of the people.

Naṣr went and attacked Samarqand in the year in which he fought al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. Then the Bukhār Khudāh[138] fled to his protection. The Muslims had the garrison[139] in their possession, and with them were two of the dihqāns[140] of Bukhārā, who had accepted Islam from the hand of Naṣr.[141] These men had resolved to kill both Wāṣil b. ʿAmr al-Qaysī,[142] who was the agent (ʿāmil) of Bukhārā, and the Bukhār Khudāh. They accused the Bukhār Khudāh, whose name was Ṭughshādah,[143] of injustice.[144] The 136. For a discussion of al-Akhram, cf. Gibb, p. 91.

137. Awdā bi-ākhira minhu ʿāriḍun baridun. Nöldeke prefers the reading bi-Akhrama; cf. Add., p. DCCX. The Cairo edition of al-Ṭabarī (VII, 176) follows Nöldeke.

138. This episode, with similar details, is given by Narshakhī, 60–62. The Bukhār Khudāh was the local ruler of Bukhārā (ibid.).

139. Wa-kānat al-maslaḥah ʿalayhim wa-maʿahum dihqānān. The translation is only tentative. The meaning of maslaḥah is obscure in this context. Cf. Gloss., p. CCXCV. As well as an arms depot, the word can denote the task of protecting the roads. Another possibility is the translation "they were armed." If the word is translated as "garrison," it is still not clear whether the use of the third person masculine plural suffix refers to the Muslims or to the Bukhār Khudāh and his followers.

140. Dihqān: a local Persian landlord. Cf. Morony, 529.

141. Wa-kānā aslamā ʿalā yaday Naṣr, rendered by Frye in his translation of the similar passage in Narshakhī as "Both had accepted Islam from Naṣr." Cf. Narshakhī, 61.

142. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1528.

143. The text has Ṭūq Siyādah. This is corrected by the editor on the basis of his reading of Narshakhī to Ṭūq Shādah. Cf. Add., DCCX. A more likely reading is Tughshādah, as given by Gibb, 91.

144. He had seized their villages. Cf. Narshakhī, 61.

Bukhār Khudāh said to Naṣr: "May God bless the amīr. I have heard that the two of them have become Muslims in your presence, so why do they have daggers hanging on them?" So Naṣr said to the two dihqāns: "Why do you have daggers on you when you have become Muslims?" They said: "There is enmity between us and the Bukhār Khudāh, and we do not trust his intentions toward us." Naṣr gave orders to Hārūn b. al-Siyāwush, the mawlā[145] of the Banū Sulaym, who was in charge of the garrison,[146] and he seized the two men forcibly and removed their daggers.[147] The Bukhār Khudāh went up to Naṣr and spoke secretly to him about the two men. Then the two of them said: "We will die nobly." One of them attacked Wāṣil b. ʿAmr and stabbed him in the belly with a knife. Wāṣil struck him on the head with his sword, cleaving his skull, and killed him. The other (dihqān) [1694] went in search of the Bukhār Khudāh. Prayer commenced[148] and the Bukhār Khudāh remained seated on a chair.[149] Naṣr stood up, went into the tent, and summoned the Bukhār Khudāh. He tripped at the door of the tent and the dihqān stabbed him. Al-Jūzjān b. al-Jūzjān[150] attacked the dihqān, striking him with an iron rod he had with him, and killed him. The Bukhār Khudāh was picked up and taken into Naṣr's tent. Naṣr ordered a cushion for him and he leaned back against it. Qarʿah,[151] the physician, came to him and began treating him. The Bukhār Khudāh made his will before Naṣr and then died soon afterward. Wāṣil was buried in the tent and Naṣr prayed over him. As for Ṭughshādah, 145. Mawlā: a client or protégé. Cf. Morony, 532.

146. Al-rābiṭah is given as a synonym for al-maslaḥah. Cf. Gloss., p. CCLVI.

147. Qaṭaʿahumā: "he disarmed them." The words their daggers have been added, since in the following lines it is clear that the two dihqāns had other weapons on them.

148. Literally, "the iqāmah was performed." For the iqāmah, cf. I. K. A. Howard, "The Development of the Adhān and Iqāma of the Ṣalāt in Early Islam," 219–28.

149. Narshakhī adds, "He did not pray, for he was still an unbeliever in secret." Cf. Narshakhī, 61. For kursī, cf. Sadan, 123–37. Probably it was a stool, being more portable.

150. A dihqān who is mentioned in 116 (734) in the company of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1569.

151. The vocalization of this name is uncertain. This same doctor in 118 (736) cut out the tongue of Khidāsh and put out his eye. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1589.

they removed the flesh from him and took his bones to Bukhārā.[152]

Naṣr made for al-Shāsh and when he came to Ushrūsanah, its dihqān, Abārākharrah,[153] gave him money. Then Naṣr went on to al-Shāsh. He made Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Azdī agent[154] ('āmil) of Farghānah and despatched him there with ten people. Muḥammad sent back from Farghānah Jaysh's[155] brother and those *dihqān*s who were with him, both from al-Khuttal[156] and from other areas. He took away many idols from there and put them in Ushrūsanah.

Some sources said that when Naṣr came to al-Shāsh, the ruler, Qadīr,[157] received him, offering peace terms, a gift, and a pledge. Naṣr imposed on him the condition that he should expel al-Ḥārith b. Surayj from his town. He therefore sent him away to Fārāb.[158] Then Naṣr appointed as the agent ('āmil) of al-Shāsh [1695] Nīzak b. Ṣāliḥ, the mawlā of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. Naṣr moved on and came down to Qubā,[159] which is in the region of Farghānah. The people there had heard that Naṣr was coming, so they burned the grass and stored away the provisions.

In the remaining part of the year 121, Naṣr sent people to the walī 'ahd of the ruler of Farghānah[160] and they besieged him in one of its citadels. The Muslims were caught unprepared by the people in the citadel, who seized and drove away their horses and 152. For a bibliography on Zoroastrian burial customs, cf. Frye's n. 223 in his translation of Narshakhī, 141.

153. Abārākharahh in the text is corrected by the editor to Abārākharrah. Cf. Add., p. DCCX.

154. Al-Ṭabarī mentions this name here only.

155. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1593, 1618, where the form given is al-Jaysh.

156. The mountainous tract on the upper course of the Oxus, between the rivers Panj and Wakhshāb. The term was also vaguely applied to all lands of the infidel to the east and north of Khurāsān. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (C. E. Bosworth); Marquart, Ērānšahr, 299–303; Le Strange, Lands, 437–39.

157. Q.d.r.: the form of this name is unclear. In the apparatus it is suggested that the person may be B.d.r Ṭurkhān (cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1629). The editor later suggests another form, Tudun. Cf. Add., p. DCCX.

158. Fārāb: the city on the east bank of the Jaxartes, later known as Utrār. This city should not be confused with Fāryāb in Khurāsān. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 484–85.

159. A city in the province of Farghānah. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 24–25; Ibn Ḥawqal, 490.

160. Walī 'ahd: the appointed heir and successor. Ibn al-Athīr has walī ṣāḥib Farghānah (V, 179).

took a number of them captive. Then Naṣr sent them reinforcements from the Banū Tamīm[161] accompanied by Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā,[162] who was a cavalryman. The Muslims laid a trap for the people in the citadel by abandoning their horses and lying in wait for them. The people in the citadel duly came out and took some of the horses. Then the Muslims emerged against them, put them to flight, killed the dihqān, and took some of the enemy prisoner. [163] The son of the slain dihqān, who was a beardless youth, attacked Ibn al-Muthannā. Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā tricked him and took him prisoner. He brought him to Naṣr, who beheaded him.

Naṣr sent Sulaymān b. Ṣūl[164] to the lord of Farghānah with the peace treaty between them (the Muslims and the people of Farghānah). Sulaymān gave the following account: I went in to the lord of Farghānah and he asked me who I was. I said: "I am a hired servant (shākir) and the amīr's deputy scribe." He said (to his servants): "Take him into the storehouse, so that he can see what preparations we have made and tell him to stand up." I said: "I cannot walk (there)." He replied: "Give him a beast to ride." So I went into his storehouses and I said to myself: "Sulaymān, may Isrā'īl and Bishr b. 'Ubaydah rejoice at your misfortune! All this can only mean that he does not want peace and I will go away empty-handed."[165] I went back to the lord of Farghānah and he [1696] said: "How did you find the road between us and you?" I said: "Easy, with plentiful water and pasturage." He was not pleased with what I told him, so he said: "How do you know?" I said: "I have gone on raids into Gharshistān,[166] Ghūr,[167] al-Khuttal, and 161. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, I, tables 59–84; and II, 7–10.

162. Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā al-Azdī. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1761–62.

163. The narrative only sometimes mentions explicitly who is performing what action here. To clarify the passage the phrase "the people in the citadel" has been adopted for one group of the protagonists.

164. This may be the son of a Turkish leader, Ṣūl, who was active against Yazīd b. Muhallab in 98 (716–17). Cf. Wellhausen, 446–47.

165. Bi-khuffay Ḥunayn. Cf. Freytag, Proverba, I, 539.

166. Gharshistān (or Gharistān) or more usually Gharjistān is the mountainous region to the east of Bādghīs, at the headwaters of the Murghāb river. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 415.

167. The mountainous area to the east and south of Gharjistān was called Ghūr (or Ghūristān); it stretched from Herat to Bāmiyān and the borders of Kābul and Ghaznah. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 416; *EI*², s.v. (A. D. H. Bivar); Ḥudūd, 342–44.

Ṭabaristān,[168] so how can I not know?" He said: "What did you think of the preparations we have made?" I said: "I saw good supplies, but did you not know that even the lord of a citadel[169] is not proof against all perils?"[170] He said: "What are they?" I said: "He is not free from the fear that those closest to him, most liked by him and most trusted by him might attack him, coveting his position, and advance themselves thereby. Then (there is the fear) that what he has hoarded will melt away and that he will be utterly ruined. Or an illness could afflict him and he might die." He scowled and did not like what I had said to him. He told me to go to my house, so I went off and stayed for two days, not doubting that he would reject the idea of peace. Then he summoned me. I gave the peace treaty to my slave and I said to him: "If a messenger comes from me to you asking for the treaty, go to the house and do not show the treaty, and say[171] that I have left the treaty in the house."[172] I went in to see the lord of Farghānah and he asked me about the letter, so I said: "I have left it behind in the house." He said: "Send someone to bring it to you." Then he accepted the (offer of) peace and gave me a fine reward. He sent his mother with me and she was in charge of his affairs. When I went in to see Naṣr, he looked at me and said: "The saying of an ancient is most appropriate for you:

> Send a wise man and you will not need to give him any orders."

I told Naṣr what had happened and he said: "You did well." Then he gave permission for the mother of the ruler of Farghānah to come in. She came in to him and he began talking to her, with the interpreter explaining what she was saying. Then Tamīm b.

---

168. The well-known province to the south of the Caspian Sea. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 368–76.

169. Ibn al-Athīr has al-Maḥṣūr "the one under siege" (V, 179).

170. Khiṣāl: literally, "good or bad qualities." Cf. Lane, I, 751.

171. The variant qul in the apparatus has been preferred here since it makes better sense than qul lī in the text.

172. This seems a rather obscure narrative. Presumably, if the text is not faulty, which it may well be, Sulaymān's elaborate démarche was aimed at giving an impression of surprise if the amīr of Farghānah should decide after all to sign the treaty.

[1697] Naṣr[173] came in and said[174] to the interpreter: "Ask her: 'Do you know who this is?' " She said: "No." He said: "This is Tamīm b. Naṣr." She said: "By God, I see in him neither the sweetness of youth nor the nobility of age."

According to Abū Isḥāq b. Rabī'ah:[175] She said to Naṣr: "Every king is not a king unless he possesses six things: a vizier to whom he may divulge his secret intentions and from whom he may seek advice and receive trustworthy counsel in every contentious issue within his bosom that he wishes to discuss; a cook who, whenever the king does not fancy food, will bring him what he does like; a wife who, whenever he goes in with troubled mind to see her and he looks at her face, causes his trouble to disappear;[176] a fortress to which he betakes himself when he is afraid or in trouble and it rescues him [she meant his horse]; a sword which will not fail him when he fights the enemy; and a storehouse sufficient to live off no matter where in the world he takes it."

Then Tamīm b. Naṣr came in with a large group of people.[177] She said: "Who is this?" They said: "This is the hero of Khurāsān. This is Tamīm b. Naṣr." She said: "He has neither the nobility of old men nor the sweetness of young ones." Then al-Ḥajjāj b. Qutaybah came in and she said: "Who is this?" They said: "Al-Ḥajjāj b. Qutaybah." She greeted him and asked about him. Then she said: "You Arabs, you don't keep faith nor do you behave properly with one another. It was Qutaybah[178] who laid the foun-

---

173. Tamīm b. Naṣr was killed in 130 (748) fighting the Hāshimiyyah near Ṭūs. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 2016.

174. It is not clear whether Tamīm or Naṣr asks the woman this question.

175. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1456.

176. Literally, "his trouble disappears."

177. The text has fī mirfalatin wa jamā'atin. For mirfalah, a long flowing garment, cf. Gloss., p. CCLXVII. Lane (I, 1128) suggests that the term denotes a conceited gait. If this reading is accepted, a possible translation would be: "with conceited gait and a group of people." The Cairo edition (VII, 187) interprets the variant in the apparatus as azfalah ("a group or collection of people"), which makes good sense here.

178. Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī became governor of Khurāsān in 85 (704). He was killed when he tried to rebel at the time of Sulaymān's succession in 96 (714–15). During his governorship he undertook many campaigns beyond Khurāsān. Cf. Wellhausen, 429–44; Gibb, 31–57. Qutaybah laid the foundations on which Islamic rule in Central Asia was built. Although many of his family held high office later, al-Ḥajjāj apparently did not. Cf. Crone, 137–38.

dations of your power,[179] as I myself saw. This is his son and yet you make him sit down below you. It is your duty to raise him to this position (majlis) and you should sit where he is."

In this year Muḥammad b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī[180] led the pilgrimage. This report came from Abū Ma'shar[181]—Aḥmad b. Thābit[182]—his informants—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—his father. Al-Wāqidī and others also gave the same report. [1698]

The governor ('āmil) of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik in charge of Medina, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if in this year was Muḥammad b. Hishām. Hishām's 'āmil over the whole of Iraq was Yūsuf b. 'Umar, his 'āmil in Āzarbāyjān and Armenia was Marwān b. Muḥammad, and his 'āmil in Khurāsān was Naṣr b. Sayyār. In the post of qāḍī in al-Baṣrah was 'Āmir b. 'Ubaydah[183] and the qāḍī of al-Kūfah was Ibn Shubrumah.[184]

---

179. Waṭṭana lakum.

180. Hishām's 'āmil in Medina.

181. Abū Ma'shar Nājiḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sindī al-Madanī (d. 170/786–87) was a younger contemporary of Ibn Isḥāq. Cf. Sezgin, I, 291–91; *EI*², s.v. (J. Horovitz-F. Rosenthal); Brockelmann, I, 207; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 419–22.

182. Aḥmad b. Thābit b. 'Attāb al-Rāzī. Cf. Sezgin, I, 292, 796.

183. 'Āmir b. 'Ubaydah al-Bāhilī. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 378.

184. 'Abdallāh b. Shubrumah al-Ḍabbī. Cf. ibid.

The Events of the Year

122

(December 7, 739–November 25, 740)

The Killing of Zayd b. ʿAlī

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf: When Zayd b. ʿAlī commanded his followers to get ready to rebel and to make preparations, those who wanted to adhere to their pledge of allegiance to him began what he had ordered them to do in that eventuality. Sulaymān b. Surāqah al-Bāriqī[185] went to Yūsuf b. ʿUmar and gave him the information[186] that Zayd was making repeated visits to a man from amongst their number called ʿĀmir and to a man from the Banū Tamīm called Ṭuʿmah, [1699] the nephew of Bāriq,[187] and that Zayd was living with them. Yūsuf sent people to their house in search of Zayd b. ʿAlī, but he was not to be found there. Then the two men were seized and brought to Yūsuf. When he had spoken to the two of them, the situation with Zayd and his followers became clear to him.

185. This man is also mentioned in a similar context by Ibn Aʿtham (VIII, 114) and al-Iṣfahānī (Maqātil, 135).

186. Literally, "gave him news about him and informed him that. . . ."

187. Literally, "the son of a sister of Bāriq."

Zayd[188] became afraid that he would be arrested, so he put forward the date that he had fixed between himself and the people of al-Kūfah (for the insurrection to begin).

In charge of the people of al-Kūfah at that time was al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt.[189] In charge of his police force was 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, a man from the Qārah;[190] he was with the Thaqīf, who were his maternal uncles. He also had with him 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās al-Kindī[191] with some groups of Syrians. Yūsuf b. 'Umar was in al-Ḥīrah.

When those supporters of Zayd b. 'Alī who had given him the oath of allegiance found out that Yūsuf b. 'Umar had heard about Zayd's activities, was scheming against Zayd, and was making inquiries about him, a group of their leaders assembled in his presence and said:[192] "May God have mercy on you! What do you have to say on the matter of Abū Bakr and 'Umar?"[193] Zayd said: "May God have mercy on both of them and forgive them both! I have not heard anyone in my family renouncing them both nor saying anything but good about them."[194] They said: "In that case, why are you seeking the blood of the members of this family? Is it not perhaps because they have disputed your power and seized it from your hands?" Zayd replied: "My strongest argument against you is that we were more entitled than anyone else to assume the authority of the Prophet of God and that they [1700] appropriated our power for themselves and deprived us of it. In our opinion, that did not amount to unbelief (kufr) on their part,

188. Literally, "Zayd b. 'Alī."

189. Al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt al-Thaqafī. He was related to Yūsuf b. 'Umar. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 536.

190. A tribal group that included some branches of al-Hawn b. Khuzaymah. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 465.

191. For a discussion of this man's career, cf. Crone, 152–53. He later became governor of al-Kūfah. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1855.

192. This incident is also recorded in Fragmenta, 96–97, and al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 240.

193. Ibn A'tham (VIII, 116) writes, "those two tyrannical men, Abū Bakr and 'Umar."

194. This acceptance by Zayd of Abū Bakr and 'Umar is an instance of the imāmat al-mafḍūl, the "imamate of the inferior." If this passage is an accurate reflection of Zayd's view, he was trying here to mobilize a wide spectrum of support to overthrow the Umayyads. For a general discussion of the imāmat al-fāḍil and the imāmat al-mafḍūl, cf. Watt, Formative Period, 226–27.

(for) when they were entrusted with government they behaved justly with the people and acted according to the Qur'ān and the sunnah." They said: "Then these men have not acted tyrannically toward you if (in your view) those did not do so. So why are you summoning people to fight those who are not tyrannical to you?" Zayd said: "These men are not like those others. These are tyrannical to me, to you, and to themselves. We are only summoning you to the Book of God and the sunnah of His prophet so that God's ordinances (sunan) may be revived and innovations (bida') may be wiped out. If you answer our call, you will prosper; but if you refuse, I will not be responsible for you."

Then the group left him and broke their allegiance to him, saying: "The real imām has precedence." They were claiming that it was Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī, the brother of Zayd b. 'Alī, who was the imām. Muḥammad had died by that time[195] but his son, Ja'far b. Muḥammad, was still alive. They said: "Today Ja'far is our imām in succession to his father. He is the person most entitled to rule after his father. We will not follow Zayd b. 'Alī. He is not an imām."

This is the group that Zayd called Rāfiḍīs.[196] Today this group claims that the person who called them Rāfiḍīs when they broke with Zayd was al-Mughīrah.[197] Before Zayd's revolt, a group of them had gone to Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī and said to him: "Zayd b. 'Alī is among us, asking us to give him the oath of allegiance. Do you think it right that we should do so?" Ja'far said to them: "Yes, give your oath of allegiance to him, for, by God, he is the most excellent of us. He is our master and the best of us."
[1701] But they came back and kept secret what it was that Ja'far had instructed them to do.[198]

Arrangements were made for the revolt of Zayd b. 'Alī, and he fixed the time with his followers as the night of Wednesday, the first night of Ṣafar, 122 (Wednesday, January 6, 740). When Yūsuf b. 'Umar heard that Zayd had resolved on rebellion, he sent word 195. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. Cf. the 'Alids' genealogical table.

196. For this group, cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, who writes: "They are called al-Rāfiḍah only because they deserted (the claims of) Abū Bakr and 'Umar." ('Iqd, I, 217).

197. Al-Mughīrah b. Sa'īd al-'Ijlī. Cf. Watt, Formative Period, 51.

198. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 240.

to al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt, ordering him to assemble the people of al-Kūfah in the Great Mosque[199] and to detain them there. Al-Ḥakam sent for the 'urafā',[200] the police, the manākib,[201] and the soldiers, and stationed them in the mosque. Then he issued the following proclamation: "Verily, the amīr says: 'We will not be responsible for the consequences for those whom we find in their houses, so go to the Great Mosque.'" So the people went to the mosque on the Tuesday, one day before Zayd's rebellion.[202]

They searched for Zayd b. 'Alī in the house of Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah al-Anṣārī[203] but he left there during the night before the Wednesday.[204] It was a night of extreme cold.[205] Then the rebels raised burning torches and shouted: "O Manṣūr, kill! Kill, O Manṣūr!"[206] Whenever fire had consumed one torch they raised up another, and they continued like this until sunrise. In the morning, Zayd b. 'Alī sent al-Qāsim al-Tin'ī,[207] who was later called al-Ḥaḍramī, and another of his followers to proclaim their war-cry (shi'ār). When they were in the Jabbānah of 'Abd al-Qays, Ja'far b. al-'Abbās al-Kindī[208] met them. They attacked him and his companions.[209] The man who was with al-Qāsim al-Tin'ī

---

199. For the background history of the Great Mosque of al-Kūfah, cf. Massignon, 353.

200. 'Arīf, plural 'urafā': an official in charge of a military division in the garrison towns. Cf. EI², "'Arīf" (S. el-Ali and C. Cahen).

201. Mankib, plural manākib: an official below the 'arīf. Cf. Lane, I, 2846.

202. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 243; al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 136.

203. Cf. p. 22.

204. One report from al-Iṣfahānī adds that this was seven nights before the end of al-Muḥarram. Cf. Maqātil, 136.

205. The translation has simplified the repetitiveness of the original. A literal translation would read: "They searched for Zayd in the house of Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah al-Anṣārī. He (Zayd) left the house of Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq in the night, which was the night of Wednesday, on an extremely cold night."

206. Yā Manṣūr, amit, amit ya Manṣūr ("Kill, kill, you who are given victory"). This was the Prophet's war-cry on the Day of the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq. Cf. Ibn Hishām, 2, 218.

207. Other sources give al-T. b. 'ī. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 182; al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 136; Fragmenta, 97.

208. Later he was to become governor of Armenia. In 127 (745) he fell in battle against the Khārijite al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays b. al-Ḥusayn. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 253.

209. Al-Ṭabarī's account is ambiguous: shaddū 'alayhi wa aṣḥābihi. Fragmenta, 97 has shadda 'alayhimā ("he attacked the two of them"). This latter version seems to suggest that it was Ja'far who began the fight against the two supporters of Zayd. Al-Iṣfahānī's account is clear: "Ja'far met them, they attacked him and his companions" (Maqātil, 136).

was killed and al-Qāsim himself was wounded and taken to al-Ḥakam. The latter questioned him, but al-Qāsim gave him no reply. Then al-Ḥakam gave orders as to his fate and he was executed at the gate of the citadel. Al-Qāsim and his companion were the first of the followers of Zayd b. ʿAlī to be killed.

[1702] Al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt gave orders concerning the entrances to the market and they were shut and the doors of the mosque were locked on the Kūfans.

The following people were in charge of the quarters[210] of al-Kūfah at that time: Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jarīr al-Bajalī[211] was in charge of the Medinans; ʿAmr b. Abī Badhl al-ʿAbdī was in charge of Madhḥij[212] and Asad;[213] al-Mundhir b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath b. Qays al-Kindī[214] was in charge of Kindah[215] and Rabīʿah;[216] and Muḥammad b. Mālik al-Hamdānī,[217] who was later called al-Khaywānī, was in charge of Tamīm[218] and Hamdān.[219]

Al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt sent word to Yūsuf b. ʿUmar informing him of what was going on. Then Yūsuf gave orders to his herald, who proclaimed to the Syrians: "Who will go to al-Kūfah, approach the rebels, and bring me back news of them?" Jaʿfar b. al-ʿAbbās al-Kindī[220] responded: "I will," and he rode off with fifty horsemen. When he reached the Jabbānah of Sālim al-Salūlī,[221] he asked for information about the rebels. He then returned to Yūsuf b. ʿUmar and told him the news. The next morning Yūsuf went out to a hill near al-Ḥīrah and camped there. He was accompanied by some Quraysh and by leaders (ashrāf) of the people. In charge of his 210. For the tribal organization of al-Kūfah, cf. Djaït, 154–55; Massignon, 345; Crone, 31.

---

211. Cf. ibid., 115.
212. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, I, 176; II, 381–82.
213. Cf. ibid., II, 194.
214. For his family history, cf. Crone, 111.
215. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 371–72.
216. Cf. ibid., II, 481.
217. For his family tree, cf. ibid., I, 228.
218. Cf. ibid., II, 544.
219. Cf. ibid., II, 277.
220. One report from al-Iṣfahānī has ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās al-Hamdānī. Cf. Maqātil, 137.
221. For the function of the *jabbānah*s of al-Kūfah, cf. Djaït, 176–77.

shurṭah that day was al-'Abbās b. Sa'īd al-Murrī.[222] Then Yūsuf despatched al-Rayyān b. Salamah al-Arāshī[223] with two thousand men.[224] He had with him three hundred Qīqāniyyah[225] foot soldiers armed with arrows.

In the morning, Zayd b. 'Alī found that the total of those who had come to him that night numbered only 218 men. He said: "Good God! Where are the people?" and he was told: "They are shut in the Great Mosque." Zayd said: "For God's sake, what sort [1703] of excuse is that for people who gave us their oath of allegiance?"[226]

Naṣr b. Khuzaymah heard the shouting and went toward it. Then he encountered 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the police chief of al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt, accompanied by his cavalry from the Juhaynah,[227] near the house of al-Zubayr b. Abī Ḥakīmah on the road that led to the mosque of the Banū 'Adī. Naṣr b. Khuzaymah said: "O Manṣūr, kill!" but 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān vouchsafed him no reply, so Naṣr and his companions attacked him. 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was killed and those with him fled.

Zayd b. 'Alī came from the Jabbānah of Sālim to the Jabbānah of al-Ṣā'idiyyīn,[228] where five hundred Syrians were stationed. Zayd b. 'Alī and the men he had with him attacked the Syrians and he put them to flight. That day Zayd b. 'Alī was riding a jet-black horse which a man from the Banū Nahd b. Kahmas b. Marwān al-Najjārī had sold him for 25 dīnārs. Later, when Zayd was killed, al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt took it.

Zayd b. 'Alī went to the door of the house belonging to a man from Azd who was called Anas b. 'Amr. He was one of the people who had given the oath of allegiance to Zayd. They shouted out-

---

222. The text has al-Muzanī, as elsewhere in al-Ṭabarī's history. Cf. II, 1707, 1711. The name should be read as al-Murrī. Cf. Fragmenta, 99; Ibn Khayyāṭ, 556; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 103.

223. This person is called al-Arrānī by Ibn al-Athīr, V, 182.

224. These are specified as cavalry in Fragmenta, 98.

225. A well-known regiment of archers from Qīqān.

226. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 137.

227. For this tribal group, cf. *EI*², "Ḳuḍa'a" (M. J. Kister).

228. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 614; Massignon, 347. This jabbānah was for the Banū Asad.

side his house, and although he was there he remained silent.[229] Then Zayd called to him: "Anas, come out and join me! May God have mercy on you! Truth has come and falsehood has vanished away. Lo! falsehood is ever bound to vanish."[230] But still Anas did not go out to him. Then Zayd said: "What made you break your [1704] promise? You have indeed acted (iniquitously)[231] and God will take account of this behavior of yours."[232]

Zayd went to al-Kunāsah,[233] attacked a group of Syrians who were there, and put them to flight. He then went into the jabbānah where Yūsuf b. 'Umar was on the hill looking down at him and his followers.[234] In front of Zayd was Ḥizām b. Murrah al-Muzanī[235] and Zamzam b. Sulaym al-Tha'labī, who were in charge of a group of men wearing armor (al-mujaffafah). Zayd had about two hundred men with him and by God, if he had approached Yūsuf then, he could have killed him[236] while al-Rayyān b. Salamah was away with the Syrian troops looking for Zayd in al-Kūfah. Then Zayd bore right by the oratory (muṣallā) of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh and he went into al-Kūfah.[237]

When Zayd had gone to al-Kunāsah, one group of his followers split off and went toward the Jabbānah of Mikhnaf b. Sulaym.[238] Then one of them suggested to the others that they should go to the Jabbānah of Kindah.[239] The man had no time to say more than that before the Syrians appeared. When Zayd's men saw them,

---

229. Literally, "he was shouted to while he was in the house and he began by not answering."

230. Qur'ān, 17, v. 81. These words were recited by the Prophet when he witnessed the destruction of the Ka'bah after the conquest of Mecca. Cf. Pickthall, 290, n. 1.

231. Fa'altumūhā. Fragmenta, 98, has fa'altumūhā Ḥusayniyyatan ("You have behaved in the same way as [other Kūfans did] with al-Ḥusayn").

232. Literally, "God is your Reckoner."

233. "The Place of Sweepings," one of the chief quarters of al-Kūfah which lay to the western side of the town. It was in al-Kunāsah that the town's gibbet was situated. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 75; Massignon, 354–55; Yāqūt, IV, 481.

234. Wa-Yūsuf b. 'Umar 'alā al-talli yanẓuru ilayhi huwa wa-aṣḥābihi. An alternative translation might be: "Yūsuf b. 'Umar and his followers were looking down at Zayd," reading aṣḥābuhu.

235. This nisbah may also be al-Murrī. Cf. n. 222 above.

236. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 138.

237. For this route, cf. Massignon's map.

238. Cf. Massignon, 347.

239. Cf. Massignon, loc. cit.

they went into a lane and walked down it. One of Zayd's men hung back and went into the mosque, where he prayed two rak'ahs.[240] He then went out to the Syrians, whom he fought for some time. They got him on the ground and began striking him with their swords. One of them, who was a horseman wearing an iron helmet, shouted out: "Take off the helmet and then hit him on the head with iron bars." They did that and he was killed. The man's companions attacked the Syrians and pulled them away from him but he was already dead. Then the Syrians went away. They had taken one of Zayd's men but the rest of them got away. The man (they captured) had gone into the house of 'Abdallāh b. 'Awf and the Syrians went in after him and took him prisoner. [1705] They brought him to Yūsuf b. 'Umar, who killed him.[241]

When Zayd b. 'Alī came and saw how the Kūfans had forsaken him, he said: "Naṣr b. Khuzaymah, are you afraid[242] that they will behave as they did with al-Ḥusayn?" Naṣr said: "May God make me a ransom for you! By God, I shall certainly fight by your side with this sword of mine until the death!" (His fight in fact took place that very day in al-Kūfah). Then Naṣr b. Khuzaymah said to Zayd b. 'Alī: "May God make me a ransom for you! The Kūfans are detained in the Great Mosque. So come with us to them."

Zayd went with them toward the mosque and he passed the house of Khālid b. 'Urfuṭah.[243] 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās al-Kindī heard that Zayd was coming, so he sallied forth with the Syrian troops. Zayd approached and the two sides met at the door of (the house of) 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ.[244] The standard-bearer[245] of 'Ubaydallāh, who was Salmān, his mawlā, recoiled in fear.

---

240. I.e., he performed two bowings of the head and body in prayer. Cf. Lane, I, 1147.

241. For a similar account, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 138.

242. Ibn al-Athīr has: "I am afraid that . . ." (V, 183).

243. Khālid b. 'Urfuṭah fought at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah against the Persians and at al-Nukhaylah near al-Kūfah against the Khārijites. He was put in charge of the Banū Tamīm and the Banū Hamdān in 51 (671). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 131; Shaykh al-Mufīd, 249; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 343. His house was a well-known landmark in al-Kūfah for a long time. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 615.

244. He led the Umayyad army against al-Ḥusayn in 61 (680). Cf. Shaykh al-Mufīd, 341–45.

245. Ṣāḥib liwā'i 'Ubaydallāh. The liwā' was the banner of a particular commander. Cf. Lane, I, 3015.

When 'Ubaydallāh wanted to attack and saw that Salmān was holding back in fear, he said: "Attack, you son of a trollop." Then Salmān launched an attack on Zayd's men and he did not withdraw until his banner was stained with blood.

Then 'Ubaydallāh himself came forth to fight[246] and Wāṣil al-Ḥannāṭ[247] went out against him and they struck each other with their swords. Wāṣil said to 'Ubaydallāh, who had a squint:[248] "Take this from me: I am the boy who sells wheat." The other [1706] said: "May God cut off my hand if you ever manage to measure a qafīz[249] again," and Wāṣil struck 'Ubaydallāh but 'Ubaydallāh did not retaliate,[250] and he and his men fled until they came to the house of 'Amr b. Ḥurayth.[251]

Zayd and his followers proceeded as far as the Bāb al-Fīl.[252] His men began placing their flags above the doors and saying: "You people in the mosque, come out!" Naṣr b. Khuzaymah began shouting to them saying: "Kūfans, forsake ignominy for glory! Come forth for your own good in both this world and the next.[253] (In your present position) you have the blessings neither of this world nor of the next." The Syrian troops looked down on them and they began throwing stones at them from the top of the mosque.

There was that day a large gathering of people in the environs of al-Kūfah—some reports say it was in the Jabbānah of Sālim. Al-

---

246. I.e., in individual combat.

247. "The wheat-seller."

248. Fa-qāla li'l-aḥwali ("he said to the squint-eyed man"). The apparatus indicates that there are words missing here, but the editor believes the protagonist is al-Aḥwal, the mawlā of al-Ash'ariyyīn. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1711. It seems unlikely, however, that there is a third person involved here. Al-Balādhurī, whose account has been followed here, makes it clear that 'Ubaydallāh was the man with a squint: ḍaraba Wāṣil al-Ḥannāṭ al-Aḥwala 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās al-Kindī. Cf. Ansāb, 247.

249. Qafīz: a measure of capacity. Cf. Hinz, 48–49.

250. Thumma ḍarabahu fa-lam yaṣna' shay'an. This translation is only tentative. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 247.

251. The text has 'Amr min Ḥurayth. Citing this reference, the index gives 'Amr b. Ḥurayth al-Makhzūmī, 415–16. 'Amr b. Ḥurayth (d. 98/716–17) was a leader of the Kūfans and an opponent of the Shī'īs. Cf. Shaykh al-Mufīd, 244; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 176.

252. The Bāb al-Fīl was situated near the Friday mosque and the citadel. Cf. Massignon's map.

253. On dīn, cf. *EI*², s.v. (L. Gardet). On dunyā, cf. *EI*², s.v. (A. S. Tritton).

Rayyān b. Salamah left for al-Ḥīrah in the evening and Zayd b. 'Alī went away with his men. Some of the Kūfans went out to Zayd and he settled in the dār al-rizq.[254] (Before he left for al-Ḥīrah)[255] al-Rayyān b. Salamah came to Zayd and fought fiercely with him at the dār al-rizq. A large number of the Syrian troops were wounded and killed and Zayd's men pursued them from the dār al-rizq as far as the mosque. The Syrian troops returned home on the Wednesday evening with the worst possible forebodings. The following day, the Thursday morning, Yūsuf b. 'Umar summoned al-Rayyān b. Salamah but he was not to be found at that time.

Some reports say: Al-Rayyān did go to Yūsuf. Al-Rayyān was [1707] not wearing his weapons and Yūsuf reproached him, saying: "Fie on you! Who is supposed to be the head of the cavalry round here? Sit down."[256] Then Yūsuf called al-'Abbās b. Sa'īd al-Murrī,[257] his chief of police, and sent him off with the Syrian troops. Al-'Abbās made for Zayd b. 'Alī in the dār al-rizq. There was a lot of wood piled up for the carpenter and this made the road difficult to pass through. Zayd came out with his men. On his right and left wings he had Naṣr b. Khuzaymah al-'Absī and Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq al-Anṣārī. When al-'Abbās saw them—and he himself did not have foot soldiers with him—he shouted, "You Syrian troops, get down on the ground, the ground." Many of his men did dismount and they fought fiercely in the battle.

One of the Syrians from the Banū 'Abs[258] who was called Nā'il[259] b. Farwah had said to Yūsuf b. 'Umar: "By God, if I set eyes on Naṣr b. Khuzaymah I will surely kill him or he will surely kill me." Yūsuf said to him: "Take this sword," and he gave him a sword that would cut through anything it touched. When the soldiers of al-'Abbās b. Sa'īd and those of Zayd met and fought each other, Nā'il b. Farwah caught sight of Naṣr b. Khuzaymah.

---

254. The army storehouse which was near the bridge over the Euphrates. Cf. Massignon, 349.

255. The sequence of events is clearer in Fragmenta, 99.

256. Al-Iṣfahānī gives a similar conversation between Yūsuf and al-Rayyān. Cf. Maqātil, 139.

257. Cf. n. 222 above.

258. For the Banū 'Abs, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 135–36.

259. Ibn al-Athīr calls him Nabīl (V, 184).

He went toward him, struck him, and cut his thigh. Then Naṣr dealt him a blow which killed him. Naṣr also died soon afterward. The battle raged on fiercely and Zayd b. ʿAlī put the Syrians to flight, killing about seventy of them. The Syrians departed in a sorry state after al-ʿAbbās b. Saʿīd had called out to them: "Get back on your horses. In a narrow place cavalry can't do anything against foot soldiers." So they got back on their horses.

[1708] In the evening Yūsuf b. ʿUmar prepared them for battle again and sent them off. They came and met up with Zayd's men. Zayd launched an attack on them and routed them. Then he pursued them, driving them into the swamp (sabkhah).[260] He attacked them in the swamp, pushing them toward the Banū Sulaym.[261] Then he followed them with his horsemen and foot soldiers until he and his men had taken possession of the dam.

Zayd then sallied forth[262] against the Syrians in the area between the Bāriq[263] and the Ruʾās,[264] and there he engaged in a fierce battle with them. His standard-bearer that day was a man called ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Abī Mālik b. Masrūḥ from the Banū Saʿd b. Zayd, the ally (ḥalīf)[265] of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib.[266] Masrūḥ al-Saʿdī had married Ṣafiyyah, the daughter of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. The Syrian cavalry began by breaking in the face of Zayd's cavalry and his foot soldiers. Then al-ʿAbbās b. Saʿīd al-Murrī[267] sent to Yūsuf b. ʿUmar informing him of this and asking him to send him archers. So Yūsuf sent them Sulaymān (b. Sulaym) b. Kaysān al-Kalbī[268] with the Qīqāniyyah and the Bukhāriyyah[269] who were archers. They began shooting at Zayd

260. The word is vocalized in the text as sabkhah but is later corrected to sabakhah; the lexica give both forms as correct. Cf. Add., p. DCCX. For the location of the swamp, cf. Massignon's map.

261. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 517.

262. The text has aẓhara lahum. The Cairo edition (VII, 185) has ẓahara lahum, which is followed here. This reading is supported by al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 140.

263. Many of the Banū Bāriq had settled in al-Kūfah. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 489.

264. For the Banū Ruʾās, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 489.

265. Ḥalīf: one who unites in a confederacy or covenant. Cf. Lane, I, 627.

266. The uncle of the Prophet. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (W. M. Watt).

267. Cf. n. 222 above.

268. Properly Sulaymān b. Sulaym b. Kaysān al-Kalbī. Cf. Index, 249; Crone, 139.

269. This group had been formed by ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād when he had taken four thousand Bukhārans prisoner in 53–54 (673–74). Cf. Narshakhī, 37; Crone, 230, n. 271.

and his men. (In fact), Zayd had wanted to send his men away when they reached the swamp but they had refused. Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq al-Anṣārī fought fiercely in front of Zayd b. 'Alī and was killed.[270] Zayd b. 'Alī and his men held firm until, when night was at hand, someone shot an arrow which struck him on the left side of his forehead and lodged in his head. Zayd then withdrew with his men. The Syrians, however, thought they had with- [1709] drawn only because night was falling.[271]

Salamah b. Thābit al-Laythī, who was with Zayd b. 'Alī and who, together with a slave belonging to Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq, was the last person to leave that day, said: I went with my companion, following in close behind Zayd b. 'Alī, and we found that he had been lifted down from his horse and taken into the apartment (bayt) of Ḥarrān b. Karīmah,[272] a mawlā of one of the Arabs in the sikkah al-barīd,[273] into the living area (dūr) of Arḥab[274] and Shākir.[275] [Salamah b. Thābit went on:] I came into the presence of Zayd and I said to him: "May God make me your ransom, Abū al-Ḥusayn!" His companions went off and fetched a physician called Shuqayr,[276] a mawlā of the Banū Ru'ās. This man took the arrow out of his forehead while I was watching him and, by God, hardly had he taken it out before Zayd began screaming and it was not long before he died. The people around said: "Where shall we bury him and where can we conceal him?" One of his companions said: "Let's dress him in his coat of mail and throw him in the water." Another of them said: "No, let's cut off his head and put it amongst those slain in battle." Zayd's son, Yaḥyā, said: "No, by God, the dogs shall not eat the flesh of my father." Another of them said: "Let's take him to al-'Abbāsiyyah and bury him."[277]

---

270. Literally, "He was killed in front of him."

271. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 250; al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 141.

272. Al-Iṣfahānī has Ḥarrān b. Abī Karīmah. Cf. ibid.

273. "The street of the post."

274. The Banū Arḥab were the clan of Yazīd b. Qays, the police chief of 'Alī. Cf. Djaït, 159.

275. The Banū Shākir were a big clan from whom Ibn Kāmil, one of Mukhtār's associates, recruited men. Cf. Djaït, loc. cit.

276. The doctor's name in some sources was Sufyān. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 251; al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 142.

277. Ibn A'tham, VIII, 121, relates that Zayd was buried in the swamp.

[Salamah continued]: I suggested to them that we should take him to the clay pit and bury him there. They accepted my advice and we went and dug a grave for him between two ditches, where there was at that time a lot of water. When we had prepared the [1710] grave properly for him, we buried him and allowed the water to flow over him. There was a Sindī slave of his with us.

Then we went with Zayd's son as far as the Jabbānah of al-Sabī', where we remained, and at that point the people left us. I stayed with Yaḥyā in a group of less than ten men. I said to Yaḥyā: "Where do you intend to go now that daybreak is upon you?" He had with him Abū al-Ṣabbār al-'Abdī. Yaḥyā replied: "The two rivers (al-nahrayn)." I said to him: "So you only want to go to the two rivers?"—I thought that he wanted to go alongside the Euphrates and fight them. Then I said to him: "Don't leave your position. Fight them until you are killed or until God decrees what He will." Yaḥyā said to me: "I want to go to the two rivers of Karbalā.'"[278] So I replied: "Well, then, flee before daybreak." Accordingly he left al-Kūfah, accompanied by me, Abū al-Ṣabbār, and a small group of men. As we left al-Kūfah we heard the call to prayer of the muezzins and we performed the dawn prayer at al-Nukhaylah.[279] Then we made off quickly in the direction of Nineveh.[280] Yaḥyā said to me: "I want to see Sābiq, the mawlā of Bishr b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr, so hurry up." Whenever I met people I would ask them for food and I would be given loaves. These I gave to Yaḥyā and he ate them and we ate with him. We reached Nineveh when darkness had already fallen. We arrived at Sābiq's house, I called through the door, and he came out to us. I said to him: "I'm going to al-Fayyūm[281] and I'll be staying there, so if you want to communicate with me, you know where to find me." Then I went away, leaving Yaḥyā with Sābiq, and that was the last time I ever saw him.

---

278. Karbalā' lies to the northwest of al-Kūfah and marks the place where al-Ḥusayn was martyred in 61 (680). Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 78. For al-Nahrayn, cf. Massignon's map.

279. A place near al-Kūfah. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 771; Wellhausen, 76–77.

280. Nīnawā: the village where the prophet Job lived. According to Yāqūt (IV, 870–71), it was in the Sawād of al-Kūfah. Cf. EI[1], s.v. (M. Streck).

281. Besides the well-known town of this name in Egypt, there was a place called al-Fayyūm near Hīt in Iraq, which is probably meant here. Cf. Yāqūt, III, 933.

Then Yūsuf b. 'Umar sent the Syrian troops to carry out a search for the wounded in the houses of the Kūfans. The troops [1711] brought the women out into the courtyard of the house while they went around the inner apartments looking for the wounded. Then on the Friday the Sindī slave of Zayd b. 'Alī revealed where Zayd was to be found. Al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt dispatched al-'Abbās b. Sa'īd al-Murrī[282] and Ibn al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt, and they went off and took Zayd away. Al-'Abbās did not want Ibn al-Ḥakam to get in first,[283] so he parted company with him. Early on the Friday al-'Abbās sent a messenger, accompanied by al-Ḥajjāj b. al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī 'Aqīl, to take the head of Zayd b. 'Alī to Yūsuf b. 'Umar.

Abū al-Juwayriyah, the mawlā of the Juhaynah,[284] composed the following lines:

Say to those who have dishonored women and who have set up candles in the desert of Sālim:
How did you find the fight against noble men,
O Yūsuf b. al-Ḥakam b. al-Qāsim?

When the messenger came to Yūsuf b. 'Umar, the latter gave orders concerning Zayd. His body was crucified at al-Kunāsah, together with Naṣr b. Khuzaymah, Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah al-Anṣārī, and Ziyād al-Nahdī. Yūsuf had proclaimed that anyone who brought a head would receive five hundred dirhams. Muḥammad b. 'Abbād brought the head of Naṣr b. Khuzaymah and Yūsuf b. 'Umar ordered that he should have one thousand dirhams. When al-Aḥwal, the mawlā of al-Ash'ariyyīn, brought the head of Mu'āwiyah b. Isḥāq, Yūsuf said to him: "Did you kill him?" Al-Aḥwal replied: "May God make the amīr prosper! It was not I who killed him but I saw him and recognized him." Yūsuf said: "Give him seven hundred dirhams." The only thing that prevented al-Aḥwal from having the full one thousand 282. Cf. n. 222 above.

283. That is, to receive the reward.

284. This poet is probably the same Abū al-Juwayriyah 'Īsā b. 'Iṣmah whose verses are quoted under the year 116 by al-Ṭabarī, II, 1565; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 130, 137; Sezgin, II, 342.

dirhams was the fact that he asserted that he had not killed Mu'āwiyah.

[1712] Other reports say that it was only when Yūsuf b. 'Umar was so informed by Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik that he heard about Zayd's activities and how, having left al-Kūfah and gone some distance, Zayd had gone back there.[285] That came about because a man from the Banū Umayyah wrote—according to the reports—to Hishām, mentioning Zayd's activities to him. Then Hishām wrote to Yūsuf, reproaching him, calling him ignorant and saying: "You are being negligent while Zayd has fixed himself at al-Kūfah and the oath of allegiance is being given to him. Keep on[286] searching for him. Give him a guarantee of safe conduct and, if he does not accept, fight him." Yūsuf wrote to al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt, who was of the family of Abū 'Aqīl and was Yūsuf's deputy in al-Kūfah, asking him to look for Zayd. Al-Ḥakam looked for Zayd but he could not find where he was hiding. Then Yūsuf secretly summoned a Khurāsānī mamlūk of his who was a stutterer. He gave him five thousand dirhams and ordered him to ingratiate himself with some of the Shī'ah. Yūsuf told him to tell them that he had come from Khurāsān out of love for the family of the Prophet (ahl al-bayt) and that he had money that he wished to use to support their cause. After the mamlūk had met the Shī'ah on a number of occasions and told them about the money that he had with him, they took him in to see Zayd. Then the mamlūk went away and told Yūsuf where Zayd was to be found. Yūsuf sent out cavalry to Zayd. Zayd's men raised their war cry but only three hundred or less of them gathered to him. Zayd said: "Dāwūd b. 'Alī knew you (Kūfans) better. He warned me that you would desert me but I took no heed."[287]

Other reports say that the person who revealed the place where Zayd was buried—and he was buried, according to these reports, in the river of Ya'qūb, where his followers had blocked the river,

---

285. The text is very obscure here. The translation has attempted to clarify it. The literal translation would be: "Yūsuf b. 'Umar knew about the affair of Zayd and his going back from the road to al-Kūfah after he had set out only by being informed about it by Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik."

286. The text has fa-iljaj fī ṭalabihi. This is emended later to fa-alḥiḥ; cf. Add., p. DCCX. There is no great difference in meaning between the two.

287. Cf. also al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 244.

dug a grave for him in the riverbed, buried him in his clothes, and allowed the water to flow over him—was the slave[288] of a fuller who happened to be there. The slave, having first agreed on a price to show Yūsuf's men where Zayd was laid, showed them the place. They took Zayd away, cut off his head, and crucified his body. They ordered that a guard should be posted over him in case anyone should try to take down the body, and a guard was indeed posted over him for some time. [1713]

Some reports say that Abū Khaythamah Zuhayr b. Mu'āwiyah[289] was amongst the people guarding Zayd. Zayd's head was sent to Hishām, who gave orders that it should be put up on the gate of the city of Damascus. Then it was sent to Medina. The body remained on the gibbet until Hishām died.[290] Then al-Walīd ordered that it should be taken down and burned.[291]

Other reports say that it was Ḥakīm b. Sharīk who informed on Zayd to Yūsuf.

Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā gave the following report about Yaḥyā b. Zayd: When Zayd was killed, one of the Banū Asad went to Yaḥyā b. Zayd and said to him: "Your father has been killed. The people of Khurāsān will give you their support. I think you should go to them." Yaḥyā said: "How can I do that?" The man said: "Hide yourself until the search for you has been called off, then leave." So the man hid Yaḥyā in his house for one night. Then he lost his nerve and went to 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr b. Marwān,[292] saying to him: "Zayd was a close kinsman of yours. It is your duty to uphold his rights." 'Abd al-Malik said: "Yes, but it would have been a more pious act to pardon him." The man said: "Zayd has been killed and this is his son, a young boy who has committed no crime. If Yūsuf b. 'Umar finds out where he is he will kill him, so you must protect him and hide him with 288. 'Abdu qaṣṣārin. The text itself has 'inda qaṣṣārin, which makes little sense. Nöldeke emends the reading to 'abdu, which is a variant in the apparatus. Cf. Add., p. DCCX. This reading has been followed in the translation. According to Fragmenta, 100, it was the fuller himself who revealed where Zayd's body was.

289. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, I, 269.

290. According to al-Mas'ūdī, Zayd's body remained attached to the gibbet in al-Kūfah for five years. Cf. Murūj, V, 472–73.

291. Zayd was forty-two when he died. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 130; Ibn Sa'd, V, 240.

292. He was an Umayyad. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, I, 10.

[1714] you." 'Abd al-Malik said: "Yes, with great pleasure." So the man brought Yaḥyā to him and he hid him in his house. This came to the ears of Yūsuf and he sent the following message to 'Abd al-Malik: "I have heard that this boy is with you. I swear to God, if you do not bring him to me I will certainly inform the Commander of the Faithful about you." 'Abd al-Malik said to him: "This is a tissue of falsehood and lies. Would I hide somebody who would challenge my authority and have a better claim to it than I have myself? I would never have thought that you could believe such a thing of me nor that you would listen to the author of such lies." Yūsuf said: "He's telling the truth. By God, Ibn Bishr is not the sort of person to hide away the likes of Yaḥyā." So Yūsuf called off the search for Yaḥyā and when the hue and cry had died down, Yaḥyā escaped with a number of Zayd's supporters to Khurāsān.

After the killing of Zayd, Yūsuf delivered the following exhortation in al-Kūfah: "O people of al-Kūfah! Verily Yaḥyā b. Zayd has entered the bridal chambers of your women just as his father did. By God, if he were to show his face to me, I would rip off his testicles just as I ripped off the testicles of his father!"

The following report came from one of the Anṣār: When the head of Zayd was brought and displayed[293] in Medina in the year 123 [November, 26, 740–November 14, 741], one of the Anṣār poets came and stood before Zayd and said:

O violator of the covenant, rejoice in what has brought you disaster!
You have violated the trust and the covenant.
    You are steeped in wrongdoing.
Satan has broken faith over what he promised you.[294]

[1715] People said to the poet: "Woe on you! How dare you say this about the likes of Zayd?" He replied: "The amīr is angry and I wanted to please him." Then one of their poets gave him the following response:

---

293. The text has ṣuliba. The apparatus suggests an alternative, nuṣiba, which makes better sense.

294. The meter is hazaj.

You poet of evil,
    you have become a liar!
Are you reviling[295] the son of the messenger of God, just to gratify those who govern over you?

May God confound you, morning and evening!
And on the Day of Gathering, make no mistake,[296]
    the fire will be your abode!

Some reports say that Khirāsh b. Ḥawshab b. Yazīd al-Shaybānī was head of police for Yūsuf b. 'Umar and that it was he who dug up Zayd and crucified him. Al-Sayyid[297] recited the following:

I spent the night sleepless and wakeful, composing poetry.
After reciting,
    I remained for a long time in a state of perplexity.
(I said) "May God shower on Ḥawshab and Khirāsh and Mazyad—
And Yazīd, for he was still more insolent and rebellious—
A million million curses for ever and ever,
For it was they who waged war on God and wrought harm on Muḥammad.
Rebelliously they have shared in shedding the blood of the pure one,[298] Zayd,
Then they raised him high on a rood,[299] stark naked and stripped to the skin.
O Khirāsh b. Ḥawshab, tomorrow it is you who will be the most wretched of men!"[300]

---

295. The text has atashtimu ibna al-rasūl, which breaks the meter (hazaj). The editor emends this later to read: ashatmu ibna rasūli Allāhi; cf. Add., DCCXI. The Cairo edition (190) follows this emendation.

296. Literally, "there is no doubt that."

297. Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad al-Ḥimyarī, whose laqab was al-Sayyid. Cf. Ibn A'tham, VIII, 205; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 185; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VII, 229.

298. Al-Muṭahhar. Ibn al-Athīr has al-Ḥusayn (V, 1815).

299. Literally, "a tree stump."

300. The meter is muqtaḍab.

[1716] According to Abū Mikhnaf: When Yūsuf had killed Zayd b. ʿAlī, he went into al-Kūfah, mounted the minbar, and said:

O you citizens of an abominable city! By God, even a refractory camel can achieve nothing against me;[301] I am neither daunted by the clattering of worn-out water-skins[302] nor am I frightened by the wolf. Far from it! I was endowed with the mightiest of forearms. Lament, O men of al-Kūfah, your disgrace and degradation. Expect neither stipend nor allowance for yourselves from us. Indeed, I am resolved to destroy your city and your homes and to despoil your possessions. I have mounted[303] my minbar only to make you understand what repressive measures will be taken against you.[304] You are a people of violence and contumacy. All of you, except Ḥakīm b. Sharīk al-Muḥāribī, wage war against God and His Prophet. I have asked the Commander of the Faithful to give me permission to take action against you. If he gives me a free hand, I shall kill your fighting men and enslave your children.[305]

In this year Kulthūm b. ʿIyāḍ al-Qushayrī[306] was killed. He was the man whom Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik had sent with the Syrian cavalry to Ifrīqiyah[307] when strife broke out amongst the Berbers.

---

301. Mā tuqarranu bī al-ṣaʿbatu. Cf. Gloss., p. CDXXI; Freytag, Prov., II, 589.

302. Lā yuqaʿqaʿu lī bi-al-shināni ("a confused and clattering noise will not be made for me with the old and worn-out water skins"). Cf. Lane, I, 1602. Yūsuf is suggesting that he is frightened by nothing.

303. An alternative translation could be: "I will never mount my minbar again until I have made you understand what repressive measures will be taken against you."

304. Mā tukrahūna ʿalayhi (lit., "what you will be forced to do"). Cf. Ullmann, 152.

305. Other versions of this khuṭbah can be found in Fragmenta, 100, and al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 258–59.

306. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Kulthūm was sent as governor of Ifrīqiyah at the beginning of Shaʿbān 123 (June 21–July 19, 741) and he died in 124 (741–42) (Taʾrīkh, 369–70). For an analysis of Kulthūm's career, cf. Crone, 128; Gabrieli, Califfato, 98–101. It was in 124 (741–42) that the great Berber revolt occurred in Spain.

307. For definitions of the boundaries of the province of Ifrīqiyah, cf. *EI*², s.v. (M. Talbi).

Also in this year 'Abdallāh al-Baṭṭāl was killed with a group of Muslims in Byzantine territory.[308]

In this year were born al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ[309] and Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī.[310]

Also in this year Yūsuf b. 'Umar sent Ibn Shubrumah to govern Sijistān[311] and he appointed Ibn Abī Laylā as qāḍī (of al-Kūfah). [1717]

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his narrators—Isḥāq b. 'Isā—Abū Ma'shar: In this year Muḥammad b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī led the people on the pilgrimage. Al-Wāqidī and others also gave the same account.

The agents ('ummāl) of the garrison cities in this year were the same as in the previous year, and their names have already been mentioned, except that the qāḍī of al-Kūfah in this year is reported to have been Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā.

---

308. 'Abdallāh al-Baṭṭāl b. al-Ḥusayn, the semilegendary hero to whom are attributed many raids into Byzantine territory. Cf. Fragmenta, 100; Ibn Khayyāṭ, 367. Ibn Khayyāṭ puts al-Baṭṭāl's death in 121 (738–39). Cf. also Brooks, "Arabs in Asia Minor," 198–200.

309. Al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, governor of Cairo in 169 (785–86). Cf. Zambaur, 26, and genealogical table 9, n. 206.

310. A member of the 'Abbāsid family who was twice governor of Mecca, the first time from 149 to 158 (766–67 to 774–75) and the second from 178 to 184 (794–95 to 800). Cf. Zambaur, 20.

311. The province of Sijistān (or Sīstān) lay to the south of Khurāsān. Its capital in medieval times was Zaranj. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 334–51. 'Abdallāh b. Shubrumah al-Ḍabbī is not mentioned amongst the governors of Sijistān by Ibn Khayyāṭ (Ta'rīkh, 375).

312. The leader of the Turks. Cf. Wellhausen, 433.

The Events of the Year 123

(November 26, 740–November 14, 741)

Amongst the events taking place during this year was the drawing up of a peace treaty between Naṣr b. Sayyār and the Soghdians.

The [Treaty with the Soghdians] and the Reason for It

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī]—his *shaykh*s: When the khāqān[312] was killed during the governorship of Asad,[313] the Turks scattered in disarray, making forays against each other. The Soghdians wanted to return home and a group of them withdrew to al-Shāsh.[314] When Naṣr b. Sayyār became governor, he sent messages to the Soghdians inviting them to return home and he complied with all their requests. They had asked for conditions that (previous) *amīr*s of Khurāsān had rejected:[315] namely, that those who had been Muslims and then apostasized from Islam should not be punished; that no excessive demands for repayment of debts should be inflicted on any of the people; that they should not be required to pay any tax arrears (qabālah) which they owed to the treasury;[316] and that they should have to return Muslim prisoners only at the decree of a qāḍī and on the testimony of trustworthy witnesses. People reproached Naṣr for having made this agreement and they taxed him about it. He replied: "Verily, by God, if you had seen with your own eyes—as I have done—the military prowess that the Soghdians displayed toward the Muslims and the havoc that they wrought amongst them, you would not have disapproved of this agreement." Then Naṣr sent a messenger to inform Hishām about that matter. When the messenger arrived, the caliph refused to support Naṣr in that affair.[317] So the messenger said: "O Commander of the Faithful, you have had experience of us in war and in peace alike, so decide for yourself." Hishām became angry. Then al-Abrash al-Kalbī said: "O Commander of the Faithful, win the people over with kindness and use forbearance toward them, for you know the havoc they have wrought amongst the Muslims." Thereupon Hishām endorsed the action that Naṣr had taken.[318] [1718]

312. The leader of the Turks. Cf. Wellhausen, 433.

313. Asad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī, Khālid's brother, was appointed governor of Khurāsān for the second time in 117 (735). He defeated the Türgesh in 119 (737) at the battle of Kharistān. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (H. A. R. Gibb); Gibb, 81–85; Wellhausen, 467–74.

314. Juday' al-Kirmānī had routed most of the Khāqān's forces; just one band of Soghdians managed to retreat. Cf. Hawting, 88.

In this year Yūsuf b. 'Umar sent al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt to Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, asking him to put Khurāsān under his jurisdiction and to dismiss Naṣr b. Sayyār.

---

315. Cf. the discussion in Barthold, Turkestan, 192.

316. For the term qabālah, cf. Gloss., p. CDXII; *EI*², "Ḳabāla" (Cahen). As Cahen says, it is difficult to define this term precisely. It would appear that the term generally refers to a practice whereby, when individuals had difficulty in paying the full amount of land tax, a local notable would advance the sum needed and would have to ensure future reimbursement. In this passage, however, the word may well mean simply "arrears."

317. Fa-lammā qadima al-rasūl abā an yunfidha dhālika ("When the messenger arrived, he refused to endorse that"). This sentence is ambiguous. The subject of the main clause could be the messenger or Hishām.

318. Fa-anfadha Hishām mā sa'ala (lit., "Hishām ratified what he (Naṣr) asked").

The Reason for Yūsuf's Request and the Outcome of It

According to 'Alī [al-Madā'inī]—his shaykhs: After Naṣr b. Sayyār had been governor for a long time and Khurāsān was well under his control, Yūsuf b. 'Umar, who was envious of Naṣr, wrote to Hishām saying: "Khurāsān is indeed a running sore![319] If the Commander of the Faithful deems it appropriate to annex Khurāsān to Iraq, I will send al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt there, for he was with al-Junayd,[320] he governed the bulk of the [eastern] provinces, and he made the lands of the Commander of the Faithful prosper with good government. I am sending al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt to the [1719] Commander of the Faithful, for he is cultured and wise. Al-Ḥakam's counsel to the Commander of the Faithful will be like our own counsel, just as his love for the ahl al-bayt is like our own."

When Yūsuf's letter reached Hishām, he sent people to the public guesthouse (dār al-ḍiyāfah) where Muqātil b. 'Alī al-Sughdī[321] was lodging. They brought him to Hishām, who said: "Are you from Khurāsān?" Muqātil said: "Yes, and I am a friend of the Turks." [He had come to Hishām with one hundred and fifty Turks.][322] Hishām said: "Do you know al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt?" Muqātil said "Yes." Hishām said: "What were his responsibilities in Khurāsān?" Muqātil said: "He was in charge of a borough (qaryah) called al-Fāryāb;[323] its kharāj[324] amounts to seventy thousand [dirhams]. Then al-Ḥārith b. Surayj took him

---

319. The text has dabiratun dabiratun. This is emended to dabaratu dabiratin ("the sore of an ulcerated camel"). Cf. Add., p. DCCXI. The Cairo edition (193) has dabaratun dabiratun and its editor explains in a footnote that the phrase means a disturbed area.

320. Al-Junayd b. 'Abdallāh al-Murrī was governor of Khurāsān from 111 (730) to 115 (733). He died in 116 (734). Cf. *EI*², "Al-Djunayd b. 'Abdallāh" (Veccia Vaglieri); Gibb, 72–76; Wellhausen, 459–62; Ibn Khayyāṭ, 375.

321. The text has al-Sa'dī, as does Ibn al-Athīr, V, 189. The name is later emended to al-Sughdī. Cf. Add., p. DCCXI.

322. This is a comment by the narrator.

323. For al-Fāryāb, cf. *EI*², Faryāb (R. Frye). Of the various possible locations, the most likely is that it is a village in Sughd.

324. Kharāj: usually, land tax. For more precise definitions of the term, cf. *EI*², s.v. (Cahen); Morony, 99–106.

prisoner." Hishām said: "Oh dear! How did he escape from al-Ḥārith?" Muqātil said: "Al-Ḥārith twisted his ear, slapped him on the back of his head, and let him go."[325]

Later on, al-Ḥakam brought the kharāj revenues of Iraq to Hishām. Hishām found that al-Ḥakam was handsome and eloquent, so he wrote to Yūsuf saying: "Al-Ḥakam has arrived. He is as you described. In the area you govern there is ample scope for him. Dismiss al-Kinānī[326] (i.e., Naṣr) and make al-Ḥakam agent ('āmil) (in his place)."

In this year Naṣr made a second raid on Farghānah and he sent Maghrā' b. Aḥmar to Iraq. The latter, however, denounced him to Hishām.

An Account of [the Denunciation of Naṣr] and of the Part Played in It by Hishām and Yūsuf b. 'Umar

It is reported that Naṣr sent Maghrā' b. Aḥmar as his envoy to Iraq after Naṣr had returned from his second raid on Farghānah. Yūsuf [1720] b. 'Umar said to Maghrā': "Ibn Aḥmar! Is Ibn al-Aqṭa'[327] [meaning Naṣr] getting a hold over you, you men of Qays?"[328] Ibn Aḥmar replied: "That has been so, may God make the amīr prosper!" Then Yūsuf said: "When you go to see the Commander of the Faithful, destroy Naṣr." So the delegation went to Hishām, who questioned them about the situation in Khurāsān. Maghrā' began to speak, giving praise and thanks to God and then referring to Yūsuf b. 'Umar in the most fulsome terms. Hishām said: "Enough of that! Tell me about Khurāsān". Then Maghrā' said: "O Commander of the Faithful, there is no army (jund) of yours that can march faster[329] than they can and there are no falcons in the sky

325. Ibn al-Athīr (loc. cit.) adds that al-Ḥārith told al-Ḥakam that he was too contemptible for him to kill him.

326. The nisbah of Naṣr b. Sayyār. For the Banū Kinānah, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 371. They were a "small and almost neutral tribe" (Gibb, 89).

327. This term of abuse, probably meaning "son of a man with an amputated hand," would suggest thieving, for which the fixed penalty is well known.

328. Ibn al-Athīr (V, 189) has Quraysh.

329. Aghaththu ("more speedy"). There is some doubt about this reading. The apparatus cites two variants, a'addu and aghazzu.

more courageous[330] than they are; their cavalry[331] are like elephants; they have adequate supplies of men and equipment—but they have no leader." Then Hishām said: "Shame on you! What has al-Kinānī (Naṣr) been doing?" Maghrā' said: "Naṣr is so old that he does not even recognize his own son." But Hishām did not accept Maghrā''s statement. He sent someone to the public guesthouse and Shubayl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Māzinī[332] was brought to him. Hishām said to him: "Tell me about Naṣr." Shubayl said: "There is no need to fear that he is so old as to be in his dotage nor that he is too young to possess sound judgment. He is experienced and tried. He was in charge of all the borders and wars in Khurāsān even before he became governor."

Yūsuf was told by letter about what had happened and he posted spies. When Naṣr's delegation reached al-Mawṣil, they left the road taken by the postal service[333] and instead used byways until they reached Bayhaq.[334] Naṣr had also been informed by letter about what Shubayl had said. Now Ibrāhīm b. Bassām was in the delegation. Yūsuf practiced a deception on him, telling him that Naṣr was dead and that accordingly he had himself appointed [1721] al-Ḥakam b. al-Ṣalt b. Abī 'Aqīl as governor of Khurāsān. So Ibrāhīm suggested to him the people to whom he should allocate all the provinces of Khurāsān.[335] Then Ibrāhīm b. Ziyād, the envoy of Naṣr, came to Ibrāhīm b. Bassām and told him that Yūsuf had tricked him. Ibrāhīm b. Bassām replied: "Yūsuf has destroyed me."

It is said that Naṣr sent Maghrā' together with Ḥamlah b. Nu'aym al-Kalbī (to Hishām). When they came to Yūsuf, Yūsuf aroused ambition in Maghrā', promising that if Maghrā' impugned Naṣr's reputation in front of Hishām, he (Yūsuf) would make Maghrā' governor of Sind. When Maghrā' and Ḥamlah came to

330. Anjadu ("more courageous"). The apparatus has a variant, aḥaddu ("more sharp"), which is followed by the Cairo edition (194).

331. Firāsiyyah. It is suggested tentatively in the glossary that this is a collective term for men skilled in horsemanship. This meaning is followed here.

332. Presumably this man was a visitor from Khurāsān.

333. For the route taken by the postal service, cf. Sprenger, Die Post- und Reiserouten des Orients.

334. The district of Bayhaq lay four days' march west from Nishāpūr. The town of Sabzavār was also known in medieval times as Bayhaq. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 391.

Hishām, Maghrā' mentioned Naṣr's courage, valor, and skill in affairs, and he was profuse in his praise. Then he continued: "Would that God would allow us to enjoy (for a while longer) what is left of him!" Hishām sat up straight and said: "What do you mean by 'what is left of him'?" Maghrā' said: "Naṣr can recognize a man only by his voice, he only understands what is said to him if people get up close to him, and his own voice is so faint that it is scarcely intelligible because he is so old." Then Ḥamlah al-Kalbī stood up and said: "O Commander of the Faithful, Maghrā' is lying. By God, Naṣr is not as he said he is. He is as he is."[336] Hishām said: "Naṣr is not as Maghrā' has described him. This is the doing of Yūsuf b. 'Umar, who is motivated by envy of Naṣr."

Yūsuf had written to Hishām mentioning that Naṣr was old and infirm, recommending Salm b. Qutaybah to him.[337] Hishām wrote back to him: "Stop talking about al-Kinānī." Then on his return to Yūsuf, Maghrā' said: "You are aware of what Naṣr has suffered at my hand and you know how (badly) I have behaved [1722] toward him. So there is no future[338] for me in being with him and there is no point in my staying on in Khurāsān. Therefore give orders for me to stay here." Yūsuf accordingly wrote to Naṣr saying: "I have transferred Maghrā''s name (from the Khurāsān register to that of Iraq).[339] So send me those of his family who are with you."

It is said that when Yūsuf ordered Maghrā' to give false witness against Naṣr, Maghrā' said: "How can I run him down after the difficult times he has been through and his kind actions toward me and my family?" But Yūsuf continued to press him, so

335. Qassama lahu Ibrāhīm Khurāsāna kullahu. This seems to mean that Ibrāhīm made suggestions as to who should assume rule over the individual parts of Khurāsān now that he believed Naṣr was dead. Cf. Gloss., p. CDXXIII.

336. Mā huwa kamā qāla huwa wa huwa. The Cairo edition (194) punctuates this phrase to make better sense and omits the wa: mā huwa kamā qāla; huwa huwa. This reading has been followed in the translation.

337. Salm b. Qutaybah was not the only member of his family who was a contender for the governorship of Khurāsān. His brother Qaṭan and his cousin Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān were also in the running. For Salm's career, cf. Crone, 137.

338. Khayr (lit., "benefit").

339. Qad ḥawwaltu ismahu.

Maghrā' said: "With what can I reproach him? Should I find fault with his experience, his obedience, his good fortune in affairs, or his skillful government?" Yūsuf said: "Reproach him for being old." When Maghrā' went in to see Hishām, he spoke about Naṣr in the most glowing terms, and then, at the end of his speech, he said: "If only. . ." Then Hishām sat up straight and said: "What do you mean by 'If only'?" Maghrā' said: "If only old age had not overtaken him." Hishām said: "Come on now! Old age has not yet overtaken him." Maghrā' said: "Naṣr only recognizes a man close up and then only by his voice. He has become too weak to raid and ride." This distressed Hishām but then Ḥamlah b. Nu'aym spoke up.

When Naṣr heard about what Maghrā' had said he sent Hārūn b. al-Siyāwush to al-Ḥakam b. Numaylah, who was in the saddlers' quarter (al-sarrājīn) reviewing the troops (jund). Hārūn grabbed him by the foot, dragged him from a carpet on which he was sitting, and broke his flag on his head. Then he hit him in the face with his carpet and said: "This is how God deals with traitors."

[1723] According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—al-Ḥārith b. Aflaḥ b. Mālik b. Asmā' b. Khārijah: When Naṣr became governor of Khurāsān he made particular favorites of Maghrā' b. Aḥmar b. Mālik b. Sāriyah al-Numayrī,[340] al-Ḥakam b. Numaylah b. Mālik, and al-Ḥajjāj b. Hārūn b. Mālik. Maghrā' b. Aḥmar al-Numayrī was the leader of the people of Qinnasrīn.[341] Naṣr gave preference to Maghrā', appointed him to a privileged position,[342] and accepted his intercessions in respect of what he needed.[343] Naṣr appointed Maghrā''s nephew, al-Ḥakam b. Numaylah, as agent ('āmil) of al-Jūzajān (Jūzjān).[344] Then he put him in charge of the ahl al-'āliyah.[345] This was a responsibility that his father in al-

340. Some of the Banū Numayr had settled in Northern Syria in the early Islamic period. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 450.

341. A town in northern Syria. The medieval geographers speak of its former greatness and comment on its insignificance in their own time. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 184–87; Ibn Ḥawqal, 118; *EI*², "Ḳinnasrīn" (N. Elisséeff); Le Strange, Palestine, 486.

342. Sannā manzilatahu. Cf. Gloss., p. CCXCIX.

343. Wa-shaffa'ahu fī ḥawā'ijihi.

344. A district in Afghan Turkestan between the Murghāb and the Oxus. Cf. *EI*², "Djūzdjān" (R. Hartmann); Le Strange, Lands, 423; Ḥudūd, 328–32.

345. The ahl al-'āliyah were a group consisting predominantly of Qays who are mentioned as one of the divisions (akhmās, "fifths") in al-Baṣrah. Cf. Djaït, 163.

Baṣrah had had before him; and 'Ukabah b. Numaylah took it on after him. Later on, Naṣr dispatched a delegation of Syrians and Khurāsānīs, and he appointed Maghrā' to be in charge of them. Ḥamlah b. Nu'aym al-Kalbī was also in the delegation. 'Uthmān b. Ṣadaqah b. Waththāb said to Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim,[346] the agent ('āmil) of Ṭukhāristān:[347]

Muslim gave me a choice of his riding animals and I said: "It is enough for me to have Muslim as my judge;
This is the hero and lord of the Banū 'Āmir.
It is honor enough for anyone to rule over the Banū 'Āmir."

The poet was referring to al-Ḥakam b. Numaylah. Naṣr's attitude toward the Qays altered for the worse and he was troubled by what Maghrā' had done.

Abū Numaylah Ṣāliḥ al-Abbār, the mawlā of the Banū 'Abs, had left (al-Kūfah) with Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn and he stayed with Yaḥyā until the latter was killed in Jūzjān. Naṣr had been angry with Abū Numaylah because of this, so the latter approached 'Ubaydallāh b. Bassām, Naṣr's friend, and recited as follows:

I was in distress, perplexed and troubled until 'Ubaydallāh removed my anxiety from me. [1724]
I cried out to him and he rose joyfully to the honor just as the whiteness of the full moon illuminates the darkness.[348]
So rise up with the judgment and the springing leap of a lion!
If on the day of battle you act like a high-minded man,
You will win to your side one whose courage (muruwwah) has reached its zenith and whose Lord has singled him out for His favor.
Steadfast in resolution, striking blows like a lion, he advances against death on the day of fear.

346. Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim al-Bāhilī had been governor of Balkh for Junayd. He was the nephew of Qutaybah b. Muslim. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1529–32, 1663–64.

347. The area to the east of Balkh which stretched along the south side of the Oxus as far as the frontiers of Badakhshān. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 426–27.

348. The text has azlāmi. The Cairo edition (196) has iẓlāmi, which seems better.

He is not one to prattle in the assembly, nor to blab his secrets in his speech. Nor is he one who argues his opponents into silence.
The garment and seat of forbearance are his,
at a time when men of understanding are dishonored by public assemblies.

So 'Ubaydallāh took Abū Numaylah in to see Naṣr. Then Abū Numaylah said: "May God order your affairs aright! Indeed, I am weak. If you think it appropriate, give me permission to recite." Naṣr gave him permission and Abū Numaylah recited the following:

The gaming arrow of al-Kalbī has won the day, but as for Maghrā', his efforts were impeded by his ignoble descent.
O sons of Numayr, make it clear and then make it clear again, was Maghrā' born a slave or was he of pure parentage?
If he is to you as treason and faithlessness are to the character of an honorable man, [1725] And if he is a descendant of slaves, then no blame will attach to you because of his treason.
The sons of Layth gave him their patronage—and what great patronage it was!—
granting him unsolicited favors and an important position.
They fattened him up and when he had attained an enviable state of well-being through the kindness[349] they had accorded him, He betrayed his patrons as easily as the wild striped ass brays in the wilderness.
So, as a warning to others and in censure of him, we likened him to a dog[350]—for blame should go to him who is worthy of it—
And we praised the sons of Layth, for excellence

349. The text has min sabīhā al-maqsūmi. This is corrected in the Cairo edition (196) to min saybihā al-maqsūmi, which makes better sense.

350. Cf. Qur'ān 7, 176: fa-mathaluhu ka-mathali al-kalbi. Cf. also the saying: "Fatten up your dog and he will eat you," quoted in G. R. Smith and M. A. S. Abdel Haleem, The Book of the Superiority of Dogs over many of Those who wear Clothes, Warminster, 1978, p. xxx.

is the exclusive mark of men of liberality, generosity, and good judgement.
Learn, then, you sons of mighty, victorious lions, and you people of al-Ṣafāh and of al-Ḥatīm,[351]
That the gratitude of pious men is enough to outweigh the words of one who is suspected of evil conduct and whose honor is impugned.[352] God has seen what you have done and the barking of dogs[353] will never stop the stars shining.[354]

When Abū Numaylah had finished, Naṣr said: "You have spoken truly." The Qays then spoke and asked for pardon.

Naṣr scorned the Qays and sent them away because of what Maghrā' had done. In this context, a poet recited the following:

God has made the noble ones hateful to you just as the Merciful One made the Qays hateful to Naṣr.
I saw Abū Layth scorning their leaders and bringing close to him all those who have only tenuous links with him.[355]

In this year Yazīd b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik led the people on the pilgrimage.[356] I was told this by Aḥmad b. Thābit from his informants on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā from Abū Ma'shar. The same report was also given by al-Wāqidī.

The agents ('ummāl) of the garrison cities in this year were the same as in the preceding one, and I have already mentioned them.

---

351. Evocative place names from the Ḥijāz.

352. Mawṣūm ("one whose honor is subjected to envious detracting"). Cf. Gloss., p. DLVIII.

353. There may well be an astronomical allusion here. Cf. Sirius, Procyon, and the kilāb al-shitā' (stars that set aurorally in winter).

354. The text wrongly has lan yanquṣu. This is corrected to lan yanquṣa in Add., p. DCCXI.

355. Wa-yudnā ilayhi kulla dhī wālithin ghumri. This seems to be analogous to the phrase dhū 'ahdin wālithin ("he who has a weak covenant"). Cf. Gloss., p. DLXV.

356. Cf. al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 394. Yazīd b. Hishām was given the nickname of al-Afqam. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 370.

The Events of the Year 124

(November 15, 741–November 3, 742)

[1726]

Amongst the events taking place during this year was the arrival in al-Kūfah of a group of 'Abbāsid supporters who were making for Mecca.[357] According to some historians, Bukayr b. Māhān bought Abū Muslim, the leader of the 'Abbāsid da'wah, from 'Īsā b. Ma'qil al-'Ijlī.

The Reason Why Bukayr b. Māhān Bought Abū Muslim

The sources differ on this matter. According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Ḥamzah b. Ṭalḥah al-Sulamī—his father: Bukayr b. Māhān[358] was scribe to one of the agents ('ummāl) of Sind. He went to al-Kūfah and the 'Abbāsid supporters assembled in a house there. Then mischievous rumors circulated about 357. These men were the leaders (nuqabā') of the 'Abbāsids in Khurāsān.

358. Bukayr b. Māhān came originally from Sijistān and had served the governor of Sind, al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. He was won over to the Hāshimiyyah in 102 (720–21). He had visited Khurāsān twice on behalf of the imām Muḥammad. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (D. Sourdel); al-Ṭabarī, II, 1639.

them and they were arrested. Bukayr was imprisoned and the others were released. Also in the prison were Abū ʿĀṣim Yūnus and ʿĪsā b. Maʿqil al-ʿIjlī, who had Abū Muslim[359] with him as his servant. Then Bukayr invited them to support the ʿAbbāsid cause and they were won over to his views. Then Bukayr said to ʿĪsā b. Maʿqil: "Who is this young man?" ʿĪsā replied: "He is a slave." Bukayr inquired: "Will you sell him?" ʿĪsā responded: "He is yours." Bukayr said: "I would like you to take a proper price for him." ʿĪsā replied: "He is yours for whatever price you want," so Bukayr gave ʿĪsā four hundred dirhams. Then they were released from prison and Bukayr sent Abū Muslim to Ibrāhīm,[360] who gave him to Mūsā al-Sarrāj.[361] Abū Muslim learned (much) from Mūsā and memorized what the latter told him. Then he began making repeated journeys to Khurāsān.

Other reports said: In the year 124 [November 15, 741–November 3, 742] Sulaymān b. Kathīr,[362] Mālik b. al-Haytham, Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ,[363] and Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb[364] left Khurāsān, [1727] making for Mecca. When they entered al-Kūfah, they went to ʿĀṣim b. Yūnus al-ʿIjlī, who was in prison under suspicion of spreading propaganda on behalf of the ʿAbbāsids. With ʿĀṣim were ʿĪsā and Idrīs, the sons of Maʿqil, whom Yūsuf b. ʿUmar had imprisoned, and those agents (ʿummāl) of Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh whom he had also put in prison. ʿĪsā and Idrīs were accompanied by Abū Muslim, who was their servant. The Khurāsānīs recognized unusual qualities (ʿalāmāt) in Abū Muslim, and they said: "Who is this?" The people in the prison replied: "A young man from al-Sarrājīn[365] who is with us." Abū Muslim had listened to ʿĪsā and 359. The future leader of the revolutionary ʿAbbāsid movement in Khurāsān. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (S. Moscati); Wellhausen, 518 ff; Shaban, ʿAbbāsid revolution, 153–57.

360. Ibrāhīm succeeded his father as ʿAbbāsid imām in 125 (743).

361. Ibn al-Athīr has Abū Mūsā al-Sarrāj (V, 191).

362. After the death of Khidāsh in 118 (736), Sulaymān b. Kathīr was appointed by the ʿAbbāsid imām, Muḥammad, to take charge of the ʿAbbāsid organization in Khurāsān. He is named as one of the six ʿAbbāsid chiefs in Marw. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1586; Shaban, ʿAbbāsid Revolution, 151–54.

363. Mālik b. al-Haytham and Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ were amongst a group of ʿAbbāsid supporters who had been imprisoned by Asad al-Qasrī in 117 (735). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1586.

364. Cf. *EI*², Ḳaḥṭaba (M. Sharon).

365. Abū Muslim learned the trade of saddler from Abū Mūsā al-Sarrāj and would take saddles to Iṣfahān, Mosul, and other places to sell them. Cf. Ibn al-

Idrīs talking about the 'Abbāsid cause[366] and when he heard them he wept. When they saw him reacting in this way, they invited him to join their movement and he agreed.[367]

In this year Sulaymān b. Hishām[368] went on a summer raiding expedition. In battle he met Leo, the king of Byzantium, and he returned safely, having taken plunder.[369]

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās died.[370] According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informants—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: Muḥammad b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl led the people on the pilgrimage in this year.[371] Al-Wāqidī gave the same report.

Also in this year 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik[372] went on the pilgrimage, accompanied by his wife, Umm Salamah, the daughter of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Yazīd, the [1728] mawlā of Abū al-Zinād: I saw Muḥammad b. Hishām at Umm Salamah's door.[373] He was sending in his greetings and there were many gifts from him at her door. He begged her to accept Athīr, V, 191–92. Al-Sarrājīn (the saddle makers' [quarter]) was apparently in Marw.

---

366. Literally, "this viewpoint."

367. For other reports on Abū Muslim in Yūsuf's prison, cf. al-Dīnawarī, 339–41; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 392–93.

368. This son of the caliph Hishām was later to play an important role at the time of the coup of Marwān b. Muḥammad in 127 (744). Cf. Hawting, 96–99. He had considerable military experience on the Byzantine frontier and was at the head of an armed force known as the Dhakwāniyyah, which numbered several thousand men. Cf. Crone, 53.

369. There is a similar report in al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 395. According to Christian sources, however, it was Leo's son whom Sulaymān met in battle, since Leo III had died on June 18, 741 (i.e., in the preceding Muslim year, 123 A.H.). Cf. Brooks, "Arabs in Asia Minor," 202.

370. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 372; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 195. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās had come to prominence on the death of Abū Hāshim in 98 (716), when one group known as the Hāshimiyyah held him to be their imām. Muḥammad sent out missionaries to Khurāsān from around 100 (718). Cf. *EI*², "'Abbāsids" (B. Lewis); and n. 395.

371. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 372.

372. The caliph Hishām's nephew. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

373. The inclusion of this anecdote probably suggests that Muḥammad b. Hishām was acting in an improper way toward Umm Salamah. Presumably the Muḥammad b. Hishām mentioned here is the man mentioned as being in charge of the pilgrimage.

them and she refused. Finally, when he had given up hope of her accepting his presents, she gave orders that they should be taken in.[374]

The agents ('ummāl) of the garrison cities in this year were the same as in the years 122 [December 7, 739–November 25, 740] and 123 [November 26, 740–November 14, 741], and they have already been mentioned.

374. Literally, "When he had given up hope of her accepting his present, she gave orders that it should be taken in."

The Events of the Year

125

(November 4, 742–October 24, 743)

Amongst the events taking place during this year was a summer raid made by al-Nu'man b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.[375]

Also in this year occurred the death of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān. According to Abū Ma'shar: Hishām died after six nights had elapsed of the month of Rabī' II [February 6, 743]. The same report was given by Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informants—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā. Al-Wāqidī, al-Madā'inī, and others gave the same report, but they said that Hishām's death occurred on a Wednesday, after six nights had elapsed of the month of Rabī' II [Wednesday, February 6, 743].

The length of Hishām's caliphate, according to all reports, was nineteen years. According to al-Madā'inī and Ibn al-Kalbī: Hishām ruled for nineteen years, seven months and twenty-one days. According to Abū Ma'shar: (nineteen years) and eight and one-half months. According to al-Wāqidī: (nineteen years,) seven months and ten nights.

---

375. For this expedition, cf. al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 395. For al-Nu'mān, cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

There was some divergence of opinion over Hishām's age. According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī: Hishām died when he was fifty-five years old. Some reports said: Hishām died when he was fifty-two years old. According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]: On the day Hishām died he was fifty-four years old. His death occurred at al-Ruṣāfah, where his grave is to be found. His kunyah was Abū al-Walīd.[376] [1729]

The Malady That Caused Hishām's Death

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr[377]—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—Shaybah b. 'Uthmān—'Amr b. Kalī'[378]—Sālim Abū al-'Alā':[379] One day, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik came out to us.[380] His appearance betrayed the fact that he was in melancholy mood. His clothes were hanging loosely on him and he had slackened the reins of his steed. He rode for an hour [in this state] and then he roused himself from his listlessness, arranged his clothes, took the reins of his horse, and said to al-Rabī': "Call al-Abrash." Al-Abrash was summoned and Hishām walked between me and al-Abrash. Al-Abrash said to him: "O Commander of the Faithful, I saw you doing something that troubled me." Hishām said: "What is that?" Al-Abrash said: "I saw you go out in a state of mind that troubled me." Hishām replied: "Come on now, Abrash! How can I not be troubled when men of wisdom (ahl al-'ilm) have claimed that I will be dead in thirty-three days' time?"

---

376. For the length of Hishām's rule, the date of his death and his age, cf. also Ibn Khayyāṭ, 372; Ibn Qutaybah, 185; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 394; Fragmenta, 107; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, 456–57; al-Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 295; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, II, 286; Hamzah, 129.

377. Aḥmad b. Zuhayr, also known as Aḥmad b. Abī Haythamah, d. 279 (892–93), was a Ḥanbalī jurist. He was one of al-Ṭabarī's authorities for the Baṣran and Medinan historical traditions, which he reported from his father. Cf. Pedersen, 'Alī and Mu'āwiya, 110; Ibn Ḥajar, Mīzān, I, 174; Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 174.

378. The reading Kalī' is uncertain. Other variants, Waki' and Dulay', are cited in the apparatus.

379. According to the Leiden index, this Sālim is not Hishām's famous kātib, who was in charge of the dīwān al-rasā'il. The index is probably wrong. Grignasci, who presents a clear discussion of the identity of Sālim, the kātib, calls him Sālim Abū al-'Alā; cf. Rasā'il, 12–13.

Sālim continued: I went back to my house and I wrote on a scroll: "The Commander of the Faithful said on such-and-such a day that he would die[381] in thirty-three days." On the night when the thirty-three days were up, a slave came knocking at my door saying: "Come to the Commander of the Faithful and bring with you the medicine for diphtheria (dhubaḥah)."[382] Hishām had [1730] taken the medicine once before, had treated himself with it,[383] and had regained his strength. So I left, taking the medicine with me. Hishām gargled with it. The pain increased in intensity and then subsided. Hishām said to me: "Sālim, some of the pain I was feeling has eased, so go to your family and leave the medicine with me." Then I went away and hardly had an hour passed before I heard loud voices lamenting: "The Commander of the Faithful is dead."

As soon as Hishām had died, the treasurers shut the doors. People looked for a copper pan in which to heat some water to wash Hishām's body, but they could not find one until they asked a neighbor to lend them one. One of the people present on that occasion said: "There is a warning in this for anyone who heeds it."[384] Hishām died of diphtheria. When he died, his son, Maslamah b. Hishām, prayed over him.

Some Biographical Details about Hishām

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Wasnān al-'Arajī[385]—Ibn Abī Nuhaylah—'Aqqāl b. Shab-

380. A similar story is also given in Fragmenta, 106.

381. Yusāfiru. Cf. Gloss., p. CCXCI.

382. Although dhubaḥah is used in modern Arabic to denote angina pectoris, it may well not be the illness that is meant here. Gabrieli states that Hishām died of angina, cf. Califfato, 140. Dhubaḥah most probably denotes a throat obstruction caused by diphtheria or quinsy, hence Hishām's gargling with the medicine.

383. Fa-ta'ālaja.

384. Hishām's avarice was legendary. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, I, 233; al-Jāḥiẓ, Bukhalā', 28, 214. Alternatively, this may be a sententious comment to the effect that death is no respecter of persons.

385. The reading Wasnān is uncertain. The apparatus has two variants, Rasnān and Rasyān. This appears to be the only place where this person is mentioned by al-Ṭabarī.

bah:[386] I went in to see Hishām, who was wearing a tunic (qabā') made of green fur. Hishām was sending me to Khurāsān and he began to give me my instructions. I kept looking at the cloak and he became aware of this and inquired: "What is the matter with you?" I said: "Before you become caliph, I saw you wearing a tunic made of green fur. I was wondering if this is the same one or a different one." Hishām said: "By the One God, this is the same [1731] one. I do not possess any other tunic. But this money that you see me collecting and hoarding is for you all." 'Aqqāl was in the service of Hishām. As for Shabbah, 'Aqqāl's father, he worked for 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.[387] 'Aqqāl used to say: "When I went in to see Hishām, I found him a man chock-full[388] of intelligence."

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Marwān b. Shujā', a mawlā of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam:[389] I was in the service of Muḥammad b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. He sent for me one day and I went in to see him. He was angry and sorrowful, so I said: "What is the matter with you?" Muḥammad said: "A Christian hit my servant on the head," and he began railing against the Christian. I said to him: "Take it easy." He said: "What can I do?" I replied: "Arraign him before the judge." He said: "Is there nothing else I can do?" I replied: "No." Then a eunuch of his said to him: "I will settle this for you." So the eunuch went and gave the Christian a beating. When Hishām heard about this, he sought out the eunuch, who called on Muḥammad for protection. Muḥammad b. Hishām said: "I gave you no orders." The eunuch retorted: "Yes, by God, you certainly did give me orders!" Then Hishām gave the eunuch a beating and rebuked his son.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī): In the time of Hishām nobody went around with a retinue except Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik. One day Hishām saw Sālim with a retinue, so he forbade him to do so and warned him: "I shall certainly find out if you go around with a retinue!" Thereafter, whenever a stranger came up and walked along with him, Sālim would stop and say, "What do you want?" and he would prevent the man from walk-386. 'Aqqāl b. Shabbah al-Tamīmī al-Khaṭīb. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1755–56, 1820.

387. Umayyad caliph who ruled 65–86 (685–705).
388. Literally, "stuffed."
389. Umayyad caliph who ruled 64–65 (684–85).

ing along with him. Yet it seems that it was Sālim who dominated Hishām.[390]

None of the Marwānids[391] used to draw an army stipend[392]
[1732] unless they had to go on raids. Some of them raided in person and some of them sent out a substitute. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik had a mawlā called Ya'qūb, who used to take Hishām's stipend, i.e. two hundred and one dīnārs, for he was treated to an extra dīnār. Ya'qūb would take the money and go out on raids. The Marwānids used to make themselves dīwān guards[393] and gave themselves other posts which allowed them to stay put and which exempted them from the obligation of going out on raids. Dāwūd and 'Īsā,[394] the two sons of 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās[395] by the same mother, served as guards to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh[396] in the east, in Iraq.[397] They stayed with Khālid and he gave them money. If that had not been the case, he would not have been able to detain them.[398] Khālid made them guards and they spent their nights talking to Khālid and engaging him in their conversations.

Hishām entrusted an estate of his to one of his mawlās. The mawlā made it flourish and the estate yielded a large income. He continued to make the estate prosper and its income was doubled. The mawlā sent his son to take the income; the latter presented it to Hishām and told him how the estate was faring. Hishām re-

390. Wa-kāna Sālimun ka-annahu huwa ammara Hishāman. Literally: "it was as if Sālim had made Hishām amīr." This translation is only tentative.

391. The Banū Marwān, the descendants of Marwān I (cf. n. 389 above), from whose number the Umayyad caliphs were drawn from 65 (685) until the fall of the dynasty in 132 (750).

392. 'Aṭā'. Cf. EI[2], s.v. (C. Cahen).

393. Fī a'wāni al-dīwāni. Cf. Gloss., p. CCCLXXXIII.

394. Prominent members of the 'Abbāsid family who were subsequently involved in the overthrow of the Umayyads. Cf. Wellhausen, 543–44.

395. The grandson of al-'Abbās, the Prophet's uncle. 'Alī was the father of the imām Muḥammad. Cf. n. 370.

396. Khālid al-Qasrī.

397. Fī a'wāni al-sharqi bi-al-'Irāqi. This translation is only tentative. The apparatus has a variant reading, fī al-sūqi ("in the market"), which is preferred in the Cairo edition, 202. Neither version is very satisfactory when followed by "in Iraq."

398. Fa-aqāmā 'indahu fa-waṣalahumā wa-lawlā dhālika lam yastaṭi' an yaḥbisahumā. This is rather obscure. Waṣalahumā has been translated as "he gave them money," and the verb ḥabasa as "to detain," rather than "to imprison." Presumably, Khālid made guards of the two 'Abbāsids as a device to keep them close to him.

warded him well and the boy saw that Hishām was pleased, so he said: "O Commander of the Faithful, I have a request." Hishām said: "What is it?" The boy said: "Ten more dīnārs in my stipend." Hishām said: "You all seem sure that ten dīnārs in the stipend are a mere trifle.[399] No, by my life, I will not do it!"

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Ja'far b. Sulaymān[400]—'Abdallāh b. 'Alī:[401] I scrutinized the registers (dawāwīn) of the Marwānids and I have never seen a more sound register than that of Hishām nor one which was more beneficial both to the common people and to the government. According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Ghassān b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd:[402] Nobody amongst the Marwānids was more avaricious [1733] in dealing with his associates and registers than Hishām nor did any of the Marwānids investigate (the activities of) his officials with such extreme thoroughness as did Hishām.[403]

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Ḥammād al-Abaḥḥ: Hishām said to Ghaylān:[404] "Fie on you, Ghaylān! People have been spreading gossip about you, so let's hear your side of the argument. If it is the truth, we shall support you; and if it is false you will be made to stop thinking that way." Ghaylān agreed, so Hishām called Maymūn b. Mihrān[405] to question

---

399. Literally, "the value of an almond."

400. Ja'far b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī al-Hāshimī was governor of Medina under al-Manṣūr (r. 136–58/745–75). Cf. Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 106, 277, 494; al-Ṭabarī, III, 247, 249.

401. This may well be a reference to 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh, the uncle of the 'Abbāsid caliph, al-Manṣūr. Cf. Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 259, 330; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 73–77, 176–77, 214–18.

402. Perhaps this is the son of Sālim's successor, the kātib 'Abd al-Ḥamīd. Cf. *EI*², "'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Yaḥyā" (H. A. R. Gibb), and Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, III, 89. Ghassān b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd was the secretary of Ja'far b. Sulaymān. Cf. Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 274, 277.

403. Hishām was apparently interested in the administrative methods of the ancient empires. Cf. Gibb, Studies, 63. According to al-Mas'ūdī, al-Manṣūr followed the fine precedents established by Hishām, whom he admired as one of the three great Umayyad leaders; the other two were Mu'āwiyah and 'Abd al-Malik.

404. Abū Marwān Ghaylān b. Muslim (or b. Marwān) al-Qibṭī al-Dimashqī was one of the Qadariyyah who advocated free will in Islam. For Ghaylān's career and writings, cf. Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 257, 274, 388; Ibn Qutaybah, 244; Cook, 81, 141, 232; Van Ess, Anfänge, 45; Watt, Formative Period, 85–86.

405. Maymūn b. Mihrān was in charge of justice in the Jazīrah under the caliph 'Umar II (r. 99–101/717–20). For an analysis of this discussion in front of Hishām, cf. Watt, 86.

Ghaylān. Maymūn said to Ghaylān: "You ask first, since the case is strongest if you ask first." So Ghaylān said to Maymūn: "Has God willed that he should be disobeyed?" Then Maymūn replied to Ghaylān: "Was God disobeyed if He did not will it so?" Ghaylān was silent and Hishām said: "Give him an answer." But Ghaylān still did not answer him. Then Hishām said to Maymūn: "God will not forgive me for my errors if I forgive Ghaylān his." So Hishām gave orders that Ghaylān's hands and feet should be cut off.

According to Aḥmad [b. Zuhayr]—'Alī [al-Madā'inī]—a man of Banū Ghanī[406]—Bishr, the mawlā of Hishām: A man who had singing girls, wine, and a guitar in his home was brought to Hishām. Hishām said: "Break the lute over his head." The instrument struck the shaykh, who wept. Bishr [the narrator] said: "I said to him, by way of consolation: 'Be patient.' He retorted: 'Do you think I am crying because I was struck? I am only crying because of the contempt which Hishām showed toward the guitar when he called it a lute!'"

A man spoke rudely to Hishām, and Hishām said to him: "You should not speak rudely to your imām."

Hishām went in search of one of his sons who had not attended the Friday prayer. Hishām said to him: "What prevented you from performing the prayer?" His son said: "My horse has died." Hishām said: "Why didn't you walk instead of missing the Friday prayer?" Then he deprived his son of a horse for a year.

Sulaymān b. Hishām wrote to his father as follows:[407] "My mule is too weak to carry me. If the Commander of the Faithful [1734] thinks it appropriate to issue orders for me to be given a horse, then let him do so." Hishām wrote back to Sulaymān as follows: "The Commander of the Faithful has understood your letter and what you have said about the weak condition of your riding animal. The Commander of the Faithful thinks that this situation has arisen from your negligence in feeding the animal, and that its fodder is being wasted. So see to the maintenance of your animal personally and the Commander of the Faithful will further consider the matter of your transport."[408]

---

406. On the Banū Ghanī, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 272.
407. Al-Mas'ūdī relates the same story. Cf. Murūj, V, 478.
408. Fī ḥumlānika: Literally, "your riding beast." Cf. Gloss., p. CCX.

One of Hishām's finance officials wrote to him as follows: "I have sent the Commander of the Faithful a basket of peaches.[409] Let the Commander of the Faithful write and tell me that it has arrived safely." Hishām wrote back to him: "The peaches which you sent have reached the Commander of the Faithful and he liked them. So send him some more and close the receptacle tightly."

Hishām wrote to one of his finance officials as follows: "The truffles which you sent the Commander of the Faithful have arrived. There are forty of them and some of them have gone bad. The only reason they got like that was because of the way they were packed. If you send any more of them to the Commander of the Faithful, fill with sand the jar in which you put them so that they will not move about and knock against each other."

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd—a mawlā belonging to Hishām: A mawlā belonging to Hishām who was on one of his estates sent me with two fine birds. I then went in to see Hishām, who was sitting on a sofa[410] in the courtyard of the house. Hishām said: "Put them in the house." So I did so and he looked at them. Then I said: "O Commander of the Faithful, what about my reward?" Hishām said: "Shame on you! What is a suitable reward for two birds?" I said: [1735] "Whatever you think." Hishām said: "Take one of the birds," so I ran into the house to look at the birds. Hishām said: "What are you doing?" I replied: "I am choosing the better of the two birds." Hishām said: "Are you choosing the better of the two and leaving me with the worse one? Leave them both and we will give you forty or fifty dirhams."[411]

(Before becoming caliph) Hishām was assigned a piece of land called Dawrīn. He sent people to take possession of it and they found it in a state of ruin. Hishām said to Dhuwayd, a scribe who was (working) in Syria: "Now then, what strategem can we use here?" Dhuwayd said: "What will you do for me in return?" Hishām said: "Four hundred dīnārs." So Dhuwayd set down the words "Dawrīn and its villages" in the registers. Hishām drew a lot of income (from this estate). Later, when Hishām became

409. Durrāqin: "Syrian peaches." Cf. Lisān, I, 971.
410. For a discussion of sarīr, cf. n. 112.
411. This story is also told by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 477.

caliph, Dhuwayd went in to see him. Hishām said: "Dawrīn and its villages. No, by God, you will never govern a province for me," and he banished Dhuwayd from Syria.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Umayr b. Yazīd—Abū Khālid—al-Walīd b. Khulayd: Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik saw me riding a Ṭukhārī horse, and he said to me: "O Walīd b. Khulayd, what is this horse?" I said: "Al-Junayd gave it to me." Hishām was envious of me and he said: "By God, there are too many of these Ṭukhārī horses around." Yet when 'Abd al-Malik had died, we found amongst his riding-animals only one single Ṭukhārī horse. His sons vied with one other as to which of them should take it, and each of them thought that if he did not possess it himself he had not inherited anything worth having from 'Abd al-Malik.[412]

One of the family[413] of Marwān[414] said to Hishām: "How can [1736] you, who are miserly and cowardly, want the caliphate?" Hishām replied: "Why should I not want it, seeing that I am forbearing and decent?"[415]

One day Hishām said to al-Abrash: "Have your she-goats given birth yet?" Al-Abrash said: "By God, yes." Hishām said: "But my she-goats are late in giving birth. Take me out to see your she-goats and let me have some of their milk." Al-Abrash said: "Yes. Shall I send people on in advance (to make preparations)?" Hishām said "No." Al-Abrash said: "Shall we send a tent ahead so that it can be put up for us?" Hishām said "Yes." Accordingly, al-Abrash sent out two men with a tent and it was put up. Early the next morning, Hishām, al-Abrash and the people went out, Hishām and al-Abrash each seated themselves on a stool, and an ewe was brought to each of them. Hishām milked the ewe with his own hand and said: "Take note, Abrash, that I had no difficulty in

412. It is possible that this was the type of horse that had been much in demand for the Sasanian armored cavalry and had also been exported for centuries to China—the celebrated "blood-sweating" horse of the Oxus. Cf. Watson, Genius, 110, 119–20. A similar story is told by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 478–79.

413. The text has ālī. This is corrected later to āli. Cf. Add., p. DCCXI. The Cairo edition (VII, 205) has the corrected form.

414. According to al-Mas'ūdī, it was Maslamah, the brother of Hishām, who teased Hishām in this way. Cf. Murūj, V, 479.

415. Anā ḥalīmun 'afīfun. Al-Mas'ūdī has anā ḥakīmun wa-'ālimun ("I am wise and knowledgeable"). Cf. Murūj, loc. cit.

getting the milk to flow."[416] Then Hishām ordered that the bread dough should be brought and it was kneaded.[417] Then Hishām lit the fire himself, made a hollow in it for the bread, and threw in the bread. He began turning it over with the poker and said: "Well Abrash, what do you think of my expertise?" When the bread was cooked thoroughly Hishām removed it. He began hitting it with the poker, saying: "This is just for you!" And al-Abrash would reply "Here I am"[418] (this is what young boys say when bread is being baked for them). Then Hishām and the people ate lunch and he returned home.

'Ilbā' b. Manẓūr al-Laythī came to Hishām and recited the following to him:

'Ulayyah said, when I decided to undertake a journey on a bewildered she-camel flapping her ears:
"How can you contemplate a journey when all the people of your family, old and young alike, are dependent on you?
The young ones are like little sand-grouse, wealthy neither in property nor in kinsfolk."

(I replied): "I am traveling to the king of Syria, the one to whom every care-burdened man[419] makes his way.

I will certainly leave you rich, provided I stay alive, [1737] through the gifts of the caliph, that dispenser of glittering largesse.
We are indeed a people whose court is dead;[420]

---

416. Lam abuss al-ḥalaba. Cf. Lisān, I, 212. Hishām is clearly proud of his prowess in milking.

417. Amara bi-mallaṭin fa-'ujinat. The mallah can mean the hollow made in the fire for baking bread, or the hot dust and ashes in which the bread is cooked. Khubzu mallatin is bread baked in hot ashes. Cf. Lane, I, Supplement, 3023. In view of the following verb, 'ujinat ("it was kneaded"), the word mallah has been translated as "bread dough." Cf. EI², "Khubz" (C. Pellat).

418. Yaqūlu jabīnaka, jabīnaka wa-al-Abrash yaqūlu labbayka, labbayka. This translation is only tentative. Jabīnaka may be analogous to the phrase min jabīnī, "I alone."

419. The text has muwaqqari. Nöldeke prefers the reading mūqari. Cf. Add., p. DCCXI. This emendation is followed by the Cairo edition, VII, 206.

420. Mayyitun dīwānunā. An alternative translation is provided in the Gloss., p. CCXLVII: "We accept no stipends."

but once it is touched by the generosity of the caliph it will be raised to life again."

Hishām said to 'Ilbā': "You have tried hard and petitioned well." So he gave orders that 'Ilbā' should receive five hundred dirhams and gave him an increase in his stipend.

Muḥammad b. Zayd b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb[421] came to Hishām, who said: "I have nothing for you." Then he added, "Take care lest anyone deceive you and say that the Commander of the Faithful has failed to recognize you. I have indeed recognized you. You are Muḥammad b. Zayd b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Do not stay and spend what money you already have, for you will get no gift from me. So go back to your family!"

One day, Hishām stopped near a walled garden of his in which there was an olive tree. With him was 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī.[422] 'Uthmān was standing with his head almost at a level with the head of the Commander of the Faithful, who was talking to him. Then Hishām heard the olive tree shaking and he said to someone: "Go to them and tell them to pick the olives properly and not to shake the tree; otherwise its fruit will burst open and its branches will break."

Hishām went on the pilgrimage. Al-Abrash took along some mukhannaths[423] who had guitars with them. Hishām said: "Imprison them and sell their possessions"—Hishām was not aware of what their goods were—"and put the proceeds in the treasury. If they mend their ways, return the money to them."

Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik lived at the Ruṣāfah which is reported to have been in the area of Qinnasrīn.[424] According to Aḥmad b.
[1738] Zuhayr b. Ḥarb—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): The reason why Hishām lived at al-Ruṣāfah was that the caliphs and their sons used to seclude themselves[425] to escape the plague. So they 421. The great-grandson of the caliph 'Umar (r. 13–23/634–44).

422. 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī was made governor of Medina in 93 or 94 (711–712 or 712–713) and dismissed in 96 (715). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1282; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, I, 93; II, 51; III, 43.

423. The term mukhannath is difficult to define precisely. It denotes an effeminate man or someone who is neither entirely male or female. Cf. Lisān, I, 908.

424. For a discussion of al-Ruṣāfah, cf. n. 426.

425. Yantabidhūna: "They would retire apart." The apparatus has a variant reading, yatabaddūna, "they would go into the desert," which is adopted by the Cairo edition (VII, 207).

lived in the desert far away from people. When Hishām wanted to move to al-Ruṣāfah, he was told: "Do not leave! Caliphs are not touched by plague. It is unheard of for a caliph to catch the plague." Hishām said: "Do you want to experiment with me?" So he moved to al-Ruṣāfah, which is a desert place, and he built two castles there. Al-Ruṣāfah is a Byzantine city built by the Byzantines.[426]

Hishām had a squint (aḥwal). According to Aḥmad (b. Zubayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī): Khālid b. 'Abdallāh[427] sent a camel-driver (ḥādī) to Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, and he recited[428] before Hishām a poem of Abū al-Najm (al-'Ijlī)[429] in the rajaz meter:

The sun on the horizon is descending like the eye of a man with a squint.
It intends to set but has not yet done so.

At this Hishām became angry and dismissed him.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Abū 'Āṣim al-Ḍabbī: I noticed Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām pass me when I was in the clearing (raḥbah) of Abū Sharīk. Abū Sharīk was a Persian after whom the clearing—which was a field under cultivation—was named. I had been baking bread. Mu'āwiyah stopped near me and I said: "Have some lunch." He dismounted and I took out the bread, put it on some bricks,[430] and he ate. Then other people came along and I asked, "Who is this?" They replied: "Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām." Mu'āwiyah ordered that I

426. There has been a long controversy about the interpretation of this passage. The reference to "two castles" (qaṣrayn) was interpreted by Sauvaget ("Remarques", 2–13) and by Creswell (Architecture, 513, 537–38) as denoting Qaṣr al-Ḥayr al-Sharqī in the Palmyrene steppe, which has two adjoining enclosures of Umayyad date. One of these, however, is a city and the other apparently a khān; for neither of them does the term qaṣr seem appropriate. Moreover, subsequent excavations on the site have revealed no traces of a Roman or Byzantine city (Grabar, City, 13). It seems preferable, therefore, to assume with Grabar that the Ruṣāfah mentioned by al-Ṭabarī is Ruṣāfat al-Shām/Sergiopolis, the major Byzantine city of northeastern Syria, situated in the desert some twenty-five miles south of the Euphrates. Cf. EI[1], "Al-Ruṣāfa" (E. Honigmann).

427. Khālid al-Qasrī.

428. Ḥadā: to urge on a camel by reciting verses to it in the rajaz meter. Cf. Lane, I, 532–33.

429. Abū al-Najm al-Faḍl (or al-Mufaḍḍal) b. Qudāmah al-'Ijlī was a well-known rajaz poet. He enjoyed particular success under Hishām. Cf. Sezgin, II, 371–72.

430. The text has fī labinin, "on bricks." An alternative reading could be fī labanin, "in milk."

should be given a present and then he rode off. Suddenly a fox appeared in front of him and he chased after it. He had not fol-[1739] lowed it for more than a bow-shot's distance when his horse unseated him and he fell. They took him away dead. Hishām said: "By God, I had resolved to choose him for the caliphate but here he is, chasing after a fox!" Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām had with him the daughter of Ismā'īl b. Jarīr and another woman. Hishām settled on each of them one-half of the eighth (i.e., their legal inheritance), namely, forty thousand (dīnārs).

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Qaḥdam, Yūsuf's secretary: Yūsuf b. 'Umar sent me to Hishām to take him a red ruby,[431] the sides of which were bigger than my palm, and a pearl as large as could be.[432] I went in to see Hishām and approached him, but I could not see his face because the couch was so long and there were so many cushions.[433] He reached out for the stone and the pearl and asked: "Did you bring papers indicating what weight they are?" I replied: "O Commander of the Faithful, they are too heavy for anyone to write down their weight. Where can the likes of them be found?" Hishām said: "You are right." The ruby had belonged to al-Rā'iqah, the slave girl of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh. She had bought it for seventy-three thousand dīnārs.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—Ibrāhīm b. al-Mundhir al-Ḥizāmī[434]—Ḥusayn b. Yazīd—Shihāb b. 'Abd Rabbihi—'Amr b. 'Alī: I was walking along with Muḥammad b. 'Alī[435] to his house, which was near the bathhouse, and I said to him: "Hishām's rule and authority have lasted a long time. It is nearly twenty years.

---

431. According to another source, the ruby was one and one-half qabḍahs in length. Cf. Fragmenta, 101. The qabḍah was usually measured as one-sixth of a cubit. Cf. Hinz, 63.

432. The pearl weighed three and one-half mithqāls. Cf. Fragmenta, 101. For the weight of the mithqāl in various parts of the Islamic world, cf. Hinz, 1–7.

433. Fursh. This usually means "carpets." Given the common Sasanian royal custom of piling cushions one upon another beside the monarch as he reclined (Grabar, Sasanian Silver, plates 13–14) and Hishām's readiness to favor Persian culture and customs, it seems probable that he had adopted this aspect of Sasanian court ceremonial. Even if fursh were to be translated as "carpets," the context (and the Sasanian silver dishes published by Grabar) establishes that such carpets were being used as cushions in this instance.

434. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mundhir al-Ḥizāmī (d. 236/850–51), was a traditionist. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 967; Ibn al-Nadīm, I, 244, 246; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, III, 190, 210.

People say that Solomon asked his Lord to bestow on him sovereignty such as should not belong to any after him. They do claim that that period was twenty years."[436] Muḥammad b. 'Alī said: "I don't know what tales are current with the people, but my father told me on the authority of his father on the authority of 'Alī on the authority of the Prophet, who said: "God will not prolong the life of a king in a community (ummah)—in the event that he has been preceded by a prophet—for a period longer than the life of that prophet." [1740]

In this year al-Walīd b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān[437] became caliph after the death of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī: Al-Walīd became caliph on a Saturday in Rabī' II, 125[438] [February 1–March 2, 743]. According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): Al-Walīd b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik acceded to the caliphate on Wednesday, the sixth of Rabī' II, 125 [Wednesday, February 6, 743]. 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī) concurred with Muḥammad b. 'Umar in this dating.

---

435. Cf. n. 370.
436. An allusion to Qur'ān 38, v. 5.
437. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.
438. The possible Saturdays were February 2, 9, 16, or 23, 743.

The Events of the Year

125 (cont'd)

(November 4, 742–October 24, 743)

Some of the Reasons Why al-Walīd Acceded to the Caliphate

I have already mentioned why al-Walīd's father, Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, nominated al-Walīd to succeed to the caliphate after his (Yazīd's) brother, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. On the day when al-Walīd's father, Yazīd, appointed him (to succeed after Hishām), al-Walīd was eleven years old and Yazīd did not die until his son al-Walīd reached the age of fifteen. Later on, Yazīd regretted having nominated his brother Hishām as caliph. When [1741] he looked at his son al-Walīd, Yazīd would say: "It is God who stands between me and the one who put Hishām between me and you."[439] When Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik died, his son al-Walīd was 439. For the early life of al-Walīd II, cf. Gabrieli, "Al-Walīd"; Derenk, Leben, 27–38. Al-Walīd's father, Yazīd, had been persuaded in 101 (719) by Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik to nominate Hishām as caliph and that Yazīd's own son, al-Walīd, should be second successor. Yazīd may well have regretted this decision, but, as his exclamation here suggests, he regarded the arrangement as a solemn obligation before God which he could not change. Therefore Hishām had duly succeeded to the caliphate in 105 (724) and al-Walīd had to wait another nineteen years for his turn.

fifteen years old and Hishām became caliph. Hishām was generous, respectful, and kind toward al-Walīd and their relationship continued in that style until al-Walīd b. Yazīd began to show signs of wanton behavior and to drink wine.[440]

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Juwayriyah b. Asmā', Isḥāq b. Ayyūb, 'Āmir b. al-Aswad,[441] and others: It was 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-'Alā al-Shabbānī,[442] the brother of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-'Alā,[443] who incited al-Walīd to act in this way. 'Abd al-Ṣamad was the tutor of al-Walīd. Al-Walīd also acquired drinking companions. Hishām wanted to keep them away from al-Walīd, so he put him in charge of the pilgrimage in 116 [January 8–13, 735].[444] Al-Walīd took with him some dogs[445] in boxes, one of which, according to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—his *shaykh*s whose names I have given—fell from the camel. In the box was a dog. People trained whips on the man who had hired out the camel and they beat him hard. Al-Walīd also took with him a domed canopy,[446] which had been made to the exact size of the Ka'bah so that he could place it over the Ka'bah. He also took wine with him. He wanted to erect the domed canopy over the Ka'bah and to sit in it.[447] His compan-

440. For al-Walīd's relationship with Hishām, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 102–03, 107–08; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, II, 117, 282, 285; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 6–9.

441. 'Āmir b. Ḥafṣ, also known as Suḥaym b. Ḥafṣ (d. 190/806), was a prolific writer. Many fragments of his work are preserved in Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif. According to Ibn Durayd, he was the mawlā of the Banū al-'Ujayf. Cf. Ishtiqāq, 235. Cf. also Sezgin, II, 266–67; Rosenthal, 381.

442. Scabrous stories were rife about this man. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, II, 78; VI, 102, 104–05. His nisbah, which appears in the text as al-Shaybānī, is corrected by the editor to al-Shabbānī (Add., p. DCCXI). The Cairo edition (209) has al-Shabbānī. bānī. Al-Balādhurī calls him 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-'Alā, al-Shā'ir ("the poet"). Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 6.

443. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-'Alā al-Shabbānī, the poet. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 2064; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 111; XVI, 157.

444. The pilgrimage proper begins on the eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah and ends on the thirteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. In 116 A.H. these days correspond to January 8–13, 735. For corroboration of the year 116 (735), cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 377; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, II, 78; Fragmenta, 113; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 198; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 7.

445. Presumably for the hunt. The dog was ritually unclean. Cf. Smith, Dogs, p. xxix–xxx.

446. Qubbah. Cf. Ibn A'tham, VIII, 137; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 400.

447. Ibn al-Athīr (loc. cit.) and Fragmenta (loc. cit.) have "to drink wine in it."

ions frightened him off the idea and said: "We don't feel safe, either on your behalf or our own,[448] from what the people might do." So al-Walīd did not move the canopy [on to the Ka'bah]. Even so, the people saw him behaving in a contemptuous and flippant way toward religion, and Hishām came to hear about it. Hishām wanted to depose him [as his heir] and to have the oath of allegiance given to his son Maslamah b. Hishām. Hishām tried to [1742] persuade al-Walīd to annul the oath of allegiance sworn to him and to give it instead to Maslamah, but al-Walīd refused. Hishām then said to al-Walīd: "Give Maslamah the oath of allegiance [to succeed] after yourself," but this too al-Walīd refused to do. Thereafter Hishām changed his attitude toward al-Walīd and did him mischief. He took steps in secret to have the oath of allegiance given to his son, and a number of people complied with Hishām's request. Amongst those who did so were his maternal uncles, Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī, and the sons of al-Qa'qā' b. Khulayd al-'Absī,[449] as well as others among Hishām's close followers.

Al-Walīd persisted in his wine-drinking and his pursuit of pleasure and he exceeded all due bounds. Hishām said to him: "Fie on you, Walīd! By God, I do not know whether you are for Islam or not. You commit every reprehensible action without feeling any shame or bothering to conceal it." So al-Walīd wrote Hishām the following poem:

O you who ask about our religion,
we follow the religion of Abū Shākir.
We drink it [the wine] both pure and mixed, sometimes warmed and sometimes cooled.[450]

Hishām was furious with his son Maslamah, whose kunyah was Abū Shākir,[451] and he said to him: "Al-Walīd is making use of

448. Literally, "We do not feel safe for you or for us who are with you from the people."

449. For the history of this family, who were involved in several Umayyad succession disputes, cf. Crone, 105–06.

450. The meter is sarī'. For these verses, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 102; Fragmenta, 114; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 198; Gabrieli, "al-Walīd," 46; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb [Derenk], 7.

451. Maslamah had become friendly with al-Walīd and had joined in some of al-Walīd's hedonistic activities. Cf. al-Balādhurī, loc. cit. Al-Walīd's response involvyou to mock me. To think I was rearing you for the caliphate! Behave in a civilized way and attend the collective prayer." Hishām put Maslamah in charge of the pilgrimage in 119 [December, 737].[452] Maslamah devoted himself to acts of religious devotion and behaved in a steady and gentle manner. He distributed money in Mecca and Medina, and a mawlā belonging to the Medinans recited the following lines:

O you who ask about our religion,
we follow the religion of Abū Shākir.
The one who generously donates hairless horses[453] with their halters and who is neither a free-thinker[454] nor an unbeliever.

The poet was referring obliquely to al-Walīd.

The mother of Maslamah b. Hishām was Umm Ḥakīm,[455] the daughter of Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ.[456] Al-Kumayt[457] recited as follows:

Verily the stakes (of the tent) of the caliphate will be transferred after al-Walīd to the son of Umm Ḥakīm.

[1743] Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī said: "I want nothing to do with a caliph whose kunyah is Abū Shākir." Maslamah b. Hishām was ing Maslamah is therefore particularly offensive to Hishām. For al-Walīd's affection and kind treatment toward his friend Maslamah, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 103–04; Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, II, 286.

---

452. For Maslamah's leading the pilgrimage, cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 377.

453. Al-jurda ("horses endowed with fine hairs"). Cf. Freytag, Lexicon, 77. Jurd is the reading followed by Fragmenta, 114; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 7; and Ibn al-Athīr, V, 198. Al-Iṣfahānī has al-buzla (camels that have attained their full strength). Cf. Aghānī VI, 102; Lane, I, 200.

454. Zindiq is a difficult term to translate accurately since it is often used as a general term of abuse, as well as to denote Manichaeans and those of other "heretical" beliefs.

455. Umm Ḥakīm was famous for her beauty as her mother Zaynab bint ʿAbd al-Raḥmān had been before her. Umm Ḥakīm was very fond of wine, a characteristic of hers that is recorded in verse by al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XV, 48.

456. The uncle of the Umayyad caliph ʿAbd al-Malik and governor of Palestine. Cf. Crone, 125.

457. Al-Kumayt b. Zayd al-Asadī (d. 126/743 or 127/744). Other verses of his are quoted in al-Ṭabarī, II, 1574–75. Cf. *EI*², "Kumayt b. Zayd" (J. Horovitz/ C. Pellat); Sezgin, II, 347–49; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 40; XV, 113. The meter is kāmil.

furious with Khālid, and so when Asad b. 'Abdallāh,[458] the brother of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, died, Abū Shākir (Maslamah) wrote to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, sending a poem in which Nawfal[459] lampooned Khālid and his brother Asad:[460]

May a Lord who has given the people respite from Asad liberate them from Khālid by destroying him too!
As for his father, he was of impure lineage, a low-born slave who was himself begotten of slaves with stunted limbs.[461]

Maslamah sent a scroll by postal courier to Khālid. Khālid thought that it contained a message of condolence on the death of his brother. He broke the seal but found in the scroll nothing but the lampooning verses. Then he said: "Never have I seen condolences like those I have received today."[462]

Hishām used to criticize and denigrate al-Walīd. He frequently scoffed at al-Walīd and his friends and often pointed out his faults. When al-Walīd realized what Hishām's attitude was he went away, accompanied by some of his retinue and his mawlās, and lived in al-Azraq between the territory of the Balqayn[463] and the Fazārah[464] at a watering-place called al-Aghdaf.[465] Al-Walīd

458. Cf. n. 1116.

459. The text has Nawfal. This is later emended to Yaḥyā b. Nawfal; cf. Add., p. DCCXI. The poet's nisbah was al-Ḥimyarī. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, II, 149; III, 138; XIV, 57.

460. The repetition of the phrase "when he (Asad) died" has been omitted in the translation.

461. Li-a'budin qufudi. Qufud is used here instead of qufd, the plural of aqfad. Cf. Gloss., p. CDXXX. 'Abdun aqfadu: "a slave having rigid and contracted arms and legs, with short fingers and toes." Cf. Lisān, III, 135. The meter of these lines is munsariḥ.

462. For a discussion of this incident, cf. Gabrieli, Califfato, 22–23, n. 3. These verses in a longer form are given in Ibn al-Athīr, V, 162. Cf. also al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 8.

463. Balqayn is a contraction of the name Banū al-Qayn. The Balqayn were a subgroup of the Quḍā'ah. Cf. al-Ya'qūbī, Les Pays, 175; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 455; *EI*², "Al-Ḳayn" (W. M. Watt).

464. The Fazārah were a subgroup of the Dhubyān. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 246.

465. On the topographical problems presented by this passage, cf. Gabrieli, "al-Walid," 6, n. 4. Gabrieli translates the Arabic fa-nazala bi-al-Azraq bayna arḍi Balqayn wa-Fazārah 'alā mā'in yuqālu lahu al-Aghdaf as "e andò a stabilirsi . . . ad al-Azraq, tra la terra dei Balqayn e dei Fazarah, sul fiumicello al-Aghdaf." The problem which Gabrieli sets out clearly is that elsewhere al-Azraq and al-Aghdaf left behind at al-Ruṣāfah his scribe 'Iyāḍ b. Muslim, the mawlā of 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, and he said to 'Iyāḍ: "Write to me about whatever is going on where you are." Al-Walīd took with him 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-'Alā. They were drinking one day, and [1744] when the wine began to have an effect on them al-Walīd said to 'Abd al-Ṣamad: "Abū Wahb, recite some verses". So 'Abd al-Ṣamad recited the following:[466]

Did you not see how the star, the moment that it ceased to shine,[467] went hurrying back to its mansion?
In confusion it strayed from its proper path, and having arrived at its place of setting,[468] it sought its place of rising.
I said, having marvelled at its activity and with burgeoning hope as it appeared,
"Perhaps the reign of al-Walīd has drawn near,
now that the time has become auspicious.
We have been hoping that he would rule, just as the owner of barren land hopes that it will become verdant.
We have made the firmest plans[469] for him with all our hearts, since he is a worthy repository for them."[470]

The poem was recited (in other places) and Hishām came to hear are shown to be in two distinctly separate localities. Al-Azraq is a citadel in the Wādī Sirḥān, 27 km from Quṣayr 'Amrah. Cf. Dussaud, 21, 81, 136, 175; Creswell, I, 405–06. Al-Aghdaf has been identified as Qaṣr al-Ṭūbah, 61 km south of al-Azraq. Cf. Derenk, 121; Gabrieli, loc. cit. The account of al-Balādhurī is clear: "He (al-Walīd) settled in al-Azraq." Ansāb (Derenk), 10.

---

466. This episode and the verses that follow are recounted by al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 104–05. Cf. also Fragmenta, 116; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 11.

467. Shuyyi'ā. Al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 105 has sab'ā.

468. Al-Ghawr. This term also denotes the low-lying area of Jordan where al-Walīd liked to spend his time.

469. Muḥkamāti al-umūri. The variant reading in the apparatus and in Fragmenta, 116 also makes good sense: muḥkamāti al-'uhūdī, "the firmest oaths."

470. The meter is mutaqārib. The tenor of these lines indicates that they probably date from the time when al-Walīd still enjoyed Hishām's favor to the full, a theory corroborated by their immediate sequel. This was probably the time, too, that al-Farazdaq wrote his panegyric to al-Walīd as crown prince. Cf. Hell, 37–65.

of it. He stopped the regular allowance he paid to al-Walīd and he wrote to him as follows: "I have heard that you have taken 'Abd al-Ṣamad as friend, confidant, and drinking companion. As far as I am concerned, that just confirms what I have already heard about you. Moreover, I do not find you blameless in any wickedness (that has been done). Send 'Abd al-Ṣamad away in disgrace."[471] Al-Walīd therefore sent 'Abd al-Ṣamad away, and he recited the following verses about him:

They have accused Abū Wahb of a great sin—no indeed, of one far greater than great!
I testify that they have lied against him, with the testimony of one knowledgeable and with long experience of them.[472]

Al-Walīd wrote to Hishām telling him that he had sent 'Abd al-Ṣamad away, and he apologized for what Hishām had heard about his drinking companion.[473] He then asked Hishām if he would permit Ibn Suhayl to join him. Ibn Suhayl was a Yamanī who had [1745] governed Damascus on more than one occasion,[474] and he was among al-Walīd's close circle of friends. Hishām, however, flogged Ibn Suhayl and sent him away. Hishām then seized 'Iyāḍ b. Muslim, al-Walīd's scribe, as he had heard that 'Iyāḍ was sending information to al-Walīd. He gave him a severe flogging and made him wear coarse cloth. When al-Walīd heard about this he exploded: "Who can trust anybody? What's the point of doing good to others? My father preferred this accursed cross-eyed man to the members of his own family and he made him his heir. Now you see how he treats me. As soon as he finds out that I have become attached to someone, he trifles with him. He wrote to me asking me to send 'Abd al-Ṣamad away, so I sent him away. Then I 471. Al-Balādhurī is more explicit: "Bring 'Abd al-Ṣamad to me with my messenger." Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 11.

472. The meter is wāfir. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 105; Fragmenta, 116; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 11.

473. Munādamatihi ("the person(s) with whom he drank"). The subsequent fate of 'Abd al-Ṣamad is recorded in al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 11 and Fragmenta, 116–17. Hishām sent him and his brother to Yūsuf b. 'Umar, who walled them up in a room where they died of thirst.

474. Al-Balādhurī adds that he may have been head of the shurṭah in Damascus. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 12.

wrote to him asking him to allow Ibn Suhayl to come and join me. So he beat Ibn Suhayl and sent him away, although he knew how highly I thought of him.[475] He found out how attached 'Iyāḍ b. Muslim is to me and that he is under my protection. He knew that I have a high regard for him and that he is my scribe. So he beat him and imprisoned him, just to harm me. O God, protect me from him!"[476] Then al-Walīd recited as follows:

It is I who[477] warn the man who would constantly bestow favor on people of dubious character,[478] not having experienced their faithlessness.
If you treat them with honor, you will find them insolently ungrateful;[479] if you treat them with contempt, you will find them tractable.
How can you exalt yourself above us when we are the very source of your prosperity?
Just you wait until[480] fortune veers in our favor.
Look around, and if the only likeness you can find for him is that of a dog,[481] then try that![482] [1746] His master fattens him up for the hunt until he has grown strong,[483] after his formerly emaciated state,
And thereupon the dog attacks him—and although that assault fails to harm him, if he were able to devour him, he would do so.[484]

---

475. Ra'yī fīhī ("my (good) opinion about him"). Cf. Gloss., p. CCLV.

476. For Hishām's treatment of 'Iyāḍ b. Muslim, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 105; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 12.

477. Literally, "I am the warner who."

478. Al-maqārīf. Cf. Gloss., p. CDXX.

479. Buṭur: plural of baṭūr. Cf. Gloss., p. CXXXVI.

480. Literally, "You will find out when."

481. Cf. n. 350.

482. The text has fa-uḍrubhu. This is emended to fa-aḍribhu by Gabrieli, "Al-Walīd," 54.

483. Nawā. Al-Iṣfahānī has istawā; cf. Aghānī, V, 105.

484. The meter is basīṭ. There is a strong possibility that some of the last few lines (1746, 11.1–4) are out of order here. The version of al-Balādhurī is more coherent, incorporating parts of al-Ṭabarī's version: baynā yusamminuhā li-al-

Al-Walīd wrote the following letter to Hishām:[485]

I have heard what cuts the Commander of the Faithful has made in my income and how he has ruined my friends, my women, and my family. I had never thought that God would thus test the Commander of the Faithful nor that he (Hishām) would thus defame me. Even if Ibn Suhayl did behave in that way,[486] it would be like the ass presuming to think it is as good as the wolf.[487] My kind actions toward Ibn Suhayl, my favorable treatment of him, and my letter to the Commander of the Faithful about him do not deserve the extreme measures taken by the Commander of the Faithful in breaking off relations with me. But if this has come about because of something specific in the mind of the Commander of the Faithful against me, (let him remember that) the succession which God decreed for me, the span of life which He ordained for me, and the substance which He allotted to me are matters which nobody apart from God can ever diminish by one jot from their appointed term; nor can anyone change their allotted times in any way. For the irreversible decree of God (qadar) runs according to His predetermined decisions, irrespective of the wishes of men.[488] There is no way to delay Him when He hastens and there is no hastening of His allotted span.[489] In such a situation, the sins that men under God commit are against themselves and because of them they [1747] deserve punishment. The Commander of the Faithful is the person in his community best fitted to perceive this and ṣaydi ṣāḥibuhu 'adā 'alayhi falaw yastaṭī'uhu aklā ("while his master is fattening him up for the hunt, he attacks him and, if he could, he would eat [him]"). Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 13.

---

485. For other versions of this letter, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 106–07; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 13–14. For a detailed analysis of the various textual and translation problems connected with this letter and Hishām's reply, cf. Appendix 1.

486. "Even if Ibn Suhayl were as the Commander of the Faithful made him out to be"; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, loc. cit.

487. "It would be enough for the ass (i.e., Ibn Suhayl) merely to approach the wolf (Hishām)" (in order to be devoured); al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, loc. cit.

488. Literally, "whether people like it or dislike it."

489. Literally, "there is no delaying of His hastening and no hastening of His allotted span."

should be the one most mindful of it. May God be the One who directs the Commander of the Faithful to good judgments in his conduct of affairs!

Hishām inquired of Abū Zubayr: "Nasṭās,[490] do you think that the people will be satisfied with al-Walīd if anything happens to me?" Nasṭās said: "Rather, may God prolong your life, O Commander of the Faithful!" Hishām retorted: "Fie on you! Death is an inevitable fact. So do you think that the people will be satisfied with al-Walīd?" Nasṭās said: "O Commander of the Faithful, an oath of allegiance to al-Walīd is already obligatory for the people." Thereupon Hishām replied: "If the people are satisfied with al-Walīd, I can only think that the popular dictum 'anyone who is caliph for three days will not enter the fire' is false."

Hishām then wrote to al-Walīd as follows:[491]

The Commander of the Faithful has understood what you have written about the cuts he has imposed on you and about other matters. The Commander of the Faithful asks pardon from God for the allowance he used to give you. The Commander of the Faithful is more afraid for his own soul because of the wrong he has done against himself in giving you the allowance he gave you than because he has made the cuts he has made and ruined those of your companions whom he has ruined. This is for two reasons. The first is that the Commander of the Faithful gave you preferential treatment in the allowance he bestowed on you, even though he knew what your attitude toward it was and that you spent it in an inappropriate way.[492] The second reason is that he made much of your friends and gave them lavish allowances (too). They do not have to put up with the kind of setbacks that the Mus-[1748] lims undergo every year when the campaigns are curtailed. Your friends remain in your company and you drag them off

490. Naṣṭās was the freedman of Ṣafwān b. Umayyah; the name is obviously an arabicized form of the Greek name Anastasios. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 103.

491. For other versions of Hishām's letter, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 107–08; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 14–15. For a discussion of textual and translation problems in this letter, cf. Appendix 1.

492. Al-Balādhurī has: "even though he knew the places where you put it and that you were spending it on the path of disobedience." Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 14.

with you in your folly. The Commander of the Faithful feels that it is more fitting for him to impose cuts on you and to give you only a bare minimum rather than to exceed the proper limits with you in this matter. But God has supported the Commander of the Faithful in the cuts that he has imposed on you, which he has made in the hope of His forgiveness for what he dreads may result from his previous actions in this matter.[493]

As for Ibn Suhayl, by my life, if he enjoyed the special position he had with you, and he was worthy of your affection,[494] God would not have made him as he is. Is Ibn Suhayl—for goodness' sake![495]—anything more than a singer and dancer, whose foolishness knows no bounds? Moreover, Ibn Suhayl is no worse than any other of the characters whom you choose as your companions in those activities which, out of nobility, the Commander of the Faithful refrains from mentioning but for which you, by God's life! would be worthy of censure. If you think that the Commander of the Faithful is eager to make trouble for you, then that would release you from any family obligation[496] because of the evil inclinations of the Commander of the Faithful in that matter. As for that which you said God has ordained for you, it was God who gave the Commander of the Faithful precedence in that respect and He chose him for it, and verily God attains His purpose.[497] The Commander of the Faithful has come to the firm conviction[498] that it is not for his own profit that he possesses what God in His goodness has given

493. I.e., Hishām fears God's anger for his former generosity toward al-Walīd and his friends.

494. Literally, "and he was worthy that you should be pleased about him or displeased."

495. It is difficult to find an appropriate translation for lillāhi abūka, an expression that denotes wonder and praise. Cf. Lane, I, 11.

496. The text has bi-ghayri illin ("without a compact"). The Cairo edition (VII, 214) has bi-ghayri ālin ("without family [obligation]"). This latter reading has been used in the translation.

497. Qur'ān 65, v. 3.

498. The text has wa-huwa 'alā al-yaqīni min rabbihi . . . ("he is sure from his Lord . . ."), as does al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 15. Al-Iṣfahānī's version (loc. cit.) makes better sense: wa-huwa 'alā al-yaqīni min ra'yihi ("he is firm in his opinion").

him—for the attainment of either evil or good—but that it is only a trust to him from God and that it is inevitable that he must (eventually) relinquish it. God is too merciful and compassionate to His servants to entrust command over them to one of them—no matter who—that is not pleasing to Him. Indeed, the Commander of the Faithful, because of his high [1749] regard for his Lord, is extremely hopeful that He will give him the task of delivering that office to one who is acceptable to Him and to them. Indeed, God's goodness to the Commander of the Faithful far exceeds his ability to describe it or to render Him sufficient thanks, except by God's own help. If He has decreed an imminent death for the Commander of the Faithful, there is in that place to which he is ultimately traveling, if God wills and by the goodness of God, a replacement for this earthly life. By my life, the content of your letter to the Commander of the Faithful is fully in accord with your foolishness and stupidity. So restrain yourself from committing excesses and be moderate in your actions. To God belong chastisements and mighty power. He strikes therewith those of His servants whom He wishes,[499] and He inclines his ear to those of His servants whom He wishes. The Commander of the Faithful implores God for protection and for right direction toward those things that are dearest and most pleasing to Him.

Al-Walīd wrote the following reply to Hishām:

I have seen you sparing no effort to erect a barrier between you and me; (whereas) if you possessed a grain of intelligence,[500] you would demolish what you have built.
You sow a crop of hatred against those still alive;
woe to them, when you die, from the evil harvest you have garnered!
I can imagine them saying at best, "If only we were"
but by then "if only we were" will be of no avail.

---

499. There is an echo here of Qur'ān 7, v. 156: 'adhābī uṣību bihi man ashā'u ("I smite with My punishment whom I will").

You have spurned the hand of one who offers kindness. If you had taken it, [1750] the Compassionate One, the possessor of grace and beneficence, would have rewarded you for it.[501]

Al-Walīd continued to live in that desert until Hishām died. On the morning of the day that al-Walīd became caliph[502] he sent for Abū al-Zubayr al-Mundhir b. Abī 'Amr. The latter came to al-Walīd, who said to him: "Abū Zubayr! As far back as I can remember I have never spent a longer night than last night. During the night I was assailed with anxieties and I kept thinking about things connected with the rule of that man (meaning Hishām). He has evil designs on me.[503] Come riding with us and let's get some air." So they went riding. After going two mīls,[504] al-Walīd stopped at a sandy hill and began complaining about Hishām. Then suddenly he saw a cloud of dust and he exclaimed: "These are messengers from Hishām. Let us pray to God that they bring good news." Then two men on post-horses hove into sight; one of them was a mawlā of Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī and the other was Jardabah. When they came nearer they went toward al-Walīd, dismounted, ran up to him, and greeted him as caliph. Al-Walīd was struck dumb with amazement. Jardabah began to repeat his salutation to him as caliph, so al-Walīd said: "Steady on! Are you telling me that Hishām is dead?" Jardabah said: "Yes." So al-Walīd asked: "Who sent your letter?" Jardabah replied: "Your mawlā, Sālim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the master of the chancellery." Al-Walīd read the letter and the two men turned to leave. Then

500. Fa-law kunta dhā irbin. Al-Iṣfahānī (loc. cit.) has fa-law kunta dhā hazmin ("if you had any determination/judgment"). Fragmenta, 117, has . . . dhā 'aqlin ("if you had any intelligence").

501. For these verses, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 104; Fragmenta, 117–18; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 15 (only part of the verses); Ibn al-Athīr, V, 199; Gabrieli, "al-Walīd," 60–61. The meter is ṭawīl. In the Aghānī the verses occur in a different context, namely, when Hishām is attempting to depose al-Walīd and make his own son his heir.

502. For similar accounts of the way in which al-Walīd heard of Hishām's death, cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, (Derenk), 20–21; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 108; Ibn A'tham, VIII, 139.

503. Qad awla'a bī: i.e., Hishām wishes al-Walīd dead.

504. Two *mīl*s: approximately 4 km. Cf. Hinz, 63.

al-Walīd called back the mawlā of Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī and asked him about his secretary, 'Iyāḍ b. Muslim. The mawlā said: "O Commander of the Faithful, he stayed in prison until [1751] God's decree struck Hishām. When Hishām reached a point where he was no longer expected to recover, 'Iyāḍ sent a message to the storekeepers asking them to keep hold of what they had in their possession and saying that on no account should anyone remove anything.[505] Hishām recovered consciousness and asked for something, but they refused to let him have it. Then Hishām said: 'So it seems that we have been storekeepers for al-Walīd!' and he died shortly afterwards. 'Iyāḍ came out of prison, sealed the doors of the storehouses, and gave orders concerning Hishām. Hishām was taken from his bed, but people could not find a container in which to warm the water to wash him and they actually had to ask to borrow one. Nor could they procure a shroud from the storehouses. So Ghālib, the mawlā of Hishām, found him a shroud."

Al-Walīd wrote to al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān,[506] telling him to go to al-Ruṣāfah to estimate what possessions and how many sons Hishām had there and to arrest his agents and dependents, except for Maslamah b. Hishām. In the case of Maslamah, al-Walīd wrote to al-'Abbās saying that he should not interfere with him nor should anyone enter his house, for Maslamah had often begged his father to show leniency in regard to al-Walīd and had made Hishām refrain from taking steps against him. So al-'Abbās went to al-Ruṣāfah and carried out the written instructions that al-Walīd had given him. Then he wrote to al-Walīd informing him that he had arrested Hishām's sons and dependents and that he had counted Hishām's possessions. Al-Walīd responded as follows:[507]

Would that Hishām were alive to see his capacious milking pail topped up!

505. In an earlier version of this story (cf. p. 72) the closing of the treasury occurred after the death of Hishām, not before.

506. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

507. For some of these lines, cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 22. The meter is sarī'.

Al-Walīd recited:[508]

Would that Hishām had lived to see [1752] his capacious corn-measure sealed up.
We have meted out to him the same measure that he meted out (to us before), and we have not deprived him of a single ounce of it.[509]
It was not out of innovation that we did so, but the Distinguishing Book[510] fully permitted it to us.

Al-Walīd appointed agents, and (letters giving him) the oath of allegiance reached him from far-flung areas. The agents wrote to him and delegations came to him. Marwān b. Muḥammad wrote to him as follows:[511]

> May God's blessing[512] be on the Commander of the Faithful in the command of His servants and the inheritance of His lands which He has bestowed on him! It was because Hishām was overwhelmed by the submerging flood[513] brought on by the intoxication of power that he was induced to attempt to diminish those rights of the Commander of the Faithful which God had magnified. He sought to achieve something that was too difficult for him. People of unsound opinions and beliefs responded to him in that, but they also found[514] what he desired too difficult. It was then that he buckled under the full weight of the decrees of God.

---

508. For these verses (with minor variants), cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 109; Fragmenta, 121, Ibn al-Athīr, V, 200; Gabrieli, "al-Walīd," 49–50. The meter is sarī'.

509. Cf. Qur'ān 4, v. 44; 11, vv. 85–86.

510. Al-furqān: "the Criterion of right and wrong." Cf. Qur'ān 2, v. 53. Al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 22, and Fragmenta, 121, have "al-Qur'ān."

511. Marwān b. Muḥammad was the cousin of al-Walīd's father and later was to become the last Umayyad caliph. He had served on the frontier in Armenia. For a good summary of his career, cf. Schönig, 7. Cf. also n. 4.

512. For other versions of this letter, cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 35–36; Fragmenta, 124–25.

513. Cf. Qur'ān 23, v. 56: fa-dharhum fī ghamratihim ("therefore leave them in [the submerging flood of] their ignorance"). Cf. also Qur'ān 23, v. 65; 51, v. 11.

514. Fa-wajadū ("they found"). The apparatus has a variant, fa-wajada ("he found"), which is adopted also by the Cairo edition (VII, 216). This makes better sense.

The Commander of the Faithful (i.e., al-Walīd) was in a place of God's protection until the time when He girded him with the noblest belt of the caliphate. He has assumed responsibility for matters which God has judged him competent to decide, and he stands confirmed in absolute control of the charge which has been laid upon him. Previous revelations[515] have foretold the appointed span of his rule. God has singled him out from His creatures to rule, for He sees their circumstances. God has invested him with the caliphal ornament hanging around his neck and has bestowed on him the reins of the caliphate and the torque[516] of authority. Praise be [1753] to God Who has chosen the Commander of the Faithful for His caliphate and to maintain the firm foundations of His religion![517] He has preserved him from the evil designs of the wicked;[518] and He has elevated him and has brought them low. Anyone who persists in such base actions[519] destroys his soul and angers his Lord, but anyone whom repentance directs to the true course, abstaining from what is wrong and turning to what is right, will find God ever disposed to forgive and be merciful.

I should like to inform the Commander of the Faithful, may God's beneficence be upon him, that when I heard about his accession to God's caliphate I mounted my pulpit, holding two swords in readiness against any mischief-makers. I announced to the people in front of me the favor that God had conferred on them in appointing the Commander of the Faithful. At this they rejoiced and said: "No other caliphal accession has filled us with greater hope or made us more joyful than the accession of the Commander of the Faithful." I had already stretched out my hand to give the oath of allegiance to you. Now I renewed it and confirmed it with weighty convenants, repeated pledges, and strong oaths.

---

515. Al-zubur.
516. 'Iṣam is the plural of 'uṣmah ("collar").
517. Wathā'iqi 'urā dīnihi.
518. Cf. Qur'ān 12, v. 76; 21, v. 58; 86, v. 16.
519. Al-khasīsah min al-umūri. Al-Balādhurī has al-khaṭī'ah ("crime, sin"): Ansāb (Derenk), 35.

Thereafter, all of them gave excellent and obedient responses.

O Commander of the Faithful, reward them for their obedience from the wealth of God which He has given you, for you are the most generous and open-handed of men! They have been waiting for you, hoping that you would reveal your bounty toward them because of the close ties of kinship that they claim with you. Show more generosity toward them than your predecessors did, so that your preference for them over your other subjects may thus be made manifest.[520] Were it not for the efforts I am making to guard the frontier where I now am, I fear that my strong yearning for the Commander of [1754] the Faithful would lead me to appoint a deputy against his orders and to come in person to see the Commander of the Faithful face to face, for there is no pleasure, however great it might be, which would equal that for me. If the Commander of the Faithful thinks it appropriate to allow me to travel to him so that I may speak of matters which I do not want to put in writing, then let him do so.

When al-Walīd came to power he made provision for the cripples and blind amongst the people of Syria. He gave them clothing and ordered that each of them should have a servant. He made available perfume and clothing among those with large families to support[521] and he increased what Hishām had given them. He augmented the stipend for everyone by ten dirhams and then, after that increase of ten, he made a further increase of ten for the Syrians in particular.[522] He doubled the allowances of those of his family who came asking for his help. When al-Walīd had been heir-apparent, he used to give food to those who came to him on their way back from the summer campaign. At a staging-post called Zīzā'[523] he would also feed for a period of three days people

520. Wa-zidhum ziyādatan yufḍalu bihā man kāna qablaka ḥattā yaẓhara faḍluka 'alayhim 'alā ra'iyyatika. Here the Cairo edition (217) adds a wa: ḥattā yaẓhara faḍluka 'alayhim wa-'alā ra'iyyatika ("so that your favor to them and your subjects may be manifest").

521. Cf. Ibn A'tham, VIII, 139.

522. Cf. Wellhausen, 353.

523. Zīzā' was a large village, one of the stages on the ḥajj route. It was in the Balqā' province. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 554.

returning from the pilgrimage. He would give fodder to their riding animals and would refuse nothing that was asked of him. People used to say to him: "If you (just) say 'Let me see,' it is a promise with which the suppliant will be satisfied."[524] Al-Walīd replied: "I do not train my tongue to say anything that I am not accustomed to doing."

Al-Walīd recited the following:[525]

I guarantee to you, if no obstacles hinder me, that the cloud of affliction will be lifted from you.
Soon both augmentation and increase,
as well as gifts, will be bestowed on you by me.
[1755] Sacred (to me) is your register in which each month scribes write down and seal your grants.

In this year al-Walīd b. Yazīd had the oath of allegiance given to his two sons, al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān, so that they should succeed him, and he made them both his heirs, one after the other, putting al-Ḥakam before 'Uthmān. Al-Walīd wrote letters on this matter to the garrison cities, and one of the people to whom he wrote about this was Yūsuf b. 'Umar, who was at that time al-Walīd's agent in Iraq. Yūsuf b. 'Umar wrote to Naṣr b. Sayyār about this and the text of the letter to him was as follows:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. From Yūsuf b. 'Umar to Naṣr b. Sayyār. And now to our subject. I have sent 'Aqqāl b. Shabbah al-Tamīmī and 'Abd al-Malik al-Qaynī to bring you a copy of the letter from the Commander of the Faithful in which he wrote informing those under my authority that he has appointed his sons, al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān, as his heirs after him.[526] I have given orders to 'Aqqāl and 'Abd al-Malik to expatiate on this matter with you. When they reach you, gather the people together to hear the reading of the letter from the Commander of the Faithful. Give orders that people should be brought together

524. Inna fī qawlīka anẓuru 'idatan mā yuqīmu 'alayhā al-ṭālibu. The translation is only tentative.

525. The meter is ṭawīl. For these verses, cf. also al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 26; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 111; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 201.

526. The word order in the Arabic is very unwieldy and has been changed around in the translation.

for it and perform with them what the Commander of the Faithful has written. When you have finished, have the letter read out and allow those who want to speak to do so. Then have the people give the oath of allegiance to the two sons of al-Walīd in God's name and blessing. Exact oaths from them according to what I have copied for you at the end of this letter of mine, (which is taken) from what the Commander of the Faithful wrote to us in his letter. Explain it and have the [1756] oath of allegiance given on that basis. We ask God to bless the Commander of the Faithful and his subjects in what He has decreed for them through the words of the Commander of the Faithful. We ask God to set al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān on the right path and to bless them and us through them. Greetings to you.

Al-Naḍr[527] wrote on a Thursday, in the middle of Sha'bān 125 [Thursday, June 13, 742]:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, give the oath of allegiance to the servant of God, al-Walīd, the Commander of the Faithful, and to al-Ḥakam, the son of the Commander of the Faithful, if he outlives him, and to 'Uthmān, the son of the Commander of the Faithful, if he outlives al-Ḥakam, to heed and to obey. And if anything should happen to either of them, the Commander of the Faithful will appoint as his successor someone from amongst his sons or subjects, giving precedence to whom he wishes and holding back whom he wishes. In this matter the oath and covenant of God are binding upon you.

A poet recited the following lines about this matter:[528]

We have high expectations of 'Uthmān, after al-Walīd, or of al-Ḥakam, and then we hope for Sa'īd,
Just as when Yazīd was in power he used to have hopes for al-Walīd.[529]

---

527. The identity of this person is not clear. He may be al-Naḍr b. Shumayl, who is mentioned in the company of Hishām. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, III, 17, 19.

528. For these verses, cf. Fragmenta, 131. The meter is mutaqārib.

529. Nu'ammilu 'Uthmāna ba'da al-Walīdi li'l-'ahdi fīnā wa-narjū Yazīdan ("We are hoping for 'Uthmān after al-Walid to rule among us and we hope for

But the caliphate became too remote (from us), so we hope that it will return to what it was before,
And if it does return, then satisfy the near relative with it,[530] so that the distant one will despair of it.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—his *shaykh*s whom I have already mentioned: 'Aqqāl b. Shabbah and 'Abd al-Malik b. Nu'aym came to see Naṣr and they brought the letter, which read as follows:[531]

Now to our subject. Verily God, may His names be blessed,
His praise be made glorious and all reference to Him be exalt-[1757] ed, made Islam the religion of His choice and He created Islam as the best thing for the chosen of His creatures.[532]
Then He chose messengers from amongst angels and men.[533]
He sent them forth with His message (Islam) and gave them orders concerning it. And between them and the nations which succeeded each other and throughout the centuries which elapsed in turn (there was conflict), but they would (still) summon men to what is better[534] and call them to a straight path. This continued until the grace of God culminated in His calling of Muḥammad, may the blessings of God

Yazīd"). For the second hemistich, the version in Fragmenta, 131, makes better sense in the context: aw Ḥakaman thumma narjū Sa'īdan ("or Ḥakam, then we hope for Sa'īd"). Al-Walīd had fifteen sons, one of whom was Sa'īd. Cf. the discussion of al-Walīd's family, listing primary sources, in H. 'Aṭwān, Al-Walīd b. Yazīd: 'arḍun wa-naqḍun (Beirut, 1981), 90–91. The Cairo edition (VII, 219) has nubā'ī for nu'ammilu.

530. Fa-awṣī al-qarība 'anhā ("bequeath it to the near relative[?]"). The Cairo edition (VII, 219) has fa-arḍī al-qarība 'anhā. With awṣā, the normal preposition would be bi. The version in the Cairo edition based on one manuscript reading is better grammatically and has been preferred here.

531. For a full discussion of the background and significance of this letter, cf. Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, 116–18. They provide an annotated translation of the letter, 118–26. A longer discussion of this letter is to be found in Appendix 2.

532. Wa-ja'alahu khayra khiyaratihi. The apparatus (BM and O) has dīn for khayr, as does the Cairo edition, 219. Crone and Hinds, 118, prefer this reading: "he has made it the religion of the chosen ones of His creation."

533. Cf. Qur'ān 35, v. 1.

534. The syntax of this passage is faulty and it is clear that some words have been omitted. The missing words must refer to the succession of prophets whose message was ignored by their own people and on whom God inflicted His punishments. The words in brackets in the translation are purely hypothetical.

be upon him, to prophethood, at a time when knowledge had passed beyond recall,[535] when blindness afflicted the people, when disunity was rife with men following their own personal inclinations,[536] when faction had made people take divergent paths and when the signs of the truth had become obliterated. (It was at such a time that) God made the right way clear by means of Muḥammad; by him He dispelled the darkness[537] and by him He brought deliverance from error and destruction. By him He made religion flourish[538] and He caused him to be a blessing for His creatures.[539] By him He set the seal on His revelation. In Muḥammad, God accumulated the bounties which He had bestowed on the prophets who had preceded him. He made him follow in their footsteps, reaffirming and embracing all that He had revealed through them, summoning to it and commanding by it.

In due course there emerged those of His community who responded to Muḥammad's call and adopted the religion which God had graciously bestowed on them. They were able to confirm the truth of the message preached by earlier prophets of God which their own people had rejected as false[540] and to accept the good counsels of those prophets which (once) they used to spurn. So they defended their sacred things which once they had violated and exalted that which they used to belittle. There was no member of the community of Muḥammad who, having been made to listen to anyone denying any of God's prophets through the message which God had entrusted to him, speaking disparagingly about him or harming him by treating him contemptuously or giving him the lie, denying what God had revealed through him, did not consider it to be licit to shed his blood and to [1758]

535. Literally, "had become effaced."

536. Tashtitin min al-hawā: Literally, "a state of disunion from (following) divergent inclinations."

537. Literally, "blindness."

538. Wa-abhaja bihi al-dīna. Crone and Hinds read anhaja ("He elucidated the religion through him"). Cf. God's Caliph, 119. Their reading follows Ṣafwat, Rasā'il, II, 448.

539. Raḥmatan li'l-'ālamīn. Cf. Qur'ān 21, v. 107. Cf. also Qur'ān 3, v. 8; 11, v. 28; 44, v. 5.

540. Literally, "in that in which their people used to call them liars."

break the bonds that existed between them, even if he were his father, son or fellow tribesman.

Then God appointed His caliphs to follow in the path of Muḥammad's prophetic ministry, after He had taken His prophet unto Himself, and (after) He had sealed His revelation by Muḥammad, in order that His rule should be accomplished, His sunnah and His penalties established, and His precepts and laws adopted. This was done so that, by His caliphs, God might confirm Islam, by them He might consolidate its sway,[541] by them He might strengthen its ties,[542] by them He might safeguard its sanctities,[543] (and) by them He might administer justice amongst His servants and might maintain the common weal in His lands. For God, most blessed and glorious, says: "And if God had not repelled some men by others the earth would have been corrupted. But God is a Lord of Kindness to (His) creatures."[544]

The caliphs of God succeeded each other as sovereigns over that which God had made them inherit from His prophets and that which He had entrusted to them. No one contests the right of the caliphs without God striking him down; no one abandons their commonality[545] without God destroying him; no one treats their authority lightly and challenges the decree of God vested in them without God granting them mastery and power over such a person and making an example of him and a warning to others. Thus does God deal with those who forsake the obedience to which God has called them and which He has commanded to be adopted and observed and by which the heavens and the earth are sustained. God, may He be blessed and glorified, said: "Then turned He to the heaven when it was smoke, and said unto it and unto [1759] the earth: Come both of you, willingly or loth." They said: "We come, obedient."[546] God, may the utterance of His

541. The text has tashyīdan. The apparatus has tashdīdan, which is better.
542. Literally, "the strengthening of His rope."
543. Daf'an bi-him 'an ḥarīmihi: literally, "fending (people) off from its (Islām's) or His (God's) forbidden things."
544. Cf. Qur'ān 2, v. 251.
545. Jamā'ah.
546. Cf. Qur'ān 41, v. 11.

name be glorified, also said: "And when thy Lord said unto the angels: 'Lo! I am about to place a viceroy in the earth,' they said: 'Wilt Thou place therein one who will do harm therein and will shed blood, while we, we hymn Thy praise and sanctify Thee?' He said: 'Surely I know that which ye know not.'"[547]

So it is by the caliphate that God preserves those of His servants on earth whom it is His will to preserve[548] and those whom He has appointed to inhabit the earth. It is in showing obedience to those whom God has appointed to rule on earth that there lies happiness for those whom God inspires thereto and who are made to understand it.[549] For God, may He be praised and glorified, knows that there is no stability or well-being for anything save through that same obedience, by which God preserves His due, by which He carries out His command, by which He repulses those who rebel against Him, safeguarding those things that are sacred to Him and protecting His inviolable precepts. He who accepts his portion of that obedience becomes the friend of God; he is obedient to His command, he obtains right guidance from Him, and he is singled out for God's blessing both in this life and in the life to come. But he who abandons that obedience, turns his face against it and opposes God thereby, squanders his allotted portion, disobeys his Lord, and loses for himself the things of this life and the next. His lot is cast with those overcome by wretchedness, possessed by sinful actions[550] which drag those in their thrall to drink in the foulest of waterholes and which betray them to the most dreadful of ends,[551] so that God afflicts them (even) in this world with humiliation and retribution and reduces them to a state of

547. Cf. Qur'ān 2, v. 30.

548. Literally, "God has preserved those of His servants on earth whom He has preserved."

549. The text has su'ida man ulhimahā wa-nuṣirahā ("those who are inspired thereto and who are assisted therein attain a state of felicity"). Dr. M. F. Al-Shayyal suggested the reading wa-buṣṣirahā, which has been followed here. Both ulhimahā and buṣṣirahā are passive since the action comes from God.

550. Al-umūru al-ghāwiyatu: Literally, "deviating matters."

551. Ilā sharri al-maṣāri'i ("the most dreadful places of slaughter").

dreadful punishment and intense sorrow (in the next world).[552]

Next to the proclamation of God's oneness, by which He distinguishes between His servants, obedience is the very pinnacle of this matter; obedience is its uppermost peak, its most prominent aspect, its guide, its foundation, its protection and its mainstay. It is by obedience that the successful receive their stations from God and are entitled to their reward from Him; whereas it is disobedience[553] that causes others (the unfortunate) to be assailed and struck down by [1760] His retribution and that necessitates His (just) displeasure and chastisement, because they have abandoned obedience, lost it, turned their back on it and given it away. God destroys those who go astray, who are inordinately proud, who are blind, who exceed proper limits and depart from the paths of piety and fear of God. So hold fast to obedience in God in those matters which may befall you, come to you, or happen to you. Be the faithful advocate of obedience, hold firmly to it, hasten toward it, take honest action to attain it, and seek diligently to approach nearer God by it. For you have seen the workings of God's judgment on behalf of those who practice obedience, by His exalting them and making their argument prevail and by His rejecting as false those who oppose them, who attack them, who compete with them, or who want to extinguish God's light which shines upon them. You have been warned, moreover, what those who are disobedient can expect in the way of reproof and straitening until their situation is reduced to sheer destruction, abasement, humiliation, and perdition. For anyone who possesses judgment and accepts sound advice, there is in that a clear warning[554] from which he may derive benefit[555] and from which he may attain a state of felicity, and by which he may know the blessing of God's decree to those who are deserving of it.[556]

552. Fīmā 'indahum. Crone and Hinds, op. cit., 121, have the reading fīmā a'adda lahum "(grief) which He has prepared for them," following Ṣafwat, Rasā'il, II, 450 n.

553. Wa-al-tabaddulu bi-hā ("giving it away in exchange for it (i.e., disobedience)"). Variants mentioned in the apparatus add li-al-ma'ṣiyati or bi-al-ma'ṣiyati. Crone and Hinds (loc. cit.) read tabadhdhul ("carelessness").

554. Wa-fī dhālika li-man kāna ra'yun wa-maw'iẓatun 'ibratun. Crone and Hinds translate this as "In that there is a warning and a lesson for the perceptive person" (op. cit., 122). The problem here is the wa between ra'yun and maw'iẓatun (or aw in the variant reading). The text as it stands should take ra'yun wa-maw'iẓatun together.

Moreover, God—to whom belongs praise and who dispenses favor and beneficence—has rightly guided the community to the best of outcomes,[557] making its condition healthy, by preventing the shedding of its blood, by consolidating the bonds of its fellowship, by making all its tongues agree, by establishing its pillars in good order, and by promoting the weal of its common people. The special repository of blessing bestowed on the community in this world, next to His caliphate which He established for them as a foundation and as a support for ruling them, is the covenant which God directed His caliphs to confirm and oversee for the Muslims in matters of moment; so that, whenever something befalls their caliphs, it might be an assurance of refuge, a shelter in [1761] times of calamity, a means of repairing disorder and of reconciling mutually hostile men, a way of consolidating the boundaries of Islam and of frustrating that which the Devil's followers desire from his enticements and to which he incites them, which is the destruction of this religion, the division of the unity of its people, and the sowing of dissension where He has united them through His religion. God's sole judgement for the evildoers in this matter is to afflict them[558] and to frustrate their desires. They will find that God's ordinance for His followers is to safeguard the conduct of their affairs[559] and that He has driven away from them anyone who wishes to make mischief or practice dishonesty in those affairs, or who wishes to weaken what God has made fast or who wishes to rely on what God has shunned.

---

555. Literally, "from whose clarity he may derive benefit."

556. Bi-hā. It is not clear to which of the feminine antecedents this may refer. It is probably the blessing.

557. The text has 'āfiyatan. The Cairo edition (VII, 221), which prefers the variant reading 'āqibatan, has been followed here. Cf. also Crone and Hinds, loc. cit.

558. Literally, "God will show the evildoers in this matter only that which will harm them. . . ."

559. Literally, "they will find God has made firm, by that which He has decreed for His followers thereby, the knots ('uqad) of their affairs."

It is by these (blessings)[560] that God has consummated—both for His caliphs and for His party which fears Him and whom He has entrusted with obedience to Him—the best of those things to which He has accustomed them; and He has enabled them to attain their purpose by what He has afforded them of His might, ennobling power, and ability to exalt and strengthen.[561] The authority embodied in this covenant[562] is integral to the completeness of Islam; it is a fraction[563] of the perfect bounties by which God has made the Muslims indebted to Him; it is an earnest of what God has in store, through this covenant, for those whom He has willed to execute it and those whom He has decreed should pronounce it.[564] He has made this covenant efficacious for those whom He has appointed to this office so as to be for Him the most excellent of treasures and the best reminder for Muslims of the benefits which He bestows on them and the protection which He affords them and of His strength on which they rely and His refuge to which they resort, a refuge which God himself has made for them, as a means of protection. For by it He defends them from every danger, by it He unites them against every faction, by it He lays low the hypocrites, and by [1762] it He preserves them from every division or schism.

So praise God, your Lord, who has been merciful to you, and who has applied in your affairs what He has shown you of this covenant—a covenant that He has made for you as an abode, a place of shelter[565] in which you may find rest, (a tree) in whose branches you may find shade, an instrument by which He has directed you to the right path wherever you

560. Bi-hā. It is not clear to what the hā refers. Rather than referring to obedience or the caliphate, it probably refers to God's benevolent actions toward those who follow Him.

561. Literally, "God has perfected . . . the best of that to which He has accustomed them and enabled them to attain from His reinforcing, honoring, exalting, and empowering."

562. Fa-amru hādhā al-'ahdi. Amr can also mean "matter." Cf. Crone and Hinds, op. cit., 123.

563. The words it is a fraction have been added for stylistic reasons.

564. Literally, "and is part of that which God has made therein (in the covenant? Islam?) for the one by whose hands He has accomplished it and on whose tongue He has decreed it."

565. Mu'awwalan: literally, "a place in which one may place confidence."

may turn your heads,[566] point your faces or convene[567] in your activities in this world and the next. In this there is a rich store of blessing; in this there is a great favor[568] from God who lavishly bestows (His) well-being. This is recognized by men of understanding and goodwill who think carefully about the consequences of their actions and who know the light that illumines the paths of right guidance. For it is proper that you should thank God for the way in which He has preserved your religion and your state of unity, (since) you are able to realize how greatly He deserves such thanks and praise for what He has determined for you by His religion. So let the position that religion has in your heart and its excellent status within your souls match God's great favor toward you in this matter, if God wills. There is no power but in God.

Moreover, ever since God appointed the Commander of the Faithful as His caliph, he (the Commander of the Faithful) has been more concerned and preoccupied with this covenant than with anything else, because he knows its crucial role in the affairs of the Muslims and because he knows those things which God has revealed to them in it for which they should be thankful. The caliph is gracious to them in his decrees. Of his own volition, he expends all his energies in this matter, both for his own good and for that of the people. He entreats his Lord and Master, in whose hand is authority and who possesses knowledge of what is hidden, to pass judgment therein on behalf of himself and his people, for He is all-powerful. In this matter the caliph asks God to help him to do what is most just, for himself in particular and for the [1763] Muslims in general.

So the Commander of the Faithful has thought it appropriate to bequeath to you a double covenant (of succession) that thereby you, like your predecessors before you, might be freed from care and blessed with abundant hope and peace of mind, and with mutual hostilities allayed. Thus you will realize to the full the importance of this matter which God has ordained for His people as a means of protection, salvation, well-being and life, while for every hypocrite and transgressor who wishes to destroy this religion and corrupt its people it is a means of abasement, destruction, and straitening. Therefore the Commander of the Faithful has appointed as his successor in that office his son al-Ḥakam and thereafter 'Uthmān, another son of the Commander of the Faithful. It is the hope of the Commander of the Faithful that the two of them are of those whom God created and fashioned for that office and in whom He perfected the ideal qualities of those whom He would wish to appoint to it, namely good judgment, sound religion, abundant manliness, and a knowledge of the proper management of affairs. In this the Commander of the Faithful has spared no effort both in his own interest and in yours.

566. Literally, "necks."

567. Literally, "the meeting of your forelocks (nawāṣīkum) in the matter of your religion and this world."

568. Cf. Qur'ān 8, v. 17.

Therefore give the oath of allegiance to al-Ḥakam, the son of the Commander of the Faithful, in the name of God and with His blessing, and after al-Ḥakam give the oath to his brother to heed and to obey. Expect as a reward for that the best of what God has already showered on you, repeatedly given you, accustomed you to, and taught you about through similar instances in the past when He bestowed widespread prosperity, general good, and great bounty, the hope,[569] security, well-being, safety, and protection of which you have achieved. This is the matter that you thought to be slow in coming and that you sought to hasten. You praised God for [1764] having achieved it and for ordaining it for you. You gave hearty thanks for it and you saw it as your good fortune. You will compete with each other and do your utmost to fulfill God's due which is incumbent on you, for you have already received from God's blessings, goodness, and generous portion all that you could (legitimately) want, and your enthusiasm for it matches what He has conferred on you and what He has done for you therein.

569. Crone and Hinds read rakhā'ihi ("ease") for rajā'ihi (op. cit., 125). This makes better sense than the version in the Leiden text, which has been translated here.

Moreover, if anything should happen to one of his two heirs, the Commander of the Faithful is entirely within his rights to fill his position and to put in his place whomsoever he wishes to put there, whether from his community or from his sons, and to give such a person precedence over the survivor of the two sons, if he so wishes, or to put him after that son. Be sure you understand that. We ask God—there is no God but He—Knower of the Invisible and the Visible,[570] the Merciful, the Compassionate, to bless the Commander of the Faithful and you in what He has determined and decreed through the words of the caliph. We ask Him to ensure that the outcome of His covenant is soundness, happiness, and joy, for the entire matter is in His hand; He alone has power over it. No one makes requests outside its remit. May the peace and the mercy of God be upon you.

Samāl[571] wrote this letter on Tuesday, eight days before the end of Rajab 125 [Tuesday, May 21, 743(?)].[572]

In this year al-Walīd appointed Naṣr b. Sayyār as governor of the whole of Khurāsān and put him in sole charge of it.

In this year Yūsuf b. 'Umar came to al-Walīd and he bought off Naṣr and his agents from al-Walīd, who gave him back the governorship of Khurāsān.

In this year Yūsuf b. 'Umar wrote to Naṣr b. Sayyar ordering him to come to him and to bring with him what he could in the way of tribute and money.[573] [1765]

570. Cf. Qur'ān 6, v. 74.

571. This name is odd and the person has not been identified.

572. The last day of Rajab in that year [i.e., Wednesday, the thirtieth of Rajab 125] corresponds to May 29, 743; eight days before corresponds to the twenty-second of Rajab (Tuesday, May 21, 743).

573. This is a rather obscure passage and the sequence of events is not clear. The following anecdotes have to do with Naṣr being first confirmed in his office by al-Walīd and then, after Yūsuf's machinations, dismissed. Cf. Wellhausen, 482–83.

What Transpired between Yūsuf and Naṣr in the Matter [of Tribute]

According to 'Alī [al-Madā'inī]—his shaykhs: Yūsuf b. 'Umar wrote to Naṣr on that matter and ordered him to come to him with all his dependents. When Yūsuf's letter reached Naṣr, he raised tribute from the people of Khurāsān and his agents.[574] He made ready every slave, female and male, and every spirited horse in Khurāsān, and he bought a thousand slaves, equipped them with weapons, and mounted them on horses.[575]

Some reports said: Naṣr made ready five hundred maidservants, and he gave orders that gold and silver ewers and statues of gazelles, lions' heads, ibexes, and other things should be made. When Naṣr had finished all these preparations, al-Walīd wrote to him urging him to hurry, so Naṣr sent the presents and the first of them reached Bayhaq.[576] Then al-Walīd wrote to him ordering him to send him guitars and lutes, and one of their poets recited the following lines:

Rejoice, you who are God's entrusted one, rejoice in the good news,
In camels laden with wealth like granaries
And mules carrying wine, their bags bulging like mandolins,
And the coquetry of Berber women as they play the bass[577] and high[578] strings [of the lute]
With now the beating of a tambourine and now the piping of flutes Such is your portion in this world and in Paradise delight itself will be yours.[579]

---

574. Qasama 'alā ahli Khurāsān al-hadāyā. The context that follows, where Naṣr is busy collecting valuable items to take to Yūsuf, makes it clear that this sentence does not mean that Naṣr distributed presents to the people of Khurāsān and his officials, as Muir suggests (Caliphate, 415–16). For the use of the term hadāyā as tribute, cf. Løkkegaard, 144.

575. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 202.

576. Cf. n. 334.

577. Al-bamm.

578. Al-zīr.

579. Cf. Qur'ān 43, v. 70.

In Hishām's time, al-Azraq b. Qurra al-Mismā'ī came from al- [1766]
Tirmidh[580] to Naṣr and he said to Naṣr: "I dreamed I saw al-Walīd b. Yazīd when he was heir-apparent, fleeing, as it were, from Hishām. I saw him on a couch, drinking honey, and he gave me some of it to drink." Then Naṣr gave al-Azraq four thousand dīnārs and a set of clothes and he dispatched him to al-Walīd with a letter.[581] Al-Azraq came to al-Walīd and gave him the money and the set of clothes. Al-Walīd, pleased with this, gave al-Azraq presents and also rewarded Naṣr well. Then al-Azraq departed; he heard about Hishām's death on his way back to Naṣr before Naṣr had any idea of what he had been doing. When al-Azraq reached Naṣr, he told him what had happened. On becoming caliph, Walīd wrote to al-Azraq and to Naṣr and gave orders to his messenger that he should go first to al-Azraq and give him his letter. The messenger reached al-Azraq at night and gave him his letter as well as Naṣr's letter, but al-Azraq did not read his own letter. (Instead) he brought the two letters to Naṣr. Walīd's letter to Naṣr instructed him to acquire guitars, mandolins, and gold and silver ewers for him, to collect from Khurāsān as many female cymbal players, falcons, and spirited horses as he possibly could, and to dispatch all this personally with prominent people from Khurāsān.

A man from the Banū Bāhilah said: A number of astrologers kept warning Naṣr that a time of trial (fitnah) was imminent, so Naṣr sent for Ṣadaqah b. Waththāb, who was in Balkh and was an astrologer in his service. Yūsuf kept asking Naṣr to come and see [1767] him and Naṣr continually hesitated to do so. Then Yūsuf sent a messenger with instructions that he should keep on pressing Naṣr to come, and that if he did not do so Yūsuf would proclaim publicly[582] that Naṣr had been dismissed from his office. When the messenger reached Naṣr, Naṣr gave him presents and bought him off.[583] Then Naṣr made for his citadel, which nowadays is the dār al-imārah, and he was on his way there when trouble 580. The most important town of the Ṣaghāniyān district at the place where the Zamīl and Oxus rivers join. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 440–41; Bosworth, "Chaghāniyān," 1–2.

581. Literally, "he sent him to al-Walīd and Naṣr wrote to him."

582. Literally, "or he would proclaim publicly."

583. Literally, "satisfied him."

broke out. So Naṣr went to his citadel in Mājān.[584] He appointed 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī as his deputy to govern Khurāsān. He put al-Muhallab b. Iyās al-'Adawī in charge of the kharāj and he made Mūsā b. Warqā' al-Nājī governor of al-Shāsh. He made Ḥassān al-Asadī, who was from Ṣaghāniyān,[585] governor of Samarqand, and he put Muqātil b. 'Alī al-Sughdī in charge of Āmul.[586] Naṣr gave orders to these men that if they heard that he had left Marw, they were to gather[587] the Turks together and to raid[588] the land across the Oxus. In that way, he could join them after leaving Marw, using that fighting as an excuse. Then one day, as Naṣr was on his way to Iraq, a mawlā from the Banū Layth came to him by night (with the news of al-Walīd's death).[589] In the morning the people were called to prayer, and Naṣr sent for al-Walīd's messengers. After praising and glorifying God, Naṣr said: "You know where I was going and you have seen what tribute I have sent. Now somebody comes to me at night and tells me that al-Walīd has been killed, unrest has broken out in Syria, Manṣūr b. Jumhūr has gone to Iraq, and Yūsuf b. 'Umar has fled.[590] You know the state of the country we live in and how numerous our [1768] enemies are!" Then Naṣr called for the leader (of the messengers) and made him swear that the news he had brought was the truth. The man swore that it was so. Then Salm[591] b. Aḥwaz said: "May God keep the amīr on the right path! If I had taken an oath I would have told the truth. This is a trick of the Quraysh who

584. Mājān was a village in the Marw area. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 378. Mājān became a flourishing suburb of Marw under Abū Muslim. Cf. Ibn Ḥawqal, 420–21; Le Strange, Lands, 398–99.

585. Ṣaghāniyān is probably to be identified as the modern town of Sar-i Asyā on the upper course of the Ṣaghāniyān River. Ṣaghāniyān was also the name of a district that lay to the west of the Wakhsh River and that was bounded on the south by the Oxus. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 439–40.

586. Āmul lay on the left bank of the Oxus, about 120 miles to the northeast of Marw. To distinguish it from Āmul in Ṭabaristān, it was later called Amū or Amūyah. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 403–04; Yāqūt, I, 365; *EI*², s.v. (M. Streck).

587. Amarahum . . . an yastaḥlibū. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 202, has yastajlibū. For yastaḥlibū ("urge to assemble"), cf. Gloss., p. CC. For yastajlibū ("to summon"), cf. Gloss., p. CLXIV. Both verbs make good sense in the context.

588. For yughīru, Ibn al-Athīr (V, 202) has ya'burū ("that they should cross").

589. The addition in parentheses is from Ibn al-Athīr, V, 202.

590. This isolated snippet about al-Walīd's murder and the events that ensued is placed too early in al-Ṭabarī's narrative. These events are discussed in detail later, under the year 126 (744). Cf. Wellhausen, 482–83.

591. He is called Sālim by Ibn al-Athīr (V, 202).

want to cast aspersions on your obedience. So clear off and don't speak calumny against us." He (the messenger)[592] said: "Salm, you are a man who is knowledgeable about military matters. You are, moreover, obedient to the Umayyads. But as for this kind of matter, your opinion on it is (as valueless as) the opinion of a slave girl with her front teeth broken!" Then Naṣr said: "Since (the time of) Ibn Khāzim,[593] I have encountered no difficult situation where my judgment was not superior (to that of others)."[594] The people said: "We know that and we think your opinion is correct."

In this year al-Walīd b. Yazīd sent his maternal uncle Yūsuf b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Thaqafī to be governor of Medina, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if, having handed over to his custody Ibrāhīm and Muḥammad, the two sons of Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī, who were tied up tightly in their cloaks.[595] Yūsuf arrived in Medina with them on Saturday, twelve days before the end of Sha'bān 125 [Saturday, June 14, 743] and paraded them before the people of Medina. Then al-Walīd wrote to him ordering him to send them to Yūsuf b. 'Umar, who was at that time his agent in Iraq. When Ibrāhīm and Muḥammad came to Yūsuf, he tortured them to death. They had been accused before al-Walīd of having embezzled large sums of money.

In this year Yūsuf b. Muḥammad dismissed Sa'd b. Ibrāhīm from the post of qāḍī of Medina and appointed to it Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Anṣārī.

In this year al-Walīd b. Yazīd sent his brother al-Ghamr b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik to carry out raids. Al-Walīd put al-Aswad b. Bilāl al-Muḥāribī[596] in charge of his naval forces and ordered him to go to Cyprus and to give the population the choice of going [1769]

592. The speaker is probably the messenger.

593. The allusion here is unclear (Ibn al-Athīr omits this saying of Naṣr's) but according to the index (321), the Ibn Khāzim in question is 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī (d. 73/692–93), a governor of Khurāsān around whom legends developed. Cf. Wellhausen, 416–21; *EI*², s.v. (H. A. R. Gibb).

594. Lam ashhad . . . amran mufẓi'an ilā kuntu al-mufri'a fī-al-rā'yi. The Cairo edition (VII, 226) has al-mufẓi'a for al-mufri'a. The Leiden text has been preferred in the translation. For a definition of mufri', cf. Lisān, II, 1082.

595. They had now to pay the penalty for having sided with the caliph Hishām when he tried to have allegiance sworn to Maslamah instead of al-Walīd. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1742; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 397.

596. Al-Muḥādhī in Ibn al-Athīr, V, 206.

either to Syria or to Byzantium. One group of them opted for asylum in Muslim territory, so al-Aswad took them to Syria. Others of them chose to go to Byzantium and they went in that direction.[597]

In this year Sulaymān b. Kathīr, Mālik b. al-Haytham, Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ, and Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb arrived in Mecca.[598]

According to some biographers, they met Muḥammad b. 'Alī[599] and they told him about Abū Muslim and what they had seen of him. Muḥammad asked them: "Is Abū Muslim a free-born man or a slave?" They replied: "'Īsā[600] alleges that he is a slave but Abū Muslim himself says that he is free-born." Muḥammad said: "Buy him and manumit him." Then they gave Muḥammad b. 'Alī two hundred thousand dirhams and clothes worth thirty thousand dirhams. Muḥammad said to them: "I do not think that you will ever meet me again after this year. Should anything happen to me, your master is Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad. I trust him and I enjoin you to treat him well just as I have enjoined him to treat you well."[601] Then they left Muḥammad b. 'Alī and he died on the first night of Dhū al-Qa'dah [Monday, July 25, 743] at the age of 63.[602] Between his death and the death of his father, 'Alī, was seven years.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informants—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: In this year Yūsuf b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Thaqafī led the pilgrimage.

[1770] In this year Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. 'Alī was killed in Khurāsān.

The Killing of Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. 'Alī

We have already mentioned how Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. 'Alī came to be in Khurāsān and the reason for his being there.[603] We will now 597. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 206. For the early history of the Muslims in Cyprus, cf. *EI*², "Ḳubrus" (A. H. de Groot).

598. Cf. the preceding account given by al-Ṭabarī (II, 1726–27). The 'Abbāsid nuqabā' were on the pilgrimage. Cf. also al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 397.

599. Cf. n. 370.

600. I.e., 'Īsā b. Ma'qil al-'Ijlī.

601. Cf. al-Dīnawarī, 340.

602. The death of Muḥammad b. 'Alī is reported in the sources as having occurred in either 124 or 125 A.H. Ibn al-Athīr says that Muḥammad was seventy-three when he died (V, 206).

603. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1714.

give an account of why he was killed, since that occurred in this year.[604]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī—Abū Mikhnaf: Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. ʿAlī stayed with al-Ḥarīsh[605] b. ʿAmr b. Dāwūd in Balkh until Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik died and al-Walīd b. Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik became caliph. Yūsuf b. ʿUmar wrote to Naṣr b. Sayyār telling him that Yaḥyā b. Zayd had left Iraq and letting him know where he was staying. Finally, Yūsuf told Naṣr that Yaḥyā was at the house of al-Ḥarīsh and he instructed Naṣr to send his men for Yaḥyā and to take him by force. So Naṣr b. Sayyār sent word to ʿAqīl b. Maʿqil al-ʿIjlī ordering him to seize al-Ḥarīsh and not to let him go until al-Ḥarīsh gave up the ghost or until he brought Yaḥyā b. Zayd to him. Accordingly, ʿAqīl sent for al-Ḥarīsh and questioned him about Yaḥyā. Al-Ḥarīsh said: "I know nothing about him." Then ʿAqīl gave him six hundred lashes. Al-Ḥarīsh said to him: "By God, if he were under my very feet I would not lift them from him so that you could take him." When Quraysh b. al-Ḥarīsh heard of this he went to ʿAqīl and [1771] said: "Don't kill my father. I will show you where Yaḥyā is." ʿAqīl sent someone with Quraysh, who showed him where Yaḥyā was. He found Yaḥyā in a (concealed) room inside a house and seized him, together with Yazīd b. ʿUmar,[606] and al-Faḍl, the mawlā of ʿAbd al-Qays who had come with Yaḥyā from al-Kūfah. ʿAqīl brought Yaḥyā to Naṣr b. Sayyār, who put him in prison and wrote to Yūsuf b. ʿUmar informing him of what he had done. Yūsuf wrote on this matter to al-Walīd b. Yazīd, who then wrote to Naṣr b. Sayyār ordering him to grant Yaḥyā safe-conduct and to set him and his associates free. Naṣr b. Sayyār summoned Yaḥyā and he ordered him to fear God, warned him against making discord, and commanded him to go to al-Walīd b. Yazīd. Naṣr ordered that Yaḥyā should have two thousand dirhams and two 604. For other accounts of the death of Yaḥyā b. Zayd, cf. Ibn Aʿtham, VIII, 126–36; al-Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 397–98; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (ed. Maḥmūdī), 260–65; al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 2–4.

605. This name is uncertain. The apparatus also has al-Jarīsh, while Ibn al-Athīr gives al-Ḥuraysh (V, 203). According to al-Balādhurī, al-Ḥarīsh was from the Rabīʿah (Ansāb, 261).

606. Yazīd b. ʿUmar had looked after Yaḥyā for six months in Sarakhs. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 260.

mules,[607] and Yaḥyā and his associates departed. Yaḥyā got as far as Sarakhs[608] and then he stayed there. In charge of Sarakhs was 'Abdallāh b. Qays b. 'Ubbād. Naṣr b. Sayyār wrote to him requesting that he should send Yaḥyā away from Sarakhs. Naṣr also wrote to al-Ḥasan b. Zayd al-Tamīmī, who was the leader of the Banū Tamīm and who was in charge of Ṭūs,[609] saying: "Keep your eyes open for Yaḥyā b. Zayd, and if he passes your way don't let him stay in Ṭūs but send him away from there." Naṣr further ordered both 'Abdallāh and al-Ḥasan that if Yaḥyā passed them they should make sure that they handed him over[610] to 'Amr b. Zurārah in Abrashahr.[611] Accordingly, 'Abdallāh b. Qays sent Yaḥyā out of Sarakhs. Yaḥyā then passed al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, who ordered him to be on his way and put him in the care of Sirḥān b.
[1772] Farrukh b. Mujāhid b. Bal'ā' al-'Anbarī Abū al-Faḍl, who had charge of a group of armed guards.

Sirḥān said: When I went in to see Yaḥyā, he spoke disparagingly about Naṣr b. Sayyār and about what Naṣr had given him.[612] Then he mentioned the Commander of the Faithful, al-Walīd b. Yazīd, and spoke ill of him.[613] He said that he went around with his associates and that he only did so because he was afraid that he would be poisoned or suffocated. He made a veiled reference to Yūsuf (b. 'Umar) and said that he was frightened of him. He confessed that he had also wanted to criticize Yūsuf, but had refrained from doing so. I said to Yaḥyā: "Say what you like, may God have mercy on you, for you need fear no spying on my part. Indeed, Yūsuf has behaved toward you in a way that should 607. Al-Balādhurī has: "Two thousand dirhams and a pair of sandals." Cf. Ansāb, 261.

---

608. Sarakhs in Khurāsān lay on the road from Ṭūs to Marw. It was on the great postal route. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 395–96; Ḥudūd, 104; al-Ya'qūbī, Les Pays, 85–86; Ibn Rustah, 200–01.

609. Ṭūs: a city in Khurāsān, due east of Nīshāpūr. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 388–89; Ibn Ḥawqal, 419; al-Ya'qūbī, Les Pays, 83–84.

610. Literally, "they should not leave him until they had given him to 'Amr."

611. The text has "Abarshahr." This is corrected later to "Abrashahr." Cf. Introd., p. DCCXI. Abrashahr was one of the names of Nīshāpūr in the early Islamic period. This is the name given on Umayyad and 'Abbāsid dirhams. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 383; al-Ya'qūbī, Les Pays, 417.

612. Literally, "he mentioned Naṣr b. Sayyār and what he gave him and there he was as if belittling him."

613. The text has fa-athnā 'alayhi. This phrase is ambiguous since athnā can mean both to speak well or ill of someone, although the former is more common.

invite comment from you." Then Yaḥyā replied: "What a surprising remark from someone who appoints guards or commands guards!"[614] In saying that, he was trying to elicit information(?).[615] By God, if I had wanted to send men after him, he would have been brought (to me) in fetters. Then I said to him: "No, by God, those guards are not meant for you. This is a practice which is always followed in this area because the treasury is here."[616] I then apologized to him for accompanying him and I went with him for over a farsakh until we chanced upon 'Amr b. Zurārah.[617] 'Amr ordered one thousand dirhams for him and gave him an escort as far as Bayhaq. Yaḥyā was afraid that Yūsuf might act treacherously toward him and having left Bayhaq, which is on the border of Khurāsān and Qūmis,[618] he then returned to 'Amr b. Zurārah with seventy men.[619] Some merchants passed Yaḥyā (on the road) and he took their riding beasts, saying: "We must pay for them."[620] Then 'Amr b. Zurārah wrote to Naṣr b. Sayyār, who [1773] in turn wrote to 'Abdallāh b. Qays and al-Ḥasan b. Zayd requesting them forthwith to go to join 'Amr b. Zurārah, who was in authority over them, and instructing them to provoke a fight with 614. Alladhī yuqīmu al-aḥrāsa aw amara al-aḥrāsa. The speaker obviously cannot remember the exact wording he used and therefore gives two versions.

---

615. The text has yatafassaḥa ("to speak eloquently"). The Cairo edition (229) also has this reading. Later, the editor emends this to yatafaḥḥasa ("to seek information"). Cf. Introd., p. DCCXI.

616. Literally, "No, by God, this has not been done because of you, but this is a thing that is always done in this area because of the position of the treasury."

617. Literally, "I went with him . . . and we came with him until we chanced upon 'Amr . . ." A farsakh consists of three mīls, i.e., about six km. Cf. Hinz, 62.

618. The province of Qūmis lay between the two provinces of the Jibāl to the west and Khurāsān to the east. Its major city was Damghān. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 364–68.

619. The sequence of events is very confused here and the text corrupt: "He advanced (aqbala) from Bayhaq, which is the furthest point of the territory of Khurāsān and the nearest of Qūmis, and he advanced (aqbala) with seventy men toward 'Amr b. Zurārah." The account of al-Balādhurī is much clearer: "When he left Bayhaq he was afraid that he would fall into the hands of Yūsuf and that he would cause him mischief, and Bayhaq is the border of the province of Khurāsān . . . so he (Yaḥyā) returned to 'Amr b. Zurārah." Cf. Ansāb, 261–62. It would appear that Yaḥyā felt panic and returned to Abrashahr (Nīshāpūr) where 'Amr was and asked permission to stay there a little while before going to Balkh. Cf. Ansāb, 262. This is also the version given by Ibn al-Athīr, V, 203.

620. Qāla 'alaynā athmānuhā. This action in acquiring more riding animals was clearly viewed as irregular by 'Amr and was used as the pretext to attack Yaḥyā.

Yaḥyā b. Zayd. So they went and joined 'Amr b. Zurārah, and those assembled numbered ten thousand men. Yaḥyā b. Zayd took the field against them, having with him only seventy men. (Yet) Yaḥyā routed them, killing 'Amr b. Zurārah and striking down numerous horses. Then Yaḥyā advanced as far as Herat. In charge of Herat was Mughallis b. Ziyād al-'Āmirī. Neither Yaḥyā nor Mughallis made a hostile move toward the other. Then Yaḥyā b. Zayd passed through Herat. Naṣr b. Sayyār sent Salm b. Aḥwaz in search of Yaḥyā b. Zayd, but when Salm reached Herat, Yaḥyā b. Zayd had already left the city. Salm then went in pursuit of Yaḥyā and caught up with him at a village in the area of al-Jūzajān,[621] which was under the charge of Ḥammād b. 'Amr al-Sughdī.

Yaḥyā b. Zayd was joined by a man of the Banū Ḥanīfah called Abū al-'Aʿlān. This man was killed that day with Yaḥyā. Yaḥyā was also joined by al-Ḥasḥās al-Azdī. Later on, Naṣr cut off his hand and his foot. Salm b. Aḥwaz put Sawrah b. Muḥammad b. 'Azīz al-Kindī on his right side and Ḥammād b. 'Amr al-Sughdī on his left. Then he launched into a fierce battle against Yaḥyā. Some accounts said that a man from the Banū 'Anazah[622] whose [1774] name was 'Īsā, the mawlā of 'Īsā b. Sulaymān al-'Anazī, shot an arrow at Yaḥyā and hit him in the forehead.[623] Muḥammad was present on that day.[624] Salm had ordered him to prepare his men for battle, but Muḥammad pretended to be ill, so it was Sawrah b. Muḥammad b. 'Azīz al-Kindī who made them ready. They fought and were killed to the last man. Sawrah passed Yaḥyā b. Zayd and took away his head. Al-'Anazī had seized his spoils and his shirt, but then Sawrah took Yaḥyā's head away from him by force.

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Mūsā b. Ḥabīb: When Yaḥyā b. Zayd was killed and al-Walīd b. Yazīd received news of it, al-Walīd wrote to Yūsuf b. 'Umar as follows: "When this letter of mine reaches you, look for the calf[625] of Iraq,

---

621. The village was called Arghūnah. Cf. Ibn A'tham, VIII, 134. Al-Mas'ūdī has Ar'awanah. Cf. Murūj, VI, 2.

622. For the Banū 'Anazah, cf. EI[2], s.v. (E. Gräf).

623. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 262.

624. Presumably the Muḥammad in question is Muḥammad b. 'Azīz al-Kindī, the father of Sawrah. This, at any rate, is the tentative opinion of the editor. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1774, note b.

625. 'Ijl. Cf. Qur'ān 20, v. 88; 7, v. 148. These details about burning the "calf of burn him, then scatter him as dust in the river."[626] Yūsuf gave orders to Khirāsh b. Ḥawshab and he brought Yaḥyā down from the gibbet,[627] burned his body, then crushed it, put it in a date basket, placed it in a boat, and then scattered Yaḥyā's remains in the Euphrates.

In this year the agents of the garrison cities were the same as in the preceding year and we have already mentioned them.

Iraq" are also mentioned in some sources in connection with Zayd. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, 257; al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 143–44.

626. Fī al-yammi. Cf. Qur'ān 20, v. 39.

627. Literally, "from his tree."

The Events of the Year 126

(October 25, 743–October 12, 744)

[1775]

One of the important events taking place during this year was the killing of al-Walīd b. Yazīd by Yazīd b. al-Walīd,[628] who was known as the Inadequate (al-Nāqiṣ).[629]

The Reason for Yazīd's Killing of al-Walīd and the Manner of His Killing

We have already given some account of al-Walīd b. Yazīd, mentioning his immorality, his wantonness, and his flippant and frivolous attitude toward religion before he became caliph. When his accession came and the caliphate passed to him, he only persisted

---

628. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

629. Although, as will be discussed later, Yazīd b. al-Walīd was given the pejorative title al-Nāqiṣ because he cut back (naqaṣa) on the people's pensions, there is also a suggestion here of incompleteness and of physical inadequacy as well. The term al-Nāqiṣ has therefore been translated as "inadequate" rather than as "curtailer" in an attempt to render the double entendre. On the reasons for Yazīd's receiving this nickname, cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, I, 17; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 19–20.

all the more in his pursuit of idle sport and pleasures, hunting, drinking wine, and keeping company with libertines. I have left to one side the accounts which deal with all this as I would hate to make my book any longer by mentioning them. These aspects of al-Walīd's behavior troubled his subjects and his soldiery deeply and they hated what he was doing. One of the worst offences he committed against himself, and which finally led to his death, was the way in which he aroused disaffection against himself amongst the sons of his two uncles, Hishām and al-Walīd, who were the sons of 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān,[630] as well as amongst the Yamāniyyah who formed the major part of the Syrian jund.

Part of the Account of al-Walīd's Causing Disaffection among the Sons of His Two Uncles, Hishām and al-Walīd [1776]

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—al-Minhāl b. 'Abd al-Malik: Al-Walīd loved idle sport, hunting, and pleasures. When he became caliph he began to dislike places where there were people. This continued to be the case until he was killed.[631] He kept on moving about and going out hunting, and he distressed the people and his soldiers. He (particularly) upset the sons of Hishām, for he sentenced Sulaymān b. Hishām[632] to one hundred lashes, shaving his head and beard and banishing him to 'Ammān, where he put him in prison; there Sulaymān remained until al-Walīd was killed.

Al-Walīd took a slave-girl belonging to the family of al-Walīd (b. 'Abd al-Malik). 'Umar b. al-Walīd spoke to al-Walīd about this matter but al-Walīd said: "I will not give her back." So 'Umar said: "In that case, there will be much neighing of horses around your troops."[633]

630. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

631. After he became caliph, al-Walīd never once entered a Syrian city until his death. Cf. Fragmenta, 130–31.

632. According to Fragmenta, 130, al-Walīd could not forget that Sulaymān b. Hishām had been against him when Hishām was caliph. Sulaymān had advised his father to depose al-Walīd as his heir. Cf. also al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 45. The text has wa-ishtadda 'alā Banī Hishāmi ḍaraba Sulaymāna. The Cairo edition, 231, punctuates this passage differently and adds fa: wa-ishtadda 'alā Banī Hishāmi; fa-ḍaraba Sulaymān. This alternative has been followed in the translation. Al-Balādhurī has a clearer version: wa-ishtadda 'alā Banī Hishāmi ḥattā ḍaraba Sulaymāna. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 46.

He (al-Walīd) imprisoned Yazīd b. Hishām al-Afqam[634] and wanted the oath of allegiance to be given to his two sons, al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān.[635] Al-Walīd consulted Sa'īd b. Bayhas b. Suḥayb on this, who said: "Don't do it; for they are young boys who have not yet reached puberty. Have the oath of allegiance given to 'Atīq b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik." Al-Walīd was furious and put Sa'īd in prison, where he died. Al-Walīd wanted Khālid b. 'Abdallāh[636] to give the oath of allegiance to his two sons but Khālid refused. Some of Khālid's family said to him: "The Commander of the Faithful wanted you to give the oath of allegiance to his two sons yet you refused to do so!" Khālid retorted: "Fie on you! How can I give the oath of allegiance to those behind whom I cannot say my prayers or whose testimony (shahādah) I cannot accept?"[637] They replied: "What about al-Walīd? You know all about his wantonness and depravity, yet you still accept his testimony!" Khālid replied: "Al-Walīd's activities [1777] are hearsay. I cannot be sure about them. It is only vulgar tittle-tattle." But al-Walīd was furious with Khālid.

'Amr b. Sa'īd al-Thaqafī said: "Yūsuf b. 'Umar sent me to al-Walīd. When I went in to see him, al-Walīd greeted me: 'Well, how do you find the libertine?' meaning by that himself. Then he went on: 'Beware lest anyone should hear you saying such a thing.' I rejoined: 'I would divorce Ḥabībah, the daughter of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jubayr, rather than allow my ear to hear such things as long as you live.'" Then al-Walīd laughed.

Al-Walīd deeply distressed the people (by his behavior), and the sons of Hishām and of al-Walīd (b. 'Abd al-Malik) charged him with being an unbeliever and with having debauched the mothers of his father's sons. They also alleged that al-Walīd had taken one hundred collars(?) and had written on each of them the name of one of the Umayyads whom he intended to kill thereby.[638] His 633. Cf. Fragmenta, 131.

634. Al-Afqam was the laqab of Yazīd b. Hishām. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 140; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, II, 291; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 46.

635. Cf. the genealogical table of the Umayyads.

636. Al-Qasrī.

637. They were minors. For a similar account, cf. Fragmenta, 131; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 46.

638. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 45; Fragmenta, 130. The text has wa- detractors also accused him of being a free-thinker.[639] The most vociferous of the critics of al-Walīd was Yazīd b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. The people were well-disposed to listen to him because he performed public acts of asceticism and would adopt a humble stance, merely saying: "We cannot afford to be satisfied with al-Walīd." (This continued) until he induced the people to assassinate al-Walīd.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Yazīd b. Maṣād al-Kalbī—'Amr b. Sharāḥil: Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik sent us to Dahlak[640] where we remained until Hishām's death and the accession of al-Walīd. Then our case was brought up, but al-Walīd refused to do anything and said: "By God, Hishām never did anything that is more deserving of forgiveness by me than his killing and banishment of the Qadariyyah".[641] Al-Ḥajjāj b. Bishr b. Fayrūz al-Daylamī was in charge of us and he used to say: "Al-Walīd will survive for only eighteen months before he is killed [1778] and his killing will bring about the destruction of the rest of his family."

A group of the Quḍā'ah, and especially of al-Yamāniyyah from Damascus, resolved to kill al-Walīd. Then Ḥurayth, Shabīb b. Abī Mālik al-Ghassānī, Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, Ya'qūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, Ḥibāl b. 'Amr, who was Manṣūr's cousin, Ḥumayd b. Naṣr al-Lakhmī, al-Aṣbagh b. Dhu'ālah, Ṭufayl b. Ḥārithah, and al-Sarī b. Ziyād b. 'Ilāqah came to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, and asked him to join in their enterprise.[642] Khālid did not agree to it.[643] Then they kataba 'alā kulli jāmi'atin isma rajulin. The meaning of jāmi'ah as a collar or manacles joining the hands to the neck is well attested. Cf. Lisān, II, 501 and Kazimirski, I, 328. Presumably, if such collars were made of metal (or even leather) they could be both written on and tightened so as to strangle the wearer. However, this is only a tentative translation. It may be that jāmi'ah could be translated more blandly as "document," but the lengthy entries in the standard dictionaries give no support for this interpretation. Moreover, there might then be a problem with the phrase "li-yaqtula bihā." Al-Balādhurī, however, omits bihā (Ansāb, 45).

---

639. Al-zandaqah.

640. The term Dahlak refers to a group of islands off the west coast of the Red Sea opposite Eritrea. Dahlak al-Kabīr was used as a place to which the Umayyad caliphs sent opponents, such as the Qadariyyah. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (S. H. Longrigg).

641. Cf. Hishām's treatment of Ghaylān.

642. For a recent discussion of the elements that comprised the opposition to al-Walīd II, cf. Hawting, 93. Al-Walīd's father, Yazid, had espoused anti-"southern" (Kalbī and Yemeni) policies, and al-Walīd had already in his short rule confirmed Yūsuf b. 'Umar (a Qaysī) in the key post of governor of Iraq.

643. Literally, "he did not answer them."

asked him to keep quiet about their plans and Khālid said: "I will not mention any of your names." But when al-Walīd wanted to go on the pilgrimage, Khālid was afraid that the conspirators would assassinate him en route. Khālid therefore went to al-Walīd and said: "O Commander of the Faithful, put off going on the pilgrimage this year." When al-Walīd asked him why, Khālid would not tell him. So al-Walīd ordered that Khālid should be cast into prison and that whatever Iraqi revenues Khālid had should be taken from him.[644]

According to 'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—al-Ḥakam b. al-Nu'mān: Al-Walīd resolved to dismiss Yūsuf (b. 'Umar) and to appoint as governor 'Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥajjāj. So he wrote to Yūsuf as follows:

> You have written to the Commander of the Faithful explaining how Ibn al-Naṣrāniyyah (i.e., Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī) has allowed the country to go to rack and ruin, and you go on to say that it was for that reason that you delivered such small revenues to Hishām.[645] It was only to be expected that you would have made the land prosper to such an extent that you restored it to its former state. So come to the Com-
> [1779] mander of the Faithful and confirm his high expectations of you by what you bring him to show how you have made the land prosper. (Do this so that) the Commander of the Faithful may be assured of your superiority over other men, because of the close kinship that God has made between you and the Commander of the Faithful—for you are his maternal uncle and the person most entitled to give generously to him—and because you know that the Commander of the Faithful has given instructions that the stipends of the Syrians and of others should be increased. (You know, too,) what he has given the members of his family—to the detriment of the treasuries—because of the churlish treatment which they endured for so long at the hands of Hishām.[646]

---

644. Al-Balādhurī adds after the same account: "He (al-Walīd) gave him (Khālid) to Yūsuf b. 'Umar, who tortured him to death." Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 47. Cf. also Fragmenta, 132.

645. Literally, "you brought to Hishām what you brought."

646. Cf. Wellhausen, 357. This letter is a transparently desperate ploy on the part of al-Walīd to raise money and was to culminate in al-Walīd's selling Khālid al-Qasrī to Yūsuf b. 'Umar.

Yūsuf accordingly set out, having appointed as his deputy his cousin Yūsuf b. Muḥammad and taking with him unprecedented quantities of money, goods, and drinking vessels from Iraq. When he arrived, Khālid b. 'Abdallāh was in prison. Ḥassān al-Nabaṭī met Yūsuf at night and told him that al-Walīd was determined to appoint 'Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥajjāj as governor and that Yūsuf would have to ingratiate himself with al-Walīd's ministers.[647] Yūsuf said: "I don't have any spare cash." Ḥassān replied: "I have five hundred thousand dirhams. If you want them, you can have them, and you can return them if you like, should things go well for you." Yūsuf said: "You know more than I do about these men and their standing with the caliph, so distribute the money amongst them to the best of your knowledge." Ḥassān acted accordingly and when Yūsuf arrived,[648] the people treated them respectfully. Then Ḥassān said to Yūsuf: "Don't go in to see al-Walīd in the morning but go to him in the evening. Write a letter to yourself from your deputy saying, 'I have written to tell you that your only hope lies in the palace.' Go in to see al-Walīd, having the letter hidden on you and wearing a sad expression. Read the letter to him and order Abān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al- [1780] Numayrī to buy Khālid from al-Walīd for forty million dirhams." Yūsuf acted accordingly and al-Walīd said to him: "Return to your post." Then Abān said to al-Walīd: "If you give me Khālid, I will give you forty million dirhams." Al-Walīd replied: "Who will act as your guarantor?" Abān said: "Yūsuf." So al-Walīd asked Yūsuf: "Will you act as his guarantor?" Yūsuf replied: "No! On the contrary, give him to me and I will extract fifty million dirhams from him."[649] So al-Walīd gave Khālid to Yūsuf, who took him away on a litter without a seat below to sit on.[650]

Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim said: I took pity on Khālid and I put some tasty things we had with us, including some dried dates and other things, in a napkin. I was riding a

647. Literally, "it was inevitable that he would have to settle the matter of his ministers." Ibn al-Athīr has: "he advised him to take bribes to his ministers" (V, 212).

648. At the court.

649. Ibn al-Athīr's account is much more straightforward. Yūsuf bought Khālid from al-Walīd for fifty million dirhams and al-Walīd gave him to Yūsuf (V, 212). Cf. also al-Dīnawarī, 347–48.

650. Wiṭā': "what is placed or spread beneath one, to sit or lie upon." Cf. Lane, I, 2949.

lively she-camel and I hurried up to Khālid without Yūsuf noticing,[651] and threw the napkin into his litter. Then Khālid said to me: "These are goods from 'Umān," referring to the fact that my brother al-Fayḍ[652] was in charge of 'Umān and that he had sent me a large sum of money. So I said to myself: "Here is this man in this (miserable) state and he still won't drop this matter." Then Yūsuf noticed me and said to me: "What did you say to Ibn al-Naṣrāniyyah?" (i.e., Khālid). I replied: "I asked him if he needed anything." Yūsuf said: "You did well. He is a prisoner." [Muḥammad continued:] If Yūsuf had been aware of what I had thrown to Khālid, some harm would have befallen me at his hands. Yūsuf arrived in al-Kūfah and killed Khālid under torture.

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī: Al-Walīd b. Yazīd recited a poem in which he reproached the Yamāniyyah for failing to come to the help of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh. According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Muḥammad b. Sa'īd [1781] al-'Āmirī, from the Banū 'Āmir of Kalb:[653] This poem was recited by one of the Yamanī poets who put it into the mouth of al-Walīd in order to rouse the Yamāniyyah against him:[654]

Have your emotions not been stirred to recall your union (with your beloved), and a knot which once was tied and then was loosed?
Yes, indeed! So let your tears flow freely, like water gushing continuously from clouds.[655]
Remember no more the people of Su'dā,[656] for we are the greatest in numbers and wealth.[657]

---

651. Fa-taghaffaltu Yūsufa. Literally, "I watched for Yūsuf to be unmindful."

652. Al-Fayḍ b. Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim al-Thaqafī. He was from Yūsuf's family. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 553. Presumably the money was tainted in some way.

653. The text has 'Āmir Kalb. This should probably read "'Āmir b. Kilāb" or "'Āmir b. Ka'b." Cf. *EI*², "'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'a" (W. Caskel); Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 160.

654. The order of the lines or half-lines of this poetry, as presented by al-Ṭabarī, is rather unsatisfactory. A number of them seem to be in the wrong place. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 212–13; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 48; Fragmenta, 132–33; al-Dīnawarī, 347. The meter is wāfir. Only the most important textual differences have been noted here. Al-Dīnawarī's version is the most at variance with the others.

655. Ka-mā'i al-muzni yansajilu insijālā. Al-Dīnawarī, 347, has ka-mā'i al-gharbi yanhamilu inhimālā.

656. For the Banū Su'dā, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 515.

657. This hemistich seems to be in the wrong place.

We are kings who rule men by force, inflicting on them humiliation and punishment.[658]
We have trampled on the Ash'arīs with the might of Qays,[659] and what a trampling for you! Its like will not recur.
Behold Khālid a prisoner in our midst![660]
Had they been true men they would have protected him,
Their lord and master in days of yore.
We have made shame dog him like a shadow.
Had they been tribes who wielded any power,
We would not have showered benefits (on them) in vain.
Nor would they have left him dispossessed and in captivity, with only our heavy chains to talk to.[661]

Al-Madā'inī reported: "struggling with our chains."

As for the tribes of Kindah and Sakūn,[662] they have never risen up again,[663] nor have their horses been relieved of their saddles.
Through them we have inflicted every sort of ignominy on mankind, and devastated both the plains and the mountains.
But battles have brought them low,
and torn them up and driven them away,
So they remain forever subservient to us; [1782]
We inflict humiliation and degradation upon them.[664]
And so the next morning I was ruling the people, with a crown on my head which will not be removed.

'Imrān b. Halbā' al-Kalbī gave the poet the following reply:[665]

---

658. Al-Dīnawarī has an extra line here.

659. Bi-'izzi Qaysin. Al-Dīnawarī has bi-kulli arḍin. For the Ash'arīs (al-Ash'ariyyūn), cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 200.

660. Fīnā. Fragmenta, 132 and Ansāb, 48 have amsā asīran (a ḥāl clause). Ibn al-Athīr has asīrun, which is also possible grammatically as the khabar.

661. Yu'āliju min salāsilinā. This is the version preferred by Ibn al-Athīr (V, 212); al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 48; Fragmenta, 133. Al-Dīnawarī, 348, has nuḥammiluhu salāsilanā.

662. The Sakūn were a branch of the Kindah. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 503.

663. The text has fa-mā istiqālū. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 212, has fa-mā istaqāmū, which makes better sense. Al-Dīnawarī, 348, has qad ista'ādhū.

664. The second hemistich is almost a repetition of 1781, line 6.

665. This reply is not in the other sources.

Rein in your riding she-camel, O Ḥalāl, and cut the cord of the one who has already severed union.
Has it not grieved you that he who has opposed the chieftains of Yaman should be held in high esteem?
We have given long days to the tribes of Nizār[666] on the Day of al-Marj[667]
And through us the crowned one of the Quraysh became king,[668] and the good fortune of those who had perished perished with them.
When[ever] you confront the Sakūn and the Kalb and the ʿAbs,[669] you may be sure that your sovereignty is at an end.
For unless a man is found to be just,
his own words will compass his downfall.
Prepare, O people of Ḥimyar,[670] whenever the call to arms is raised, Indian swords and blood-spilling[671] spears,
And every[672] youthful horse with high short ribs and endowed with two flanks, lean in belly and tall as mountains[673]
Will leave behind on every battlefield a dead warrior, a man who had grown tired of the call[674] (to battle), surrounded by birds.
If you reviled us for the deeds we have done,
you would be saying a dreadful thing.

---

666. I.e., Muḍar and Rabīʿah.

667. This is probably a reference to the battle of Marj Rāhiṭ near Damascus in 64 (684), at which the Quḍaʿah led by the Kalb tribe defeated a confederation of Qays tribes and ensured that the caliphate would remain in the Marwānid line. For a discussion of the tribal implications of this battle, cf. Crone, 35; Wellhausen, 171–83; Rotter, 126–51; Dixon, 83–120.

668. I.e., the Umayyad caliph, Marwān I.

669. For the Banū ʿAbs, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 135; cf. *EI*², "Ghaṭafān" (J. Fück).

670. For the Banū Ḥimyar, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 324.

671. Al-nihālā: literally, "(blood) drinking."

672. The text has wukulla. This is emended to wakullu. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXI.

673. The text has al-ḥibālā. The Cairo edition (236) has al-jibālā, which has been preferred in the translation.

674. Qad madhila al-suʾālā. This is instead of min al-suʾāli (lit., "who has become weary of asking"). Cf. Gloss., p. DCLXXXIII.

As for the brothers of al-Ash'ath,[675] they were killed, but they were neither trampled on nor humiliated.
As for the sons of al-Muhallab,[676] we have joined battle against them, but you have fought none of them.
And the men of Judhām,[677] together with those of Lakhm,[678] [1783] have set themselves against their brothers, killing and scattering them.
We fled, refusing to help you against them, but those who have assisted you have committed a grave error.
So if you do return, you should know that we have swords which are sharp and which we polish continually.
We will mourn[679] Khālid by using your Indian swords, nor will his great deeds be lost [from memory].
Has not Khālid been the rain sought by orphans when they came to you and you gave them nothing?[680] Khālid used to provide shrouds for the dead of Nizār, and enrich the quick (of Nizār) with land and wealth.
If those who had done him wrong had been in the courts of his own people, they would have been severely punished.
You will encounter, if you remain alive, clearly marked horses, stern of expression, which are never without[681] their trappings.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): The people's rage against al-Walīd only increased when 675. This is probably a reference to the rebellion of Ibn al-Ash'ath in 80–82 (699–702). Cf. *EI*², s.v. (Veccia Vaglieri); Hawting, 67–71; Dixon, 151–68; Crone, 110–11; Wellhausen, 232–48.

676. For the rebellion of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab in 102 (720), cf. Wellhausen, 312–18; Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 93–95; Hawting, 73–76; al-Ṭabarī, II, 1402–05.

677. For the Banū Judhām, cf. *EI*², "Djudhām" (C. E. Bosworth). In the Umayyad period, they were close supporters of the Banū Marwān. The text has Judhāmun. This is corrected to Judhāmu. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXII.

678. For the Banū Lakhm, cf. *EI*², s.v. (H. Lammens-I. Shahid). They were closely linked in Umayyad times with the Judhām.

679. The Leiden text has satabkī. The Cairo edition (VII, 236) has sanabkī ("we will mourn"), as does the emended version. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXII.

680. Literally, "while you were leanness for them."

681. The text has lā yuzāyalna. This is later emended to lā yuzāyilna. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXII.

this poem was recited. Then Ibn Bīḍ[682] declaimed the following lines:[683]

You have loaded the cloud of affliction with further affliction, after you asserted that the cloud of affliction would be lifted from us.
Would that Hishām were still alive ruling over us, and that we still had our hopes and aspirations intact!

Hishām had appointed al-Walīd b. al-Qa'qā'[684] as agent of Qinnasrīn[685] and 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Qa'qā' in charge of Ḥimṣ. Al-Walīd b. al-Qa'qā' had given Ibn Hubayrah one hundred lashes.[686] When al-Walīd became caliph, the Banū al-Qa'qā'[687] fled from him and sought refuge at the grave of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.[688] Al-Walīd sent people to seize them. He then handed them over to Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah,[689] who was in charge of Qinnasrīn. Ibn Hubayrah tortured them, and al-Walīd b. al-Qa'qā', 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Qa'qā' and two other men from the Qa'qā' family died under torture.

[1784] The sons of al-Walīd (b. 'Abd al-Malik) and of Hishām, as well as the family of al-Qa'qā' and the Yamāniyyah, conceived a deep 682. Ibn al-Athīr has Hamzah b. Bīḍ (V, 213). Fragmenta, 133, and al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 48, give the poet the nisbah al-Ḥanafī. Cf. also Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, I, 289; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 42–43.

683. The meter is ṭawīl. Ibn al-Athīr has more lines of poetry, also by Ibn Bīḍ, at this point (loc. cit.). These are also in Fragmenta, 133.

684. Al-Walīd b. al-Qa'qā' had served in Armenia under Maslamah and in Khurāsān under Junayd. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 206; al-Ṭabarī, II, 1529, 1550. He was appointed 'āmil of Qinnasrīn by Hishām in 119 (737). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1593. For the history of this family, cf. Crone, 105.

685. For this well-known city of northern Syria, cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 353–57; *EI*², s.v. (N. Elisséeff).

686. 'Umar b. Hubayrah al-Fazārī had been made governor of al-Jazīrah under 'Umar II in 100 (718–19). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1349; Wellhausen, 319–22, 326–28, 453–55. For the one hundred lashes, cf. also Fragmenta, 122.

687. The Banū al-Qa'qā' had supported Hishām in his unsuccessful attempts to have al-Walīd ousted as his heir apparent. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1742.

688. The Umayyad caliph, Yazīd II, who ruled 101–05 (720–24). Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table. Fragmenta, 122 has the Banū al-Qa'qā' fleeing to the grave of Marwān.

689. Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah later joined up with Marwān II. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 564. He was killed by the 'Abbāsids in 132 (749–50). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1913; III, 61; Crone, 107.

hatred for the caliph al-Walīd because of his treatment of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh. Accordingly, the Yamāniyyah went to Yazīd b. al-Walīd and tried to persuade him to have the oath of allegiance given to him. Yazīd consulted 'Amr[690] b. Yazīd al-Ḥakamī, who said: "The people will not give the oath of allegiance to you over this matter. Consult your brother al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd, for he is the head of the Banū Marwān.[691] If al-'Abbās gives you the oath of allegiance, no one else will oppose you. If al-'Abbās refuses, then the people will be more likely to obey him. If you insist on sticking to your opinion, then proclaim publicly that al-'Abbās has given the oath of allegiance to you." At that time Syria was plague-ridden and the conspirators went out into the desert country. Yazīd b. al-Walīd was encamped in the desert and al-'Abbās was at al-Qasṭal.[692] There was a distance of a few *mīl*s between the two of them.[693]

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī (al-Madā'inī): Yazīd came to his brother al-'Abbās and told him what had been happening.[694] Yazīd asked his advice and spoke abusively of al-Walīd. Then al-'Abbās said to him: "Go easy, Yazīd. By breaking God's oath you corrupt both true religion and this life on earth." Yazīd returned home and worked secretly among the people, who clandestinely gave him the oath of allegiance. Yazīd also issued secret instructions to al-Aḥnaf al-Kalbī, Yazīd b. 'Anbasah al-Saksakī, and a group of notables and chiefs who were in his confidence, and they privately canvassed people to join the cause. Then Yazīd paid another visit to his brother al-'Abbās, accompanied by their mawlā, Qaṭan.[695] Yazīd sought his brother's advice on this whole matter and told him that people were coming to him and trying to persuade him to accept their oath of allegiance. Al-'Abbās chided 690. The text has 'Amr. Ibn al-Athīr has 'Umar. For his biography, cf. Crone, 156.

691. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

692. Al-Qasṭal was a place near al-Balqā' in the area of Damascus, on the road to Medina. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 95; Derenk, 121; Dussaud, 80, 85; Gaube, 67–73, 76–78, 85–86.

693. For these events, cf. Fragmenta, 133–34; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 48–49; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 213.

694. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 381.

695. According to al-Jahshiyārī, Qaṭan was in charge of al-khātam al-kabīr (Wuzarā', 44).

him and said: "If you resort to this kind of behavior again, I will certainly tie you up tightly and take you to the Commander of the Faithful," so Yazīd and Qaṭan went away. Then al-'Abbās sent word to Qaṭan, saying: "Look here, Qaṭan! Do you think that Yazīd is in earnest?" Qaṭan said: "To tell the truth, I don't think [1785] he is. But he can no longer endure[696] what he has heard of al-Walīd's treatment of the sons of Hishām and the sons of al-Walīd (b. 'Abd al-Malik) and of the caliph's flippant and contemptuous attitude toward religion." Al-'Abbās replied: "By God, I myself think that he is the ill-starred one[697] of the Banū Marwān. Were it not for the fact that I am afraid that al-Walīd would act hastily and unfairly toward us, I would truss up Yazīd hand and foot[698] and take him to al-Walīd. So dissuade him from what he plans to do. He listens to you." Then Yazīd said to Qaṭan: "What did al-'Abbās say to you when he saw you?" So Qaṭan told Yazīd what al-'Abbās had said and Yazīd said: "No, by God, I won't hold back!"[699] When Mu'āwiyah b. 'Amr b. 'Utbah heard about the people's activities, he went to al-Walīd and said: "O Commander of the Faithful, you coax forth my tongue when we have a friendly conversation, but I hold it back out of reverence for you. I hear what you do not hear and I fear things which do not worry you.[700] Shall I speak honestly or remain silent out of obedience?" Al-Walīd said: "Everything is acceptable from you. God has hidden knowledge about us; it is our destiny to reach him. If the Banū Marwān knew that they are kindling a fire on red-hot stones which they are casting into their own bellies, they would not act in this way. Let us go back[701] (to what we were talking about) and we will hear what you have to say." Marwān b. Muḥammad heard

---

696. Mā qad ḍāqa bihi dhar'an.

697. Asha'ma sakhlatin ("the most inauspicious lamb"). It is tempting to use the English idiom "black sheep" here, but such an idiom does not take account of the nuance of ill luck in Arabic. Men who are sukhkhāl are weak and commit foul deeds (ardhal): cf. Lisān, II, 114. Fragmenta, 134 has ashamma ("disdainful"). Ibn al-Athīr, V, 213 has asha'ma mawlūdin ("the most inauspicious offspring").

698. Literally, "I would tie Yazīd up tightly."

699. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 49; Fragmenta, 134.

700. Literally, "I fear that against which I see you feeling secure."

701. The text has na'ūdhu as does Fragmenta, 134. The apparatus has one suitable variant, na'ūdu, which is adopted by the Cairo edition (238), and which makes better sense. Al-Balādhurī also has na'ūdu. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 50.

in Armenia that Yazīd was fomenting discord amongst the people and inciting them to depose al-Walīd. So Marwān wrote to Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān,[702] who was a God-fearing man,[703] ordering him to forbid the people to take such action and to restrain them, and saying:[704]

Verily God has created for the benefit of all the members of a family pillars on which they may lean and by which they may guard themselves against dangers. By the grace of your Lord, you are one of the pillars of [the members of] your family. I have heard that a group of fools in your household have set in motion a certain matter.[705] If they achieve their aim in this matter, having agreed to abrogate their oath of allegiance, they will open a door which God will not shut for them until much blood of theirs has been shed. I myself am fully occupied on the most perilous of the Muslim frontiers. If I could get hold of these people, I would put their wrongdoing to rights with my own hand and with my own words. I would, moreover, fear God[706] if I did not act in this way[707] because I know what mischief is caused to religion and to this earthly life as a consequence of schism. [I know too] that the strength of a group will only ever be destroyed if they fall into disagreement amongst themselves and that if their words become confused their enemy will seek to overcome them. You are closer to these people than I am. Use deceit to find out what they are plotting and pretend to be on their side. When you find out anything about their conspiracy, [1786]

---

702. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, II, 192, 292, 298; al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 332. He was made governor of Palestine. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1831.

703. The text has wa-kāna Sa'īdu yatāllahu. The editor says that he has put this only as a tentative reading but that it was known that Sa'īd had a pious reputation. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1174. The editor's reading is supported by al-Balādhurī, who has wa-kāna Sa'īdu muta'allihan. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 50. The Leiden text does not have the hamzah: it should read yata'allahu, as the Cairo edition (238) has it.

704. For another version of Marwān's letter, cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 50.

705. Qad istannū amran. Cf. Gloss., p. CCXCVIII. Al-Balādhurī has qad assasū amran. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 50.

706. I.e., God's wrath.

707. Literally, "in neglecting that."

threaten that you will reveal their secrets. Grip them by your words and make them afraid of the consequences (of their acts). Perhaps God will restore to them what they have lost of their religion and their senses, for in the course of their striving, the general good is blighted[708] and the state is destroyed. So act quickly in this matter, whilst the cord of friendship is still tied fast, whilst the people are quiet and the frontiers are still protected. For (in the course of time) communal unity turns to disunity, prosperity is ousted by poverty,[709] and the numbers (of men) diminish. For the people of this world, [1787] these are (only) vicissitudes which come and go in the fluctuation between waxing and waning.[710] We, the people of this family, have received a prolonged series of blessings and this has caused distress[711] to all nations, to those who are hostile to such blessings and who envy those that possess them. It was because of the envy of Iblīs that Adam was driven out of Paradise. This group (of conspirators) have pinned their hopes on strife, but perhaps it is their souls which will perish without their achieving what they anticipated. Every family has ill-fated individuals because of whom God removes His favor. May God protect you from being one such person. Keep me informed of what they are up to. May God preserve your religion for you, may He deliver you from what He has made you enter into, and may He cause your reason to overcome your natural inclinations!

Sa'īd took this matter seriously and he sent Marwān's letter to al-'Abbās. Al-'Abbās summoned Yazīd and he reproached and threatened him. Yazīd warned al-'Abbās, saying: "I am afraid, brother, that one of those enemies of ours who envy us this prosperity wants to stir up trouble between us." Then Yazīd swore an 708. Literally, "there is a changing of favors (from God)." Cf. Qur'ān 8, v. 55.

---

709. Here al-Balādhurī's version of the letter ends.

710. Wa-duwalu al-layālī mukhalifatun 'alā ahli al-dunyā wa-al-taqallubu ma'a al-ziyādati wa-al-nuqṣāni: literally, "The turnings of the nights are varied on the people of this world and (there is) fluctuation between increasing and decreasing." Cf. Qur'ān 3, v. 140.

711. The text has qad yu'nā bihā. The Cairo edition (238) has qad ya'ībuhā ("have castigated them").

oath to al-'Abbās that he had not done anything wrong, and his brother believed him.

According to Aḥmad—'Alī [al-Madā'inī]—Ibn Bishr b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik: My father Bishr b. al-Walīd[712] went in to see my uncle al-'Abbās and spoke to him on the matter of deposing al-Walīd and giving the oath of allegiance to Yazīd. Al-'Abbās was against the idea and my father argued the opposing point of view with him. I rejoiced and told myself: "Here is my father daring to speak to my uncle and to dispute what he says with him." I could see where my father was correct in what he said, but the truth [really] lay with what my uncle said.[713] Al-'Abbās sighed: "O Banū Marwān! I do believe that God has permitted your destruction." He then recited the following verses:[714] [1788]

I beseech God to protect you from temptations that loom as high as mountains, and then violently erupt.
Verily God's creatures have grown tired of your policies, so hold fast to the pillar of religion, and keep a tight rein on yourselves.
Do not offer yourselves as prey to men who are wolves, for wolves devour meat whenever they are offered it.
And do not rip open your bellies with your own hands, for by then neither sorrow nor alarm will bring you relief.

After Yazīd had made his arrangements and while he was still living in the desert, he went toward Damascus until he reached a distance of four nights from Damascus; he was in disguise, accompanied by seven people, riding asses. They then stopped at Jarūd,[715] which was a day's journey from Damascus. Yazīd threw himself down and went to sleep. The people with him said to a mawlā of 'Abbād b. Ziyād: "If you have any food, we will buy it." The mawlā replied: "I won't sell you anything, but you may have

712. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table. Bishr and al-'Abbās were brothers.

713. This is presumably what is meant here. The text has wa-kuntu arā anna al-ṣawāba fīmā yaqūlu abī wa-kāna al-sawabu fīmā yaqūlu 'ammī. Alternatively, Ibn Bishr could mean that he saw the right in both viewpoints.

714. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb [Derenk], 51; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 137; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 214. The meter is basīṭ.

715. A village of Ma'lūlā. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 65; Le Strange, Palestine, 463.

hospitality and food enough from me." So he brought them hens, young chickens, honey, clarified butter, and curds, which they ate. Then Yazīd set off again and entered Damascus at night. Most of the people of Damascus had already given the oath of allegiance secretly to Yazīd, as had the people of al-Mizzah,[716] apart from Mu'āwiyah b. Maṣād al-Kalbī, who was their leader.
[1789] Accordingly, Yazīd marched off immediately to the house of Mu'āwiyah b. Maṣād, accompanied by a small group of his followers. Al-Mizzah was a mīl or more away from Damascus. (On their way) they met with heavy rain. When they arrived at the house of Mu'āwiyah b. Maṣād, they knocked on his door and somebody opened it for them. Yazīd went in and Mu'āwiyah said to him: "Mind the carpet, for God's sake." Yazīd replied: "Indeed, I do have mud on my feet and I don't want to ruin your carpet." Mu'āwiyah said: "What you want us to do is worse" (than ruining the carpet). Then Yazīd talked to him and Mu'āwiyah gave him the oath of allegiance. Some reports said that his name was Hishām b. Maṣād.

Thereafter, Yazīd returned to Damascus, taking the canal road and riding on a black ass.[717] He then lodged in the house of Thābit b. Sulaymān b. Sa'd al-Khushanī.[718] Al-Walīd b. Rawḥ departed, having sworn that he would enter Damascus only if he were armed. So he girded himself with his weapons and covered them with his clothes. He took the Nayrāb[719] road, riding a piebald horse, and rode until he had caught up with Yazīd. In charge of Damascus (at this time) was 'Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf.[720] Since he was afraid of the plague, he left Damascus and took up residence in Qaṭāna,[721] having appointed his son as his deputy in Damascus while Abū al-'Āj Ka-716. Al-Mizzah was a large village in the upper part of the Ghūṭah of Damascus. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 522; Le Strange, Palestine, 508. The area was well-known for its Qadarī sympathies. Cf. Fragmenta, 135; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 51.

717. Perhaps this is a hint at a messianic status. Cf. Hawting, 93.

718. The text has al-Khushanī. Fragmenta, 135, has al-Khushaynī. Al-Iṣfahānī has al-Ḥasanī; cf. Aghānī, VI, 137.

719. Al-Nayrab was a village near Damascus, famous for its gardens. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 855; Le Strange, Palestine, 515.

720. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1778–79.

721. Qaṭanā was one of the villages in the area. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 137; Le Strange, Palestine, 483.

thīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī[722] was in charge of his shurṭah. Then Yazīd decided to come out into the open. The governor was told that Yazīd was raising a rebellion, but he did not believe it. Yazīd sent for his followers between the dusk prayer and the late night prayer on a Thursday night in 126 [October 25, 743–October 12, 744].[723] They hid themselves at the Farādīs Gate[724] until the [1790] muezzins had made the dusk call to prayer. Then the rebels went into the mosque and performed the prayer. Now there were at the mosque guards who had the task of dispersing the people from the mosque at night. So after the people had prayed, the guards shouted to them to leave. Yazīd's followers lingered behind and began leaving by the maqṣūrah door[725] and going back in again by another door. This continued until there was no one left in the mosque but the guards and Yazīd's followers, who then seized the guards. Yazīd b. 'Anbasah went to Yazīd b. al-Walīd, told him what had happened, took his hand, and said: "Rise, O Commander of the Faithful and rejoice in God's help and succour!" Yazīd arose and said: "O God, if it is pleasing to you, then assist me to perform this task and reveal to me the right way in it. If it is not pleasing to you, then relieve me of the task by my death."[726]

Yazīd went forth with twelve men. On reaching the donkey market, they met forty of their companions. When they came to the grain market, they were joined by some two hundred of their supporters.[727] Then they proceeded to the mosque. They went inside, made for the maqṣūrah door and knocked on it, saying: "We are messengers from al-Walīd." A servant opened the door to them. They seized him, went inside, and captured Abū al-'Āj, who

722. He had been governor of al-Baṣrah from 120 to 122 (737–40). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1667.

723. This rather unsatisfactory date is repeated in the other sources. Only al-Iṣfahānī is more precise. He gives a Friday in the following year, Jumādā II, 127 [March 10–April 7, 745]. Cf. Aghānī, VI, 138.

724. There was a quarter of the city of Damascus called Farādīs, after which the city gate was named. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 439; Yāqūt, III, 862.

725. For the probable location of the maqṣūrah door of the mosque, cf. Creswell, I, 172, fig. 89.

726. Cf. Fragmenta, 135–36; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb [Derenk], 51–52; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 137–38; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 214.

727. Al-Balādhurī writes that they were about two hundred and sixty men. Cf. Ansāb [Derenk], 52. Cf. also Fragmenta, 136.

was drunk. They also seized the treasurers of the bayt al-māl[728] and the postmaster. Then Yazīd sent men to all the people whom he feared and they were arrested. Yazīd immediately sent people to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydah, the mawlā of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, who was in charge of Ba'labakk,[729] and he was arrested. Yazīd also dispatched men at once to 'Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥajjāj, [1791] and he too was seized. Then Yazīd sent to al-Thaniyyah[730] to his followers requesting them to join him. Yazīd ordered the gatekeepers[731] (of the city): "In the morning, open the gate only to those who give you our password," and they left the gates chained up. There were many weapons inside the mosque which Sulaymān b. Hishām had brought from the Jazīrah. The treasurers had not managed to appropriate them, so Yazīd's followers took them, and acquired a large number of them. In the morning Ibn 'Iṣām and the people of al-Mizzah came, and by the middle of the day the people had given the oath of allegiance to Yazīd, who recited the following lines:[732]

When they are made to dismount from their horses to stab each other, they stride toward death in the manner of refractory camels.

Yazīd's followers were amazed and said: "Look at this man! Before dawn he was glorifying God and now he is reciting poetry!"

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Razīn b. Mājid: In the morning we went with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Maṣād—we numbered around fifteen hundred 728. The bayt al-māl was situated inside the Great Mosque of Damascus, on the northwest side of the courtyard. Cf. the description given by al-Muqaddasī and quoted by Le Strange, Palestine, 227.

729. Ba'labakk (Heliopolis) was part of the jund of Damascus in Umayyad times. Cf. Ya'qūbī, Les Pays, 172–73; Yāqūt, I, 672, 675; Le Strange, Palestine, 295–98; *EI*², s.v. (J. Sourdel-Thomine).

730. This is a reference to Thaniyyat al-'Uqāb (the Eagle's Gorge), which was a pass situated to the north of Damascus. Cf. Yāqūt, I, 936; III, 691; Le Strange, Palestine, 383, 545.

731. It is not quite clear whether this is a reference to the doors of the mosque or the gates of the city. Fragmenta, 137, specifies that it was the gates of the city; this seems more probable.

732. The meter is ṭawīl. For these verses, cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 53; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 128; Framenta, 137. The Cairo edition of al-Ṭabarī, 241, notes that this is from the dīwān of al-Nābighah.

men—as far as the Jābiyah Gate.[733] We found it to be locked, and there was a messenger of al-Walīd. He said: "Why these (warlike) preparations and equipment? Indeed, by God, I shall certainly inform the Commander of the Faithful," so a man from al-Mizzah killed him. Then we entered Damascus by the Jabīyah Gate. We went first into the Kalbiyyīn alley, but it was too narrow for us (because of our large numbers). So some of us took the route through the grain market. Then we assembled at the door of the mosque and we went in to see Yazīd. Before the last of our [1792] number had finished greeting Yazīd, the Sakāsik[734] arrived, numbering around three hundred men. They had entered the city from the Sharqī Gate and when they reached the mosque they came in by the Daraj door.[735] Thereafter Ya'qūb b. 'Umayr b. Hānī al-'Absī[736] arrived with the people of Dārayyā.[737] They entered Damascus through the Bāb al-Ṣaghīr.[738] Then 'Īsā b. Shabīb al-Taghlibī[739] came with the people of Dūma and Ḥarastā,[740] and they came in through the Tūmā Gate.[741] Ḥumayd b. Ḥabīb al-Lakhmī brought the people of Dayr al-Murrān,[742] al-Arzah, and Saṭrā,[743] entering Damascus by the Farādīs Gate. Al-Naḍr b.

733. The Bāb al-Jābiyah was at the western end of the "Street called Straight." Jābiyah was a suburb of the city. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 231.

734. The Sakāsik were a branch of the Kindah. They had fought for the Umayyads at Marj Rāhiṭ in 64 (683). Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 503.

735. The Daraj door is not identifiable but in this same context al-Balādhurī calls it Bāb Jayrūn. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 53. This was the eastern door of the mosque. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 260.

736. There is some doubt about this man's nisbah. In the text it is al-'Absī but in the apparatus the variant al-'Ansī is given. Ya'qūb's father, 'Umayr, was used by al-Ḥajjāj to control the Kurds and was later made deputy governor of al-Kūfah. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 385; Crone, 140. Al-Balādhurī gives him no nisbah (loc. cit.). Ibn al-Athīr, V, 215, has al-'Absī.

737. Dārayyā was a village in the Damascus area. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 536; Le Strange, Palestine, 436.

738. The Bāb al-Ṣaghīr was situated at the southwestern angle of the Damascus city wall. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 231.

739. Cf. Crone, 160–61.

740. Ḥarastā was a farmstead in the Damascus area. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 237; Yāqūt, II, 241.

741. The Bāb Tūmā was a city gate of Damascus facing northeast. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 254.

742. Dayr al-Murrān was a monastery near Damascus. Cf. Yāqūt, I, 696; IV, 480.

743. Saṭrā was a village of the Damascus area. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 532; Yāqūt, III, 90.

'Umar al-Jarashī came with the people of Jarash,[744] al-Ḥadīthah,[745] and Dayr Zakkā,[746] entering by the Sharqī Gate. Rib'ī b. Hāshim al-Ḥārithī arrived with a group of the Banū 'Uthrah[747] and Salāmān,[748] and they came in by the Tūmā Gate. The Banū Juhaynah[749] and those affiliated to them came with Ṭalḥah b. Sa'īd,[750] and one of their poets recited the following verses:[751]

Their supporters flocked to them at daybreak, among them the Sakāsik, the courageous tent-dwellers.
The Kalb brought them horses, and furnished them[752] with bright white swords and with their torsos and forearms.
[1793] Honor them as the bulwarks of a tradition (sunnah),[753] for it was they who protected their honor against every unbeliever.
And Sha'bān[754] and al-Azd joined them with spears extended, and 'Abs and Lakhm acted as protectors and defenders,
As did Ghassān[755] and the two tribes of Qays and Taghlib,[756] whilst every weak-kneed laggard declined the challenge.
So as soon as morning broke upon them, they were kings of powerful authority,

---

744. Jarash (the ancient Gerasa) was a town in Transjordan to the southeast of the Jabal 'Ajlūn. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 61; *EI*², s.v. (D. Sourdel).

745. Al-Ḥadīthah was a village in the Ghūṭah of Damascus. It was also called Ḥadīthat Jarash. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 225; Le Strange, Palestine, 445.

746. Dayr Zakkā was also a village in the Ghūṭah. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 665; Le Strange, Palestine, 435.

747. For the Banū 'Uthrah, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 565–66. The tribe were within the sphere of the Ghassānids, and well before the coming of Islam had gone to Syria and become Christians.

748. The Banū Salāmān were a subgroup of the Banū 'Uthrah who settled in Syria. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 414.

749. For the Banū Juhaynah, cf. n. 227.

750. This may be the same person who had earlier been deputy governor of al-Baṣrah. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 414, and the discussion in Crone, 139.

751. The meter is ṭawīl. For these verses, cf. also al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 54. The textual differences are only minor.

752. Literally, "brought them horses and supplies."

753. Literally, "honor them as the firm supporters of a tradition."

754. For the Banū Sha'bān, a branch of the Ḥimyar, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 521.

755. For the Banū Ghassān, cf. *EI*², s.v. (I. Shahid).

756. For the Banū Taghlib, an important tribe of the Rabī'ah, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 541–42. The Taghlib were allowed to remain Christians during the Umayyad period without having the status of the ahl al-dhimmah.

and firm was their hold over every disobedient, insolent rebel.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Qusaym b. Ya'qūb and Razīn b. Mājid and others: Yazīd b. al-Walīd sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Maṣād with two hundred or so horsemen to Qaṭanā[757] to seize 'Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, who had entrenched himself in his castle. 'Abd al-Raḥmān gave him safe-conduct and 'Abd al-Malik came out to him. We then entered the castle and there we discovered two saddlebags, each containing thirty thousand dīnārs. When we reached al-Mizzah, I said to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Maṣād: "Take one or both of these saddlebags home with you. You will never get anything like them from Yazīd!" 'Abd al-Raḥmān replied: "(If I did that) I would be the first to [1794] commit treachery. No, the Arabs shall not say that I was the first person to act treacherously in this affair." Then he took the money to Yazīd b. al-Walīd.

Yazīd b. al-Walīd sent word to 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik and gave him orders that he should station himself at the Jābiyah Gate.[758] Then Yazīd said: "Let anyone who has a stipend come and get it. Anyone who has no stipend may have a subsidy of one thousand dirhams." Next, Yazīd instructed the sons of al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik—he had thirteen of them with him: "Disperse yourselves among the people so that they can see you, and whip up enthusiasm in them." He then said to al-Walīd b. Rawḥ b. al-Walīd: "Bring al-Rāhib down,"[759] and al-Walīd did so.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Dukayn b. al-Shammakh al-Kalbī and Abū 'Ilāqah b. Ṣāliḥ al-Salāmānī: Yazīd b. al-Walīd issued the following proclamation: "Anyone who joins up to fight against the libertine (al-Walīd) will have one thousand dirhams." Even so, fewer than one thousand men gathered to Yazīd. Then he caused the 757. The text has Qaṭan. Earlier, al-Ṭabarī reported that 'Abd al-Malik had fled the plague and taken up residence in Qaṭanā. Cf. II, 1789.

758. Literally, "he ordered him and he stood at the Jābiyah Gate."

759. Anzil al-rāhiba fa-fa'ala ("bring the monk down, so he did (?)"). This isolated snippet is not explained nor is there information in any of the other sources.

760. For a long biography of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr al-Kalbī, cf. Crone, 158–59.

following proclamation to be made: "Anyone who joins up to fight the libertine will have fifteen hundred dirhams", and on that day fifteen hundred joined up. Yazīd put Manṣūr b. Jumhūr[760] in charge of one contingent, Ya'qūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym al-Kalbī in charge of another, Harim b. 'Abdallāh b. Daḥyah[761] over [1795] another, and Ḥumayd b. Ḥabīb al-Lakhmī over another. In overall charge of these men, Yazīd appointed 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik, who set out and made camp at al-Ḥīrah.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd: When Yazīd b. al-Walīd rose up in rebellion, a mawlā of al-Walīd got on his horse and went off at once to al-Walīd. His horse died when he reached his destination. The mawlā told al-Walīd what had happened, whereupon al-Walīd gave him one hundred lashes and threw him into prison. Then al-Walīd summoned Abū Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, gave him money, and sent him to Damascus. Abū Muḥammad departed and on reaching Dhanabah,[762] he made a halt. Yazīd b. al-Walīd sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Maṣād to him. Then Abū Muḥammad made his peace with him and gave the oath of allegiance to him. News of this reached al-Walīd when he was at al-Aghdaf,[763] which is in the 'Ammān area. Bayhas b. Zumayl al-Kilābī said—or, according to another report, the speaker was Yazīd b. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah—"O Commander of the Faithful, go and establish yourself in Ḥimṣ, as it is well-fortified. Send troops against Yazīd so that he may be killed or imprisoned." However, 'Abdallāh b. 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ said: "It is not fitting for a caliph to leave his camp[764] and his women before he has fought and (thus) shown himself to be without blame. It is God who strengthens and succors the Commander of the Faithful." Yazīd b. Khālid said: "What should the caliph have to fear for his women when it

761. The editor gives two vocalizations: Daḥyah and Diḥyah. The latter has been preferred because of the known form of the name Diḥyah b. Khalīfah, who was one of the Prophet's Companions. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 232; Crone, 156–57.

762. Dhanabah was one of the districts of Damascus. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 724; Le Strange, Palestine, 437.

763. For al-Aghdaf, cf. n. 465. Al-Balādhurī has al-Azraq; cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 55.

764. It would be more appropriate in this context to translate 'askar as "camp" rather than "troops." Al-Balādhurī has "his camp, his treasures, and his women." Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 56. Cf. also a similar version in Fragmenta, 139.

is only 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik[765] who would head the opposing forces? (After all,) he is their paternal cousin." Al-Walīd, (however,) took the advice of Ibn 'Anbasah. Then al-Abrash Sa'īd b. al-Walīd al-Kalbī said to al-Walīd: "O Commander of the Faithful, Tadmur[766] is well fortified and my people there will defend you." Al-Walīd replied: "I don't think it is wise for us to go to Tadmur,[767] since the people there are the Banū 'Āmir who are the ones who have rebelled against me. But suggest another fortified place to me." Al-Abrash said: "I think you should stay in al-Qaryah."[768] Al-Walīd replied: "I don't like it." Al-Abrash said: "Then there is al-Hazīm."[769] Al-Walīd said: "I hate its name." So al-Abrash said: "Then there is al-Bakhrā',[770] the citadel of al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr." Whereupon al-Walīd exclaimed: "Fie on you. How ugly are the names of your watering places!" Then al-Walīd set out with two hundred men on the Samāwah[771] road and he left the cultivated land behind him. Al-Walīd recited the following verses:[772] [1796]

If you do not mingle good with evil, you will not find a faithful adviser nor anyone to help you when need overtakes you.
Whenever they intend to commit one of their sinful actions,
I will bare my head and uncover my face.

765. Literally, "it is only 'Abd al-'Aziz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik coming to them."

766. Viz., Palmyra. Cf. EI[1], "Palmyra" (F. Buhl); Yāqūt, I, 828.

767. Al-Balādhurī and Fragmenta add: "and its name is its name" (loc. cit.). Tadmuru means "you perish."

768. Al-Qaryah. This is vocalized by Guidi in the indices to the Aghānī, 761, as al-Qurayyah. Probably this is a place-name too. Perhaps it is a reference to the village at Palmyra or to the well-known place al-Qaryatayn.

769. Hazīm was due south of Palmyra. Cf. Dussaud, 79. Hazīm can mean "a voice like thunder." Cf. Lisān, III, 805.

770. Al-Bakhrā': the feminine of abkhar ("to have a stinking mouth"). Al-Bakhrā' has been sited variously in eastern Syria (Huart, I, 276); near al-Qaryatayn between Damascus and Palmyra (von Kremer, I, 152); and 25 km south of Palmyra (Derenk, 46). Derenk's location is probably the correct one. Al-Nu'man b. Bashīr was a Companion of the Prophet, after whom the town of Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān was named. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 495–97.

771. Al-Samāwah was the name of the desert between al-Kūfah and Syria. Cf. Yāqūt, III, 131; Le Strange, Palestine, 530.

772. These verses are also to be found in al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, loc. cit.; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 111. The meter is ṭawīl.

Al-Walīd passed by the well country[773] of al-Ḍaḥḥāk[774] b. Qays al-Fihrī, where he came across some of his[775] sons and grandsons, who numbered forty men, and they went with him. They said to al-Walīd: "We are unarmed. What about ordering some arms for us?" but he did not give them a single sword or spear. Then Bayhas b. Zumayl said to al-Walīd: "Since you have refused to go to Ḥims or Tadmur, what about this fortress, al-Bakhrā'? It is well fortified and was built by the Persians. Stay here." Al-Walīd [1797] replied: "I am afraid of the plague." Whereupon Bayhas replied: "What is in store for you is worse than the plague." Then al-Walīd settled at the fortress of al-Bakhrā'.

Yazīd b. al-Walīd summoned the people to fight with 'Abd al-'Azīz against al-Walīd, and he issued a proclamation that anyone who went with 'Abd al-'Azīz would receive two thousand dirhams. Then two thousand men joined up and Yazīd gave them two thousand dirhams each, saying to them: "Your destination is Dhanabah".[776] But (only) twelve hundred men reached Dhanabah. Then Yazīd said to them: "You must now go to the stronghold of the sons of 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd[777] in the desert." But only eight hundred men reached it. 'Abd al-'Azīz[778] moved on and met up with al-Walīd's baggage train, which they seized. They then camped near al-Walīd.

An envoy from al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd reached al-Walīd with a message from al-'Abbās to the effect that he was coming to join him. Then al-Walīd said: "Bring out a couch." A couch was brought out and he sat down on it, saying: "So men dare to attack me, when I attack the lion and strangle the serpent?"[779] and al-Walīd and his followers awaited the arrival of al-'Abbās.

---

773. Fa-marra bi-shabakati Ḍaḥḥāk.

774. Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī was a very influential leader of the Qays in Mu'āwiyah's time, first as his ṣāḥib al-shurṭah and then as governor of Damascus. He was killed at Marj Rāhiṭ in 64 (684). For an account of his career, cf. *EI*², s.v. (A. Dietrich).

775. Ibn al-Athīr makes it clear that "his" sons and grandsons is a reference to al-Ḍaḥḥāk (V, 216).

776. Al-Iṣfahānī has D.nyah for this place name. Cf. Aghānī, VI, 138.

777. The sons of 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. Cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

778. It is not clear from the text who is meant here. Presumably it is the leader, 'Abd al-'Azīz, who had been sent out against al-Walīd by Yazīd.

779. The text has a-'alayya tawaththaba al-rijālu wa-anā athibu 'alā al-asadi?

Then 'Abd al-'Azīz launched the attack against al-Walīd and his followers.[780] In charge of his right flank was 'Amr b. Ḥuwayy al-Saksakī[781] whilst Manṣūr b. Jumhūr headed the vanguard.[782] In charge of the infantry was 'Umārah b. Abī Kulthūm al-Azdī.[783] 'Abd al-'Azīz called for a black mule of his to be brought and he mounted it. 'Abd al-'Azīz sent Ziyād b. Ḥusayn al-Kalbī to speak to al-Walīd and his followers and to summon them to the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet, but Qaṭarī,[784] the mawlā of al-Walīd, killed Ziyād. Then Yazīd's men withdrew, 'Abd al-'Azīz dismounted, and his followers fled. A number of soldiers of 'Abd [1798] al-'Azīz had been killed and their heads had been taken to al-Walīd, who was at the gate of the citadel of al-Bakhrā', having displayed the flag of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam which Marwān had raised at al-Jābiyah.[785] 'Uthmān al-Khashabī[786] was amongst the followers of al-Walīd b. Yazīd who were killed; he had been slain by Junaḥ b. Nu'aym al-Kalbī. 'Uthmān was one of the sons of the Khashabiyyah[787] who had been with al-Mukhtār.

When 'Abd al-'Azīz heard that al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd was com-

The version in al-Balādhurī is more satisfactory, replacing tawaththaba with yatawaththabu. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 57. Cf. also Fragmenta, 140.

780. Literally, "'Abd al-'Azīz fought them."

781. 'Amr b. Ḥuwayy al-Saksakī was a descendant of a sharīf of Damascus who fought for Mu'āwiyah at Ṣiffīn.

782. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 222. Oddly enough, 'Amr b. Ḥuwayy himself is listed as being amongst those men on whom Yazīd showered honors, having suppressed their rebellion. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1831; Crone, 155.

783. This is the form of the name given by al-Ṭabarī. Al-Balādhurī and Fragmenta have 'Umārah b. Kulthūm al-Azdī (loc. cit.). He was a close associate of Khālid al-Qasrī and was executed by Marwān II. Cf. Crone, 163.

784. Al-Balādhurī also has Qaṭarī (loc. cit.). A variant in the apparatus (from MS. B) has Qaṭan. Qaṭan was certainly a mawlā, too, but he was the mawlā of Yazīd and his brother, al-'Abbās. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 145.

785. Before the battle of Marj Rāhiṭ in 64 (684), the aged Marwān b. al-Ḥakam (Marwān II) had pitched camp at al-Jābiyah. Cf. EI[1], s.v. (H. Lammens). Al-Balādhurī and Fragmenta have: "which he had raised at al-Jābiyah to fight al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays." (loc. cit.).

786. Al-Iṣfahānī has Yazīd b. 'Uthmān al-Khashabī (loc. cit.).

787. Khashabiyyah ("men armed with clubs") was originally an abusive name for the mawlās who were armed with clubs and formed the main body of al-Mukhtār's supporters. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 684; EI[2], "Khashabiyya" (C. van Arendonk). For a recent account of the revolt of al-Mukhtār, which centered on al-Kūfah between 65 and 68 (685–687), cf. Hawting, 51–53.

ing, he despatched Manṣūr b. Jumhūr with some cavalry and said: "You will meet al-'Abbās and his sons at al-Shi'b.[788] Seize them." So Manṣūr left with some cavalry, and when they came to al-Shi'b they saw al-'Abbās with thirty of his sons. Manṣūr's men said to al-'Abbās: "Join 'Abd al-'Azīz," whereupon al-'Abbās hurled insults at them. Then Manṣūr said to al-'Abbās: "By God, if you advance any further, I will surely penetrate your stronghold, by which I mean your breastplate."[789] According to Nūḥ b. 'Amr b. Ḥuwayy al-Saksakī: It was Ya'qūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym al-Kalbī who met al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd. Ya'qūb asked al-'Abbās to join forces with 'Abd al-'Azīz but al-'Abbās refused to do so.

Then Ya'qūb said: "O son of Qusṭanīn,[790] if you refuse, I shall strike you on the head."[791] Al-'Abbās looked at Harim b. 'Abdallāh b. Diḥyah and said: "Who is this?" Harim replied: "It is Ya'qūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym." Then al-'Abbās said: "In-[1799] deed, by God, how horrified his father would be to see his son in this position." Then Ya'qūb brought al-'Abbās to the camp of 'Abd al-'Azīz.[792] Al-'Abbās did not have his followers with him, as he had gone ahead of them with his sons, so he said: "We belong to God!" Al-'Abbās was brought before 'Abd al-'Azīz, who adjured him: "Give the oath of allegiance to your brother Yazīd b. al-Walīd." This al-'Abbās did. Then he stood up and the rebels raised a flag, saying: "This is the flag of al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd, who has given the oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful, Yazīd b. al-Walīd." Thereupon al-'Abbās said: "We belong to God! This is one the wiles of the Devil. The house of Marwān is destroyed!"

Thereafter, people defected from al-Walīd's army[793] and came to join al-'Abbās and 'Abd al-'Azīz. Al-Walīd came forth, wearing two coats of mail, and his two horses, al-Sindī and al-Zā'id,[794]

---

788. Al-Shi'b ("the Pass").

789. Literally, "your stronghold, meaning your breastplate."

790. He was called son of Constantine because his mother was a Christian. Cf. Gloss., p. DCCXII. Fragmenta, 141, has Qusṭanīn.

791. Literally, "I will strike that in which your (two) eyes are."

792. Al-Balādhurī adds: "He (al-'Abbās) was like a prisoner amongst them." Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 58. Cf. also Fragmenta, 141.

793. Literally, "defected from al-Walīd."

794. For these two horses, cf. Mas'ūdī, VI, 13, 16. The horse called al-Zā'id had belonged to Hishām. Fragmenta has al-Sandarī for al-Sindī (loc. cit.).

were brought to him. Then he launched himself fiercely into the fray.[795] Somebody shouted to the rebels: "Kill the enemy of God in the way Lot's family were killed. Throw stones at him." When al-Walīd heard that, he went into the citadel and locked the door and 'Abd al-'Azīz and his followers surrounded the citadel. Then al-Walīd went up to the door and said: "Is there anyone amongst you who is an honorable man of noble descent and who has a proper sense of shame, to whom I can speak?" Yazīd b. 'Anbasah al-Saksakī said to him: "Speak with me." Al-Walīd asked him who he was and he replied: "I am Yazīd b. 'Anbasah." Then al-Walīd exclaimed: "O brother of the Sakāsik! Did I not increase your stipends? Did I not remove onerous taxes from you? Did I not make gifts to your poor and give servants to your cripples?" Yazīd b. 'Anbasah replied: "We don't have any personal grudge against you. We are against you because you have violated the sacred ordinances of God, because you have drunk wine, because [1800] you have debauched the mothers of your father's sons, and because you have held God's command in contempt."[796] Al-Walīd replied: "That's enough from you, brother of the Sakāsik! By my life, you have said too much and gone too far. God's dispensation to me leaves scope for what you have mentioned."[797] With that he went into the room, sat down, took a copy of the Qur'ān, and said: "This is a day like the day 'Uthmān was killed,"[798] and he began to recite. Then the rebels began to scale the wall. The first person over the top was Yazīd b. 'Anbasah al-Saksakī. He climbed down and went up to al-Walīd, whose sword was at his side. Then Yazīd said to him: "Take off your sword." Al-Walīd replied: "If I had wanted my sword, the situation between you and me would have been different from this." Then Yazīd took al-Walīd's hand, wanting to take him into custody and to have consultations about 795. Literally, "then he fought them a fierce fight."

796. Al-Balādhurī adds to this catalog of sins the allegation that al-Walīd was a homosexual (loc. cit.).

797. Wa-inna fīmā uḥilla lī la-sa'atan 'ammā dhakarta ("In what has been allowed to me there is scope for what you have mentioned"). Cf. the same wording in al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 139. Al-Balādhurī (loc. cit.) has wa-inna fīmā aḥalla Allāhu la-mandūḥatun 'ammā dhakarta ("verily in what God has decreed as permissible there is ample scope for what you have mentioned").

798. The third caliph of Islam, 'Uthmān, had been killed while reading the Qur'ān.

what should be done with him.[799] At that point ten men came down from the wall;[800] amongst them were Mansūr b. Jumhūr, Ḥibāl b. 'Amr al-Kalbī, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ajlān, who was the mawlā of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, Ḥumayd b. Naṣr al-Lakhmī, al-Sarī b. Ziyād b. Abī Kabshah, and 'Abd al-Salām al-Lakhmī. 'Abd al-Salām struck al-Walīd on the head and al-Sarī hit him in the face; then five of them seized him to take him outside. A woman who was with al-Walīd in the room screamed, so they let go of al-Walīd and did not take him out. Then Abū 'Ilāqah al-Quḍā'ī cut off al-Walīd's head. He took some gut and sewed up the wound on al-Walīd's face. Thereupon Rawḥ b. Muqbil took al-Walīd's head to Yazīd (b. al-Walīd) and said: "Rejoice, O Commander of the Faithful. The libertine, al-Walīd, has been slain and those who were with him and with al-'Abbās have been taken prisoner!"
[1801] Yazīd was eating his lunch and both he and his companions prostrated themselves (in thanks to God).[801] Then Yazīd b. 'Anbasah al-Saksakī stood up, took the hand of Yazīd (b. al-Walīd)[802] and said: "O Commander of the Faithful, arise and rejoice in God's victory." Yazīd removed his hand from the hand of Ibn 'Anbasah and said: "O God, if this is pleasing to you, then direct me to the right way." Yazīd asked Yazīd b. 'Anbasah: "Did al-Walīd speak to you?" Ibn 'Anbasah said: "Yes, al-Walīd spoke to me from behind the door. He said: 'Is there anyone of noble descent among you to whom I may speak?' So it was I who spoke to him and I upbraided him. Then al-Walīd replied: 'That's enough from you. By my life, you have gone too far and said too much. The disunity amongst you will never be healed,[803] and dissension amongst you will never be put right and your tongues will never agree.'"

---

799. Al-Balādhurī has: "to have consultations with Yazīd b. al-Walīd about him" (loc. cit.).

800. The account in the Aghānī is clearer and has been followed here: fa-nazala min al-ḥā'iṭi 'asharatun fīhim (loc. cit.). The text in al-Ṭabarī states that there were ten men and then enumerates only six of them.

801. Ibn A'tham has: "he (Yazīd) and those with him prostrated themselves out of joy before Almighty God, just as Abū al-'Abbās al-Saffāḥ prostrated himself when Marwān b. Muḥammad died" (VIII, 140–41).

802. In view of the fact that the narrative involves two people called Yazīd, the aim here has been to clarify which Yazīd is performing which action.

803. Cf. al-Balādhurī, loc. cit. This might be an optative, which may use the present tense: "may the disunity amongst you never be healed . . ."

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Nūḥ b. 'Amr b. Huwayy al-Saksakī: We went out to fight against al-Walīd on nights when there was no moon; (it was so dark that) I could not see the stones at all, let alone distinguish between black stones and white.[804] Al-Walīd b. Khālid, the nephew of al-Abrash al-Kalbī, was on the left flank of al-Walīd's forces with the Banū 'Āmir. There were also men of the Banū 'Āmir on the right flank (of the forces) of 'Abd al-'Azīz, so the men on al-Walīd's left flank would not fight those on the right flank of 'Abd al-'Azīz, and they defected en masse to 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj. Nūḥ b. 'Amr said: "I saw the servants and dependents of al-Walīd b. Yazīd, on the day he was killed, seizing hold of the rebels' hands and showing them where al-Walīd was."[805]

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—al-Muthannā b. Mu'āwiyah: Al-Walīd came and camped at al-Lu'lu'ah.[806] He ordered his son, al-Ḥakam, and [1802] al-Mu'ammal b. al-'Abbās to apportion a stipend of sixty dīnārs to anyone who would join them. So I went with my paternal cousin, Sulaymān b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, to al-Walīd's camp. Al-Mu'ammal allowed me to approach him[807] and he said: "I will take you in to see the Commander of the Faithful and I will speak to him about his assigning you one hundred dīnārs." (The narrative of al-Muthannā continues). Then al-Walīd left al-Lu'lu'ah and camped at al-Mulaykah,[808] where a messenger from 'Amr b. Qays[809] came to him from Ḥimṣ to tell him that 'Amr had sent 804. This is only a tentative translation.

805. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 59; Fragmenta, 142.

806. Lu'lu'ah is a quarter of Damascus outside the Bāb al-Jābiyah. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 494; Yāqūt, IV, 371.

807. Literally, "let me come near and brought me close."

808. This form is uncertain and the place itself has not been identified. The name could also be al-Malīkah.

809. Qays b. Thawr al-Sakūnī was a sharīf from Ḥimṣ in the entourage of Mu'āwiyah. His son, 'Amr b. Qays, had fought with Maslamah in 98 (716–17). Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1317; Crone, 99.

810. Al-Walīd was well known to have been a lover of fine clothes. He preferred colored garments, especially of yellow. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, II, 65. For a detailed discussion of this topic, cf. R. Hillenbrand, "La Dolce Vita in early Islamic Syria," 12, 27. The Umayyad caliphs and their courtiers used clothing of luxury fabrics. Sulaymān and his retinue wore exclusively garments of washī (variegated silk). Cf. *EI*², "Libās" (Y. K. Stillman).

him five hundred horsemen under the leadership of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Janūb al-Bahrānī. Then al-Walīd summoned al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Ayman from the Banū 'Awf b. Kalb and ordered him to go to Ibn Abī al-Janūb, who (by this time) had reached al-Ghuwayr, and to tell him to come in all haste to al-Walīd at al-Mulaykah. The following morning al-Walīd ordered the company to break camp. He himself left (as well), riding on a chestnut horse. He was wearing a silk gown and silk turban. Around his waist he wore a thin roll of cloth and over his shoulders he had draped a yellow shawl over his sword.[810] En route the sons of Sulaym b. Kaysān joined him with sixteen horsemen. When al-Walīd had gone a little further, the Banū al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr met him with more horsemen. Then al-Walīd (b. Yazīd) was joined by al-Walīd, the nephew of al-Abrash, with the Banū 'Āmir of Kalb. Al-Walīd took the nephew of al-Abrash along with him and gave him clothes. Al-Walīd continued along the road and then he turned off at a hill[811] called al-Mushbihah,[812] where Ibn Abī al-Janūb met up with him, accompanied by the men from Ḥimṣ. Then al-Walīd arrived at al-Bakhrā'. It was then that the troops clamored and said: "We have no fodder for our riding animals." So al-Walīd gave orders that it should be announced publicly that the Commander of the Faithful had bought the standing corn [1803] from the village. The soldiers said: "What can we do with green corn? It will make our animals ill." The soldiers only wanted dirhams.

Al-Muthannā said: I came to al-Walīd and I went in to see him, entering at the back of the tent. He asked for a meal, and when the food had been put in front of him, a messenger who was called 'Amr b. Murrah came to him from Umm Kulthūm, the daughter of 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. The messenger told al-Walīd that 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj had camped at al-Lu'lu'ah, but al-Walīd paid no attention to him. Then Khālid b. 'Uthmān al-Mikhrāsh,[813] who was his chief of police, brought al-Walīd a man 811. Tal'ah ("high land"). The word can also mean "stream".

812. This is tentative vocalization. The text has al-M.sh.b.hah. There is a variant reading, al-M.s.b.h.h.

813. For a history of this man's family, cf. Crone, 93–94. According to Ibn al-Kalbī, he had been head of police for Hishām as well (II, 343).

from the Banū Ḥārithah b. Janāb,[814] who said to al-Walīd: "I was in Damascus with 'Abd al-'Azīz and I have come to tell you what I know. Here are fifteen hundred dirhams which I have brought with me." At this point he untied a purse from his waist and showed it (to al-Walīd). (He went on:) "'Abd al-'Azīz has encamped at al-Lu'lu'ah and he will be coming to you from there tomorrow morning." Al-Walīd vouchsafed him no reply. Instead, he turned to a man who was beside him and began a conversation with him which I could not hear. I asked one of the people who were standing between al-Walīd and me what al-Walīd was saying. That person informed me: "Al-Walīd was asking the man about the canal which he had dug in Jordan and inquired how much more there was to do."[815] Then 'Abd al-'Azīz approached from al-Lu'lu'ah. Having arrived in al-Mulaykah he took possession of it. He dispatched Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, who took Sharqī al-Qurā, a high hill in a desert area[816] on the road from Nihyā[817] to al-Bakhrā'.

Al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd was making preparations with about one hundred and fifty of his mawlās and sons. He then sent a man from the Banū Nājiyah,[818] who was called Ḥubaysh,[819] to al- [1804]
Walīd to ask him to decide whether al-'Abbās should come and join him or march against Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Al-Walīd had his suspicions about al-'Abbās, so he sent word ordering him to come and join him. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr intercepted al-Walīd's messenger and asked him what his mission was, and the messenger told him. Then Manṣūr said to the messenger: "Tell al-'Abbās: By God, if you leave your present position[820] before sunrise, I will certainly kill you and your men! In the morning let him go wher-

814. The Banū Ḥārithah b. Janāb were a branch of the Banū 'Abdallāh b. Kinānah from the Banū Kalb. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 316.

815. Cf. Braslavski, "Hat Welīd II den Jordan ablenken wollen?", 97–100.

816. Fī arḍin malsā'a. Malsā'u: a desert in which there are no herbage, trees, or wild animals. Cf. Lane, I, 2736.

817. For a tentative siting of Nihyā (southwest of Palmyra) cf. Dussaud's map (op. cit., 79).

818. For the Banū Nājiyah, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 442.

819. The vocalization comes from the Cairo edition, 248.

820. The text has zaḥalta ("if you withdraw"), which is a conjecture on the part of the editor. The Cairo edition (249) has raḥalta ("if you march"), which also makes good sense.

ever he wants." Al-'Abbās continued to make his preparations.[821] In the morning we heard the soldiers of 'Abd al-'Azīz, who had reached al-Bakhrā', uttering the takbīr.[822] Then Khālid b. 'Uthmān al-Mikhrāsh came out and deployed al-Walīd's men in battle order; but there was no fighting between them until after sunrise. The soldiers of Yazīd b. al-Walīd carried a notice board[823] attached to a spear on which was written: "We summon you to the Book of God and the sunnah of His prophet, and (we request) that the matter should be determined by consultation" (shūrā).[824] Then they began to fight and 'Uthmān al-Khashabī was killed. About sixty of al-Walīd's men were also killed. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr advanced on the Nihyā road and approached al-Walīd's troops from behind. Manṣūr went toward al-Walīd, who was in his tent at a time when there was nobody to stop Manṣūr attacking al-Walīd.[825] When I saw Manṣūr, 'Āṣim b. Hubayrah al-Mu'āfirī, the deputy of al-Mikhrāsh, and I came out. The soldiers of 'Abd al-'Azīz withdrew as did those of Manṣūr. Sumayy b. al-Mughīrah was struck down and killed. Then Manṣūr turned to join 'Abd al-'Azīz.

[1805] Al-Abrash was on a horse of his called al-Adīm, and was wearing a hat with two straps which he had tied securely under his beard.[826] He began shouting to his nephew: "You son of a stinking woman![827] Hoist your flag!" His nephew replied: "I can't find

---

821. I.e., he did not move until after sunrise.

822. The takbīr is the pronouncement of the statement Allāhu akbaru.

823. Kitāb has been translated here as "notice-board," since the object involved must have been large enough to have been seen aloft on a spear.

824. The appeal to a shūrā ("consultation") had often been made by opponents of the Umayyads, such as Ibn al-Zubayr and al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. For an analysis of the call for a shūrā by Yazīd b. al-Walīd, cf. Hawting, 94–95. Yazīd justified the use of force against al-Walīd II because the latter had used force to resist the call (ibid.).

825. Literally, "he was in his tent, there being nobody between him and Manṣūr."

826. 'Alayhi qalansuwatun dhātu 'uthnayni qad shaddahā taḥta liḥyatihi. The qalansuwah could designate a close-fitting cap or hood. It was under the 'Abbāsids that the use of the tall, conical, Persian hat, the qalansuwah ṭawīlah, became widespread. Cf. *EI*², "Libās" (Y. K. Stillman).

827. Lakhnā'. Cf. Gloss., p. CDLXVII. According to the definition given by Ibn Qutaybah, lakhnā' is used to designate someone with stinking breath. Cf. Ibn Qutaybah, Kitāb al-'Arab in M. Kurd 'Alī, Rasā'il al-Bulaghā' (Cairo, 1953), 352. This is the prime meaning given in Līsān, III, 356. It does, however, indicate that lakhnā' may also mean a woman who has not been circumcised.

a way forward. These men are from the Banū ʿĀmir."[828] Then al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd arrived, but the men of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz blocked his path. A mawlā of Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Diḥyah who was called al-Turkī launched an attack on al-Ḥārith b. al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd and thrust at him with a blow which knocked him from his horse.[829] Al-ʿAbbās struck out in the direction of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. Al-Walīd's men were confused[830] and retreated in disarray.

Then al-Walīd b. Yazīd sent al-Walīd b. Khālid to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Ḥajjāj to tell him that al-Walīd would give him fifty thousand dīnārs, that he would appoint him to the governorship of Ḥimṣ for his lifetime, and that he would protect him in every difficult situation (that might arise), provided he went away and stopped fighting. ʿAbd al-ʿAziz rejected this offer[831] and would not agree to any of these terms.[832] Al-Walīd (b. Yazīd) prevailed upon al-Walīd b. Khālid to go back to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and make him the same offer again. Al-Walīd b. Khālid did so, but ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz remained obdurate. Then al-Walīd (b. Khālid) moved a short distance off, turned his horse around, approached ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz once more, and addressed him as follows: "Will you put five thousand dīnārs at my disposal and do likewise for al-Abrash, seeing that I have an exclusive status with my people? Then I will come in with you and join your enterprise." ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz replied: "On condition that you attack al-Walīd's soldiers at once." Accordingly, al-Walīd b. Khālid did so. Now in charge of the right flank of [1806] the caliph al-Walīd's army was Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān b. Yazīd b. Khālid.[833] He said to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz:[834] "Will you give me twenty thousand dīnārs, the governorship of Jordan, and a share of the command if I join up with you?" ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz answered: "On condition that you attack al-Walīd's army immediately." This 828. Cf. Fragmenta, 143; al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 60.

829. The text has ardāhu. The Cairo edition, 249, has adhrāhu, as does a variant MS. reading.

830. Fa-usqiṭa fī aydī aṣḥābi al-Walīdi. Cf. Fragmenta and Ansāb, which have suqiṭa (loc. cit.). According to Lane, suqiṭa is better. The phrase denotes repentance or perplexity or error. Cf. Qur'ān 7, v. 148; Lane, I, 1380. Thus the translation could also be: "al-Walīd's men repented (of what they had done)" or "al-Walīd's men realized they had committed an error." With the close relationship between the men on both sides, any of these translations make sense.

831. Literally, "he did not agree to it/answer him."

832. Literally, "he did not agree with him in anything."

833. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 547; Crone, 154.

834. Literally, "it was said to him."

Mu'āwiyah did and al-Walīd's army fled; al-Walīd himself arose and went into al-Bakhrā'.

'Abd al-'Azīz came forward and stood by the gate which was barred by a chain. Then one man after another began entering (the citadel) under the chain. Thereupon 'Abd al-Salām b. Bukayr b. Shammākh al-Lakhmī came up to 'Abd al-'Azīz and said to him: "Al-Walīd is saying that he will come out on your authority." So 'Abd al-'Azīz said: "Let him come out." But no sooner had he turned around than people upbraided him: "What are you doing, letting him come out? Leave him there and let the people deal with him for you." So 'Abd al-'Azīz called back 'Abd al-Salām and said: "There is no need for me to do what has been suggested to me." [Al-Muthannā's narrative continues]: At this juncture I saw a tall young man on a horse approaching the wall of the citadel. Then he climbed over it and went inside the citadel. I myself entered the citadel and I saw al-Walīd standing there. He was wearing a shirt shot through with silver[835] and trousers of variegated cloth,[836] and his sword was in a scabbard; the people were shouting abuse at him. Then Bishr b. Shaybān, the mawlā of Kinānah b. 'Umayr, who was the man who had climbed over the wall to get inside, went toward al-Walīd. Al-Walīd moved toward the door—I think he wanted to go to 'Abd al-'Azīz—and 'Abd al-Salām was on his right and the messenger from 'Amr b. Qays was on his left. Then Bishr hit al-Walīd on the head; the other men struck him repeatedly with their swords and he fell dead. 'Abd al-Salām threw himself on to al-Walīd and cut off his head. Yazīd b. al-Walīd had put a price of one hundred thousand dirhams on al-[1807] Walīd's head. Then Abū al-Asad, the mawlā of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī, came up and ripped off a handful of al-Walīd's skin and he took it to Yazīd b. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, who was being held prisoner in al-Walīd's camp. The people plundered al-Walīd's camp and stores. Then Yazīd al-'Ulaymī Abū al-Baṭrīq b. Yazīd, whose daughter was married to al-Ḥakam b. al-Walīd, came to me and said: "Protect my daughter's belongings for me," for every-

835. As well as the basic meaning of "reeds," qaṣab is "anything made of silver and of other material, resembling (in form) the kind of round and hollow bone thus called" and "fine, thin, delicate or soft garments." Cf. Lane, I, 2529–30.

836. Washī. For al-Walīd's taste for fine clothes, cf. n. 810.

body was appropriating whatever they could lay their hands on.[837]

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī: After al-Walīd was killed,[838] his left hand was cut off. It was bundled off to Yazīd b. al-Walīd and it arrived before al-Walīd's head. The hand arrived on the Thursday night and the head was brought the next day. After the prayer, Yazīd displayed the head prominently to the people. The people of Damascus had been in a state of agitation about 'Abd al-'Azīz, but when al-Walīd's head was brought to them they quietened down and their behavior was restrained.

When Yazīd ordered that al-Walīd's head should be displayed, Yazīd b. Farwah, the mawlā of the Banū Marwān,[839] remonstrated with him: "Only the heads of rebels are displayed publicly. This is your paternal cousin and a caliph. I am afraid that if you exhibit his head, the people's hearts will soften toward him and the members of his family will be angry about what has happened to him." Yazīd replied: "By God, I certainly will exhibit it!" and he stuck al-Walīd's head on a spear. Then he said to Ibn Farwah: "Off you go with it. Take it around the city of Damascus and go into his father's house[840] with it." Ibn Farwah did as he was told and was greeted with an uproar from the citizens and al-Walīd's family. Then he brought the head back to Yazīd who said: "Take it to your house."[841] The head remained with Ibn Farwah for nearly a month until Yazīd told him to hand it over to al-Walīd's brother Sulaymān. Now Sulaymān, al-Walīd's brother, [1808] was one of the people who had acted against his brother. Ibn Farwah washed the head, put it in a basket, and took it to Sulaymān. When Sulaymān saw it he said: "A curse on him! I testify that he was a wine-bibber, wanton and licentious, and that he tried to corrupt me."[842] So Ibn Farwah left the house. Directly 837. Fa-mā waṣala aḥadun ilā shay'in za'ama annahu lahu. This sentence seems a little odd. It has been translated tentatively as if it read fa-mā waṣala . . . illā za'ama ("nobody came to anything except that he claimed that it was his").

838. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 60–61; Fragmenta, 143–44.

839. Ibn al-Athīr has the Banū Murrah (V, 217).

840. Fragmenta, 144, has dāra ibnihi ("the house of his son").

841. Literally, "the people of the house."

842. La-qad arādanī 'alā nafsī al-fāsiqa. Even seduction may be suggested here.

afterwards he met a slave girl of al-Walīd[843] to whom he said: "Alas! How violently Sulaymān abused al-Walīd! He alleged that al-Walīd had tried to corrupt him." The woman retorted: "By God, that wicked blackguard was lying! Al-Walīd did not do that. If he had wanted to corrupt Sulaymān, he would have done so and Sulaymān would not have been able to prevent him from doing so."

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Yazīd b. Maṣād: Yazīd b. al-Walīd sent me to Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī.[844] Al-Walīd had sent him off as governor of Damascus when he had heard the news of Yazīd's rebellion. When Abū Muḥammad reached Dhanabah, Yazīd received the news about him and he sent me to Abū Muḥammad. When I reached Abū Muḥammad, he made his peace (with our party) and gave the oath of allegiance to Yazīd. We did not even have time to move on before someone appeared in the distance, coming from the direction of the desert. I sent people to him and he was brought to me. The man turned out to be Abū Kāmil al-Ghuzayyil[845] the singer, riding on a she-mule called Maryam[846] which belonged to al-Walīd. He told us that al-Walīd had been killed. Then I sped off to Yazīd, but he had heard the news before I reached him.[847]

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b.
[1809] Marwān al-Kalbī—Dukayn b. Shammākh al-Kalbī al-'Āmirī: I saw Bishr b. Halbā' al-'Āmirī on the day al-Walīd was killed. He struck the gate of al-Bakhrā' with his sword and said:[848]

We shall weep for Khālid with Indian swords, and may his good deeds not go for nought.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Abū

---

843. Literally, "a female mawlā of al-Walīd met him."

844. Abū Muḥammad (b. Yazīd) al-Sufyānī is to be identified as Ziyād b. 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, who was related to al-Walīd through al-Walīd's grandmother. Cf. Wellhausen, 362.

845. Abū Kāmil (or Kumayl) Ghuzayyil al-Dimashqī. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, III, 207.

846. Even al-Walīd's choice of name for his she-mule, Maryam, is shown to be irreverent. Al-Balādhurī omits this name. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 63.

847. Literally, "I found the news had reached him before I reached him."

848. For these lines, cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1783. The meter is wāfir.

'Āṣim al-Ziyādī: Ten men claimed that they had killed al-Walīd. (Abū 'Āṣim continued): "I saw Wajh al-Fals holding a piece of skin from al-Walīd's head in his hand and he said: "I killed al-Walīd and I took this piece of his skin. Then somebody came and cut off al-Walīd's head and this piece of skin remained in my hand." The real name (ism) of Wajh al-Fals ("Farthing-face") was 'Abd al-Raḥmān.

Al-Ḥakam b. al-Nu'mān, the mawlā of al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, said: Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, accompanied by ten men, amongst whom was Rawḥ b. Muqbil, brought al-Walīd's head to Yazīd. Then Rawḥ said: "Rejoice, O Commander of the Faithful, that the libertine has been killed and al-'Abbās has been taken prisoner." Amongst those who brought the head were 'Abd al-Raḥmān Wajh al-Fals and Bishr, the mawlā of the Kināna[849] of Kalb. Yazīd gave each of them ten thousand dirhams. On the day al-Walīd was killed, he said, while he was fighting the rebels: "Anyone who brings a head will have five hundred dirhams." When a number of people brought heads, al-Walīd said: "Write their names down."[850] Then a mawlā of his who was one of the people who had brought a head, said: "O Commander of the Faithful, today is not a day on which to use credit!"[851]

The singers Mālik b. Abī al-Samḥ[852] and 'Umar al-Wādī[853] were with al-Walīd. When his men forsook him and he was surrounded, Mālik said to 'Umar: "Let's leave."[854] 'Umar replied: "That would be disloyal; besides, we won't be touched, since we are not fighting men." Mālik said: "Come off it! By God, if the rebels are victorious against us, you and I will be the first to be [1810]

849. The Kināna (b. 'Awf) were a branch of the Kalb. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 371.

850. In exactly the same context, al-Balādhurī (loc. cit.) tells this story about Yazīd, not al-Walīd. In view of al-Walīd's well-known attitude toward money and his lack of ready cash earlier to pay his troops (cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1803), the anecdote is more likely to refer to al-Walīd. Al-Iṣfahānī also attributes this story to al-Walīd. Cf. Aghānī, VI, 139.

851. Laysa hādhā bi-yawmin yu'malu fīhi bi-nasi'atin. Cf. Gloss., p. DXI. Al-Iṣfahānī has laysa hādhā . . . yawman yu'āmilu fīhi bi-al-nasi'ati (loc. cit.).

852. For Mālik b. Abī al-Samḥ al-Ṭā'ī, cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, III, 198, 207.

853. The text has 'Amr al-Wādī. The name is given in other sources as 'Umar al-Wādī b. Dāwūd b. Zādhān. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, III, 207; al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 64–65, 109–10, 139–44. The form 'Umar has been used in the translation.

854. Literally, "go with us."

killed. Al-Walīd's head will be put between our heads and the people will be told: 'Look who was with him even in this (abject) state.' There will be no worse criticism of him than that."[855] So the two of them fled.

According to Abū Ma'shar—Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informant(s)—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā: Al-Walīd b. Yazīd was killed on a Thursday, two nights before the end of Jumādā II, 126 [Thursday, April 15, 744]. Hishām b. Muḥammad, Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī, and 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī give the same date. Historians disagree, however, as to the length of al-Walīd's caliphate.[856] According to Abū Ma'shar—Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informants—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā:[857] Al-Walīd's caliphate lasted one year and three months. Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī) said: Al-Walīd's caliphate lasted one year, two months and twenty-two days.

Historians also disagree about al-Walīd's age on the day he was killed. Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī said that al-Walīd was killed when he was thirty-eight years old. Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī) said he was killed when he was thirty-six. Some other historians said he was killed when he was forty-two; others said it was when he was forty-one, others said forty-five, and yet others forty-six.[858]

Al-Walīd's patronymic was Abū al-'Abbās. His mother was Umm al-Ḥajjāj,[859] the daughter of Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Tha-[1811] qafī. Al-Walīd was a man of great strength and he had prehensile toes.[860] He used to take an iron ploughshare with a rope in it, have the rope tied to his foot, and then jump on his horse and pull the ploughshare along. He could ride without holding onto his horse, and he was a poet, much addicted to wine-drinking.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—Ibn Abī al-Zināḍ[861]—his father: (Abū al-Zināḍ's narrative begins): Once I

855. Literally, "they will not censure him for anything worse than this."

856. Literally, "they disagreed on the amount of time in which he was caliph."

857. This chain of transmitters has been arranged in the usual way, although it is somewhat different from usual in the text.

858. For other sources on the date of al-Walīd's death and the length of his life and his caliphate, cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (Derenk), 66–67; Fragmenta, 145; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 400; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 380; Hamzah, 129; Ibn Qutaybah, 186; Ibn A'tham, VIII, 140.

859. Al-Walīd's mother's name was Zaynab. Cf. 'Aṭwān, 61.

860. Literally, "long toes." Cf. Ibn A'tham, VIII, 137.

861. Literally, "Ibn Abī al-Zināḍ, who said, 'My father said.'" For Abū al-Zināḍ, was with Hishām when al-Zuhrī[862] was present. They referred to al-Walīd, criticizing him and finding serious fault with him. However, I myself took no part in what they were saying. Then al-Walīd asked permission to enter; this was granted to him. I saw anger on his face. He sat for a little while and then he got up. Later, when Hishām died, somebody wrote a letter against me and I was taken to al-Walīd. He greeted me, saying "How are you, Ibn Dhakwān?" and asked kindly about me. Then he said: "Do you remember the day when that squint-eyed man (Hishām) had that libertine[863] al-Zuhrī with him and they were pulling me to pieces?" I said: "I remember that, but I took no part in what they were saying." Al-Walīd replied: "That's true. Did you see the slave who was standing behind Hishām?" I said: "Yes." Al-Walīd said: "It was he who passed on to me what they said. By God, I swear if that libertine—meaning al-Zuhrī—had lived, I would have killed him." I replied: "I saw from your face that you were angry when you came in." Then al-Walīd said: "Ibn Dhakwān, that squint-eyed man has made me waste the best years of my life."[864] I said: "No, rather may God prolong your life for you, O Commander of the Faithful, and may He allow the community to enjoy your continuing presence!" Then al-Walīd called for supper and we ate it. When it was time for the evening prayer, we performed it and we conversed until the hour for the late night prayer. After we had prayed, al-Walīd sat down and asked for something to drink and they brought in a covered vessel. Three slave girls came and they lined up between him and me.[865] Then the important jurist and traditionist, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 106; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, III, 287. His names were Abū al-Zinād 'Alī b. Dhakwān al-Qurashī. He had been secretary to 'Umar II; cf. Wellhausen, 270, 347. He died in 131 (748); cf. Sezgin, I, 405.

---

862. For Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Zuhrī (d. 124/742) the famous traditionist and historian, cf. Sezgin, I, 28; Duri, 95–121. He was on very good terms with Hishām, who made him his son's tutor. Cf. Duri, 118.

863. Al-fāsiq.

864. Literally, "that squint-eyed man has taken away my life."

865. The text has ṣaffaqna bayna yadayhi baynī wa-baynahu. Ṣaffaqa can mean to transfer wine from one vessel to another in order for it to become clear, i.e., to decant the wine (Cf. Lane, I, 1700). Thus a literal translation would be "they decanted (the wine) in front of him between me and him." The wording baynī wa-baynahu is rather odd; it is unlikely that the girls divided the wine between al-Walīd and Abū al-Zinād. Fragmenta, 129, has fa-ṣuffifna baynī wa-baynahu ("they were positioned between me and him"). The version of al-Iṣfahānī [1812] al-Walīd began to drink, they went away[866] and we chatted. When al-Walīd asked for another drink, the slave girls did as they had done before.[867] Al-Walīd went on talking and asking for more to drink, and the slave girls continued bringing him wine until dawn. I counted that he had drunk seventy cups.

In this year Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī was killed.

The Killing of Khālid al-Qasrī and the Reason for It

We have already given an account of how Hishām dismissed Khālid from his post as governor of 'Irāq and Khurāsān[868] and of how Hishām had appointed Yūsuf b. 'Umar as governor of 'Irāq. As already mentioned, Khālid had worked in that post for Hishām for fifteen years, apart from a few months, since as already said he became governor of 'Irāq for Hishām in 105 [June 10, 723–May 28, 724] and was dismissed from the post on Jumādā I, 120 [April 26, 738–May 25, 738]. When Hishām dismissed Khālid, Yūsuf came to Wāsiṭ[869] to get Khālid, seized him, and imprisoned him there. Then Yūsuf b. 'Umar went to al-Ḥīrah and Khālid remained imprisoned in al-Ḥīrah for a full eighteen months, with his brother Ismā'īl b. 'Abdallāh, his son Yazīd b. Khālid, and his nephew al-Mundhir b. Asad b. 'Abdallāh. Yūsuf begged Hishām for permis-(Aghānī, VI, 106) is the most straightforward: fa-qumna baynī wa-baynahu ("they stood between me and him"). Later the editor emends the reading to ṣafafna (his vocalization). Cf. Add., p. DCCXII. The Cairo edition (253) has ṣufifna, which is more satisfactory. It is always conceivable that ṣaffaqna, the original reading of the editor, was correct, especially in view of the sentence that follows: "He asked for drink and they did as they had done at first." The tentative translation provided here omits the phrase bayna yadayhi and thus follows the Fragmenta and the Aghānī.

---

866. The text has dhahabna. The Cairo edition (loc. cit.) has dhahabnā ("we went away").

867. Literally, "continued doing like that."

868. Literally, "from his post and his governorship." For a parallel account, cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 207–10.

869. Wāsiṭ, in Iraq, had been founded by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf in 83 (702) or 84 (703). He had built a large prison there, which is presumably where Khālid al-Qasrī was put by Yūsuf b. 'Umar. For a long discussion of the exact site of medieval Wāsiṭ, cf. EI[1], s.v. (M. Streck). Cf. also Yāqūt, IV, 881–88; Le Strange, Lands, 39–40. The city was called Wāsiṭ because it lay equidistant from al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, and Ahwāz.

sion to be allowed a free hand with Khālid and to torture him, but (at first) Hishām would not allow Yūsuf to do that. Then, after Yūsuf had asked repeatedly and had made excuses to him for a shortfall in the kharāj and for loss of revenue, Hishām did on one occasion give Yūsuf permission.[870] But he sent a guard to witness the torture and he swore that if Khālid met his end while he was in Yūsuf's hands, then he (Hishām) would certainly kill Yūsuf. So Yūsuf summoned Khālid and he sat on a bench (dukkān) in al- [1813]
Ḥīrah,[871] with the people all assembled. Yūsuf was free with his tongue[872] against Khālid, but Khālid did not utter a single word until Yūsuf abused him by calling him Ibn Kāhin, meaning Shiqq b. Sa'b al-Kāhin.[873] Thereupon Khalid retorted: "You fool! You revile me by questioning my noble birth, but your father, O Ibn al-Sabbā', was only a wine-merchant," meaning that he sold wine. At this, Yūsuf sent Khālid back to his prison. Then in Shawwāl 121 [September 10, 739–October 8, 739] Hishām wrote to Yūsuf ordering him to release Khālid, and Khālid settled in the citadel of Ismā'īl b. 'Abdallāh in Dūrān behind the Kūfah bridge. Yazīd b. Khālid set out by himself, going through the territory of the Banū Ṭayy[874] as far as Damascus. Then Khālid set out, accompanied by Ismā'īl and al-Walīd, after 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ had equipped them (for the journey). Khālid sent the heavy baggage to the citadel of the Banū Muqātil,[875] but Yūsuf had sent 870. Cf. al-Jahshiyārī, 41.

871. Fa-jalasa 'alā dukkānin fī-al-Ḥīrah. Dukkān: "a kind of wide bench, of stone or brick, etc., generally built against a wall, upon which one sits." Cf. Lane, I, 900. A shop (also dukkān) in the market was a booth with a raised platform (maṣṭabah). Cf. J. M. Rogers, The Spread of Islam, 66. For a detailed discussion of maṣṭabah and dukkān, cf. Sadan, 123–24.

872. Wa-basaṭa 'alayhi. As well as verbal attacks, this phrase could also mean that Yūsuf stretched out his hand against Khālid.

873. For an account of the attempts made by Abū 'Ubaydah and others to denigrate the genealogy of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, cf. Goldziher, I, 188–89. Khālid traced his origins back to the South Arabian tribe of the Bājilah and he counted amongst his ancestors the famous soothsayer Shiqq. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 57–58. Shiqq was allegedly only half a man (one arm and one leg, hence shiqq). Cf. the biography of Khālid given by Ibn Khallikān, II, 313; al-Dīnawarī, 344. According to al-Dīnawarī, Khālid's response to Yūsuf was: "Your father and grandfather were only shopkeepers in al-Ṭā'if" (ibid.).

874. For this important North Arabian tribe, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 555.

875. This citadel was at 'Ayn al-Tamr on the route from al-Ḥīrah to Syria and was named after Muqātil b. Ḥassān. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 121, 137; Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 431.

cavalry (after them) and they seized Khālid's provisions, heavy baggage and camels as well as his mawlās who were looking after Khālid's possessions. Yūsuf confiscated and sold[876] what he took from them and sent some of the mawlās back into slavery. So when Khālid arrived at the citadel of the Banū Muqātil, all the (movable) possessions which he and his sons owned had been taken. After moving on to Hīt,[877] they made for al-Qaryah,[878] which is situated opposite the gate of al-Ruṣāfah, where Khālid remained for the remainder of Shawwāl and during the months of Dhū al-Qa'dah, Dhū al-Ḥijjah, al-Muḥarram, and Ṣafar [October 9, 739–February 3, 740]. (During this time) Hishām would not allow them to come in and see him. Al-Abrash was in correspondence with Khālid (during this period, which was the time that) Zayd b. 'Alī rose in rebellion and was killed.

[1814] According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī—his relaters: Yūsuf wrote to Hishām as follows: "The members of this family, the Hāshimites, had been dying of hunger, to the point that every one of them was preoccupied solely with finding food for their dependents. Then, when Khālid became governor of Iraq, he gave them money, by means of which they so recovered their strength that they began to cherish aspirations to the caliphate. Zayd rose in rebellion only on Khālid's advice. That is proved by the fact that Khālid stayed at al-Qaryah, which is on the route to Iraq, so that he could get news from there." Hishām remained silent until he had finished reading the letter. Then Hishām said to al-Ḥakam b. Ḥazn al-Qaynī, who was in charge of the delegation (from Yūsuf), and whom Yūsuf had ordered to confirm what was written in it—he had in fact done so—"You are lying and so is the person who sent you. Whatever suspicions we may have had about Khālid, we have never doubted his obedience." Then Hishām ordered that the messenger's throat should be cut.[879] When Khālid heard 876. Fa-ḍaraba wa bā'a. Presumably this is the meaning of ḍaraba in this context. Certainly if the mawlās were beaten, the text would have to read ḍarabahum.

877. Hīt, a town in Iraq, lay on the right bank of the Euphrates, at the spot where caravans trading between Iraq and Syria crossed the river. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (M. Streck); Le Strange, Lands, 64–65.

878. The phrasing of the Arabic here seems to indicate that al-Qaryah is a place name rather than "the village": thumma taḥammalū ilā al-qaryati wa-hiya. Ibn al-Athīr has al-qaryati allatī ("the village which . . ." (V, 207).

879. Literally, "he gave orders concerning him and his throat was cut."

about that, he went to Damascus where he stayed until the (time for) the summer expedition arrived. Then he left with the expedition, accompanied by Yazīd and Hishām, his two sons.[880]

The person in charge of Damascus at that time was Kulthūm b. 'Iyāḍ al-Qasrī,[881] who was ill-disposed[882] toward Khālid. When the expedition was well on the way to Byzantine territory,[883] fires began to break out every night in the houses of Damascus. A man from Iraq called Abū al-'Umarras and some companions of his started the fire, and while it raged they would plunder and steal.[884] Ismā'īl b. 'Abdallāh and al-Mundhir b. Asad b. 'Abdallāh and the two sons of Khālid, Sa'īd and Muḥammad, were on the coast because there had been bad news from Byzantium.[885] At this juncture, Kulthūm wrote to Hishām mentioning the fire and saying that there had never been such a fire before and that it was the work of the mawlās of Khālid, who wanted to attack the treasury (bayt al-māl). Hishām wrote back ordering Kulthūm to [1815] imprison Khālid's family, both young and old, as well as their mawlās and womenfolk. So Kulthūm seized Ismā'īl, al-Mundhir, Muḥammad, and Sa'īd from where they were stationed on the coast, and they were brought back in manacles, together with those mawlās whom they had with them. Kulthūm imprisoned Umm Jarīr, Khālid's daughter, al-Rā'iqah,[886] and all the women and young boys.

Then Abū al-'Umarras was overpowered and he and his associates were seized. Al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the superintendent

---

880. Literally, "the two sons of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh." According to al-Dīnawarī (345), Khālid asked Hishām's permission to raid in the direction of Ṭarsūs.

881. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1716. Kulthūm was sent as governor of Ifrīqiyah in 123 (740–41) and died in 124 (741–42). Cf. n. 306.

882. Wa-kāna mutaḥāmilan. Cf. Gloss., pp. CCIII–CCIV.

883. Fa-lammā adrabū. Cf. Lane, I, 866.

884. Cf. al-Dīnawarī, 345; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 208.

885. Li-ḥadathin kāna min al-Rūmī ("because of bad news which was from Byzantium[?]"). If, as al-Dīnawarī says, Khālid was at Ṭarsūs, he was at the most important of the frontier fortresses, since it guarded the Cilician Gates. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 132. Ṭarsūs is on the coast, as al-Ṭabarī says. Alternatively, ḥadath might be a reference to the Darb al-Ḥadath, the northeastern pass through the Taurus guarded by the fortress of Ḥadath. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 121–22. This is improbable, given the statement that Khālid was on the coast. According to al-Balādhurī, as cited by Le Strange, the Darb al-Ḥadath ("the road of bad news") was given the name Darb al-Salāmah ("the road of safety") after the fortress was captured by the Muslims (loc. cit.).

886. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1739.

of the kharāj in Damascus, wrote to Hishām telling him that Abū al-'Umarras and his associates had been taken, giving their names one by one and detailing their tribes and garrison towns. Al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān did not, however, include amongst them a single one of Khālid's mawlās. Then Hishām wrote to Kulthūm upbraiding and reproaching him, and ordering him to release all the people he had imprisoned. Kulthūm let them all go, but he appropriated the mawlās for himself in the hope that Khālid would speak to him about them when the latter returned from the summer campaign. When the soldiers returned from the frontier,[887] Khālid received word that his family had been imprisoned; but he did not hear that they had been set free again. Yazīd b. Khālid secreted himself in a crowd of men until he reached Ḥimṣ, whilst Khālid came and stayed in his house in Damascus. When people came to Khālid the following morning, he sent for his two daughters, Zaynab and 'Ātikah, and said: "I am growing old and I would like you to look after me." His daughters were very happy to do that. Then his brother Ismā'īl and his sons, Yazīd and Sa'īd, came in to see him. Khālid gave permission (to other people to come in), and his daughters stood up intending to withdraw.[888] So Khālid said: "Why should they withdraw when Hi-[1816] shām drives them to prison day after day?" Then the people came in and Ismā'īl and Khālid's two sons stood in front of his two daughters concealing them.

Khālid said: "I went out raiding in God's cause, hearing and obeying. Then people machinated behind my back and my women and the women of my family were seized and put in prison with criminals as is the practice with unbelievers. What was to stop a group of you standing up and saying: 'Why have the women of this man who hears and obeys been imprisoned?' Were you afraid that you would all be killed? May God inspire fear in you!" Then Khālid added: "As for the position between me and Hishām, (it is this): If he does not lay off me, I will certainly summon (people to follow) the one who is 'Irāqī in passion, Syrian in family, and Ḥijāzī in origin (meaning Muḥammad b. 'Alī b.

887. Literally, "when the people came and they went away from the frontier."

888. Fa-qāmat ibnatāhu li-yatanaḥḥayā. Ibn al-Athīr (V, 208) has fa-qāma banātuhu yaḥtajibna ("his daughters stood up to veil themselves").

'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās).[889] You have my permission to go and tell Hishām that." When Hishām heard what Khālid had said he declared: "Abū al-Haytham[890] has lost his reason."[891]

According to Abū Zayd—Aḥmad b. Mu'āwiyah—Abū al-Khaṭṭāb: Khālid said: "By God, if the lord of al-Ruṣāfah—meaning Hishām—does wrong,[892] we will certainly raise in support of us the Syrian, the Ḥijāzī, the 'Irāqī (i.e. Muḥammad b. 'Alī) and if he makes the slightest noise,[893] it (i.e., al-Ruṣāfah) will collapse on all sides." When Hishām heard what Khālid had said he wrote to him as follows: "You talk raving nonsense.[894] Are you threatening me with the insignificant, vile tribe of Bajīlah?"

(The narrative of Abū al-Khaṭṭāb continues.) By God, no one, apart from a man of the Banū 'Abs, supported him either in deed or word. The man from the Banū 'Abs recited the following:[895]

Verily, the sea of generosity has become calm, [1817]
a captive of the Banū Thaqīf,[896] bound in chains, But even though you have imprisoned al-Qasrī, you will not have imprisoned his reputation, nor will you have imprisoned his beneficence amongst the tribes.

Khālid and Yazīd and other members of Khālid's family remained in Damascus, while Yūsuf (b. 'Umar) kept plying Hishām with requests for Hishām to send him Yazīd. Then Hishām wrote to Kulthūm b. 'Iyāḍ ordering him to seize Yazīd and to send him to Yūsuf. Accordingly, Kulthūm sent cavalry to take Yazīd, who was in his house. Yazīd attacked the cavalry, who fell back from him, and then Yazīd himself escaped on horseback. Then the 889. The imām of the Shī'īs. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1769. Al-Dīnawarī, 345, has Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās.

890. The kunyah of Khālid al-Qasrī. Cf. Ibn Khallikān, II, 308.

891. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr (loc. cit.); al-Dīnawarī (loc. cit.).

892. La'in sā'a. A variant reading has lā'in shā'a ("if he wishes"). It might have been more usual to expect la'in asā'a.

893. Literally, "if he snorts a snort."

894. Innaka hadhdhā'atun hudharatun. Cf. Gloss., p. DXL.

895. The meter is ṭawīl. The poet is named by Ibn Khallikān as Abū al-Shaghb al-'Absī. Ibn Khallikān also quotes the verses (loc. cit.). Al-Dīnawarī, 347, has similar, although not always identical, lines, which he attributes to al-Ash'ath b. al-Qīnī.

896. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 553.

cavalry returned to Kulthūm and told him what had happened. The day after Yazīd had left, Kulthūm sent cavalry to take Khālid. Khālid called for his clothes and he put them on. His women[897] all began to wail, so one of the cavalrymen said (to Khālid): "Why don't you tell these women to shut up?" Khālid replied: "Why should I? Were it not for my obedience (to the caliph), the slave of the Banū Qasr would learn that he can't treat me in this way. So tell him what I said and if he is a true Arab, as he claims to be, just let him come and seek his fortune from me."[898] Then Khālid left with the cavalry and he was incarcerated in the prison at Damascus. Ismā'īl immediately left for al-Ruṣāfah to see Hishām. Ismā'īl went in to see Abū al-Zubayr,[899] his chamberlain (ḥājib), and told him that Khālid had been imprisoned. Then Abū al-Zubayr went in to Hishām and informed him. Hishām wrote to Kulthūm[900] reproaching him, saying: "You have released those whom I ordered you to imprison, and you have imprisoned those whom I did not order you to imprison," and ordering Kulthūm to release Khālid. This Kulthūm did.

[1818] Whenever Hishām wanted anything done, he would order al-Abrash (to deal with it). Accordingly, Hishām wrote through al-Abrash to Khālid. Al-Abrash wrote as follows: "The Commander of the Faithful has heard that 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Thuwayb al-Dinnī, of the Banū Dinnah of Sa'd, the brothers of 'Uthrah b. Sa'd,[901] stood up before you and said: 'O Khālid, I love you because you have ten special qualities. Truly, God is noble and so

---

897. Literally, "the women."

898. La-yaṭlub jaddahu minnī: there are a number of problems with the word jaddahu (thus vocalized by the editor). Firstly, it is not clear whether Khālid is speaking about Yūsuf, Hishām, or Kulthūm. Secondly, jadd may mean "fortune" or "grandfather." Thirdly, there is a variant reading, ḥadd ("prescribed punishment, extremity"). A possible solution is as follows. Although most evidence points to Kulthūm's not being a relation of Khālid's (he would appear to have been a Qaysī; cf. Crone, 128, and *EI*², s.v. [R. Basset]), there was obviously at least one strand of tradition that said he was (cf. al-Dīnawarī, 345, who claims that Kulthūm was a paternal cousin of Khālid's). Thus, it may be that here too Khālid is making a furiously ironic allusion to the fact that his relative is the one who is arresting him.

899. Abū al-Zubayr Nasṭās. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1749.

900. Cf. n. 306.

901. Al-Dīnawarī (346) has al-Kalbī. For this rather complicated genealogy, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 242.

are you. God is generous and so are you. God is merciful and so are you. God is forbearing and so are you.' And so ('Abd al-Raḥmān continued in this way) until he had enumerated ten qualities.[902] Now the Commander of the Faithful swears by God that if that incident is authenticated to his own satisfaction, the shedding of your blood will be licit. So write and tell me about the matter properly, so that I may inform the Commander of the Faithful about it." Then Khālid wrote the following reply: "That assembly had too many people present for it to be possible that unjust or wicked persons could falsify the truth of what was said. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Thuwayb stood before[903] me and said: 'O Khālid, I love you because you have ten special qualities. Truly, God is noble; He loves every noble person and He (therefore) loves you and I love you because God loves you. . .' and 'Abd al-Raḥmān continued in this way until he had enumerated ten qualities. But worse than that was (your condoning) the way in which Ibn Shaqqī al-Ḥimyarī stood up before the Commander of the Faithful and said: 'O Commander of the Faithful, which do you prize more highly: your deputy (khalīfah) among your people, or your messenger?' So the Commander of the Faithful replied: 'My deputy among my people.'[904] Then Ibn Shaqqī[905] said: 'You are the deputy of God and Muḥammad is His messenger. By my life, if a man of the Banū Bajīlah[906] goes astray, it is certainly a more paltry matter both to the common people and to the court [1819] that if the Commander of the Faithful (himself) goes astray.'" Al-Abrash read out Khālid's letter to Hishām, who said: "Abū al-Haytham has become senile."[907]

Khālid remained in Damascus during the (remainder of the time) that Hishām was caliph, until Hishām died. After Hishām's 902. Al-Dīnawarī lists all ten qualities (loc. cit.).

903. Fa-amma ("he turned"). The Cairo edition (257) has fa-qāma, which is the emended version of the Leiden edition. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXII.

904. According to al-Dīnawarī, Hishām was angry because 'Abd al-Raḥmān had attributed to Khālid merits that no single caliph had possessed (loc. cit.).

905. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 209. Al-Dīnawarī calls him 'Abdallāh b. Ṣayfī (loc. cit.).

906. Khālid's own tribe. He means himself here.

907. Al-Dīnawarī's account is less elliptical. In it Khālid upbraids Hishām for his harsh treatment of 'Abd al-Raḥmān, whilst in the face of the blasphemous remarks of 'Abdallāh b. Ṣayfī (called Ibn Shaqqī by al-Ṭabarī), Hishām did nothing at all to refute them (loc. cit.).

death, al-Walīd became caliph and the leaders of the junds, including Khālid, came to see him, but al-Walīd would not allow a single one of them in to see him. Khālid complained (that he was unwell)[908] and sought permission (to go home). This was granted to him, and accordingly he went back to Damascus where he remained for some months. Then al-Walīd wrote to Khālid as follows: "The Commander of the Faithful is apprised of the matter of the fifty million (dirhams). Didn't you know?[909] So come to the Commander of the Faithful with his envoy. He has ordered him to give you enough time to make your preparations." Then Khālid sent for a number of his close advisers, amongst whom was 'Umārah b. Abī Kulthūm al-Azdī, and Khālid read out the letter to them and said: "Advise me on what I should do." They replied: "Al-Walīd is not to be trusted in regard to you. We think that you should go into Damascus, seize the treasuries, and summon people to follow whomsoever you wish. The majority of the people are for you, and nobody will raise a dissenting voice against you." Khālid said: "What action other than that (could I take)?" They replied: "Seize the treasuries and stay put until your position has become secure." Khālid then asked: "What else could I do?" His advisers replied: "You could hide."

Then Khālid declared: "As regards your suggestion that I should summon people to follow whomsoever I wish, I would hate to have discord and disagreement on my hands. As for your suggestion that I should make my position secure, you do not feel that I am safe against al-Walīd when I have done nothing wrong, so how can you hope that he will keep faith with me when I have seized the treasuries? As for hiding, by God, I have never covered my head in fear of anyone, and now that I have reached the age I am now, I won't do so either. On the contrary, I will go (to al-Walīd) and I will ask God for help." Then Khālid departed and came to al-Walīd, but al-Walīd did not summon him or speak to [1820] him and Khālid remained in his own house with his mawlās and his servants until the time that the head of Yaḥyā b. Zayd was

908. Wa-ishtakā. Later on in this narrative Khālid says that he is unable to walk and that he has to be carried. It may be that this was the result of the earlier torture he had undergone at the hands of Yūsuf b. 'Umar.

909. A-lam ta'lam! Ibn al-Athīr has allatī ta'lamu ("which you know about") (V, 209).

brought from Khurāsān. Then the people were assembled in a portico (riwāq) and al-Walīd sat down (with them). The chamberlain came and stood (by Khālid) and Khālid said to him: "You can see the state I am in. I can't walk. I can only be carried in my chair." The chamberlain replied: "Nobody who is being carried can go in to see al-Walīd," and he gave permission for three other people to go in. Then he said: "Stand up, Khālid!" to which Khālid replied: "I have already told you what a state I am in." So the chamberlain allowed another one or two people to enter. Then he repeated "Stand up, Khālid!" to which Khālid again replied: "I have already told you what a state I am in." This continued until the chamberlain had allowed ten people in. Then, after saying once more: "Stand up, Khālid," he gave permission for everyone to go in[910] and gave instructions that Khālid should be admitted in his chair. So Khālid was taken in to see al-Walīd, who was sitting on his couch. The tables were set; the people were in front of him in two rows. Shabbah b. ʿAqqāl or ʿAqqāl b. Shabbah was speaking and the head of Yaḥyā b. Zayd had been raised aloft. Khālid was taken to one of the two rows and when the speaker had finished his speech al-Walīd stood up. The people were sent away and Khālid was taken back to his family. When he had taken off his clothes, al-Walīd's messenger came to him and took him back again. When Khālid reached the door of the tent he stopped. Then the messenger of al-Walīd came out to him and said: "The Commander of the Faithful asks you: 'Where is Yazīd b. Khālid?'" Khālid replied: "Yazīd became the object of Hishām's anger.[911] Hishām sent people to look for him and Yazīd fled from him. We used to see Yazīd in the company of the Commander of the Faithful until God made him caliph. Then when Yazīd did not appear we thought that he was in his home territory of al-Sharāh[912] or thereabouts." The messenger came back to him again and said: "No: you have left Yazīd behind to stir up trouble." Then Khālid said to the messenger: "The Commander of the Faithful knows that we are a family of obedience—I, my father,

910. Literally, "Then he said, 'Stand up, Khālid!' and allowed all the people to go in."

911. Literally, "a claw struck him from Hishām." Cf. Gloss., p. CCCXLVI.

912. In the Damascus province. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 32–33.

and my grandfather before me." Then Khālid interpolated (to the [1821] narrator): "I could tell by the speed of the messenger's return that al-Walīd was near enough to hear what I was saying." Then the messenger came back and said: "The Commander of the Faithful says to you: 'Either you bring Yazīd or I will surely kill you.'"[913] At that Khālid raised his voice and said: "Say to him: 'So that's what you have been wanting all along, is it? By God, even if Yazīd were under my very feet I would not lift them up for you, so do whatever you want.'" Then al-Walīd ordered Ghaylān,[914] the chief of his guards, to beat Khālid, saying: "Let me hear his voice." So Ghaylān took Khālid to his house and tortured him with chains but Khālid did not open his mouth. Then Ghaylān went back to al-Walīd and said: "By God, I won't torture anyone who never speaks or cries out!" Al-Walīd said: "Lay off him and imprison him at your place." So he kept Khālid in prison until Yūsuf b. 'Umar brought money from Iraq.[915] Then al-Walīd and his associates deliberated the matter amongst themselves and al-Walīd held an assembly with the people at which Yūsuf was present. He[916] spoke to Abān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Numayrī about Khālid and said: "I will buy him for fifty million (dirhams)." Then al-Walīd sent word to Khālid saying: "Yūsuf will buy you for fifty million. If you can guarantee (to give me) that amount, (well and good). Otherwise I will hand you over to Yūsuf." Khālid replied: "(True) Arabs cannot be sold. By God, if you asked me to guarantee this"—and he picked up some wood from the ground—"I would not do it. So think again." Accordingly, al-Walīd handed Khālid over to Yūsuf, who stripped him of his clothes, threw a woolen cloak over him, bundled him into another, and took him away in a litter without a seat. Khālid's companion on the road was Abū Quḥāfah al-Murrī, the nephew of al-Walīd b. Talīd, who had been Hishām's governor in al-Mawṣil.[917]

Yūsuf took Khālid away and he camped at al-Muḥdathah, about

913. The text has la-urhiqanna. The Cairo edition (259) has la-uzhiqanna ("I will surely kill"). The latter version has been followed.

914. Al-Dīnawarī (347) calls him Sa'īd b. Ghaylān.

915. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1779–80.

916. It is not clear whether this refers to Yūsuf or al-Walīd.

917. According to al-Dīnawarī (348) Yūsuf took Khālid to Wasiṭ.

a day's journey from al-Walīd's camp. Then Yūsuf called Khālid and referred to his mother (in a scandalous context). Khālid replied: "Why are you talking about mothers? May God curse you! [1822] By God, I will never speak a word to you again." Then Yūsuf lashed Khālid and tortured him severely but Khālid did not utter a single word. Then Yūsuf proceeded on his journey with Khālid. After some distance, Zayd b. Tamīm al-Qaynī sent a mawlā of his called Sālim al-Naffāṭ[918] to give Khālid a drink of sawīq[919] made from pomegranate seeds. When Yūsuf heard about this, he sentenced Zayd to five hundred lashes and Sālim to one thousand lashes. Then Yūsuf reached al-Ḥīrah and he summoned Khālid, together with Ibrāhīm and Muḥammad, the sons of Hishām (b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī). Yūsuf had Khālid flogged but Khālid did not tell him anything. Ibrāhīm b. Hishām bore up under torture but Muḥammad b. Hishām was broken. After Khālid had remained under torture for one day, Yūsuf placed the spiked rack[920] on his chest and killed him that night. Khālid was buried in the cloak which he had been wearing in the area of al-Ḥīrah in al-Muḥarram 126 (October 25–November 24, 743) according to the report given by al-Haytham b. 'Adī. Then 'Āmir b. Sahlah al-Ash'arī came and killed[921] his horse at Khālid's grave and Yūsuf gave him seven hundred lashes.

According to Abū Zayd—Abū Nu'aym—an (unnamed) man: I was present when Yūsuf brought Khālid. Yūsuf called for some wood, which was placed on Khālid's feet, and then people stood on him until his feet were broken. But by God, he did not cry out or allow any expression[922] to cross his face. Then they stood on his legs until they were broken, then on his thighs, on his loins, and on his chest until he died. But by God, he did not (once) cry out or allow any expression to cross his face.

---

918. The naphtha thrower.

919. Sawīq: a soup or paste made from flour and water to which honey, oil or pomegranate syrup is added. Cf. Lisān, II, 243; EI[1] s.v. (J. Ruska).

920. Al-muḍarrasah. Cf. al-Dīnawarī, 348; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 210. Here Ibn al-Athīr quotes from al-Farazdaq's verses against Khālid al-Qasrī.

921. Fa-'aqara farsahu: "he hamstrung/killed his horse." A pre-Islamic practice. Cf. the tradition quoted by Lane: lā 'aqra fī al-Islāmi ("there will be no slaughtering (at the grave) in Islam"). Cf. Lane, I, 2108.

922. Literally, "frown."

When al-Walīd b. Yazīd was killed, Khalaf b. Khalīfah[923] recited the following:[924]

The Kalb and the forefathers of Madhḥij[925] have silenced [1823] a soul tormented with thirst[926] which clamored sleeplessly the whole night long.
In avenging Khālid, they have left[927] the Commander of the Faithful prostrate upon his nose, though not in the act of worship.
So if you have snapped the cord of a necklace of ours, we have in retaliation rent the cords of many necklaces of yours.
And if you have diverted our attention from dispensing largesse, we have in turn diverted al-Walīd's attention from the singing of maidens.
And if al-Qasrī has embarked on a journey of no return, (Remember that) Abū al-'Abbās also is no longer to be seen.

Ḥassān b. Ja'dah al-Ja'farī[928] gave the lie to Khalaf b. Khalīfah in these verses of his:[929]

Surely a man who claims that he himself killed al-Walīd and not the caliph's uncles, has a soul brimful of lies.
He is naught but a man whose hour of death is nigh,

---

923. Khalaf b. Khalīfah, the mawlā of Qays b. Tha'labah. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, II, 301.

924. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, loc. cit. The meter is ṭawīl.

925. For the Banū Madhḥij, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 381.

926. Ṣadan. Cf. Lane, I, 1671. The translation here is based on the basic meaning of ṣadiyā ("to thirst vehemently"). Others will argue that what is meant here is the bird (often an owl) that cries in the head of the slain when his blood has not been avenged by retaliation. Cf. ibid. The translation here, "tormented with thirst," is based on an oral explanation of the term ṣadan given in 1970 by Professor A. F. L. Beeston, who convincingly related the term to the Ugaritic practice of placing water in the grave so that the soul of the deceased should not thirst in eternity.

927. Tarakna ("they have left"). Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi (loc. cit.) has taraknā ("we have left").

928. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1378.

929. The meter is basīṭ.

one against whom the Banū Marwān have marched alongside the Arabs.

Abū Miḥjan, Khālid's mawlā, recited the following:[930]

Ask al-Walīd, ask his troops, when in the morning our hailstorm rained down on him,
Did a single soul from the Muḍar come to shield him, when the horses were charging under the dust cloud of death? [1824]
The man who in his folly lampoons us in verse we will cut to pieces with shining white swords; indeed, we use them to lampoon and smite (our foes).

Naṣr b. Sa'īd al-Anṣārī recited the following:[931]

Convey to Yazīd[932] of the Banū Kurz a stark message,[933] that from afar my thirst for vengeance has been slaked and that I am no longer after revenge.[934]
You have cut down the limbs of a slave (qinnawr)[935] in rage with a sharp, well-worn Indian sword.
In the evening, the wives of a slave have suffered mutilation because of the downfall of the slave, the son of a slave,
And the dogs of Damascus continued to grip him with their teeth, as if his limbs were the limbs of a pig.
They left only fragments of him at the place where he died, the debris of a decaying corpse dragged over the tent ropes.
You made your sword the judge when you were not satisfied with their judgment,

---

930. This meter is also basīṭ.

931. Again, the meter is basīṭ.

932. Yazīd, Khālid's son. Kurz was an ancestor of Khālid al-Qasrī. Cf. Ibn Khallikān, II, 309; Goldziher, I, 188–89.

933. Mughalghalatan.

934. The text has qinnawr. This is later changed tentatively to qinnūr. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXII. The original version seems to accord better with the form in Lisān, III, 179, where the vocalization is qinnawr and the word is defined as al-'abd ("slave"). This is also the view expressed by the editor. Cf. Gloss., p. CDXCDXXIII. The Cairo edition (261) has qannūr.

935. The double force of al-'abdi qinnawrin has not been rendered in English.

for only the sword passes judgment without seeking justification.
So do not accept from Khālid, if you are far-sighted, anything except every great and famous deed.
[1825] You have set fire to the kingdom of the Nizār and then terrified them with galloping horses which bear haughty warriors.
There were none among the family of a slave, nor among their offspring,[936] equal to the moon in the sky, suffused with light.

In this year the oath of allegiance was given to Yazīd b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, who was called Yazīd the "Inadequate"[937] (al-Nāqiṣ). Yazīd was given the title of the "Inadequate" only because he cut back the increase of ten dirhams in the people's stipends which al-Walīd b. Yazīd had decreed for them. After al-Walīd was killed, Yazīd revoked their increase and restored their stipends to what they had been in the time of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. It was said that the first person to call Yazīd by this name was Marwān b. Muḥammad.[938]

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): Marwān b. Muḥammad reproached Yazīd b. al-Walīd and called him al-Nāqiṣ b. al-Walīd. So he dubbed him the "Inadequate" and that is why the people called him that.

---

936. Literally, "nor did they beget."
937. Cf. n. 629.
938. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 220.

The Events of the Year 126 (cont'd)

(October 25, 743–October 12, 744)

In this year the unity of the Banū Marwān was disturbed and discord prevailed.

The Discords That Occurred

One such source of discord was the uprising of Sulaymān b. Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik in ʿAmmān after the killing of al-Walīd b. Yazīd. According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Madāʾinī): When al-Walīd was killed, Sulaymān b. Hishām came out of prison—he had been imprisoned in ʿAmmān[939]—took what revenues there were in ʿAmmān, and made for Damascus, where he began cursing al-Walīd and upbraiding him for being an unbeliever.

In this year the people of Ḥimṣ attacked the dependents of al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd. They destroyed his house and declared publicly that they were seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Walīd b. Yazīd. [1826]

939. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1776. For Sulaymān's activities after his release from prison, cf. also Ibn al-Athīr, V, 220; Fragmenta, 146.

The Uprising in Ḥimṣ

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī): Marwān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik was al-Walīd's governor in Ḥimṣ. He was one of the most prominent members of the Banū Marwān as far as nobility, generosity, intellect, and good looks were concerned. When al-Walīd was killed and the news of his murder reached the people of Ḥimṣ, they closed the town gates and they long continued to lament and mourn for al-Walīd. The people asked how al-Walīd had come to be killed and one of the people who had come to them (to tell them the news) said: We continued to maintain law and order among the people, and to keep them under control, until al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd arrived and defected to the side of 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj. Then the people of Ḥimṣ rose up and wrecked and looted the house of al-'Abbās; they carried off his women and took away his sons, whom they cast into prison. They began searching for al-'Abbās, but he escaped to Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Then the people wrote to the junds, summoning them to seek vengeance for al-Walīd's blood, and the junds responded. The people of Ḥimṣ who were in the junds wrote to the effect that they would not give the oath of obedience to Yazīd, that if al-Walīd's two heirs[940] were still alive they would give the oath of allegiance to them and that otherwise they would give it to the best person they knew, on the condition that he give them stipends each Muḥarram and that he make provision that their children should inherit them.[941] They chose Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. Ḥuṣayn[942] as their leader. He wrote a letter to Marwān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik, who was in the amīr's residence in Ḥimṣ. When Marwān had read the letter he said: "This is a letter that was written with God's approval,"[943] and he agreed to do what they wanted. When Yazīd b. al-Walīd heard about the people of Ḥimṣ he sent envoys to them, amongst whom was Ya'qūb b. Hānī', and he wrote a letter to them saying that he was not calling them to accept himself but that he was summoning them to the 940. The two sons mentioned in al-Walīd's succession letter, i.e., al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān.

941. Literally, "he would give (stipends) to them for the children."

942. Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī. Cf. Crone, 97.

943. This translation is only tentative.

shūrā. 'Amr b. Qays al-Sakūnī[944] replied: "We are content with our heir-apparent" (walī 'ahd), meaning the son of al-Walīd b. Yazīd. At that Ya'qūb b. 'Umayr[945] took hold of 'Amr's beard and berated him: "You decrepit old man! Your judgment is unsound and you have lost your reason. Even if the person you mean[946] were an orphan in your care, it would not be lawful for you to give him his money, so how could it be otherwise in the case (not just of money, but) of the ummah itself?"[947] Then the people of Ḥimṣ attacked the envoys of Yazīd b. al-Walīd and drove them out. In charge of Ḥimṣ was Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. Ḥuṣayn. Marwān b. 'Abdallāh had no authority over them. Al-Simṭ b. Thābit[948] was with the people of Ḥimṣ, too, but relations between him and Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd were strained. Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī,[949] who was also with the rebels, declared to them: "If I went to Damascus and showed only myself to the people there, they would not oppose me." [1827]

Then Yazīd b. al-Walīd dispatched Masrūr b. al-Walīd and al-Walīd b. Rawḥ with a large number of troops, most of whom were from the Banū 'Āmir of Kalb, and they camped at Ḥuwwārayn.[950] Thereafter, Sulaymān b. Hishām came to Yazīd. Sulaymān was well received by Yazīd, and Yazīd married Sulaymān's sister, Umm Hishām, the daughter of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. Yazīd also returned to Sulaymān those of his family's possessions that al-Walīd had seized. Then Yazīd sent Sulaymān b. Hishām to Masrūr b. al-Walīd and al-Walīd b. Rawḥ, ordering them to heed and obey him. Then the people of Ḥimṣ arrived and camped at a village belonging to Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b.

---

944. For his biography, cf. Crone, 99.

945. The name is written thus in the text. On the preceding page, however, Ya'qūb b. Hānī' was mentioned in the delegation sent to Ḥimṣ by Yazīd. There is probably a scribal error here and the name should be Ya'qūb b. Hānī'.

946. One of the two sons of al-Walīd, who were still minors.

947. Literally, "how is the case of the ummah!"

948. Al-Simṭ b. Thābit b. Yazīd b. Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ. For his later career, cf. al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 404, 495. For the history of his family, cf. Crone, 101–02.

949. Abū Muḥammad Muḥammad b. 'Abdāllah b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah al-Sufyānī, an Umayyad. For a discussion of this name, cf. Fragmenta, 138, and the editor's note C. Cf. also Wellhausen, 362, 365–66.

950. Of the places that bear this name in Syria, the most likely here is a fortress near Ḥimṣ. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 355; Le Strange, Palestine, 465; Dussaud, 79.

Marwān al-Kalbī—'Amr b. Muḥammad and Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Bahrānī: Marwān b. 'Abdallāh stood up and addressed them: "You who are gathered here! You have risen up in rebellion [1828] to wage war against your enemy and to avenge the blood of your caliph and you have taken a path of rebellion for which I hope that God will reward you and give you a good recompense. People have shown their readiness to fight you and have revealed aggressive intentions toward you. If you foil their attempts, the rest will follow of itself and you will be nearer to your objectives and (your enemies) will be easier for you (to deal with). I do not think it is advisable for you to go to Damascus with this army at your back."[951] Then al-Simṭ said: "By God, this is an enemy who is right on your doorstep and who wants to disrupt your unity. And he has Qadarī inclinations." Thereupon the soldiers attacked and killed Marwān b. 'Abdallāh and his son, and exhibited their heads[952] to the people. By making these remarks, however, al-Simṭ had only wanted to disagree with Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd.

When Marwān b. 'Abdallāh was killed, the people of Ḥimṣ appointed as their governor Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī. They further sent word to Sulaymān b. Hishām, saying: "We are coming to you, so remain where you are," so he stayed put. Then the people of Ḥimṣ bypassed Sulaymān's troops on their left and advanced toward Damascus. Sulaymān got wind of where they were going, so he departed in haste and met up with them at al-Sulaymāniyyah, which was an estate belonging to Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik (and was located) behind 'Adhrā',[953] fourteen miles from Damascus.

According to 'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān b. Bashshār and al-Walīd b. 'Alī: When Yazīd heard about what the people of Ḥimṣ had been up to, he summoned 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj and sent him off with three thousand men, ordering him to make himself master of the 'Uqāb pass.[954] Yazīd also sent for Hishām b.

---

951. Literally, "and to leave this army behind you." Ibn al-Athīr has: "if you are victorious over them what follows them will be easier for you" (V, 221).

952. There is no dual in the Leiden text here, but the Cairo edition (VII, 264) corrects it without comment.

953. 'Adhrā' was a well-known village of the Ghūṭah district around Damascus. Cf. Yāqūt, III, 625; Le Strange, Palestine, 383.

954. This is presumably a reference to the Eagle's Gorge which lay near 'Adhrā'. Cf. Le Strange, loc. cit.

Maṣād and dispatched him with fifteen hundred men, ordering him to seize the mountain road at al-Salāmah[955] and instructing the forces to provide each other with mutual support.

According to 'Amr b. Marwān—Yazīd b. Maṣād: I was with Sulaymān's troops. When we came upon the people of Ḥimṣ, they had camped at al-Sulaymāniyyah. They had positioned themselves with the olive grove on their right, the mountain to the north of them, and the wells behind them. So there was only one way of approaching them. They had camped there at the beginning of the night and had rested their riding animals, whereas we had spent the whole night traveling until we had come upon them. When the sun was high and the heat had become intense and our animals were exhausted and our armor weighed heavily on us, I went up to Masrūr b. al-Walīd and said to him, within earshot of Sulaymān: "O Abū Sa'īd, I swear to you by God that the amīr (of Ḥimṣ) is sending his jund forward to fight (us) at this very moment." Then Sulaymān rode up and said: "Young man, be steadfast. By God, I will not dismount until God has decreed His will for me and them (the people of Ḥimṣ)."[956] Then Sulaymān moved forward (into the fray); in charge of his right flank was al-Ṭufayl b. Ḥārithah al-Kalbī and in command of his left was al-Ṭufayl b. Zurārah al-Ḥabashī.[957] The people of Ḥimṣ launched an attack on us and our right and left flanks withdrew a distance of more than two bowshots, whilst Sulaymān maintained his position in the center. Then Sulaymān's men attacked the army of Ḥimṣ, pushing them back to their original position. Thereafter there were repeated attacks from both sides. Around two hundred of the men of Ḥimṣ were killed, including Ḥarb b. 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, and about fifty of Sulaymān's followers lost their lives. Abū al-Halbā' al-Bahrānī, who was a prominent horseman from Ḥimṣ, sallied forth and issued a challenge to single combat, so Ḥayyah b. Salāmah al-Kalbī came out against him. Abū al-Halbā' struck Ḥayyah a blow which unseated him from his horse. Then Abū Ja'dah, a mawlā of Quraysh from Damascus, [1829]

955. The text has al-Salāmah. Ibn al-Athīr has al-Salāmiyyah (V, 221). Certainly al-Salāmiyyah (unlike al-Salāmah) can be located in the area between Ḥamāh and Ḥimṣ. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 528; Dussaud, 79.

956. Literally, "until God has decreed what He decrees between me and them."

957. For these two men called Ṭufayl, cf. Crone, 162.

attacked Abū al-Halbā' and killed him. Next, Thubayt b. Yazīd al-Bahrānī sallied forth and issued a challenge to single combat, whereupon Īrāk al-Sughdī, who was a descendant of the kings of Sughd and was attached to Sulaymān b. Hishām, came out against him. Now Thubayt was short and Īrāk was massive. When Thubayt saw Īrāk advancing toward him he retreated, so Īrāk stood and shot an arrow at him which pinned his leg muscle [1830] to his saddle cloth. While they were thus engaged, 'Abd al-'Azīz approached from the 'Uqāb pass and he attacked the men of Ḥimṣ with such vigor that he broke through their lines killing (some of them) and then reached us.

According to 'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān—Sulaymān b. Ziyād al-Ghassānī:[958] I was with 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj. When he caught sight of the troops of Ḥimṣ, he said to his followers: "Your destination is that hill which is in the center of their troops. By God, any of you who falls behind will be beheaded by me personally." Then, ordering his personal standard-bearer to advance, he launched into the fray and we went with him. We killed everyone in our way until we reached the hill. 'Abd al-'Azīz had split up the troops of Ḥimṣ who were in disarray. Then Yazīd b. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī shouted: "Fear God, fear God when dealing with your own people!"[959] and thus he restrained them, for his heart misgave him at what Sulaymān and 'Abd al-'Azīz had done. Hostilities almost broke out between Sulaymān, supported by the Dhakwāniyyah,[960] and the Banū 'Āmir from Kalb. The Dhakwāniyyah were stopped from attacking the Banū 'Āmir on being assured that the latter would give the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Then Sulaymān b. Hishām sent men to Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī and Yazīd b. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, and they were seized. As they were being taken past al-Ṭufayl b. Ḥārithah, they shouted out to him: "We beseech you, uncle,[961] by God and kinship, (help us)." So al-Ṭufayl went with them to 958. The Cairo edition (265) puts in Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr) at the beginning of this chain of transmitters.

959. Allāha Allāha fī qawmika.

960. The Dhakwāniyyah were the armed retinue of Sulaymān b. Hishām, numbering several thousand men. Cf. Crone, 53, 241, n. 393.

961. Their maternal uncle.

Sulaymān, but he imprisoned them both. The Banū 'Āmir were afraid that he would kill the two of them, so a group of the Banū 'Āmir came and remained with the two captives in the tent. Then Sulaymān sent them on to Yazīd b. al-Walīd, who imprisoned them in the Green Palace[962] with al-Walīd's two sons. Yazīd also imprisoned with them Yazīd b. 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sufyān, the maternal uncle of 'Uthmān b. al-Walīd. Then Sulaymān and 'Abd al-'Azīz went toward Damascus and lodged at 'Adhrā'. The people of Damascus reached agreement and gave the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Then the people went (back) to Damascus and Ḥimṣ. Yazīd allotted them stipends and gave presents to their leaders, amongst whom were Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Ḥusayn, al-Simṭ b. Thābit, 'Amr b. Qays, Ibn Ḥuwayy, and al-Ṣaqr b. Ṣafwān. Yazīd appointed Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. Ḥuṣayn, [1831] who was from Ḥimṣ, as governor. The remainder (of the rebels) stayed in Damascus and then left to join the people of Jordan and Palestine. Three hundred of the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ had been killed that day.[963]

In this year the inhabitants of Palestine and Jordan rose up and killed their governor.[964]

The Rebellion of the People of Palestine and Jordan and the Treatment They Received from Yazīd b. al-Walīd

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Rajā' b. Rawḥ b. Salāmah b. Rawḥ b. Zinbā':[965] Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik, a man of good character, was al-Walīd's governor in Palestine. Yazīd b. Sulaymān (b. 'Abd al-Malik) was the chief of his father's sons.[966] They had been

962. Al-Khaḍrā': the palace built at Damascus by Mu'āwiyah, the first Umayyad caliph. It is perhaps significant that the audience hall at al-Ruṣāfah and the palace at Wāsiṭ also had green domes. Cf. the discussion in Grabar, Al-Mushatta, 106.

963. For an analysis of the revolt of the men of Ḥimṣ, cf. Shaban, Islamic History, I, 157; Wellhausen, 365–66.

964. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 222–23.

965. For the history of this family, cf. Crone, 99–101.

966. Literally, "the sons of Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik." For Yazīd b. Sulaymān, cf. the Umayyad genealogical table.

living in Palestine, and the people there liked them because of the protection that they extended to them. When al-Walīd was killed, the leader of the people in Palestine at that time, Sa'īd b. Rawḥ b. Zinbā', wrote to Yazīd b. Sulaymān, saying: "The caliph has been killed. Come to us and we will appoint you to rule over us." Then Sa'īd (b. Rawḥ) gathered his people to him and wrote to Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik, who was at that time camped at al-Saba',[967] saying: "Leave us. The situation here has become very troubled and we have chosen as our ruler a man under whose government we can be content." Accordingly, Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik went away to Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Then Yazīd b. Sulaymān summoned the people of Palestine to fight against Yazīd b. al-Walīd. The people of Jordan heard about their activities and so they appointed Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik to rule over them, whilst it was Sa'īd b. Rawḥ and Ḍib'ān b. Rawḥ[968] who were in command of the people of Palestine. When Yazīd (b. al-Walīd) heard about the doings of the people of Jordan and Palestine, he sent Sulaymān b. Hishām against them, accompanied by the men of Damascus and the men of Ḥimṣ who had been with al-Sufyānī. According to 'Alī (al-[1832] Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān—Muḥammad b. Rashīd al-Khuzā'ī: The men of Damascus numbered eighty-four thousand even before Sulaymān b. Hishām went out to join them.[969]

According to Muḥammad b. Rāshid: Sulaymān b. Hishām[970] kept on sending me to Ḍib'ān and Sa'īd, the two sons of Rawḥ, and to al-Ḥakam and Rāshid, the two sons of Jir' of the Balqayn, and I would make them promises and raise their hopes (of what they would receive) if they gave the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Accordingly, they agreed to do so. According to 'Uthmān b. Dāwūd al-Khawlānī: Yazīd b. al-Walīd sent me, together with Ḥudhayfah b. Sa'īd, to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik and Yazīd b. Sulaymān to call on them to submit to him and to make them promises and raise their hopes. So we began with the men of

967. Two places called al-Saba' (Le Strange has al-Sab') were located in the province of Filasṭīn. The more likely one here is the district that lies between Jerusalem and al-Karak. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 523.

968. Ḍib'ān is the vocalization given by the editor. Fragmenta, 152, has Ḍab'ān.

969. Literally, "the men of Damascus were eighty-four thousand, and Sulaymān b. Hishām went to them."

970. Cf. n. 368.

Jordan and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik. A group of them had gathered to him and I addressed him. Then one of them said: "May God show the amīr the right way! Accept what this young man says."[971] Then the prayer began,[972] and I spoke privately with him and said: "I have been sent by Yazīd with a message for you.[973] By God, all the flags I have left behind me are hoisted over the heads of your own people. Every dirham that has left the treasury is in their hands and they (all) have some kind of grievance against you."[974] Muḥammad said: "Are you sure about that?" I said: "Yes." Then I went away, came to Ḍib'ān b. Rawḥ, and said the same things to him. I also said to him: "Yazīd will make you governor of Palestine for as long as he remains in power." So Dib'ān agreed to what I had proposed and I left. Before the following day the people of Palestine had decamped.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwan al-Kalbī—Muḥammad b. Sa'īd b. Ḥassān al-Urdunnī: I was a scout for Yazīd b. al-Walīd in Jordan. When the situation had settled down in his favor, he made me superintendent of the kharāj in Jordan. When the people rebelled against Yazīd b. al-Walīd, I went to Sulaymān b. Hishām and I asked him to detail some cavalry to accompany me in making a raid on Ṭabariy- [1833]

971. The text has aqbil hādhā al-fatā uqīmat al-ṣalātu. This would appear to be faulty. At minimum the insertion of wa or fa before uqīmat is necessary. Thus a literal translation would be: "'Accept this young man' and then the prayer began." The Cairo edition (VII, 267) has a longer, quite different reading here: uqtul hādhā al-Qadariyya al-khabītha fa-kaffahum 'annī al-Ḥakam b. Jir' al-Qīnī, which the editor says is a variant reading, although the Leiden edition gives no variants at all. Ibn al-Athīr glosses over this problem by omitting it (V, 222). In this very unsatisfactory situation, the former solution with the addition of wa has been adopted. It accords better with the following details of a private conversation between the messenger and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik.

972. Cf. n. 148.

973. Literally, "I am Yazīd's messenger to you."

974. The meaning of this is rather obscure. A literal translation of the text would be: "By God, I have not left behind me any flag except that it is raised over the head of a man of your family and there is no dirham which leaves the treasury except in the hand of a man from amongst them." The Arabic then continues: wa-huwa yaḥmilu laka kadhā wa-kadhā. Presumably what the messenger is suggesting here is that there are troops mobilized and paid from the family of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik already on the side of Yazīd b. al-Walīd and that Muḥammad would do well to submit at once. The precise meaning of yaḥmilu is not clear, but ḥamala may mean "to be angry, to have a grievance" (cf. Lane, I, 647) and has tentatively been translated thus in this sentence.

yah.[975] But Sulaymān refused to send anyone with me. Then I went to Yazīd b. al-Walīd and told him what had happened. Yazīd wrote a letter over his own signature to Sulaymān, ordering him to let me take with me whatever I wanted. Then I took the letter to Sulaymān, and he sent Muslim b. Dhakwān[976] and five thousand men with me. I left with them at night and made them camp at al-Baṭīḥah. Then they dispersed into the villages. I went with a group of them to Ṭabariyyah and they wrote letters contacting their own groups. The people of Ṭabariyyah said: "Why should we stand by when troops are searching our houses and oppressing our people?" Then they went to the residence of Yazīd b. Sulaymān and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik, plundered their belongings, seized their riding-animals and weapons, and returned to their own villages and houses.

When the people of Palestine and Jordan had dispersed, Sulaymān went to al-Ṣannabrah,[977] where the people of Jordan gathered to him and gave the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Then on the Friday Sulaymān sent people toward Ṭabariyyah; he himself crossed the lake by boat and traveled alongside his men[978] (who were on the road) until he reached Ṭabariyyah. Then he led the people in the Friday prayer, made the oath of allegiance (to Yazīd b. al-Walīd) with the people who were there, and returned to his camp. According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—'Uthmān b. Dāwūd: When Sulaymān camped at al-Ṣannabrah, he sent me to Yazīd b. al-Walīd, instructing me to transmit the following message to Yazīd: "You know how churlish the people of Palestine are, but God has (so far) taken it upon Himself to defend you from them. I have resolved to appoint Ibn Surāqah as governor of Palestine and al-Aswad b. Bilāl al-Muḥāribī as governor of Jordan." So I went to 975. Ṭabariyyah (Tiberias), the capital of the province of Jordan. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 334–51.

976. The commander of the Dhakwāniyyah, a freedman of Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Cf. Crone, 241, n. 394.

977. This place is vocalized in the text as al-Ṣinnabrah. According to Le Strange, basing his reading on Yāqūt, III, 419, it should be al-Ṣannabrah. This was a place in the province of Jordan, three miles from Ṭabariyyah (Palestine, 531).

978. The text has wajjaha Sulaymānu ilā . . . fa-ja'ala yusāyiruhum. There would appear to be an implied object ("them," "the people") with wajjaha. Otherwise, tawajjaha would be more usual.

Yazīd and I told him what Sulaymān had instructed me to tell him. Yazīd said: "Tell me what you said to Ḍib'ān b. Rawḥ," so I told him. Then he said: "And what did Ḍib'ān do?" I replied: "Before morning, he decamped with the people of Palestine and Ibn Jirw and the people of Jordan did likewise." Then Yazīd said: "No one keeps his promises better than we do. Go back and tell Sulaymān not to leave until he has gone to al-Ramlah and make the people there give the oath of allegiance (to me). I have already [1834] appointed Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd as governor of Jordan, Ḍib'ān b. Rawḥ as governor of Palestine, Masrūr b. al-Walīd over Qinnasrīn, and Ibn al-Ḥusayn over Ḥimṣ."

After the murder of al-Walīd, Yazīd b. al-Walīd delivered a sermon. After giving praise and thanks to God and praying for His prophet Muḥammad he went on:[979]

> O people! By God, I did not rise up in rebellion out of overweening insolence and pride[980] nor out of a craving (to possess the things of) this world nor out of a desire for kingship. Nor do I have an inflated opinion of myself. Indeed, without the mercy of my Lord, I would be lost. On the contrary, I have rebelled out of righteous anger for God's cause, His prophet, and His religion, and I came to summon people to God, His book, and the sunnah of His prophet. (And this was at a time) when the signposts indicating the right path had been destroyed,[981] the light of pious folk had been extinguished, and there had appeared that stiff-necked tyrant who declared licit every forbidden thing and who was responsible for one innovation (bid'ah) after another. Nor, moreover, by God, did he confirm the truth of the Book or believe in the Day of Reckoning, although in the matter of noble descent he was my (paternal) cousin and was my equal as regards lineage. When I saw (all) this, I sought God's favor in my dealings with him

979. For other versions of this famous khuṭbah, cf. Fragmenta, 150–51; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqah, 130–31; Ibn Khayyāṭ, 382–83; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, II, 144; al-Jāḥiẓ, al-Bayān, II, 141–42. Only significant differences are noted below. For a recent discussion of this khuṭbah, cf. Hawting, 95.

980. Baṭaran. Cf. Qur'ān 28, v. 58.

981. Hudimat. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi (loc. cit.) and Ibn Khayyāṭ (loc. cit.) have durisat ("had been effaced").

(al-Walīd) and I implored Him not to let me yield to self-interest in this matter. I summoned to that cause those under my command who answered my call and I strove therein until God, by His own power and might and not through mine, granted His servants and lands surcease from him (al-Walīd).

O people, I give you my pledge that I will not place stone upon stone nor brick upon brick,[982] I will not dig any river, I will not accumulate wealth or give it to any wife or child. (I swear too) that I will not transfer wealth from one town to another until I have made good the loss to that town and [1835] repaired adequately the fortune of its people.[983] If there is any surplus, I will take it[984] to the next town and to those who are in greatest need of it.[985] I will not detain you for long periods at the frontiers, thereby sorely testing you and your families. I will not close my door against you so that the strong amongst you will devour the weak, nor will I place on those of you who pay the poll-tax (burdens) which will drive you from your lands and decimate your progeny.[986] With me in charge you will receive your stipends every year and your rations every month, so much so that there will be an abundance of sustenance for (all) Muslims, be they far distant or near at hand. If I keep my word to you, then it is your duty to heed, to obey, and to provide help generously. But if I do not keep faith with you, it is up to you to depose me, with the proviso that you should (first) ask me to repent and if I do so you should accept such repentance from me. If you know of anyone of proven probity who of his own accord will give you

---

982. These are attacks on the building activities of his predecessor, al-Walīd.

983. Ḥattā asudda . . . khasāsata ahlihi bi-mā yu'nīhum. This is later amended to yughnīhum ("until I have restored the fortune of its people by that which satisfies them"). Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII. The Cairo edition (269) has bi-mā yu'īnuhum ("by that which keeps them").

984. Fa-in faḍala faḍlatun naqaltuhu. The Cairo edition (269) corrects faḍlatun to faḍlun.

985. Naqaltuhu ilā al-baladi yalīhi mimman huwa aḥwaju ilayhi. The version of Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi (loc. cit.) makes better sense: ilā al-baladi alladhi yalīhi waman huwa aḥwaju ilayhi. This is the version adopted in the translation.

986. Literally: "will drive them from their lands and decimate their progeny."

what I would give you, and you want to give the oath of allegiance to him, then I would be the first to give him my allegiance and submit to him.

O people! Obedience to a (created) human being should not involve disobedience to the Creator nor should you keep faith (with a human ruler) by breaking a covenant (with God). Obedience consists solely in obedience to God. So obey him (the caliph), in (your) obedience to God, as long as he (the caliph) obeys (God). But if he (the caliph) disobeys God and summons (you) to disobey God too, then he deserves to be disobeyed and killed. This is what I have to say and may God forgive me and you.

Then Yazīd b. al-Walīd called on the people to renew their oath of allegiance to him. The first person to do so was Yazīd b. Hishām, whose laqab was al-Afqam. Then Qays b. Hāni' al-'Absī gave him the oath of allegiance and declared: "O Commander of the Faithful, fear God and continue to conduct yourself as you are doing now, for no member of your family has behaved as (well as) you have. If people affirm that 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz[987] (did so), (the difference is that) you obtained the caliphate by upright means,[988] whereas 'Umar took it in a wicked way." When Marwān b. Muḥammad heard what Qays had said, he exclaimed: [1836] "What's wrong with him? May God strike dead him who defamed us all and 'Umar as well." (Later) when Marwān became caliph he sent somebody and said: "When you go into the mosque at Damascus, look for Qays b. Hāni'—he has been praying there for a long time—and kill him." So the man went away, entered the Damascus mosque, caught sight of Qays saying his prayers, and killed him.

In this year Yazīd b. al-Walīd dismissed Yūsuf b. 'Umar from the governorship of Iraq and appointed Manṣūr b. Jumhūr to it.

987. Fragmenta, 151, gives an alternative laqab, al-Ashdaq ("having a wide mouth") for Yazīd b. Hishām. The Umayyad 'Umar II, 99–101 (717–20) is traditionally characterized as the only pious caliph of the dynasty and the only legitimate caliph in a line of "kings." Cf. Hawting, 15.

988. The text has bi-ḥablin ṣāliḥin. Fragmenta has bi-sababin ṣāliḥin (loc. cit.).

The Dismissal of Yūsuf b. 'Umar and the Appointment of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr (as Governor of Iraq)

When Yazīd b. al-Walīd had secured for himself the obedience of the Syrians, it was reported that he invited 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Hārūn b. 'Abdallāh b. Daḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī to be governor of Iraq. 'Abd al-'Azīz said to Yazīd: "If I had a jund, I would accept." So Yazīd dropped the idea of choosing him[989] and appointed Manṣūr b. Jumhūr to the post.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī): Al-Walīd b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik was killed on a Wednesday, two nights before the end of Jumādā II, 126 [Wednesday, April 15, 744], and the people gave the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik in Damascus. On the day that al-Walīd b. Yazīd was killed, Mansūr b. Jumhūr, who was the seventh (son) of seven,[990] left al-Bakhrā' for Iraq. When Yūsuf b. 'Umar heard that Manṣūr was coming, he fled.[991] Manṣūr b. Jumhūr arrived in al-Ḥīrah early in Rajab [mid-April, 744].[992] He seized the treasuries and distributed the stipends to those entitled to them and (did [1837] likewise with) the rations. Manṣūr appointed Ḥurayth b. Abī al-Jahm[993] as governor of Wāsiṭ, having gone by night to the previous governor, Muḥammad b. Nubātah,[994] imprisoning him and putting him in fetters. Manṣūr also appointed Jarīr b. Yazīd (b. Yazīd) b. Jarīr[995] as governor of al-Baṣrah. After that, Manṣūr remained there, appointing governors and receiving the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd from the people in the various regions of Iraq. He stayed there for the remainder of Rajab and

---

989. Literally, "left him."

990. Wa-huwa sābi'u sābi'atin. On the significance of the number seven in the Islamic world, cf. F. C. Endres and A. M. Schimmel, Das Mysterium der Zahl, 162–66.

991. Cf. Fragmenta, 151; Ibn Khayyāṭ, 348; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 223.

992. Rajab 126 began on Sunday, April 19, 744.

993. Ḥurayth b. Abī al-Jahm al-Kalbī was from the subtribe of 'Āmir. Cf. Crone, 157.

994. Muḥammad b. Nubātah al-Kilābī. For a biography of his family, cf. Crone, 152.

995. The name appears in the text as Jarīr b. Yazīd b. Yazīd b. Jarīr. This must be a mistake. One Yazīd has therefore been omitted.

during Sha'bān and Ramaḍān [April–mid-July, 744] and left a few days before the end of Ramaḍān.

According to reports other than that of Abū Mikhnaf: Manṣūr b. Jumhūr was a rough Bedouin. He was a supporter of Ghaylān and was not a man of religion. He joined Yazīd's cause only because of his Ghaylānī beliefs and out of zeal to avenge the killing of Khālid. That was also why he was present at the murder of al-Walīd. When Yazīd appointed Manṣūr as governor of Iraq, he said to him: "I have appointed you as governor of Iraq. Go there and fear God! [You should] know that I killed al-Walīd only because of his depravity and tyranny.[996] It is not fitting that you should behave in the manner that caused us to kill al-Walīd."

Then Yazīd b. Ḥajarah al-Ghassānī came in to see Yazīd b. al-Walīd. Yazīd b. Ḥajarah was a pious and virtuous man who was influential amongst the Syrians and who had fought against al-Walīd for religious reasons. He said [to Yazīd b. al-Walīd]: "O Commander of the Faithful, have you appointed Manṣūr as governor of Iraq?" The caliph answered: "Yes, I have done so, because of his achievements and the valuable assistance [he gave me]." Yazīd b. Ḥajarah said: "O Commander of the Faithful, there is no one there like Manṣūr in his rough Bedouin ways and his coarseness in matters of religion." The caliph replied: "If I do not appoint Manṣūr, who has given such valuable assistance [to me], whom should I appoint?" Yazīd b. Ḥajarah said: "You should appoint someone who is God-fearing and upright, who hesitates before [judging] doubtful legal matters,[997] and who is well acquainted with the precepts and punishments [of Islam]. Why is it that I don't see any of the Qays, either in attendance on you or standing at your door?" Yazīd b. al-Walīd replied: "If it were not for the fact that I want nothing to do with bloodshed I would have dealt quickly with the Qays. By God, they are strong only when Islam is weak."

When Yūsuf b. 'Umar received the news that al-Walīd had been killed, he began to seek out those of the Yamāniyyah who were in his entourage and to throw them into prison. Then he began to

996. Literally, "because of what he manifested in the way of tyranny."

997. Wa-al-wuqūfi 'inda al-shubhāti. This translation is only tentative.

speak privately to a succession of men from the Muḍariyyah and [1838] to say to them: "What would you do if a covenant were broken or a compact were dissolved?" Each man would say in reply: "I am a Syrian. I give the oath of allegiance to the person to whom the Syrians give allegiance and I do as they do." Yūsuf did not care for their attitude, so he released those of the Yamāniyyah who were in prison. He sent word to al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abdallāh al-Baṣrī and Manṣūr b. Naṣīr, who were aware of the situation between Yūsuf and the Syrians, and he ordered them to keep him informed by letter of what was going on. Yūsuf also posted lookouts on the road to Syria and remained in al-Ḥīrah, a prey to fear. Manṣūr approached (al-Ḥīrah) and when he was at al-Jum'[998] he wrote the following letter to Sulaymān b. Sulaym b. Kaysān:[999]

> Now for the substance of my letter. Verily, God does not change the condition of a folk until they (first) change that which is in their hearts; and if God wills a misfortune for a folk there is none than can repel it. Truly, al-Walīd b. Yazīd exchanged the blessing of God for unbelief. He shed blood, so God shed his blood and hastened his progress toward the Fire (of hell). God (then) appointed to His caliphate one who was better than al-Walīd, one who follows the right path more closely—Yazīd b. al-Walīd—and the people have already given him the oath of allegiance. Yazīd has appointed al-Ḥārith b. al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd as governor of Iraq. Al-'Abbās has sent me to seize Yūsuf and his agents and he is camped at al-Abyaḍ,[1000] which is a two days' journey behind me. So seize Yūsuf and his agents. Do not let a single one of them escape you and I will imprison them on your behalf. But beware if you oppose (this), for that would bring down upon you and your family a fate that you would be powerless to resist. So make up your mind or leave.

Other reports said that when Manṣūr was at 'Ayn al-Tamr[1001]

---

998. Al-Jum' was a castle in the Petra area, in the Jabal al-Sharāh. Cf. Yāqūt, II, 118; Le Strange, Palestine, 466.

999. The leader of the Syrian troops at al-Ḥīrah. Cf. Wellhausen, 368.

1000. For Qaṣr al-Abyaḍ, cf. Dussaud, 79.

1001. 'Ayn al-Tamr is a small town between Anbār and al-Kūfah eighty miles west of Karbalā'. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (S. A. El-Ali).

he wrote to those Syrian commanders who were in al-Ḥīrah informing them that al-Walīd had been killed and ordering them to seize Yūsuf and his agents. Manṣūr sent all the letters to Sulaymān b. Sulaym b. Kaysān and ordered him to distribute them to the commanders. Sulaymān took them and went in to see Yūsuf. When Sulaymān had read out to Yūsuf the letter from Manṣūr, Yūsuf was at his wit's end (as to what he should do next).[1002]

According to Ḥurayth b. Abī al-Jahm: I was staying in Wāsiṭ [1839] when the letter from Manṣūr b. Jumhūr came to me out of the blue telling me to seize Yūsuf's agents, for it was I who carried out his orders in Wāsiṭ. So I assembled my mawlās and my men and we rode, forming a group of around thirty armed men, as far as the city (of Wāsiṭ).[1003] (At once) the gatekeepers said: "Who are you?" I answered: "I am Ḥurayth b. Abī al-Jahm." Then they replied: "We swear by God that it must be an important matter if it brings Ḥurayth here." When they had opened the gate, we went inside and seized the governor, who submitted to us. The following morning we received the oath of allegiance from the people in the name of Yazīd b. al-Walīd.

According to 'Umar b. Shajarah: When 'Amr b. Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim[1004] was governor of Sind, he seized Muḥammad b. Ghazzān—or 'Izzān—al-Kalbī, and beat him. He then sent him to Yūsuf, who (also) beat him and demanded a large sum of money from him which he was to pay in installments every Friday. (Yūsuf ordered that) if Muḥammad did not do so, he would be given twenty-five lashes. (Eventually) Muḥammad's hand and some of his fingers became shriveled.[1005] When Manṣūr b. Jumhūr became governor of Iraq, he appointed Muḥammad b. Ghazzān as governor of Sind and Sijistān. When Muḥammad arrived in Sijistān he took the oath of allegiance on behalf of Yazīd (from the people there). Then he advanced to Sind, where he seized 'Amr b. Muḥammad, trussed him up in fetters, and ap-

---

1002. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 223.

1003. Presumably this story only makes sense if Ḥurayth was outside the city of Wāsiṭ when he received Manṣūr's letter.

1004. 'Amr b. Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim had been appointed governor of Sind by Yūsuf b. 'Umar in 122 (739–40). Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 369.

1005. The clear inference is that Muḥammad did not keep up with the payments.

pointed guards to keep watch over him. After that, as Muḥammad was rising to perform the prayer, 'Amr seized a sword from the guards and fell on it when it was drawn so that it went right into his belly. People began shouting and Ibn Ghazzān came out and said: "What made you do what you have done?" 'Amr replied: "I was afraid of being tortured." Ibn Ghazzān said: "I was not going to go to the extremes to which you have gone yourself." 'Amr survived for three days and then he died. Ibn Ghazzān received the oath of allegiance on behalf of Yazīd (from the people there).

When Sulaymān b. Sulaym b. Kaysān al-Kalbī had read the letter of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr to Yūsuf b. 'Umar, Yūsuf said to him: "What do you think I should do?" Sulaymān replied: "You do not have an imām on whose side you can fight. The Syrians will not fight beside you against al-Ḥārith b. al-'Abbās and I do not think [1840] you are safe from Manṣūr b. Jumhūr if he takes the field against you. Your only sensible course of action is to return to your own country, Syria." Yūsuf said: "That is my view too, but how can I manage it?" Sulaymān said: "Make a public profession of obedience to Yazīd and pray for him in your sermon. Then when Manṣūr comes, I will send you off with people I can trust." When Manṣūr had camped in a place from which his men could reach the town the following morning, Yūsuf made his way to the house of Sulaymān b. Sulaym, where he remained for three days. Then Sulaymān sent men with Yūsuf to accompany him on the road to al-Samāwah until he reached al-Balqā'.[1006]

It is said that Sulaymān advised (Yūsuf): "You should hide and leave Manṣūr to take over the job."[1007] Yūsuf replied: "With whom (can I hide)?" Sulaymān said: "With me. I will put you in a safe place." Then Sulaymān went to 'Amr b. Muḥammad b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, told him what the situation was, and asked him to grant asylum to Yūsuf. Sulaymān said to 'Amr: "You are a man of the Quraysh and your maternal uncles are from the Bakr b. Wā'il." So 'Amr gave Yūsuf a place to hide.

'Amr said: "I have never seen a man so overweeningly proud 1006. Al-Balqā' is one of the districts of the province of Damascus. Its major town was 'Ammān. Cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 34–35. For more details of its limits, cf. *EI*², s.v. (J. Sourdel-Thomine).

1007. Literally, "leave Manṣur and the governorship/job."

and yet so thoroughly scared as he was. I brought him a valuable slave girl and I said (to myself:) "She will warm him up and calm him down." But, by God, he did not go near her nor did he even look at her. Then one day he sent for me and I went in to see him. He said to me: "You have done very well and you have behaved admirably. But I still need one thing." I said to him: "Tell me what it is." Yūsuf said: "Get me out of al-Kūfah and back to Syria." I said I would do so. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr reached us the next morning. He referred to al-Walīd and fulminated against him; he mentioned Yazīd b. al-Walīd and praised him;[1008] he touched on Yūsuf and his tyranny. Then the preachers stood up and poured censure on al-Walīd and Yūsuf. I went to Yūsuf and I told him what these people had been saying. Whenever I mentioned one of the people who had spoken disparagingly of him he would interrupt: "It is my duty to God to give him one hundred lashes—or two or three hundred." I was amazed that he still wanted to be governor and that he was still threatening people. Sulaymān b. Sulaym left Yūsuf (for a while) and then he sent him to Syria, where he hid, before moving to al-Balqā'.[1009]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): Yūsuf b. 'Umar sent a man from the Banū Kilāb with five hundred men and he [1841] said to them: "If Yazīd b. al-Walīd comes your way, do not on any account allow him to pass." Then Manṣūr b. Jumhūr approached them with thirty men and they did not engage him in battle. He relieved them of their weapons and made them accompany him to al-Kūfah. The only people who left al-Kūfah with Yūsuf b. 'Umar were Sufyān b. Salāmah b. Sulaym b. Kaysān, Ghassān b. Qi'ās al-'Udhrī, and some sixty of Yūsuf's own children, both male and female. Manṣūr entered al-Kūfah early in Rajab,[1010] took possession of the treasuries, distributed the stipends and rations, and released those agents and tax officials who were in Yūsuf's prisons. It was when Yūsuf reached al-Balqā' that Yazīd b. al-Walīd received word of his activities.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm b.

1008. The text has fa-qarraḍahu. This is emended by the Cairo edition (273) to fa-qarrazahu ("he eulogized him"). Both versions are acceptable.

1009. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 224.

1010. Rajab 126 began on April 19, 744.

Yazīd b. Huraym—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ, the mawlā of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān—Muḥammad b. Sa'īd al-Kalbī, who was one of the commanders of Yazīd b. al-Walīd: When Yazīd received word that Yūsuf was with his family at al-Balqā', he sent Muḥammad b. Sa'īd to search for Yūsuf b. 'Umar. [Muḥammad's narrative continues:] So I set off with fifty or more horsemen and surrounded Yūsuf's house at al-Balqā'. We carried out a thorough search (of the house) but we could not find anything, (for) Yūsuf had put on women's clothes and was sitting with his wives and daughters. Then Muḥammad searched among the women and found him in their midst. He brought Yūsuf out in fetters and threw him into prison with the two young sons of al-Walīd. Yūsuf remained in prison for the whole period of Yazīd's caliphate and for two months and ten days of Ibrāhīm's rule. Then, when Marwān came to Syria and approached Damascus, he gave Yazīd[1011] b. Khālid the task of killing them. So Yazīd dispatched a mawlā of Khālid's, whose patronymic was Abū al-Asad, [1842] with a number of other henchmen of his.[1012] Abū al-Asad went into the prison and battered in the heads of the two young boys with clubs and then he brought out Yūsuf b. 'Umar and executed him.

Other reports said that when Yazīd b. al-Walīd heard that Yūsuf had reached al-Balqā', he sent out fifty horsemen. Thereupon a man from the Banū Numayr[1013] came to Yūsuf and said: "By God, cousin, you are a dead man. So do as I say and put up a fight. Leave it to me and I will snatch you out of the clutches of these men." Yūsuf said: "No." So the Numayrī said: "Let me kill you then, and don't let these Yamāniyyah kill you and thus arouse our intense wrath at your murder." Yūsuf replied: "I don't have the option of either of the suggestions you have made to me." The man said: "You know best." Then they brought Yūsuf to Yazīd, who said: "What has brought you here?" Yūsuf said: "Manṣūr b. Jumhūr came to take over as governor, so I left him and the job." Yazīd replied: "No! It was you that hated (the idea of) governing 1011. Yazīd was the most suitable person to avenge the death of his father by killing Yūsuf.

1012. Ibn al-Athīr suppresses the details of the way in which the two sons of al-Walīd and Yūsuf met their end (V, 224).

1013. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 450.

for me," and he then ordered that Yūsuf should be thrown into prison.

Other reports said that Yazīd summoned Muslim b. Dhakwān and Muḥammad b. Sa'īd b. Muṭarrif al-Kalbī, and he said to them: "Word has come to me that the libertine Yūsuf b. 'Umar has reached al-Balqā'. Go and bring him to me." So they searched for him but they could not find him. Then they frightened a son of Yūsuf's into saying: "I will show you where he is," and he told them that Yūsuf had gone to an estate of his, thirty *mīl*s away. The two men took with them fifty men from the jund at al-Balqā' and they found Yūsuf sitting there. When he realized that they had found him, he ran away, leaving his sandals behind. The two men searched for him and they found him with some women who had thrown a silk drape over him and were sitting on the hem of it, with their heads bared. The men dragged him away by his foot while Yūsuf started imploring Muḥammad b. Sa'īd to use his good offices with the Kalb and (in return) he would pay (him) ten thousand dīnārs and the blood-money of both Kulthūm b. 'Umayr and Hāni' b. Bishr. When Muslim and Muḥammad came to see Yazīd (with Yūsuf), an agent of Sulaymān's, who was taking his turn at guard duty, came up to Yūsuf. He grabbed Yūsuf's beard, tugged at it, and pulled some of it out; Yūsuf's stature was of the shortest, just as his beard was of the longest.[1014] Then Muslim and Muḥammad took Yūsuf in to see Yazīd, whereupon Yūsuf grabbed hold of his own beard, which at that time reached below [1843] his navel, and said: "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, he has pulled out my beard and he has not left me a single hair of it." Then Yazīd gave orders concerning Yūsuf and he was imprisoned in the Green Palace. (Later) Muḥammad b. Rashīd went in to see Yūsuf and he asked him: "Are you not afraid that one of the people whom you have wronged will bear down on you and throw stones at you?" Yūsuf replied: "No, by God, I hadn't thought of that. I beseech you, by God, to speak to the Commander of the Faithful about moving me to a different place from this, even if it is more cramped than this one." Muḥammad b. Rashīd said: "I told Yazīd (what Yūsuf had said) and Yazīd replied: "This is just one sign of Yūsuf's foolishness. I imprisoned Yūsuf only in order to send him to Iraq, so that he should be presented to the people and so that the injustices that he has perpetrated should be put right by his own money and by his own blood."

1014. Literally, "he was one of the largest of men as regards beard and one of the shortest as regards stature." Cf. the marked hostility shown toward Yūsuf by Wellhausen, who calls him in the same paragraph both a goblin and a toad (op. cit., 368).

When Yazīd b. al-Walīd had killed al-Walīd b. Yazīd and sent Manṣūr b. Jumhūr to Iraq, Yazīd b. al-Walīd wrote a letter to the people of Iraq in which he outlined the evil deeds of al-Walīd. According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): Some of the contents of the letter were as follows:[1015]

> God has chosen Islam as a religion; He has looked with favor upon it and has purified it. He has prescribed laws in it whereby He has laid down (what good men should do) and prohibited (men) from committing those acts that He has forbidden, so as to test the obedience or disobedience of His servants. In Islam, God has perfected every embodiment of good and the greatest of His bountiful gifts. Moreover, He took on the responsibility for it, preserving it and keeping charge of those of its people who observe its ordinances, protecting them and making known to them the excellence of Islam. Whenever God gives the blessing of the caliphate to anyone who submits to the divine command and acts according to it, and then somebody else competes with God's caliph through the medium of a covenant, or tries to give away what God has bestowed on him (the caliph) or breaks a compact, that person's perfidy is always brought to naught and his machinations are foiled[1016] until such time as God has 1015. This letter has recently been translated by Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, 126–28. They draw attention to the version of the letter found in al-Balādhurī, Ansāb (MS.), fols. 170a–b, where the date of the letter is given as 28 Rajab 126/May 15, 744 and the scribe is named as Thābit b. Sulaymān b. Sa'īd (i.e., Sa'd). Crone and Hinds follow the text of al-Ṭabarī and point out only the significant variants found in al-Balādhurī's version.

---

1016. Literally, "God does not give the blessing of the caliphate to anyone who accepts the command of God and comes to Him, then someone (else) competes with him (the caliph) with a covenant or tries to give away what God has bestowed on him (the caliph) or a violator violates (a compact) except that that person's perfidy is most feeble and his deceit is most worthless." In 1.17, the reading aw bi-ḥulūli ṣarfi has been changed to aw yuḥāwilu ṣarfa mā, following the Cairo edition (VII, 275). This is based on a variant in the apparatus.

finished giving His gifts to the caliph, and bestowed on him His reward and the recompense which He has kept in store for him, whilst He makes his enemy lose his way totally and frustrates all his efforts.

The caliphs of God succeeded each other as guardians of His religion, passing judgement therein by His ordinance and following therein His book. Because of that they had an abundance of blessings (heaped) upon them as a result of God's friendship and His assistance;[1017] and God was pleased with His caliphs in that office[1018] until the time when Hishām died. Then the command passed to the enemy of God, al-Walīd, the violator of sacred things such as no Muslim would ever approach and toward which (even) an infidel would not venture, but rather avoid going near their like.[1019] When (the news of) that behavior of his spread abroad and became publicly known, when the affliction he caused worsened, blood was shed because of him, possessions were unlawfully seized, and acts of profligacy were committed which God will condone only for a little while in those who commit them, I went to al-Walīd, expecting that he would return (to the right path), whilst excusing myself in the sight of God and the Muslims,[1020] repudiating al-Walīd's activities and the flagrant way in which he had disobeyed God, and seeking from God the fulfillment of what I purposed; namely,[1021] to restore the pillars of religion and to adopt for His people that which is pleasing to Him. [1844]

1017. Literally, "because of that, they had from His friendship and help that which completed the blessings upon them."

1018. Al-amru. Crone and Hinds have "office" (loc. cit.).

1019. Tukarruman 'an. This presumably applies to both the Muslim and non-Muslim.

1020. Sirtu ilayhi ma'a intiẓāri murāja'atihi wa i'dhārin ilā Allāhi wa-ilā al-Muslimīna munkiran li-'amalihi. . . Crone and Hinds have: "I went to him with the expectation that he would mend his ways and apologize to God and to the Muslims, disavowing his behavior. . . ." (loc. cit.). An alternative translation could read: "I went to him with the expectation that he would return (to the right path) and excusing myself to God and the Muslims, rejecting his activities." The interpretation here is based on the premise that Yazīd, not al-Walīd, is apologizing to God and the Muslims and that he (Yazīd) is dissociating himself with al-Walīd's profligate activities.

1021. Literally, "the fulfillment of that which I purposed consisting of the restoring. . . ."

Then I came across a jund whose breasts seethed with wrath at the enemy of God because of the way they had seen him behaving—for truly, whenever the enemy of God encountered one of the ordinances of Islām he wanted to change it and to act in respect of it in a manner that was contrary to God's revelation. (All) that (conduct) on his part was known to all and comprehensive in scope;[1022] it was in full view (of everyone), for God had drawn no veil over it, nor was anybody in any doubt about it. Then I mentioned to the jund what I abominated and feared, which was the corruption of both religion and worldly affairs. So I roused them to restore and defend their religion. They vacillated in this, fearing that they would only be saving themselves by the action they would be taking. Then I summoned them to put the matter right and they hastened to answer my call. God sent a group of them, men who were pious and pleasing (to Him), to inform the rest[1023] and I sent 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik to be in charge of them. He met the enemy of God near a village called al-Bakhrā'. They called upon al-Walīd to agree that the matter should be referred to a shūrā in which the Muslims should decide for themselves whom they would agree to appoint to rule (over them). The enemy of God would not agree to that and opted only to sink deeper into error. He was the first to launch an attack on them in ignorance of [1845] God, but he found God a mighty judge and His grip agonizingly painful. God killed al-Walīd because of his evildoing and He killed a group of his followers—they did not number as many as ten—who were companions of his and 1022. Shāmilan. Crone and Hinds have "generally" (loc. cit.).

---

1023. The text has fa-ibta'atha Allāhu minhum ba'than yukhbiruhum man/min awlā al-dīni wa-al-riḍā. This is very unsatisfactory. It is possible to render it as "God sent a group of them to inform them (the others), those (man) possessed of religion and what is pleasing to God," with man awlā al-dīni wa-al-riḍā in apposition to ba'than. This is certainly the inference of the punctuation of the Cairo edition (VII, 276). Alternatively, if min is read instead of man, a possible translation would be: "God sent a group of them to inform them (the others), (a group) consisting of those possessed of religion and what is pleasing." Crone and Hinds emend yukhbiruhum to bi-khayrihim, which makes good sense (loc. cit.). Their translation thus reads: "God sent a deputation made up of the best of those possessed of religion and what is pleasing."

came from the depraved inner circle of his intimates. The remainder of al-Walīd's associates agreed to follow the right path to which they had been summoned. Thus God extinguished his fire and granted His servants relief from him. A curse on him and those who follow in his way!

I wanted to tell you (all) this and to notify you quickly about it so that you might give praise and thanks to God, for you have today reached the best possible situation for yourself (in view of the fact that) your governors are the best people from amongst you and justice has opened wide its arms to you and you will not be ruled in any other way than this. On that account, therefore, praise your Lord all the more and follow[1024] Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, for I have selected him for you on the basis that God's covenant and compact and the culmination of what has been promised and laid down for any of His creatures are binding upon you. So heed and obey me and those whom I shall appoint to succeed me and on whom the community has agreed. I have a similar duty toward you. I shall certainly deal with you according to the ordinance of God and the sunnah of His prophet, and I shall follow in the path of the best of your predecessors. We ask God, our Lord and our Guardian, to favor us most generously with His assistance and the best of His decree.

In this year Naṣr b. Sayyār refused to give up his post to the agent of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr after Yazīd b. al-Walīd had appointed Manṣūr to govern Khurāsān together with Iraq. According to Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabarī himself: I have already given some account of Naṣr. (I mentioned) what happened about the letter of Yūsuf b. 'Umar to Naṣr in which he instructed Naṣr to bring him the tribute for al-Walīd b. Yazīd and to go in person from Khurāsān to Iraq; and (I mentioned) how Naṣr traveled slowly and how he then received the news of al-Walīd's murder.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—al-Bāhilī: Bishr b. Nāfi', the mawlā of Sālim al-Laythī who was in charge of coinage in Iraq, came to Naṣr. Bishr said: "When Manṣūr b. Jumhūr [1846] came as amīr of Iraq, Yūsuf b. 'Umar fled. Manṣūr sent his brother Manẓūr b. Jumhūr[1025] as governor of al-Rayy[1026] and I accompanied him there. Then I said (to myself): "I will go to Naṣr and tell him (what is going on)." When I reached Nīshāpūr,[1027] Ḥumayd, Naṣr's mawlā, threw me into prison and said: "You will not get out of here until you tell me (why you are here)." So I told him and I made him swear by God's oath and covenant that he would not tell anyone until I had reached Naṣr and informed him, so Ḥumayd did that. Then we all went to Naṣr, who was in his citadel in Mājān. We asked permission to go in and see him, but a eunuch of his said that Naṣr was asleep. We pressed him further and he went off and told Naṣr. Naṣr came out and grabbed my hand and took me inside. He did not say anything to me until we were inside the room. Then he asked me (why I had come) and I told him. Naṣr said to Ḥumayd, his mawlā: "Take him away and give him a present." Then Yūnus b. 'Abd Rabbihi[1028] and 'Ubaydallāh b. Bassām came to me and I told them (the news). Salm b. Aḥwaz (also) came to me and I told him.

1024. The text has tābi'ū. Crone and Hinds follow al-Balādhurī, who has bayi'ū (loc. cit.).

(Bishr's narrative continues.) Al-Walīd b. Yūsuf was with Naṣr. When Naṣr heard the news, Naṣr kept al-Walīd with him. Al-Walīd sent people to me and when I had told them the news[1029] they called me a liar. So I said (to Naṣr): "You should get these men to confirm (what they say)." After three days had passed

---

1025. Manẓūr b. Jumhūr was later murdered in India by Rifā'ah b. Thābit al-Judhāmī. Rifā'ah was seized by Manṣūr b. Jumhūr and walled up alive in a pillar. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1895; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 407; Crone, 159.

1026. Al-Rayy was an important city of the province of Jibāl, which stood near the site of modern Tehran. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 214–17; al-Ya'qūbī, Les Pays, 79–80; Schwarz, 446–48, 740–83.

1027. Nīshāpūr was one of the four great cities of Khurāsān. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 382–88; Barthold, Historical Geography, 95–102.

1028. For a discussion of Naṣr's relationship with Yūnus b. 'Abd Rabbihi, another of his mawlās, cf. Crone, 53.

1029. This is rather an obscure narrative, which seems to be in no other source. A literal translation would be: "he made him stay (aqarrahu) when the news reached him; then he sent (people) to me, and when I told them, they called me a liar, so I said: 'Seek confirmation (istawthiq) from these people.'" A possible sequence of events here is that Naṣr kept Yūsuf's son with him. Al-Walīd b. Yūsuf sent some of his associates to Bishr. They tried to refute the news that Bishr told them—namely that al-Walīd was dead and Yūsuf b. 'Umar had fled. Bishr then told Naṣr to make the others confirm the truth of what they had said. The emended version of this passage in the Cairo edition (VII, 277) is of no use.

Naṣr posted eighty men to guard me. The news was slower to arrive than I had expected. Then on the ninth night, which was the night of Nawrūz,[1030] the news reached them, confirming what I had already told them. Naṣr publicly sent me most of the tribute (intended for al-Walīd)[1031] and he ordered that I should be given a horse with its saddle and bridle. He (also) gave me a Chinese saddle and he said to me: "Stay on so that I can give you a full hundred thousand (dirhams)."

When Naṣr was sure that al-Walīd had been killed, he gave back that tribute (intended for al-Walīd), freed the slaves, divided up the pick of the slave girls amongst his sons and his close associates, distributed those vases amongst the common people,[1032] and sent out governors, ordering them to act honorably. (Bishr's narrative continues.) The Banū Azd in Khurāsān caused turmoil by spreading false rumors[1033] that Manẓūr b. Jumhūr was coming [1847] there. Then Naṣr preached a sermon in which he said: "If a suspect amīr comes to us, we will cut off his hands and his feet." After that, Naṣr revealed the man's name, calling him 'Abdallāh, the deserted one, the mutilated one.[1034]

Naṣr appointed (governors) over the Banū Rabī'ah and the Yamāniyyah. Naṣr made Ya'qūb b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn governor of upper Ṭukhāristān and appointed Mas'adah b. 'Abdallāh al-Yashkirī to rule over Khwārazm.[1035] Khalaf recited the following verses about Mas'adah:[1036]

When I am close to Kardar I say to my companions, 1030. Nawrūz is the first day of the Persian solar year, which now occurs at the vernal equinox. It was also in earlier times deemed to be at the midsummer solstice. For a discussion of the history of the dating of Nawrūz, cf. EI[1], s.v. (R. Levy).

1031. Al-hadāyā. Cf. n. 574.

1032. Ibid.

1033. Wa-arjafat al-Azdu. Arjafa, "to cause agitation in others by spreading false rumors." Cf. Lane, I, 1042.

1034. Thumma bāḥa bihi ba'du fa-kāna yaqūlu 'Abda Allāhi al-makhdhūla al-mabtūra ("then he revealed it after that and he would say 'Abdallāh, the deserted one, the mutilated one"). These imprecations were no doubt intended as a warning to anyone who wanted to take Khurāsān from Naṣr. The Cairo edition (VII, 278) has al-mathbūr ("overcome") for al-mabtūr.

1035. Khwārazm was the province lying along the lower course of the Oxus. Cf. EI[2], s.v. (C. E. Bosworth).

1036. The meter is ṭawīl.

"Truly Mas'adah al-Bakrī is the reviving rain supplicated by widows."

Then Naṣr appointed Abān b. al-Ḥakam al-Zahrānī (in place of Mas'adah) and he appointed al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah al-Jahḍamī as governor of Quhistān.[1037] Naṣr ordered his governors to behave uprightly. He summoned the people to give the oath of allegiance, which they did. In this connection a poet recited (the following lines):[1038]

I declare to Naṣr, having pledged allegiance to him against most of the (Banū) Bakr and their allies, My hand is surety for you against the Bakr of Iraq, against their leader and the son of the most distinguished one amongst them.
I (You)[1039] have given assurance to the Muslims, to the people of the (Muslim) lands near and far (That) whenever we exceed[1040] your desire,
Swift, light-footed camels will make their way to you.
You have called upon the troops to give allegiance (to you), and you were absolutely in the right to do so.[1041]
You have safeguarded Khurāsān for the Muslims when the earth was about to convulse.
And when the Muslims were restored to mutual harmony, you lavished money on those who composed their differences.
You have granted[1042] protection and security to the people of the towns and to those settled on their borders;

1037. A number of areas were called Quhistān ("the mountain country"). The district meant here is Quhistān-i Khurāsān, the mountainous region that stretches south from Nīshāpūr to Sīstān. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 352–63; *EI*², s.v. (J. H. Kramers).

1038. The meter is mutaqārib.

1039. The text has akhadhtu. It would make better sense if it is read as akhadhta.

1040. The text has idhā lā tujību ilā mā turīdu. This is later emended to idhā mā nuzīdu. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII.

1041. This hemistich seems to be in the wrong place. An alternative translation might be "and you treated all of them with absolute justice."

1042. This line seems also to be in the wrong place and it is difficult to determine the subject of ajāra.

And to the soldiers in both east and west you have become a milch-camel, its udders overflowing with milk for them.
We will remain in that situation[1043] [1848] until the paths to be followed become clear to the pathfinders,
And until the Quraysh have revealed that which is hidden in the depths of their hearts.
I have sworn that it is better for the grazing-camels who make journeys to be stripped of their wool,[1044]
And added to what is paid by those of the Quraysh who live in the valleys,[1045]
first those of noble birth and then the base-born.[1046]
If he who becomes powerful robs the weak, we will beat their horses on their manes.
We have found fodder, no matter what its source, which the horses feed on once it has been heated up for them.
As long as they have a share in it, their flanks will become heavy (with fat), when formerly they were lean.
We continue as before to maintain our support for the Quraysh, and we are content with their allies;
We shall be satisfied to have your power as a place of refuge for them,
for your power is their bulwark.
Perhaps the Quraysh, when they vie amongst themselves, will hit some[1047] of their targets,
And they will overwhelm the plotters in Iraq who have up-ended the bucket from the east by its hooks.

1043. This line also does not fit here. The meaning seems to be "we will remain loyal to you."

1044. The text has li'l-ghazwi. This is emended by the editor to lal'urwu. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII. The Cairo edition (VII, 279) follows this correction.

1045. Literally, "the Quraysh of the valleys."

1046. Literally, "their low-ranking men after their high-born ones."

1047. The text has a lacuna here: tuqarṭisu . . . fī ahdāfihā. The Cairo edition (VII, 279) has tuqarṭisu fī ba'ḍi ahdāfihā.

Indeed, we are like lions,[1048] and lions are endowed with manes above their shoulders.
If they scatter in fright, fearing destruction, (they will find that) the vicissitudes of time are yet closer to them (in destruction).
For your sake we have remained steadfast (in battle)[1049] when their ranks crumbled and collapsed.[1050]
We have found you to be benevolent and kind to us, showing us the tender loving kindness of a mother.
Our allegiance to you was not a passing whim to be rescinded at the earliest opportunity,
Like a young girl who rushed to meet her (intended) husband, before her fingers had been dyed
And who was unveiled by the bridegroom before the marriage contract had been drawn up, and who therefore encountered him with aversion.

[1849] Naṣr had appointed 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī as governor of Khwārazm. 'Abd al-Malik used to preach to the people there and in his sermon he would say: "I am neither a rough Bedouin nor a Fazārī[1051] who follows the ways of the Nabateans.[1052] Circumstances have favored me and I have taken full advantage of them. Verily, by God, I shall certainly use the sword where appropriate and the whip where appropriate, and I shall throw open the prison (to be used). You will assuredly find me extremely harsh in crushing any dissension. Either you will go undeviatingly along the same road as me, galloping like a young camel on the widest of paths, or I shall certainly strike you in the way a lynx-eyed man strikes water birds,[1053] striking them first on one side and then on the other."

1048. The translation is only tentative. The Cairo edition (loc. cit.) has wa-bi-al-usdi minnā ("and with lions of ours").

1049. Literally, "by you our feet have remained firm."

1050. Literally, "when their banks collapse."

1051. For the Banū Fazārah, a North Arabian tribe, cf. EI[2], s.v. (W. M. Watt).

1052. For the pre-Islamic Aramaic-speaking Arab people, the Nabataeans (al-Anbāṭ), cf. EI[1], s.v. (E. Honigmann). During the Islamic period the term Nabataean in the mouth of Arabs was one of abuse. Cf. the long discussion in Goldziher, I, 145.

1053. Al-qāriba "water birds." Cf. Gloss., p. CDXIX.

(One day) a man of the Balqayn turned up in Khurāsān at the behest of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr. A mawlā of Naṣr's called Ḥumayd, who was in charge of coinage[1054] in Nīshāpūr, seized him, beat him, and broke his nose. The man complained to Naṣr, who ordered twenty thousand (dirhams) to be given to him and presented him with a set of clothes. Naṣr said: "The person who broke your nose is a mawlā of mine. He is not a social equal, so that I may take retaliation from him on your behalf. So don't complain any more."[1055] Then 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī said: "Brother from the Balqayn, broadcast what manner of man it is that you have come to see. We have lined up the Qays for the Rabī'ah, and the Tamīm for the Azd. Only the Kinānah do not have anyone to equal them!" Naṣr retorted: "Whenever I have put a matter right you ruin it."

According to Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah—Aḥmad b. Mu'āwiyah—Abū al-Khaṭṭāb: Qudāmah b. Muṣ'ab al-'Abdī and a man from the Banū Kindah came to Naṣr b. Sayyār on behalf of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr. Naṣr said: "Is the Commander of the Faithful (really) dead?" They said: "Yes." Then Naṣr asked: "And Manṣūr b. Jumhūr has been made governor of Iraq and Yūsuf b. 'Umar has relinquished control of Iraq?"[1056] The two men confirmed that this was so. Then Naṣr said: "We have no faith in what you lot have said."[1057] Thereupon Naṣr imprisoned both the men but he allowed them ample living space. Naṣr (then) dispatched a man who, when he got to al-Kūfah, saw Manṣūr preaching. Then Naṣr released the two men and said to Qudāmah: "Has a man from the Banū Kalb been appointed as governor over you?" Qudāmah replied: "Yes. We are only from the Qays and the Yamāniyyah." So Naṣr said: "Why isn't one of you appointed as governor (of Iraq)?" Qudāmah said: "Because it is with us as the poet said: [1850]

If ever we fear any tyranny from a ruler, we call on Abū Ghassān and he comes to the rescue with his troops.

1054. Sikak. This is rather ambiguous, since it can mean either the engraved pieces of metal used for stamping coins or streets.

1055. Literally, "so do not say anything but good."

1056. Literally, "has fled from the throne of Iraq."

1057. Innanā bi-jumhūrikum min al-kāfirīna.

Naṣr laughed and attached Qudāmah to his retinue.

When Manṣūr b. Jumhūr reached Iraq, he either appointed 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās as governor of al-Kūfah, or he found him already ensconced as governor there and confirmed him in the post.[1058] Manṣūr put Thumāmah b. Ḥawshab in charge of his shurṭah. Later on he dismissed him and appointed al-Ḥajjāj b. Arṭāh al-Nakha'ī.[1059]

In this year Marwān b. Muḥammad wrote to al-Ghamr b. Yazīd, the brother of al-Walīd b. Yazīd, ordering him to avenge the blood of his brother al-Walīd.

The Text of Marwān's Letter to al-Ghamr

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī): Marwān wrote to al-Ghamr b. Yazīd as follows:

> Now to the point. Truly this caliphate is from God and follows the paths laid down by the prophethood[1060] of His messengers and the establishment of the precepts of His religion. God has blessed the caliphs by that with which He has invested them, honoring them (thereby) and honoring those who honor them. May destruction fall on anyone who vies with His caliphs and who seeks to follow a path different from theirs! The caliphs have continued to be trustees of what God has set apart for them in the caliphate, with one after another of them appearing[1061] to conduct its affairs justly, with the help of those Muslims who support it.
>
> Of (all) God's creatures, the Syrians were the most obedient to Him, the most zealous to defend His sacred ordinances, the most faithful in keeping His covenant,[1062] and the most severe in destroying anyone who deviated from, opposed, obliterated, and strayed from the truth. God's bounty flowed copiously upon them, Islam flourished through them, and 1058. On 'Ubaydallāh cf. Crone, 152.

---

1059. Cf. his biography in Crone, 157. He later became the kātib to the 'Abbāsid caliph, al-Manṣūr. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, III, 276, 322.

1060. Literally, "on the basis of the paths of prophethood."

1061. Literally, "one riser after (another) riser performs."

1062. The text has "a covenant."

polytheism and its followers were brought low by them. But (recently) they have violated God's command and tried to violate His covenants. For that reason there came forward someone to fan the flames (of fitnah),[1063] even though men's hearts had turned away from him.[1064] Those who (now) seek [1851]
(vengeance for) the blood of the caliph[1065] are the (true) leaders of the Banū Umayyah, for his (al-Walīd's) blood will not have been shed in vain, even though discord has been stilled by them (the rebels) and public affairs have been restored to good order.[1066] For there is no opposing what God has willed.

You have written (telling me) about your situation and your opinion on what they have done. I will remain silent until I think the moment is right for a rebellion,[1067] and then I will attack in vengeance, and I will avenge God's religion which has been persecuted and His precepts which have been abandoned as if they were of no value.[1068] I have a group of men whose hearts God has made obedient to me; they are people who are daring enough for what I have in mind for them to do. There are (also) other people like them, whose hearts are full to overflowing and look only to find an opportunity (for revenge). Retribution has its auspicious moment and appointed time from God.[1069] I would not be worthy of 1063. Man ash'ala ḍirāmaha. The reference is presumably to fitnah ("discord"), which, however, has not been explicitly mentioned, and to Yazīd's rebellion.

---

1064. Wa-in kānat al-qulūbu 'anhu nāfiratun ("although hearts had turned away from him"). This is rather obscure. It is more probable that the people would have turned away from al-Walīd, whose behavior had alienated them, than from Yazīd, who stepped forward to oppose him. However, it may simply mean that Yazīd was not in the public eye until he rebelled. Alternatively, 'anhu could refer to God.

1065. I.e., al-Walīd.

1066. Another possible translation of this might be: "Those demanding the blood of the caliph (i.e., al-Walīd's murderers) are the leaders of the Banū Umayyah. But [instead of 'for' (fa-inna)] his blood will not have been shed in vain, even though discord has been stilled by them and public affairs have been restored to good order."

1067. Ghiyaran. Cf. Gloss., p. CCCXCIV.

1068. The text has antaqimu li-dīni Allāhi al-matbūlī wa-farā'iḍihi al-matrūkati majjānatan. The Cairo edition (VII, 281) has "I am exacting vengeance for God's religion, whose precepts have been cast aside (al-manbūthati), and which has been abandoned as valueless (majjānatan)." Majjān is not usually feminine.

1069. Literally, "vengeance has its turning which comes from God and an appointed time."

the name[1070] of Muḥammad or Marwān if, when I saw a rebellion, I did not exert myself to the utmost against the Qadariyyah and if I did not strike them with my sword, wounding and stabbing them, with God's decree ordaining what He wills therein and visiting His punishment on those whom He chooses to punish.[1071] I am remaining silent only because of what I am expecting to come from you, so do not be too feeble to exact blood vengeance for your brother, for truly God is your protection and your sufficiency and God's will and help are sufficient.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Amr b. Marwān al-Kalbī—Muslim b. Dhakwān: Yazīd b. al-Walīd spoke to al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd about Ṭufayl b. Ḥārithah al-Kalbī, saying that Ṭufayl had incurred a bloodwit and had asked al-'Abbās if he would write to Marwān b. Muḥammad interceding for Ṭufayl with him, so that Marwān would allow Ṭufayl to ask his kinsfolk for it. (It so happened that) Marwān b. Muḥammad used to prevent people from drawing from the stipend fund for that purpose.[1072] Now al-'Abbās agreed to do as Yazīd asked and he deposited the letter with the postal service. The letter of al-'Abbās with its full contents reached the most far-flung areas (of the empire). Then Yazīd (also) wrote to Marwān, saying that he had made a transaction to buy[1073] an estate for eighteen thousand dīnārs from Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Walīd and that he needed (an extra) four thousand dīnārs.

[1852] According to Muslim b. Dhakwān: Yazīd called me and said: "Go with Ṭufayl taking these letters with you and discuss this matter with him." So we went off, without al-'Abbās knowing that I had gone, and when we reached Khilāṭ[1074] we met 'Amr b.

1070. Literally, "I would not resemble Muḥammad or Marwān." Muḥammad was his father and Marwān his grandfather.

1071. Here, the Cairo edition (VII, 282) adds bī after qaḍā'u Allāhi and bihim after yarmī: "whatever God's decree ordains therein for me or whatever punishment He inflicts on those whom He chooses to punish."

1072. Literally, "prevent people from asking for any of that with the stipend."

1073. Ishtarā. Presumably the transaction had not yet been completed, as Yazīd needed four thousand more dīnārs.

1074. Khilāṭ (Akhlāṭ) is a town at the northwestern corner of Lake Van (in modern Turkey). Cf. *EI*², "Akhlāṭ" (V. Minorsky).

Ḥārithah al-Kalbī. He asked us how we were and we told him, whereupon he said: "You are lying! There is something going on between you two and Marwān." We said: "What could that be?" Then when I wanted to leave, 'Amr took me aside and said to me: "Do the people of al-Mizzah number one thousand?" I said: "More (than that)." Then 'Amr said: "How far is it between al-Mizzah and Damascus?" I replied: "Within hailing distance." He then inquired: "At what do you estimate the numbers of the Banū 'Āmir to be" (meaning the Banū 'Āmir of Kalb)? I said: "Twenty thousand men." Then 'Amr moved his finger (to indicate that I should leave) and turned his face away.

(Muslim's narrative continues:) When I heard that, I wanted (to see) Marwān, and I wrote him the following letter purporting to come from Yazīd: "Now to the point of my letter. I have sent Ibn Dhakwān, my mawlā, to you, on a matter that he will mention to you and put before you. So say what you like to him, for he is one of the best of my associates and the most trustworthy of my mawlās. He will be a trusty person and a reliable confidant, if God wills." Then we came to Marwān and Ṭufayl gave the letter from al-'Abbās to the chamberlain. Ṭufayl told the chamberlain that he had with him the letter from Yazīd b. al-Walīd and he read it (out). The chamberlain came out and said: "Do you have any letter other than this one with you? Did he entrust you with any message?" Ṭufayl replied:[1075] "No, but I do have Muslim b. Dhakwān with me." Then the chamberlain went in and told Marwān. He emerged (again) and said: "Order the mawlā of al-'Abbās to go away."

(Muslim's narrative continued:) So I went away, and when the time came for the dusk prayer I made my way to the maqṣūrah. When Marwān (had) performed the prayer, I left to say the prayer a second time, for I did not put any value on Marwān's prayer. When I straightened up in the prayer a eunuch came up to me, and after he had scrutinized me he made off. I shortened my prayer and caught up with him. He took me in to see Marwān, who was in one of the women's rooms. I greeted him and sat down. Then Marwān inquired: "Who are you?" I replied: "Muslim b. Dhakwān, the mawlā of Yazīd." Marwān said: "Are you a [1853] manumitted mawlā or a voluntarily commended (tibā'ah) mawlā?"[1076] I replied: "A manumitted one". Marwān said: "That is better. There is merit in both kinds. Now tell me whatever you want." Then I said: "It is up to the amīr to guarantee my personal safety no matter what I say, whether I agree with him or disagree," and he granted my request. Then I praised God and prayed for His prophet. I described how God had graciously bestowed the caliphate on the Banū Marwān and how the common people had been satisfied with them. (I then mentioned) how al-Walīd had broken covenants and corrupted the people's hearts and how the common folk poured censure upon him. I told Marwān everything about al-Walīd and when I had finished, Marwān began to speak. By God, he did not give praise to God nor did he recite the shahādah. He merely said: "I have heard what you have said. You have done well and your words have struck home. The judgment of Yazīd is best. I call God to witness that I have given the oath of allegiance to Yazīd (al-Walīd), freely expending my efforts and my money in this matter and only desiring thereby my due from God. By God, I could not have asked for more from al-Walīd. Indeed, he honored kinship and delegated authority to us and let us share in his rule,[1077] but I testify that he did not believe in the Day of Reckoning." Then Marwān asked me how Yazīd was and I magnified and exaggerated the situation. Marwān said: "Hide your business here. I have satisfied your friend's need, have discharged for him the matter of his bloodwit, and have ordered that he be given one thousand dirhams." I stayed on for a few days, and then one day Marwān summoned me at noon and instructed me: "Go to your friend and say to him: 'May God direct you on the right path! Go ahead as God has commanded, for you are in God's sight.'" Then Marwān wrote an answer to my letter and he said to me: "If you can travel without stopping or fly, then fly, for there will be a rebellion in the Jazīrah within six or seven days, and I am afraid that it will be a protracted affair[1078] and you will 1076. Clientage was known as walā'. It arose either on 'itāqah (manumission) or tibā'ah (voluntary commendation). Cf. Crone, 49, 236–37.

1075. Reading qāla for qultu.

---

1077. Laqad waṣala wa-fawwaḍa wa-ashraka fī mulkihi. The translation is tentative, taking waṣala to mean "to keep close family ties," fawwaḍa as "to delegate," and ashraka as "to give a share."

1078. Literally, "a rebel will rebel in the Jazīrah within six or seven days and I am afraid that their affair will become protracted."

not be able to get through." I asked Marwān: "What does the amīr know about this?" Marwān laughed and said: "I satisfy all those with deviant views so that they will tell me their secret intentions."[1079] I said to myself: "I am one of those people"; then I remarked (to Marwān): "If you have done that, God will set you aright. Indeed, the following story was told about Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, who said: 'I obtained this information (in the following way). I went along with the people in their erroneous ideas and shared their sentiments with them until they divulged to me what they were thinking and passed on to me their innermost thoughts.'" [1854]

(Muslim's narrative continues:) Then I took my leave of Marwān and departed. When I got as far as Āmid,[1080] I met a succession of postal couriers (who reported) al-Walīd's murder and that 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān had attacked al-Walīd's agent in the Jazīrah and driven him out of the area, and that he had placed scouts on the road. Then I left the postal couriers, hired a riding-animal and a guide, and came back to Yazīd b. al-Walīd.

In this year Yazīd b. al-Walīd dismissed Manṣūr b. Jumhūr from (his post as governor of) Iraq, appointing in his place 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān.

The Dismissal of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr from the Post of Governor of Iraq

It is reported that Yazīd b. al-Walīd said to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz:[1081] "The people of Iraq have shown themselves to be well disposed to your father. So go there. I have appointed you governor of Iraq."

According to Abū 'Ubaydah: 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar was a pious man who was in bad health.[1082] When he came to Iraq he personally sent out messengers and letters to the Syrian commanders

1079. Literally, "there are no people of erroneous opinions (ahli hawā) except that I give them satisfaction until they have told me their secret intentions."

1080. The well-known city of the province of Diyār Bakr, now known in modern Turkey as Diyarbakir. It stands on the left bank of the Tigris. Cf. *EI*², "Diyār Bakr" (M. Canard and C. Cahen).

1081. The son of the Umayyad caliph 'Umar II. For the dismissal of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr and the appointment of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 228–29; Fragmenta, 152–53.

1082. Muta'allimun. Ta'allama: "to be in pain."

who were in Iraq, for he was afraid that Manṣūr b. Jumhūr would not surrender the post to him. All the commanders submitted to his authority and Manṣūr b. Jumhūr handed over (the post) to him and left for Syria. Then 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar appointed his own agents to office and issued the people with their rations and their stipends. Then the Syrian commanders began to dispute with him and said: "You are distributing our fay' to these people, yet they are our enemy." 'Abdallāh said to the people of Iraq: "I wanted to return your fay' to you, for I knew that you were more entitled to [1855] it. (Now) these men have disputed with me and found fault with me." Then the people of al-Kūfah went out to the jabbānah and mobilized (there). The Syrian commanders sent messengers to them, making excuses and denying (their own words) outright and swearing that they had not said any of the things that the Kūfans had heard. Then a mixed rabble of men rose up from both sides and began stabbing each other with spears, and a small group of them were killed. These were not identified. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar was in al-Ḥīrah and 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās al-Kindī was in al-Kūfah. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr had appointed him as his deputy in the city and the people of al-Kūfah wanted to drive him out of the citadel. So 'Ubaydallāh sent word to 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān b. al-Qaba'tharī,[1083] who came to him, kept the people away from him, calmed them down, and rebuked them until they had dispersed peaceably with one another.[1084] When 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar heard about this he sent for Ibn al-Ghaḍbān, gave him a set of clothes and a beast to ride,[1085] rewarded him generously, and put him in charge of his shurṭah and the kharāj of the Sawād. He also entrusted him with the auditing[1086] and ordered him to assign a portion (in the dīwān) to his family, so he assigned (them) sixty or seventy (dirhams).

In this year discord broke out in Khurāsān between the Yamāniyyah and the Nizāriyyah, and al-Kirmānī[1087] rose up in opposition to Naṣr b. Sayyār. A group of supporters rallied to each of them.

1083. 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān al-Shaybānī. For a discussion of the activities of his father, al-Ghaḍbān, and himself, cf. Crone, 162.

1084. Literally, "some of them felt safe from others."

1085. Wa-ḥamalahu. Cf. Lane, I, 647. Cf. also Qur'ān 9, v. 92.

1086. Al-muḥāsabāt.

1087. Juday' al-Kirmānī of the Banū Azd had been the general of Asad al-Qasrī, governor of Khurāsān, who, after al-Ḥārith b. Surayj had been driven back across

The Discord between Naṣr and al-Kirmānī and What Had Caused It

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—his shaykhs: When 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar came to Iraq as its governor on behalf of Yazīd b. al-Walīd, he wrote to Naṣr appointing him as governor of Khurāsān.

According to another report: 'Abdallāh's letter reached Naṣr after al-Kirmānī had escaped from Naṣr's prison.[1088] The astrologers said to Naṣr: "There will be discord in Khurāsān." So Naṣr gave orders that the remaining funds should be taken from the treasury and he gave the people some of their stipends in silver [1856] coins and some in gold which originated from the vases[1089] that he had collected to send to al-Walīd b. Yazīd.[1090] The first person to speak up [about all this][1091] was a man from the Banū Kindah who was eloquent and loquacious. He said: "What about the stipends?" The following Friday Naṣr gave orders to some of the guards; they put on their weapons and he dispersed them through the mosque, fearing that someone would speak up. The man from the Banū Kindah stood up and said: "What about the stipends?" Then a man who was a mawlā of the Banū Azd, whose laqab was Abū al-Shayāṭīn, stood up and spoke his piece. Ḥammād al-Ṣā'igh and Abū al-Salīl al-Bakrī also rose to their feet and said: "What about the stipends?" So Naṣr replied: "Preserve me from disobedience![1092] It is your duty to obey and to remain united. Fear God and heed what is preached to you." Then Salm b. Aḥwaz went up to Naṣr, who was on the minbar, and spoke to him, saying: "Your talking to us in this way does not satisfy us one bit." Thereupon the people of the bazaar ran off to their market stalls. Naṣr was the Oxus, and had taken refuge with the Türgesh, was sent by Asad in 118 (736) against some of al-Ḥārith's followers in Badakhshān. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1589–91; Gibb, 81; Wellhausen, 467–69; Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 124; Hawting, 86–88.

---

1088. This is looking forward to events discussed later in detail by al-Ṭabarī (II, 1861–62).

1089. Literally, "gold from the vases." This is ambiguous. It is not clear whether the gold came from the melting down of the vases or whether the vases had been used to store gold coins. The former possibility is more likely.

1090. Cf. n. 574.

1091. As it appears to have been a Friday, the discussion must have taken place in the mosque.

1092. Iyyāya wa-al-ma'ṣiyata: "preserve me from disobedience (on your part)." Cf. the examples quoted in Wright, II, 82.

furious and declared: "You will not receive any stipends from me after this behavior of yours today." Then he went on: "My position with you is as if one of you[1093] rose up against his brother or his cousin and slapped his face when he was being given a camel or a garment to wear (as presents) and who (then) said: "My lord and my foster-father!" Or I feel as if[1094] some intolerable evil has materialized from under your very feet[1095] and it is as if you are being flung down in the bazaars like slaughtered camels.[1096] Truly people become disenchanted with the rule of anyone who rules for a long time. You, people of Khurāsān, are a garrison in the very heart of the enemy. Beware lest there should be any dissension amongst you."

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak: Naṣr said in his oration:

> Verily, I am one who pronounces (people) unbelievers[1097] and, further, who tells (them) when they are doing wrong. That is probably better for me. Indeed, you are striving to attain your ends but deliberately arousing discord in so doing.[1098] May God (therefore) not preserve you. By God, I know you through and through[1099] and I do not have (even) ten of you left on my side. The situation with me and you is > [1857] as one of your predecessors said:[1100]
>
> Hold fast, comrades,[1101] and we shall urge on[1102] your 1093. Literally, "it seems to me that a man amongst you . . ." (ka-annanī bi-rajulin minkum). Cf. Wright, II, 170.

1094. The text has ka-annanī bihim. Ibn al-Athīr changes bihim to bikum (V, 229). This makes better sense in the context and has been followed in the translation.

1095. Similarly here, Ibn al-Athīr (loc. cit.) has taḥtā arjulikum for al-Ṭabarī's arjulihim.

1096. Wa-ka-annanī bikum muṭarraḥīna fī al-aswāqi. Probably some prophetic allusion to the forthcoming revolution is being attributed here to Naṣr.

1097. Mukaffir. Cf. Ullman, 263.

1098. Literally, "you are striving to attain a matter in which you want discord."

1099. Literally, "I have stretched you out and rolled you up and rolled you up and stretched you out."

1100. The meter is rajaz. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 229.

1101. Literally, "our comrade."

1102. The text has naḥdū. This is later emended to naḥdu. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII. Ḥadā: "to urge on camels by singing to them"; cf. Lane, I, 532–33.

camels by singing to them, for we have experienced both your good side and your bad.

Fear God! By God, if there should be any disagreement amongst you, it would be preferable for each of you to be deprived of your money and children than to see what would ensue.[1103] O people of Khurāsān, you have held communal concord in contempt and you have veered toward divisiveness. Is it authority of an unpredictable kind[1104] that you want and expect? Verily, therein lies your destruction, O assembly of Arabs.

Then he quoted the words of al-Nābighah al-Dhubyānī:[1105]

If your evil nature triumphs over you,
I have nevertheless striven for your good.

Al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Hashraj b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Ward al-Jaʿdī said:

I pass the night leaning on my elbow, contemplating the stars;
whenever the last of them depart, the first of them reappear.[1106] Because discord has become widespread, encompassing all the people of prayer, Those in Khurāsān and Iraq, and those in Syria, are all grieved and troubled about it.
For this reason, the people are in pitch darkness; their cries of confusion are enmeshed in the darkness.[1107]
In the dark the fool who is rebuked for his folly is equal to the wise man.
People are in such distress that pregnant women have almost disowned their children.

1103. Literally, "then each man amongst you would certainly want to be deprived of his money and children and not to have seen it."

1104. A-sulṭāna al-majhūli turīdūna. . . ?

1105. The meter is wāfir. Al-Nābighah al-Dhubyānī was born in the second half of the sixth century. He enjoyed a high reputation, and the caliph ʿUmar was said to have called him the best poet of the Arabs. Cf. Sezgin, II, 110–13.

1106. Literally, "whenever they depart, their first ones reappear."

1107. Literally, "entangled are its woods."

For this reason, they stray blindly in total confusion; its dangers slay them unawares.[1108]
The people see in this situation only all kinds of unknown hazards[1109]
Like the whickering of a young she-camel or the cry of a woman in labor whose child has become stuck fast, around whom stand her midwives.[1110]
He has come[1111] into our midst, despised in manner, with calamitous affairs whose afflictions are red in color.[1112]

[1858] When Naṣr's letter of appointment to govern on behalf of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar reached him, al-Kirmānī announced to his followers: "There is discord among the people, so look for someone to run your affairs." (Now he was only called al-Kirmānī because he was born in Kirmān. His name was Juday' b. 'Alī b. Shabīb b. Barārī b. Ṣunaym al-Ma'nī.) His followers said: "You are the man for us." Then the Muḍariyyah said to Naṣr: "Al-Kirmānī is fomenting discord against you. Send people against him and kill him." Naṣr replied: "No, but I have children, both male and female. I will marry my sons to his daughters and his sons to my daughters." The Muḍariyyah said: "No." Then Naṣr said: "I will send him one hundred thousand dirhams, for he is miserly and gives nothing to his followers. They will get to hear of this and will desert him." The Muḍariyyah rejected that idea, too, saying: "That would only strengthen him." Thereupon Naṣr rejoined: "Leave him as he is, with him on his guard against us and us on 1108. Literally, "because of it they are in every blind confusion, tested by its tangled complexities[?]." The text has fī-kulli mubhamatin. The Cairo edition (VII, 276) has fī ẓilli mubhamatin ("in the shadow of blind confusion"). The text has tumnā lahum. The Cairo edition (loc. cit.) has taghtāluhum, which makes much better sense.

1109. Literally, "the people do not see in its consequences except that which its speaker does not explain." The text has yabīnu. This is later emended to yubīnu. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII.

1110. Kaṣayḥati ḥublā ṭarraqat, ḥawlahā qawābiluhā. The text has ṭaraqat, but a reading of ṭarraqat makes better sense. Cf. Lisān, II, 589.

1111. The text has fa-jā'in. This is later emended to fa-jā'a. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII.

1112. Possibly a reference to the newborn child as well as the bloodshed of fitnah.

our guard against him." So the Muḍariyyah said: "Send your men to him and imprison him."[1113] Naṣr received word that al-Kirmānī was saying: "My ultimate aim in obeying the Banū Marwān was that I would be made a commander[1114] and then I would seek vengeance for the Banū Muhallab[1115] as well as for the treatment that we have received at the hands of Naṣr, what with his coarseness and the prolonged restrictions he has imposed on us and his retaliation against us for what Asad did to him."[1116] Then 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī said to Naṣr: "This is the beginning of discord. Accuse al-Kirmānī of some foul deed, announce publicly that he is a dissident, and execute him. Execute Sibā' b. al-Nu'mān al-Azdī and also al-Farāfiṣah[1117] b. Zuhayr al-Bakrī, who continues to be angry at (Asad b. 'Abd) Allāh because he thought himself to be superior to the Muḍar and the Rabī'ah when he was in Khurāsān"(?).[1118] Jamīl b. al-Nu'mān said (to Naṣr): "You have treated al-Kirmānī

1113. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 230. The Cairo edition interprets this passage differently. The Leiden text is vocalized to read: "They said, 'Send (people) to him and imprison him.'" The Cairo edition (VII, 287) has qālū [lā, qāla] (brackets are those of the Cairo editor) fa-arsala ilayhi fa-ḥabasahu: "They said 'no.' So he sent (people) to him and he imprisoned him."

1114. An tuqallidanī al-suyūfu. The Cairo edition (loc. cit.) has an yuqallada wuldī al-suyūfa ("that my sons would be invested with swords (i.e., given command)").

1115. Cf. n. 676.

1116. Probably a reference to Asad's having ordered that Naṣr should be lashed. Cf. Wellhausen, 455.

1117. The form of this name is uncertain. The editor earlier had al-Furāfiṣah (II, 1604) but has al-Farāfiṣah here.

1118. This part of the text is clearly faulty and neither the Leiden nor Cairo editions have satisfactory versions. Ibn al-Athīr omits it altogether and al-Dīnawarī's account sheds no light on the matter (op. cit., 350–51). The Leiden text has fa-innahu lam yazil muta'aṣṣaban 'alā Allāhi bi-tafaḍḍulihi 'alā Muḍari [wa-bi-tafaḍḍulihi 'alā Rabī'ata kāna bi-Khurāsān.] By the editor's own admission he guessed at what is between the brackets. The Cairo edition (VII, 287) has fa-innahu lam yazil mutaghaḍḍaban 'alā Allāhi bi-tafḍīlihi Muḍara 'alā Rabī'ah (and then, in a new paragraph:) wa kāna bi-Khurāsān. It is possible that words may have been omitted here, e.g., part of a name before Allāh (e.g., Asad b. 'Abdallāh, the preceding governor of Khurāsān, who supported a pro-Yemeni and anti-Rabī'ah and Muḍar policy). A possible reconstruction of the sentence might therefore lead to the following translation: "for he continues to be angry (mutaghaḍḍaban) against Asad b. 'Abdallāh (?) because of his thinking himself superior (bi-tafaḍḍulihi) to Muḍar and to Rabī'ah when (?) he was in Khurāsān." Various textual problems remain unsolved, however.

honorably. If you can't face killing him (yourself), hand him over to me and I will kill him."

[1859] It was said that Naṣr became angry with al-Kirmānī only because the latter wrote to Bakr b. Firās al-Bahrānī, the governor of Jurjān, telling him about Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, and because he (Bakr?) sent a letter with Abū al-Za'farān, the mawlā of Asad b. 'Abdallāh, appointing al-Kirmānī. So Naṣr instituted a search for al-Kirmānī but he could not find him. The man who wrote to al-Kirmānī informing him of the killing of al-Walīd and the coming of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr to Iraq was Ṣāliḥ al-Athram al-Ḥirār.

It is said that a group of people came to Naṣr and reported: "Al-Kirmānī is encouraging faction." Aṣram b. Qabīṣah said to Naṣr: "If Juday' could achieve power and authority only by means of Christianity or Judaism, he would become a Christian or a Jew."[1119] Naṣr and al-Kirmānī had been on friendly terms and al-Kirmānī had behaved well toward Naṣr during the governorship of Asad b. 'Abdallāh. Then when Naṣr became governor of Khurāsān he dismissed al-Kirmānī from (his) command[1120] and appointed to it Ḥarb b. 'Āmir b. Aytham al-Wāshijī. His leadership was not successful[1121] and Naṣr reinstated al-Kirmānī in office; but only a short time later he dismissed al-Kirmānī, appointing in his stead Jamīl b. al-Nu'mān. Relations between Naṣr and al-Kirmānī became strained and then Naṣr imprisoned al-Kirmānī in the citadel. The man in charge of the citadel was Muqātil b. 'Alī al-Mara'ī—or according to some sources, al-Murrī.[1122]

When Naṣr had made up his mind to imprison al-Kirmānī, he gave orders to 'Ubaydallāh b. Bassām, the commander of his guards, who brought al-Kirmānī to Naṣr. Naṣr said to him: "Kirmānī, did I not receive a letter from Yūsuf b. 'Umar ordering me to kill you, and write back to him saying: 'Al-Kirmānī is a shaykh and a knight of Khurāsān,' and prevent the shedding of your blood?" Al-Kirmānī said: "Yes." Naṣr went on: "Did I not pay the debts you had incurred and did I not take it equally out of the 1119. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 230.

1120. Al-ri'āyasah. Cf. Crone, 31.

1121. Fa-mā zujirat. The Cairo edition (VII, 287) has fa-māta Ḥarb ("then Ḥarb died").

1122. This last being the form preferred by Nöldeke. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII.

people's stipends?" Al-Kirmānī said: "Yes." Naṣr said: "Did I not appoint[1123] your son 'Alī to a position of authority, even though your people were against it?" Al-Kirmānī replied: "Yes." Then Naṣr went on: "And yet you repaid that (kindness) by arousing [1860] discord." Then al-Kirmānī said: "There was more to it than what the amīr has said.[1124] And I give thanks for that. Just as the amīr prevented the shedding of my blood, so too I behaved during the time of Asad b. 'Abdallāh in the way that he knows. So let the amīr act without haste and make sure (of the truth), for I am no friend to faction." Then 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī said: "You are lying. Your aim is sedition and that you will not achieve." Salm b. Aḥwaz urged: "Behead him, O amīr." Al-Miqdām and Qudāmah, the two sons of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al-Ghāmidī, said: "Truly the companions of Pharaoh were better than you when they said 'Put him off (for a while), both him and his brother.'[1125] By God, do not let al-Kirmānī be killed, as Ibn Aḥwaz recommends." So Naṣr gave orders to Salm, who put al-Kirmānī in prison, three days before the end of Ramaḍān, 126 [July 14, 744]. Then the Banū Azd spoke up (about al-Kirmānī) and Naṣr said: "I have sworn that I would imprison him and that no evil will befall him at my hands. If you fear for his safety, then choose a man to keep him company." So the Banū Azd chose Yazīd al-Naḥawī and he remained with al-Kirmānī in the citadel.[1126] Naṣr appointed the Banū Nājiyah, who were the associates of 'Uthmān and Jahm, the two sons of Mas'ūd, to guard al-Kirmānī. The Banū Azd sent al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah al-Jaḥḍamī and Khālid b. Shu'ayb b. Abī Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥuddānī to Naṣr and they spoke to Naṣr about al-Kirmānī. Al-Kirmānī remained in prison for twenty-nine days.

According to 'Alī b. Wā'il, one of the Banū Rabī'ah b. Ḥanẓalah: I went in to see Naṣr and al-Kirmānī was sitting apart and complaining: "What have I done wrong? If Abū al-Za'farān had come, 1123. The text has a-lam artash. This is later emended to a-lam ura"is. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII.

---

1124. Literally, "the amīr did not say anything except there was more than it." In other words, in everything Naṣr said there was more to be added.

1125. Cf. Qur'ān 7, v. 111.

1126. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 231.

by God, I would never have hidden him; and I do not know where he is."

On the day that al-Kirmānī was imprisoned, the Banū Azd had wanted to snatch him away from his escorts, but al-Kirmānī implored them in God's name not to do that and he went away laughing under escort from the guards of Salm b. Aḥwaz. Then [1861] when al-Kirmānī was put in prison, 'Abd al-Malik b. Ḥarmalah al-Yaḥmadī, al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, 'Abd al-Jabbār b. Shu'ayb b. 'Abbād, and a group of the Banū Azd talked (over the matter). They went down to Nawsh[1127] and said: "We do not accept that al-Kirmānī should be imprisoned when he has committed no crime or offense." Some *shaykh*s from the Banū al-Yaḥmad[1128] said: "Do not take any action. See what your amīr does." The Banū Azd replied: "We are not satisfied. Just let Naṣr keep his hands off us or we will certainly start on you." Then 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abbād b. Jābir b. Hamā(m)[1129] b. Ḥanẓalah al-Yaḥmadī joined them with one hundred men, and also Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā and Dāwūd b. Shu'ayb. They spent the night in Nawsh with 'Abd al-Malik b. Ḥarmalah and those men who were with him. The following morning they marched to Ḥawzān and set fire to the house of 'Azzah, Naṣr's concubine. They remained (there) for three days, proclaiming: "We are not satisfied." Thereupon they (Naṣr's men?) appointed trustworthy men to watch over al-Kirmānī and they put Yazīd al-Naḥawī and others with al-Kirmānī. Then one of the people of Nasaf[1130] came and said to Ja'far, the servant of al-Kirmānī: "What would you give me if I got al-Kirmānī out (of prison)?" They replied: "You could have whatever you requested." Then the man went to the water conduit (leading) from the citadel and widened it. Then he made his way to al-Kirmānī's sons and said to them: "Write a letter to your father telling him to be ready to escape tonight." So they wrote to him and they put the letter in the food. Al-Kirmānī called Yazīd al-Naḥawī and Ḥuṣayn[1131] b. Ḥukaym and they ate supper with him 1127. A number of villages in the Marw district bore this name. Cf. Yāqūt, IV, 823–24.

1128. For the Banū al-Yaḥmad, a subgroup of the Azd, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 589.

1129. The text has Hamā.

1130. For the city of Nasaf in Sughd, cf. Le Strange, Lands, 469–71.

1131. Ibn al-Athīr has: Khiḍr b. Ḥukaym. (V, 231).

and then they went out. Al-Kirmānī went in to the (subterranean) conduit and his rescuers pulled him by his arm. Then a serpent wound itself around al-Kirmānī's stomach, but it did not harm him. One of the Banū Azd said: "The snake was Azdī and so it did not harm him." He came finally to a narrow place where they dragged him out; his shoulder and side were grazed. When al- [1862]
Kirmānī emerged (from the conduit) he mounted his she-mule, Dawwāmah (according to some sources, he mounted his horse, al-Bashīr), with the fetters still on his foot. The men then brought him to a village called Ghalaṭān, where 'Abd al-Malik b. Ḥarmalah was waiting, and al-Kirmānī was cut loose from the fetters.

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī) and Abū al-Walīd[1132] Zuhayr b. Hunayd al-'Adawī: Al-Kirmānī had his servant Bassām with him (in prison). Bassām noticed a hole in the citadel and he kept on making it wider until he made it possible to escape through it.[1133] Al-Kirmānī sent a message to Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā and 'Abd al-Malik b. Ḥarmalah, saying: "I am escaping tonight." So al-Kirmānī's supporters assembled. Then when al-Kirmānī had escaped, his mawlā Farqad[1134] came to them and told them the news and they met up with him at the village of Ḥarb b. 'Āmir. Al-Kirmānī was wearing a sheet with a sword around his waist. With him were 'Abd al-Jabbār b. Shu'ayb and the two sons of al-Kirmānī, 'Alī and 'Uthmān, together with his servant Ja'far. Al-Kirmānī gave orders to 'Amr b. Bakr to go to Ghalaṭān, Andagh, and Ushturj[1135] together(?). Al-Kirmānī ordered the people to meet him at the gate of al-Rayyān b. Sinān al-Yaḥmadī in Nawsh, in the meadow, which was the place where they prayed during the 'īd. So 'Amr went to the people and told them (what al-Kirmānī had said). Then the people left their vil-1132. The name Abū al-Walīd in the text is later emended to Abū al-Dhiyal. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII. This is not accepted by the Cairo edition (VII, 289).

---

1133. Al-Dīnawarī gives a detailed account of al-Kirmānī's escape from prison, giving a longer version of the story involving Bassām (op. cit., 351–52). Cf. also Ibn A'tham, VIII, 146–53.

1134. The text has Farqadu, later emended to Farqadun. Cf. Emend., p. DCCXIII.

1135. Ushturj is a town in the district of Andkhoy in Khurāsān. Cf. Ḥudūd, 336, n. 61; al-Iṣṭakhrī, I, 270–71. The text has Ushturj Ma'nan. The Cairo edition (VII, 290) has ma'an ("together"). Ma'an is the name of a tribe, but it makes little sense here.

lages, armed with weapons, and al-Kirmānī led them in the morning prayer. They numbered around one thousand. Before sunset, however, their number had increased to three thousand. Then the people of al-Saqādim joined them. Al-Kirmānī marched to Marj Nīrān, getting as far as Ḥawzān. Khalaf b. Khalīfah recited the following lines:[1136]

Go forth to the meadow which most effectually removes blindness, for the people of the conduit have already departed.[1137] Truly the meadow of the Azd is extensive, and in it the feet stand equal to the knees.

It is said that the Banū Azd gave the oath of allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥarmalah on the basis of God's Book on the night that al-Kirmānī escaped. Once they had assembled in the meadow at [1863] Nawsh, prayer began[1138] and ʿAbd al-Malik and al-Kirmānī were in dispute for a while. Then ʿAbd al-Malik conceded al-Kirmānī precedence, handing the command over to him, and al-Kirmānī led the prayer.

When al-Kirmānī had escaped, Naṣr went and camped hard by the gate of Marw al-Rūdh[1139] on the Ibrdānah(?)[1140] side where he remained for a day or two. It is said that when al-Kirmānī escaped, Naṣr appointed as his own deputy ʿIṣmah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Asadī, while he himself made for the five bridges at the gate of Marw al-Rūdh, where he addressed the people and carped at al-Kirmānī, saying: "He was born in Kirmān and was a Kirmānī. Then he came to Harāh (Herat) and was a Harawī. He who falls between two stools[1141] has no firm base nor does he flourish."[1142] Then Naṣr said, referring to the Banū Azd: "If they gather together, 1136. The meter is ramal.

---

1137. Surely a reference to the escape of al-Kirmānī from the conduit (al-sarab) and to al-Kirmānī's meeting at the marj. In a more general way, the lines could be interpreted as praise of desert instead of city life.

1138. Uqīmat al-ṣalāt.

1139. Marw al-Rūdh or Little Marw was thus named to differentiate it from Marw al-Shāhijān. Marw al-Rūdh was situated about 160 miles further up the Murghāb river than Marw al-Shāhijān. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 404–05; Yāqūt, IV, 506; *EI*², s.v. (C. E. Bosworth).

1140. This place has not been identified and the editor is not sure of the vocalization.

1141. Literally, "two beds."

1142. Literally, "nor is he a growing branch."

they are the most contemptible of people; and if they refuse to do so, they are as al-Akhṭal[1143] said:

(They are) frogs answering one another in the darkness of night; their voices guide the water-snake toward them."

Then Naṣr regretted his hasty words and added: "Pronounce the name of God, for to pronounce God's name is a sovereign remedy. To pronounce God's name is a blessing, with no tincture of evil, that drives away sin.[1144] To pronounce God's name is to be absolved from hypocrisy." Thereafter many people gathered to Naṣr, and he sent Salm b. Aḥwaz in heavy armor with many men to al-Kirmānī. People mediated between Naṣr and al-Kirmānī and they asked Naṣr to grant al-Kirmānī safe-conduct and not to imprison him, while al-Kirmānī's family would guarantee that he would not oppose Naṣr. Al-Kirmānī placed his hand in Naṣr's hand and Naṣr ordered him to stay in his house. Then al-Kirmānī heard something about Naṣr, so he left (his house) to go to a village that belonged to him. Then Naṣr sallied forth and camped at the bridges (at the gate of Marw), where al-Qāsim b. Najīb came to him. He spoke to Naṣr about al-Kirmānī and Naṣr guaranteed his safety (no matter what he said). Al-Qāsim said to Naṣr: "If you want, al-Kirmānī will go away from Khurāsān for you or, if you so desire, he will stay in his house." Naṣr thought it wise to banish al-Kirmānī, but Salm said to him: "If you banish him, you will [1864] make his name and reputation famous and people will say: 'Naṣr banished him because he was afraid of him.'"[1145] Naṣr replied: "What I fear from him if he is banished is less than what I fear from him if he is living (here); for a man who is exiled from his country becomes less powerful." They urged him not to do it, so Naṣr stayed his hand from al-Kirmānī and gave his followers ten (dīnārs) each. Then al-Kirmānī came to Naṣr and entered his tent and Naṣr promised him safe-conduct.

1143. The famous Christian Arab poet (d. probably before 92/710). Cf. *EI*², s.v. (R. Blachère).

1144. Literally, "the mentioning of God is a cure, the mentioning of God is a blessing in which there is no evil."

1145. Qāla al-nāsu akhrajahu annahu hābahu. Ibn al-Athīr (V, 232) has li-annahu, which has been followed here. The Cairo edition (VII, 291) also has li-annahu.

'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abd Rabbihi joined al-Ḥārith b. Surayj.[1146] Then, in Shawwāl 126 [July 17–August 14, 744], Naṣr received word that Manṣūr b. Jumhūr had been dismissed and that 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz had been made governor (of Iraq). Then Naṣr addressed the people, mentioning Ibn Jumhūr and saying: "I have found out that he is not a governor of Iraq. God has dismissed him from office and has appointed (in his stead) the Virtuous One (al-Ṭayyib, i.e., 'Abdallāh), the son of the Virtuous One (al-Ṭayyib, i.e., 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz)." Al-Kirmānī was angry about Ibn Jumhūr and began collecting men and taking up arms again. He would attend the Friday prayer, accompanied by about fifteen hundred men, and would perform the prayer outside the maqṣūrah, before going in to see Naṣr. He would greet Naṣr but would not sit down. Then al-Kirmānī stopped going in to see Naṣr and began to oppose him publicly.

So Naṣr sent the following message to him by Salm b. Aḥwaz: "By God, I did not want to do you any harm by imprisoning you, but I was afraid that you would cause mischief amongst the people. So come to me." Al-Kirmānī gave Salm the following reply: "Were it not for the fact that you are in my house I would kill you. Were it not for what I know of your foolishness I would teach you how to behave. Go back to Ibn al-Aqṭa'[1147] and tell him whatever you like, be it good or bad." So Salm returned to Naṣr and gave him the message.[1148] Then Naṣr said to him: "Go back to him." Salm replied: "No, by God! I am not afraid of him but I would hate him to make me listen to things about you that I do [1865] not like (to hear)." So Naṣr dispatched 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī, who said (to al-Kirmānī): "Abū 'Alī, I fear for your fate in this world and the next as a result of what you have begun. We are going to make certain proposals to you. So go to your amīr, who will give you the details.[1149] Our aim in this is only to warn you."

1146. The text has no obvious break between the events occurring with Naṣr and al-Kirmānī and then the reference to al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. This is probably an early allusion to the men who rallied to al-Ḥārith (under the year 127) amongst whom 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abd Rabbihi was one. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1890; Wellhausen, 485–86.

1147. Cf. n. 327. Cf. also al-Dīnawarī, 352.

1148. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 232. Hereafter, Ibn al-Athīr's account omits the details of the various attempts to persuade al-Kirmānī to go to see Naṣr.

1149. Literally, "we are proposing certain proposals to you. So go to your amīr, who will suggest them to you."

Al-Kirmānī replied: "I know that Naṣr did not charge you with this message, but that you wanted (what you said) to reach his ears and thereby to gain favor (with him). By God, I will not say another word (to you) after I have finished what I am saying now until you have gone back to your house. So let him send anyone he likes so long as it is not you." Then 'Iṣmah went back and said (to Naṣr): "I have not seen a more undisciplined lout than al-Kirmānī. I do not wonder at him, but I do wonder at Yaḥyā b. Ḥudayn (and his people)—may God curse them![1150]—indeed, they respect him more than his (own) associates do."

Salm b. Aḥwaz said: "I am afraid that this frontier and the people will become corrupted. So send Qudayd to al-Kirmānī." Then Naṣr told Qudayd b. Manī' to go to him. Qudayd did so and said to al-Kirmānī: "Abū 'Alī, you have been stubbornly persistent (in this matter) and I am afraid that the situation will become too difficult, that we will all perish, and that these foreigners[1151] will gloat over us." Al-Kirmānī replied: "Qudayd, I am not suspicious of you; but what has happened has made me mistrustful of Naṣr. The Prophet of God said: 'The Bakrī is your brother, but do not trust him.'" Qudayd said: "If that is what you think, give him some surety." Al-Kirmānī asked: "Who?" Qudayd answered: "Give me 'Alī and 'Uthmān." Al-Kirmānī rejoined: "Who is he giving me? He has nothing good to offer." Qudayd replied: "Abū 'Alī, I swear to you, by God, do not let the ruin of this city be on your hands." Then Qudayd went back to Naṣr and he said to 'Aqīl b. Ma'qil al-Laythī: "What I most fear is that disaster will befall this frontier. So speak to your (paternal) cousin." So 'Aqīl said to Naṣr, "O amīr, I beseech you, by God, not to cause evil fortune to befall your tribe. Rebels (khawārij) are fighting Marwān in Syria. Both the people and the Banū Azd are in a state of dissension.[1152] They are light-headed and foolish; but 1150. The text is perhaps faulty here. The editor notes that after Ḥudayn there may have been the words wa-qawmihi, i.e., Bakr b. Wā'il. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1571. This makes good sense with the plural suffix of la'anahum.

---

1151. Al-a'ājim: the non-Arab population of Khurāsān.

1152. There are various ways in which this passage could be punctuated. It could be translated as: "Indeed, Marwān is in Syria (and) the rebels are fighting him, and the people and the Azd are in discord . . ." Alternatively, it could read: "Indeed, Marwān is in Syria (and) the rebels and the people are fighting him, and the Azd are in discord . . ." The punctuation of the Cairo edition (VII, 292) places a comma after "rebels."

they are your neighbors." Naṣr replied: "What am I to do? If you know a way of restoring the people to good order, then go ahead, [1866] for al-Kirmānī has made up his mind not to trust me."

Then 'Aqīl went to al-Kirmānī and said: "Abū 'Alī, you have instituted a custom which will be followed by other *amīr*s after you. Indeed, I foresee a situation in which I fear that people will act quite unreasonably." Al-Kirmānī said: "Naṣr wants me to go to him, but I do not feel safe from him. We want him to withdraw. (Then) we ourselves will withdraw and we will choose a man from Bakr b. Wā'il who is satisfactory to all of us to be our governor until a decree comes from the caliph. (But) Naṣr refuses (to do) this." 'Aqīl replied: "Abū 'Alī, I am afraid that the people of this frontier will perish, so go to your amīr and say that whatever he (Naṣr) wants will be agreed to by you. But do not incite the fools amongst your people to action in this affair that they have undertaken." Al-Kirmānī said: "I am not suspicious of you so far as your advice or your reasoning are concerned, but I do not trust Naṣr. Let him take what he wants from the wealth of Khurāsān and go away." 'Aqīl said: "Are you willing to do something that would lead to agreement between you? You can make marriage alliances with his family and he can make marriage alliances with yours." Al-Kirmānī replied: "I don't feel safe from him in any situation." 'Aqīl said: "No good will come of this. I am afraid that tomorrow you will be wiped out and all to no purpose." Al-Kirmānī replied: "There is no power and no strength except in God." 'Aqīl asked him: "Shall I come back to you?" Al-Kirmānī replied: "No, but take him a message from me and tell him: "I fear that people will incite you to do what you do not want (to do) and that you will behave toward us in a way that has irrevocable consequences. But, if you insist, I will go away from you, not out of fear of you but (because) I would hate to be the cause of any disaster to the inhabitants of the province or to cause bloodshed in it." So al-Kirmānī prepared himself to leave for Jurjān.

In this year Yazīd b. al-Walīd granted al-Ḥārith b. Surayj safe-[1867] conduct and he wrote to al-Ḥārith accordingly. He also wrote to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar ordering him to return to al-Ḥārith such of his money and sons as had been seized from him.

The Reason for Granting Safe-Conduct to al-Ḥārith b. Surayj[1153]

It is reported that when the disagreement between Naṣr and al-Kirmānī occurred in Khurāsān, Naṣr was afraid that al-Ḥārith b. Surayj would muster his followers and the Turks against him, and that the situation would be worse for him than it had been with al-Kirmānī and others. Naṣr therefore was keen[1154] to consult al-Ḥārith. So he sent Muqātil b. Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī, Tha'labah b. Ṣafwān al-Banānī, Anas b. Bajālah al-'Arajī, Hudbah al-Sha'rāwī, and Rabī'ah al-Qurashī to al-Ḥārith to bring him back from the country of the Turks.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—his shaykhs: Khālid b. Ziyād al-Baddī, who was one of the inhabitants of Tirmidh, and Khālid b. 'Amr, a mawlā of the Banū 'Āmir, went to Yazīd b. al-Walīd to ask for safe-conduct for al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. When they reached al-Kūfah, they met Sa'īd Khudaynah,[1155] who said to Khālid b. Ziyād: "Do you know why people called me Khudaynah?" Khālid said: "No." So Sa'īd said: "They wanted to make me kill the Yamāniyyah and I refused to do so." Then the two men asked Abū Ḥanīfah[1156] to write on their behalf to al-Ajlaḥ, who was one of the close associates of Yazīd b. al-Walīd. So he wrote to al-Ajlaḥ on their behalf and al-Ajlaḥ took them in to 1153. For an analysis of the amnesty granted to al-Ḥārith through the mediation of Naṣr, who hoped that al-Ḥārith would support him against al-Kirmānī, cf. Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 136; Hawting, 107–08.

1154. Literally, "desired."

1155. Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who was an Umayyad and the son-in-law of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik, had been governor of Khurāsān in 102 (720). He preferred a policy of conciliation in Khurāsān but was forced to go out against the Turks and, after initial success, was severely defeated by them. He was recalled in 103 (721) because of his weakness and complaints of tyranny. The father of one of the men in this delegation to Yazīd, Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī, had vigorously opposed Sa'īd's policies and had intrigued against him. The nickname Khudhaynah ("little lady") was given to him by his enemies in Khurāsān, although some Arab elements called him "a sword held over our heads." The term khudhaynah is explained as dihqanah ("lady of the house"). Cf. Gibb, 61–62; Shaban, 'Abbāsid Revolution, 95, 99–101; Barthold, Turkestan, 188–89; al-Ṭabarī, II, 1418.

1156. Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān b. Thābit, born ca. 80 (699) and died 150 (767), the eponymous founder of the Ḥanafī madhhab. He lived in al-Kūfah and became the foremost authority on religious law there. Cf. EI[2], s.v. (J. Schacht).

see Yazīd. Khālid b. Ziyād said to Yazīd: "O Commander of the Faithful, you killed your cousin in order to establish the Book of God. Yet now your agents are acting unjustly and tyrannically." Yazīd replied: "I can find no helpers other than them, and yet I hate them." Khālid said: "O Commander of the Faithful, appoint as governors people from noble families[1157] and attach to every governor men who are of known piety and knowledgeable in fiqh to make them adhere to the terms of your covenant." Yazīd replied: "I will do so." Then the two men asked Yazīd to grant safe-conduct to al-Ḥārith b. Surayj and Yazīd wrote to him as follows:

[1868] Now to our subject matter. We have been angry on God's behalf that His ordinances have been neglected and that His servants have sunk into every kind of excess. Blood has been shed unlawfully and money has been seized illegally. We wanted our actions in this community to be according to the Book of God, may He be praised and glorified, and the sunnah of His prophet. There is no power except in God. We have explained this to you ourselves. So come in safety, you and those who are with you, for you are our brothers and our helpers. I have written to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz asking him to return such of your wealth and children as were confiscated.

Then the two men (i.e. Khālid b. Ziyād and Khālid b. 'Amr) came to al-Kūfah and went in to see Ibn 'Umar. Khālid b. Ziyād said: "May God preserve and prosper the amīr! Do you not order your agents to conduct themselves as your father did?" 'Abdallāh replied: "But isn't 'Umar's (irreproachable) conduct clear and known to all?" Khālid said: "People don't benefit from it and it has not been put into practice." Then the two men arrived in Marw and they gave Yazīd's letter to Naṣr, who returned as much as he could of what had been taken from al-Ḥārith and his followers.[1158] They then called on al-Ḥārith, where they met Muqātil b. Ḥayyān and his associates, whom Naṣr had sent to al-Ḥārith. Ibn 'Umar had written to Naṣr saying: "You have granted safe-conduct to al-Ḥārith without my permission and without the permission of the caliph." So Naṣr regretted[1159] what he had 1157. Ahla al-buyūtāti. Cf. Gloss., p. CXLV.

1158. Literally, "them."
1159. Fa-usqiṭa fī yadayhi. Cf. Lane, I, 1380.

done. He dispatched Yazīd b. al-Aḥmar with orders to kill al-Ḥārith when he had got him onto the boat. When Khālid b. Ziyād and Khālid b. 'Amr met Muqātil in Āmul, Muqātil himself crossed over to al-Ḥārith and prevented Yazīd from attacking him.

Al-Ḥārith traveled to Marw, after living in the country of the infidels for twelve years, accompanied by al-Qāsim al-Shaybānī and Muḍarris b. 'Imrān, his judge, and 'Abdallāh b. Sinān. When al-Ḥārith arrived in Samarqand, the governor in charge of the city was Manṣūr b. 'Umar.[1160] The latter did not receive al-Ḥārith and he said: ("Should I see him) because of his good deeds?"[1161] Then Manṣūr wrote to Naṣr asking his permission to attack al-Ḥārith, and whichever of them killed the other would go to Paradise or the Fire. Manṣur wrote as follows:[1162] "If al-Ḥārith comes to the amīr, having already impaired the authority of the Banū Umayyah, lapping up more and more blood, and having severed all [1869] ties with this world, whereas while he was under their rule he had been the most hospitable of them to a guest, the fiercest of them in courage and the most zealous of them against the Turks, then he will cause division among the Banū Tamīm and do you a mischief."[1163]

The Sardarkhudāh was imprisoned with Manṣūr b. 'Umar because he had killed Baysān. His son Jundah sought vengeance from Manṣūr and Manṣūr imprisoned him.[1164] Al-Ḥārith spoke to Manṣūr about him, so Manṣūr released him. Thereupon al-Ḥārith took over his debt and he paid it for him in full.

According to some sources: In this year the imām Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad[1165] sent Abū Hāshim Bukayr b. Māhān[1166] to Khurāsān, furnished with a mandate[1167] and injunctions

---

1160. Manṣūr b. 'Umar al-Sulamī. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1677, 1679; Wellhausen, 477.

1161. A-li-ḥusni balā'ihi! Presumably a sarcastic comment.

1162. It is not clear from the text whether this is Manṣūr's letter to Naṣr or Naṣr's reply to Manṣūr. The former possibility has been adopted in the translation.

1163. Literally, "to your disadvantage."

1164. Fa-ista'adā ibnuhu J.nd.h Manṣūran fa-ḥabasahu. The vocalization of the name is uncertain, but it appears in the indices, 109, as J.nd.h b. Baysān.

1165. Cf. *EI*², Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad (F. Omar).

1166. Cf. n. 358.

1167. Bi-al-sīrati. I.e., having been given instructions as to how he should proceed.

(waṣiyyah). He arrived in Marw and assembled the naqībs and those dā'īs who were present there. He announced the death of the imām Muḥammad b. 'Alī, called on them to support Ibrāhīm, and gave them Ibrāhīm's letter. They accepted what it said and handed over to him such subscriptions to the Shī'ī cause as had come in to them. Bukayr then took these monies to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad.

[1870] In this year Yazīd b. al-Walīd had the people give the oath of allegiance to his brother Ibrāhīm and he made him his heir.[1168] He also had the oath of allegiance given to 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik as the heir of Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd. According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): The reason for that was that Yazīd b. al-Walīd fell sick in Dhū al-Ḥijjah 126 [September 14–October 12, 744]. People said to him: "Have the oath of allegiance given to your brother Ibrāhīm and to 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj after him." The Qadariyyah kept on pressing him to have the oath of allegiance sworn, and urging him: "It is not lawful for you to neglect the leadership of the community. So have the oath of allegiance taken to your brother." (They did this) until Yazīd had the oath of allegiance taken for Ibrāhīm and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj after him.

In this year Yazīd b. al-Walīd dismissed Yūsuf b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf[1169] from the governorship of Medina, appointing in his place 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān. According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): It is alleged that Yazīd b. al-Walīd did not appoint Yūsuf b. Muḥammad as governor but that the latter forged a letter of appointment as governor of Medina. Later, Yazīd dismissed him and appointed 'Abd al-'Azīz to the post and he went there (to Medina) two nights before the end of Dhū al-Qa'dah (126) [August 15–September 13, 744].

In this year Marwān b. Muḥammad rebelled against Yazīd b. al-Walīd. He left Armenia for the Jazīrah, on the pretext that he was 1168. For Yazīd's nomination of his brother Ibrāhīm as his heir, cf. Fragmenta, 153; Ibn Khayyāṭ, 387.

---

1169. Yūsuf b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, the brother of al-Walīd II's mother, Umm Ḥajjāj, had been sent as governor to Medina by al-Walīd on his accession. Cf. Wellhausen, 354; al-Ṭabarī, II, 1768.

seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Walīd b. Yazīd. But when he reached Ḥarrān,[1170] he gave the oath of allegiance to Yazīd.

The Account of [Marwān's Rebellion] and of the Reason That Prompted Marwān to Oppose (Yazīd) and Then to Give Allegiance to Yazīd

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm b. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Huraym—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ, the mawlā of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān: I asked Abū Hāshim how closely he had witnessed the events he related to us and he said: "I was staying in the camp of Marwān b. Muḥammad." (Abū Hāshim's account continues:) When 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān b. Muḥammad b. Marwān returned from his summer raiding campaign, he was with al-Ghamr b. Yazīd in Ḥarrān. While 'Abd al-Malik was there he received the news of al-Walīd's murder. Al-Walīd's agent in the Jazīrah was 'Abdah b. Rabāḥ al-Ghassānī. When he heard that al-Walīd had been killed, 'Abdah left the Jazīrah and made for Syria. Then 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān b. Muḥammad attacked Ḥarrān and the (other) cities of the Jazīrah; he held on to them and appointed Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. [1871]
'Ulāthah to govern them. 'Abd al-Malik then wrote to his father in Armenia informing him of what he had done and advising him to hasten to join him. Marwān made his preparations for the journey and announced publicly that he was seeking (vengeance for) the blood of al-Walīd. Marwān did not like to leave the frontier unguarded before he had put his affairs in order. He dispatched to the people of al-Bāb[1171] Isḥāq b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī,[1172] who was the 1170. Ḥarrān is the well-known city in Northern Mesopotamia (now in Turkey). Marwān was to make it his residence when he became caliph. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (G. Fehérvári).

1171. I.e., Bāb al-Abwāb, Darband on the Caspian. This was a pass and a frontier town at the eastern end of the Caucasus. Yāqūt describes the great wall which lay to the west of it and which had been built in the sixth century A.D. to keep out the barbarians. After the Muslim conquest the Bāb became the base for future Arab operations against the Khazars. In Hishām's reign, Maslamah is said to have established twenty-four thousand Syrians there. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 207; Le Strange, Lands, 180; Minorsky, Sharvān and Darband, 18–19; *EI*², s.v. (D. M. Dunlop).

1172. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1635; al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 206; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 403; Crone, 106.

head of the Banū Qays, and Thābit b. Nu'aym al-Judhāmī,[1173] a man from Palestine who was the head of the Yamāniyyah. The reason why Thābit was in Marwān's company was that Marwān had released him from Hishām's prison at al-Ruṣāfah. Marwān used to visit Hishām once every two years to discuss the affairs of the frontier, its condition, what would be good for his troops, and what he thought should be done against the enemy. The reason that Hishām had imprisoned Thābit was, as we have mentioned above, because of what had happened between him and Ḥanẓalah b. Safwān. Hishām had sent Ḥanẓalah with a jund to fight the Berbers[1174] and the people of Ifrīqiyah after they had killed Hishām's agent over them, Kulthūm b. 'Iyāḍ al-Qushayrī. Thābit had turned this jund against Ḥanẓalah. Ḥanẓalah then wrote a letter to Hishām complaining about his situation, whereupon Hishām ordered Ḥanẓalah to send Thābit to him in irons. Ḥanẓalah accordingly sent Thābit to Hishām, who put him in prison, where he remained until Marwān b. Muḥammad came to Hishām on one of his visits. We have already said something about Kulthūm b. 'Iyāḍ and his activities in Ifrīqiyah in the relevant section of this book of ours.

While Marwān was visiting Hishām, those leaders of the Yamāniyyah who were with Hishām came to him and sought his help over the matter of Thābit. Amongst the people who spoke to Marwān about Thābit were Ka'b b. Ḥāmid al-'Ansī,[1175] Hishām's chief of police; 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍakhm; and Sulaymān b. Ḥabīb, his judge.[1176] Then Marwān asked Hishām to hand Thābit over to him, so Hishām did so. Thābit went (with Marwān) to 1173. For his biography, cf. Crone, 161.

---

1174. Literally, "The reason for Hishām's imprisoning Thābit was what we have already mentioned of his affair with Ḥanẓalah b. Ṣafwān and his (Thābit's) turning against him (Ḥanẓalah) of the jund, which Hishām had sent with him (Ḥanẓalah) to fight the Berbers . . ." Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1716.

1175. The text has al-'Absī. Crone proves convincingly that Ka'b b. Ḥāmid, who had been the head of the shurṭah of 'Abd al-Malik, al-Walīd, Sulaymān, Yazīd, and Hishām, is often called al-'Absī. Ibn Ḥabīb, on the other hand, has him as al-'Ansī, and therefore of Yamanī descent, as the passage here suggests. Cf. Crone, 163–64; Ibn Ḥabīb, Muḥabbar, 374.

1176. There were two men of this name. One was a judge and was a Qaysī. Cf. Ibn Khayyāṭ, 557; al-Ṭabarī, II, 1226, 1338. The other was a well-known Yamanī leader and is most probably the one mentioned here. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1946, 1977. Crone argues that the phrase "his judge" is an incorrect gloss (op. cit., 164).

Armenia and Marwān placed him in authority and behaved generously to him. When Marwān sent Thābit with Isḥāq to the people [1872] of al-Bāb, he wrote a letter to them which the two men were to take with them. In it he informed them about the state of their frontier, and what remuneration they would receive if they followed their orders and remained in their posts; by standing firm they would ward off the evil of the enemy from the sons of the Muslims. Marwān also sent the people's stipends with the two men and he appointed as commander over the people of al-Bāb a man from Palestine called Ḥumayd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Lakhmī, who was acceptable to them, who had been their governor before, and whose rule they had praised. The two envoys carried out Marwān's orders amongst the people; they transmitted his message and read out his letter to them. The people agreed to stand firm on their frontier and to remain in their posts.

Then news reached Marwān that Thābit had been plotting with the local commanders[1177] to leave their frontier post and to join their junds. When the two men got back to Marwān, he made preparations to leave and inspected his troops. Thābit b. Nuʿaym plotted with those Syrians whom he had with him to break away from Marwān and to join up with himself so that he could take them to their junds and be in command of them. Then they broke away from their camp together with (other) people who fled at night[1178] and they pitched camp separately.

Marwān got wind of their activities, so he and his men kept watch, fully armed, throughout the night. The following morning he and his men sallied forth against them. Thābit's followers were twice as many as those of Marwān. They lined the men up in battle order. Then Marwān gave orders to heralds, who shouted between the two lines on the right, on the left, and in the middle. They proclaimed the following announcement to them: "People of Syria, what has prompted you to defect and for what conduct on my part have you conceived a dislike for me? Did I not rule you in a way that won your approval and behave correctly toward you and govern you well? What is it that has prompted you into shedding your own blood?" The rebels gave Marwān the following reply: "We were obedient to you because of our obedience to [1873] our caliph. Then our caliph was killed and the Syrians gave the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. al-Walīd. We are content to be governed by Thābit and we have made him our leader to march with us under our banners until we return to our junds." Then Marwān gave orders to his herald to proclaim:[1179] "Truly you have lied! You do not want what you have said you want. Your sole desire has been to act rashly and to seize wrongfully the possessions, food, and fodder of any *dhimmī*s whom you pass. The only thing between you and me will be the sword until such time as you submit to me. I will go with you as far as the Euphrates and then I will take my leave of every commander and his jund. Then rejoin your junds."

1177. Literally, "their commanders."
1178. Maʿa man farra laylān. This is somewhat obscure.

When the rebels had seen how serious Marwān's intentions were, they submitted to him and cast in their lot with him. They then handed over Thābit b. Nu'aym and his sons to Marwān. Thābit had four sons: Rifā'ah, Nu'aym, Bakr, and 'Imrān. Marwān gave orders concerning them and they were hauled off their horses and stripped of their weapons. He put chains on their feet and appointed some of his guards to keep watch over them. He took a group of the jund from Syria and the Jazīrah and attached them to his troops. He kept a tight rein on them during the journey, so that none of them were able to attack or act tyrannically against any of the villagers or to obtain anything without paying. (This state of affairs prevailed) until he reached Ḥarrān. Then Marwān ordered the Syrians to rejoin their junds, but he kept Thābit under his own eye in prison. He then invited the people of the Jazīrah to mobilize and he paid stipends to more than twenty thousand stalwarts. Then Marwān made preparations to march on Yazīd. Yazīd wrote to him saying that if Marwān gave him the oath of allegiance, he would appoint Marwān as governor of the lands over which 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān had appointed his father, Muḥammad b. Marwān, in the Jazīrah, Armenia, al-Mawṣil, and Āzarbāyjān. Marwān duly gave the oath of allegiance to him and he sent Muḥammad b. 'Ulāthah and a number of other notables of the Jazīrah to Yazīd.[1180]

1179. Literally, "who proclaimed."
1180. For this episode, cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 234–35; al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 403.

In this year Yazīd b. al-Walīd died. His death was at the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 126 [October 12, 744]. According to Abū Ma'shar— [1874] Aḥmad b. Thābit—his informants—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā: Yazīd b. al-Walīd died after the Feast of the Sacrifice in Dhū al-Ḥijjah 126 [after September 23, 744].

According to all of our informants, his caliphate lasted six months. It is (also) said[1181] that his caliphate lasted five months and two nights. According to Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī): Yazīd ruled for six months and several days. According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): He ruled for five months and twelve days.[1182] Yazīd b. al-Walīd died ten days before the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 126 [October 3 or 4, 744][1183] at the age of forty-six.

According to some sources: Yazīd ruled for six months and two nights.

He died in Damascus but there is disagreement as to how old he was when he died. According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī): Yazīd died when he was thirty-seven. According to some sources: He died when he was thirty-seven. Yazīd's patronymic was Abū Khālid.[1184] His mother was a concubine. Her name was Shāh-i Āfrīd.[1185] She was the daughter of Fīrūz[1186] b. Yazdigird b. Shahriyār b. Kisrā. Yazīd used to say:[1187]

I am the son of Kisrā; my father is Marwān.
One grandfather is a qayṣar; the other a khāqān.[1188]

It is said that he was a Qadarī.

1181. There is an apparent contradiction here with the preceding sentence.
1182. "'Alī b. Muḥammad said" is repeated here.
1183. The exact date is somewhat uncertain since it is not clear whether this statement includes or excludes the last day of Dhū-al Ḥijjah itself. Al-Mas'ūdī gives the date of Yazīd's death as hilāl (new moon) in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 126. Cf. Murūj, VI, 18. Ibn A'tham (VIII, 141) has a date in Muḥarram, 127. Ibn Khayyāṭ (387) has ten days remaining of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 126.
1184. Cf. al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 32.
1185. She was the daughter of Fīrūz, the son of Yazdigird III. She was taken prisoner in Sughd by Qutaybah and placed in the harem of al-Walīd I. For a discussion of this and other forms of the name, cf. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 272.
1186. The editor vocalizes the name as Fayrūz.
1187. For this line, cf. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., and Muir, 417.
1188. Literally, "my grandfather is a qayṣar and my (other) grandfather a khāqān."

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): In appearance he was brown-skinned, tall, with a small head, and a mole on his face. He was a handsome man. He had quite a wide mouth but not excessively so. According to al-Wāqidī: He was nicknamed Yazīd the Inadequate because he cut back the people's stipends which al-Walīd had increased. According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): Marwān b. Muḥammad railed against Yazīd and called him: "The Inadequate (al-Nāqiṣ) Son of al-Walīd," so the people called him the "Inadequate."

[1875] According to al-Wāqidī: In this year 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān led the pilgrimage.[1189] According to some sources: In this year 'Umar b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik led the pilgrimage. He was appointed by Yazīd b. al-Walīd. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who was in charge of Medina, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if, went with him.

Yazīd's governor of Iraq in this year was 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. The judge of al-Kūfah was Ibn Abī Laylā. In charge of the aḥdāth[1190] of al-Baṣrah was al-Miswar b. 'Umar b. 'Abbād.[1191] The judge of al-Baṣrah was 'Āmir b. 'Abīdah. The governor of Khurāsān was Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Kinānī.

1189. Cf. al-Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 402.

1190. From the fourth/tenth century to the sixth/twelfth century the term aḥdāth referred to a kind of urban militia, often representing a "municipal opposition" to political authority. It is, however, more difficult to define the term in earlier periods of Islamic history. Cf. *EI*², s.v. (C. Cahen). Probably the term referred either to some kind of auxiliary police force or auxiliary troops.

1191. Cf. Crone, 109.

The Events of the Year 126 (cont'd)

(October 25, 743–October 12, 744)

Then came Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, but his rule was not recognized.[1192]

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī): The rule of Ibrāhīm was not universally recognized. One week he would be recognized as caliph, another week as amīr, and another as neither caliph nor amīr.[1193] This situation continued until Marwān b. Muḥammad arrived to depose him and kill 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik. According to Hishām b. Muḥammad (al-Kalbī): Yazīd b. al-Walīd nominated as his successor Abū Isḥāq Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd. He remained in office for four months and was then deposed in Rabī' II 126 [January 22–February 19, 744].[1194] Thereafter he remained alive until he 1192. Lam yatimm amrun. Literally, "a command/an affair was not accomplished." Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., has al-amru; Fragmenta, 154, has amruhu.

---

1193. Cf. the verse of a poet quoted by al-Mas'ūdī: "We give the oath of allegiance to Ibrāhīm every Friday" (Murūj, VI, 19).

1194. The dating is somewhat uncertain here. According to al-Ya'qūbī (loc. cit.), Ibrāhīm was deposed by Marwān, who then had the oath of allegiance given to himself on a Monday halfway through Ṣafar 127. For the reign of Ibrāhīm, cf. also Ibn A'tham, VIII, 141–42; Fragmenta, 154.

was killed in 132 [August 20, 749–August 8, 750]. His mother was a concubine.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad: The rule of Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd lasted seventy nights.

The Events of the Year [1876]

127

(October 13, 744 – October 2, 745)

Among the events taking place during this year were the journey of Marwān b. Muḥammad to Syria and the battle that took place between him and Sulaymān b. Hishām at 'Ayn al-Jarr.[1195]

The Account of Marwān's Journey and What Caused The Battle [at 'Ayn al-Jarr][1196]

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The cause [of the battle] sprang from what I have already mentioned in part:[1197] namely Marwān's going from Armenia to the Jazīrah after the murder of al-Walīd b. Yazīd, his conquering of it [the Jazīrah], professing that he was incensed on account of al-Walīd, out of disapproval of his murder; then his taking of the ba'yah for Yazīd b. al-Walīd after Yazīd had appointed him as governor of the province of his father, Muḥammad b. Marwān; and his subsequent behavior and 1195. 'Ayn al-Jarr was an important site in the Biqā' and contained a vast enclosure with towers. It is generally held to have been founded by al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik around 95–96/714–15. Cf. EI[2], s.v. [J. Sourdel-Thomine]; M. Chehab, "The Umayyad palace at 'Anjar" in Ars Orientalis, V [1963]: 17–27.

1196. For parallel accounts, cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 243–45; Fragmenta, 154–56.

1197. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1870–73.

his sending Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ulāthah and a group of notables from the people of the Jazīrah (to Yazīd) while he (Marwān) was in Ḥarrān.

According to Aḥmad (b. Zuhayr)—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad: When Marwān heard about the death of Yazīd he sent a message to Ibn 'Ulāthah and his associates, recalling them from Manbij,[1198] whilst he (himself) set out for Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd. Marwān departed with the jund of the Jazīrah, having appointed his son 'Abd al-Malik as his deputy with forty thousand men from the garrison in al-Raqqah.[1199] When he reached[1200] Qinnasrīn, where there was a brother of Yazīd b. al-Walīd called Bishr, whom Yazīd had appointed as governor of Qinnasrīn, Bishr sallied forth toward him, drew up his forces (in preparation to fight) against Marwān, and made a proclamation to the people. Marwān called upon them to give the oath of allegiance to him.[1201] Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah, along with the Qaysiyyah, favored Marwān, and they handed over Bishr and a brother of his called Masrūr b. al-Walīd [1877] who was Bishr's brother on his mother's and father's side. Marwān took him and his brother Masrūr b. al-Walīd and imprisoned them. He (then) departed with those people from the Jazīrah and from Qinnasrīn whom he had with him, making in the direction of the people of Ḥimṣ. When Yazīd b. al-Walīd died, the people of Ḥimṣ had refused to give the oath of allegiance to Ibrāhīm and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj. So Ibrāhīm dispatched 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj and the jund of the people of Damascus, and he laid siege to them in their city. Marwān hastened his pace, and when he came near to the city of Ḥimṣ 'Abd al-'Azīz departed from them (the people of Ḥimṣ).[1202] They all came out to Marwān, gave the oath

---

1198. For Manbij, cf. EI[1], s.v. (E. Honigmann).

1199. For al-Raqqah, the principal city of Diyār Muḍar, cf. EI[1], s.v. (E. Honigmann).

1200. The text has itnahā. It is later corrected to intahā (cf. Add., II, p. DCCXIV). The Cairo edition has the correct form (VII, 300).

1201. Fa-kharaja ilayhi fa-ṣāffahu fa-nādā al-nās wa-da'āhum Marwān ilā mubāya'atihi. This is rather ambiguous, but presumably Bishr is performing all the actions here until Marwān is specifically mentioned. Certainly this is the interpretation to be inferred from the punctuation of the Cairo edition (loc. cit.).

1202. Ibn al-Athīr has "departed from it" (i.e., the city; V, 244).

of allegiance to him, and left with him. Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd sent out contingents with Sulaymān b. Hishām, who went with them and encamped at 'Ayn al-Jarr where Marwān came to him. Sulaymān had one hundred and twenty thousand horsemen and Marwān had eighty thousand with him. They (the two sides) met each other and Marwān called on them to refrain from fighting him and to release the two sons of al-Walīd, al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān, who were imprisoned in the jail in Damascus. He guaranteed on their behalf (i.e., al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān) that they would not take reprisals against them (al-Walīd's murderers) because the latter had killed their father (i.e., al-Walīd) and that the two of them would not seek out any of those who had been responsible for his murder. They (Sulaymān's men) refused to accept it (the guarantee) and persisted in fighting Marwān. They fought from the time that the sun was high[1203] until late afternoon, and the slaughter on both sides mounted and was general amongst them. Marwān was experienced and wily, so he called three of his commanders, one of whom was a brother of Isḥāq b. Muslim[1204] called 'Īsā, and he ordered them to go behind his line with his cavalry, which numbered three thousand, sending with them laborers with axes. The two lines of Marwān's men and those of Sulaymān b. Hishām filled the area between the two mountains that enclosed the meadow, whilst between the two armies there flowed a slowly moving river.[1205] Marwān ordered them to cut down the trees when they reached the mountain, to tie the logs together, to cross over to Sulaymān's army, and to make a surprise attack on it.

Sulaymān's cavalry, who were[1207] busy fighting, were aware [1878] only of the horses and swords and of the takbīr (being said) by their own men behind them. So when they saw that (i.e., Mar-

---

1203. Irtifā' al-nahār. Cf. Lane, I, 1123.

1204. Isḥāq b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī had served in Armenia and Āzarbāyjān. For his biography, cf. Crone, 106. Little is known of his brother 'Īsā.

1205. Jarrār. Cf. Gloss., p. CLXI. Riḍā suggests that the term means "slowly moving on account of its abundance" (I, 507).

1206. Jusūr: that on which one crosses over a river or the like (Lane, I, 424).

1207. Huwa mashghūlūn is corrected by the editor to hum mashghūlūn. Cf. Add., II, p. DCCXIV.

wān's men crossing the river) they fled in disarray and were routed. The people of Ḥimṣ thrust their weapons into them because of their anger toward them, and they killed about seventeen thousand of them. The people of the Jazīrah and Qinnasrīn (on the other hand) recoiled from slaughtering them, and they did not kill a single one of them. They brought to Marwān prisoners from amongst them who were as many as those killed or even more, and Marwān's men were permitted to plunder Sulaymān's army.[1208] Marwān took the ba'yah from them in favor of the two boys, al-Ḥakam and 'Uthmān; he released them (the prisoners) after he had provided them[1209] with a dīnār each, and he allowed them to rejoin their families. He killed only two men from their number, one of whom was called Yazīd b. al-'Aqqār and the other al-Walīd b. Maṣād, both of them Kalbīs. They were among those who had gone after al-Walīd and compassed his murder. Yazīd b. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī was with them, and he took flight with those who escaped with Sulaymān b. Hishām to Damascus. One of the two, i.e, the two Kalbīs, had been in command of the guards of Yazīd (b. al-Walīd), and the other had been in charge of his police.[1210] Marwān beat them with whips then and there.[1211] He subsequently gave orders concerning them, and they were thrown into prison, where they perished.[1212] Sulaymān and those men who were with him kept going until they reached Damascus, where the leaders of the people[1213]—Yazīd b. Khālid al-Qasrī, Abu 'Ilāqah al-Saksakī,[1214] al-Aṣbagh b. Dhu'ālah al-Kalbī,[1215] and the likes of them—gathered to him, Ibrāhīm, and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj. They said to one another: "If the two boys, the sons of al-Walīd, survive until Marwān

---

1208. Lit. "their 'askar was made lawful."

1209. Fragmenta, 156, has "after he had given them stipends."

1210. I.e., ṣāḥib al-ḥaras and ṣāḥib al-shurṭah.

1211. Lit. "in that stopping place of his."

1212. Lit. "they were imprisoned, and they perished in his prison."

1213. Ru'ūs min ma'ahum. Fragmenta, 156, is less ambiguous: ru'ūs al-nās.

1214. The text has Abū 'Ilāqah. Crone vocalizes this name as 'Ulāqah (op. cit., 96 and 294). This person is Sarī b. Ziyād, one of the conspirators against al-Walīd II (cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1778, 1800).

1215. Cf. his biography in Crone, 156.

arrives and gets them out of prison and authority devolves onto them, they will not spare any of their father's murderers. The best thing for us is to kill them both." So they appointed Yazīd b. Khālid to do that. In prison with the two of them were Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī and Yūsuf b. 'Umar. Yazīd sent a mawlā affiliated to Khālid (al-Qasrī) called Abū al-Asad with a number of [1879] his associates. Abū al-Asad went into the prison and broke the skulls of the two young boys with clubs.[1216] He brought out Yūsuf b. 'Umar in order that they should kill him, and he was (accordingly) beheaded. They (also) wanted to kill Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī.[1217] He went into one of the rooms of the prison, locked the door,[1218] threw carpets and cushions behind it,[1219] and leant against it, so that nobody could open it.[1220] They called for fire to burn him out,[1221] but it was not brought before news came that Marwān's cavalry had entered the city.[1222] Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd fled and hid himself. Sulaymān plundered[1223] what was in the treasury, distributed it amongst those contingents he had with him, and left the city.

In this year[1224] 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib[1225] summoned people in al-Kūfah to his cause and fought 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān[1226] there. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar defeated 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah, who made for al-Jibāl[1227] and took possession of it.

1216. For a previous account of this murder, cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1841–42.

1217. For this person, cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1828, 1830–31.

1218. Fa-aghlaqahu.

1219. Khalfahu. Presumably the door is meant here, although it could be translated as "behind him."

1220. Fa-lam yaqdir 'alā fatḥihi. Both the Cairo edition (VII, 302) and Ibn al-Athīr (V, 245) have yaqdirū.

1221. Li-yuḥriqūhu. It is possible that the prison is meant here, rather than al-Sufyānī.

1222. Here Ibn al-Athīr adds: "and they (Yazīd's associates) fled" (loc. cit.).

1223. Wa-anhaba. Ibn al-Athīr has the more appropriate usage of intahaba (loc. cit.). Fragmenta (156) has nahaba.

1224. The apparatus has the variant "Abū Ja'far said" before the account begins.

1225. This man was a Shī'ite, the great-grandson of 'Alī's brother Ja'far. Cf. Shaban, Islamic History, 161; Wellhausen, 384.

1226. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1854–55, 1858, 1864, 1867–68, and subsequent accounts.

1227. For the province of Jibāl, cf. Le Strange, Lands, 185–231; EI[2], s.v. (L. Lockhart).

The Account of the Cause of the Uprising of 'Abdallāh (b. Mu'āwiyah) and of His Summoning the People to Himself

According to Hishām (b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī)—Abū Mikhnaf: 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah rebelled against 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar and declared war on him in Muḥarram 127 (October 13, 744–November 11, 744).[1228]

According to Aḥmad—'Alī b. Muḥammad—'Āṣim b. Ḥafṣ al-Tamīmī and other knowledgeable people: The reason for the uprising of 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far against 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz was that the former came to al-Kūfah on a visit to the latter seeking remuneration from him[1229]
[1880] and not intending to rebel, and he married the daughter of Ḥātim b. al-Sharqī b. 'Abd al-Mu'min b. Shabath b. Rib'ī.[1330] When tribal discord surfaced, the Kūfans said to him: "Call on people to join you, for the Banū Hāshim are more entitled to rule than the Banū Marwān." Then 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah summoned people secretly in al-Kūfah whilst Ibn 'Umar was in al-Ḥīrah, and Ibn Ḍamrah al-Khuzā'ī gave him the oath of allegiance. Then Ibn 'Umar got in touch with Ibn Ḍamrah secretly and gave him a bribe.[1331] Then Ibn Ḍamrah[1232] sent a message to Ibn 'Umar saying, "When we meet the people I will retreat with them." This message reached Ibn Mu'āwiyah and when the people assembled he said: "Ibn Ḍamrah has acted treacherously, and he has promised Ibn 'Umar that he will retreat with the people. So do not be alarmed when he retreats,[1233] for he will be doing so out of treachery." When they assembled, Ibn Ḍamrah retreated, and the people retreated (too), and nobody remained with Ibn Mu'āwiyah. He recited:

1228. For other accounts of the revolt of 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah, cf. al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 228–32; Ibn al-Athīr, V, 246–48; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 394–95.

1229. Yaltamisu ṣilatahu. The Aghānī (XII, 228) has mustamīhan "asking for a stipend."

1230. For the family of this man, cf. Crone, 118. He must have been a local notable.

1231. Fa-arḍāhu: lit: "gave him what satisfied him."

1232. The Aghānī calls him Ibn Ḥamzah (XII, 229).

1233. Lit: "do not let his running away alarm you." And yet, as the sequel shows, the people did do exactly as Ibn Ḍamrah wanted, leaving Ibn Mu'āwiyah in the lurch.

The gazelles have departed from Khidāsh,[1234] so Khidāsh does not know what to hunt.

Ibn Mu'āwiyah returned to al-Kūfah—they had met at a place between al-Ḥīrah and al-Kūfah—and then he went to Ctesiphon (al-Madā'in), and the people gave the oath of allegiance to him. A group of Kūfans joined him, and he departed and took possession of Ḥulwān[1235] and al-Jibāl.

It is said: 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah came to al-Kūfah and collected a group of people, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar did not know (about it) until 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah went out to the jabbānah, assembling (his men) for battle. When they met, Khālid b. Qaṭan al-Ḥārithī[1236] was in charge of the Yemenis. Al-Aṣbagh b. Dhu'ālah al-Kalbī with the Syrians pressed Khālid, and he and the Kūfans fled. (One group of) Nizār held back from (attacking another group of) Nizār, and they returned (to al-Kūfah). Fifty men of the Zaydiyyah came to the house of Ibn Muḥriz al-Qurashī intending to fight, and they were killed. None of the Kūfans apart from them were killed.

Ibn Mu'āwiyah left al-Kūfah for Ctesiphon in the company of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās al-Tamīmī. Then he left there and took possession of al-Māhān,[1237] Hamadhān, Qūmis, Iṣfahān, and al-Rayy.[1238] The slaves of the Kūfans joined him and he recited (the following):[1239] [1881]

Do not embark on an action[1240] for the like of which you blame your brother.
Of no pleasure to you will be the saying of a man who contradicts what he says in what he does.

1234. For Khidāsh, cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1503, 1588, 1593; Wellhausen, 504, 509–11, 514–17; *EI*², s.v. (M. Sharon).

1235. For the city of Ḥulwān in the province of Jibāl, cf. Le Strange, Lands, 191; *EI*², s.v. (L. Lockhart).

1236. For this man's family, cf. Crone, 111–12.

1237. For the city of Māhān in the province of Kirmān, cf. Le Strange, Lands, 307.

1238. Ibn al-Athīr has a slightly different list of places in his account—Ḥulwān, al-Jibāl, Hamadhān, Iṣfahān, and al-Rayy (V, 248).

1239. Those lines are found, along with others not included here, in the Aghānī (XII, 232).

1240. Al-ṣanī. Cf. Lane, I, 1734.

As for Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā, he asserted that the reason for that (i.e., the rebellion of Ibn Mu'āwiyah) was that 'Abdallāh, al-Ḥasan, and Yazīd b.[1241] Mu'āwiyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far came to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, and they lodged amongst the (Banū) Nakh'[1242] in the house of a mawlā of theirs called al-Walīd b. Sa'īd. Ibn 'Umar treated them kindly, gave them presents, and spent three hundred dirhams on them every[1243] day. Their situation remained like this until Yazīd b. al-Walīd died and the people gave the oath of allegiance to his brother Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd and after him to 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik. (News of) the ba'yah in their names came to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar in al-Kūfah. So the people gave the oath of allegiance to the two of them, and he increased the people's stipends by a hundred (dirhams) each. He wrote to the outlying districts (announcing) that the oath of allegiance had been given to them, and (news of) the oath (being taken there) reached him. While he was thus engaged, he heard that Marwān b. Muḥammad had gone with the people of al-Jazīrah to Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd and that Marwān had held back from giving Ibrāhīm the oath of allegiance. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar kept 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah close by him; he increased what he was spending on him and prepared him to face up to Marwān b. Muḥammad, so that, if Marwān was victorious over Ibrāhīm, 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah would give him ('Abdallāh b. 'Umar) the oath of allegiance and would fight Marwān with him. The people were in an uproar about what was going on. As Marwān came near to Syria, Ibrāhīm sallied forth to him and fought him. When Marwān had defeated and routed him, Ibrāhīm fled.[1244] 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥajjāj stood firm in the battle until he was killed. Ismā'īl b. 'Abdallāh, the brother of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī, [1882] fled until he reached al-Kūfah. He had been in Ibrāhīm's army. He 1241. The editor rightly notes that it would be more accurate to say "Banū" (Notes, 1881).

1242. The Banū Nakh' were brought from Yemen to al-Kūfah at the time of the wars of conquest (cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 444).

1243. Ibn al-Athīr has "on him and his brothers" (V, 246).

1244. Wa-kharaja ilayhi Ibrāhīm fa-qātalahu fa-hazamahu Marwān wa-ẓafara bihi wa-kharaja hāriban. The Cairo edition has a version of the text that is different in some places, although its apparatus makes no reference to this: wa-kharaja ilayhi Ibrāhīm fa-qātalahu Marwān fa-hazamahu wa-ẓafara bi-'askarihi wa-kharaja hāriban (VII, 304).

fabricated a letter allegedly from Ibrāhīm about the governorship of al-Kūfah. Then he sent a message to the Yamāniyyah and secretly informed them that Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd had appointed him governor of Iraq, and the Yamāniyyah accepted that from him. When 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar heard about this, he came for Ismā'īl at the daybreak prayer, accompanied by 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍban,[1245] and attacked him straightaway. When Ismā'īl saw that—having no letter of contract with him and (knowing that) his master, in whose name he had counterfeited the appointment, was fleeing in disarray—he became afraid that his doings might be made public and that he would be disgraced and killed. So he said to his companions: "I dislike the shedding of blood, and I did not realize that the matter would end like this. So hold back your hands (from fighting)." Then the group left him, and he said to the people of his family: "Ibrāhīm has fled, and Marwān has entered Damascus." This was related by the people of Ismā'īl's family, and the news spread. Strife became general, and tribal discord broke out amongst the people. The cause of that was as follows: 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar had given Muḍar and Rabī'ah very large stipends and had not given anything to Ja'far b. Nāfi' b. al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr al-Dhuhlī and 'Uthmān b. al-Khaybarī, the brother of[1246] Banū Taym al-Lāt,[1247] and had not treated them equally with their peers. So the two of them went to see 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar and spoke rudely to him. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar became angry and gave orders concerning them. 'Abd al-Malik al-Ṭā'ī, who was in charge of his police force (and) who was standing at his head, went up to them. He pushed them away, and they pushed him and went out angrily. Thumāmah b. Ḥawshab b. Ruwaym al-Shaybānī[1248] was present, and he left in angry protest because of his two friends. Then they all departed for al-Kūfah. This occurred while Ibn 'Umar was in al-Ḥīrah. When they came to al-Kūfah, they shouted: "O family of Rabī'ah!" Then the Rabī'ah rose up on their behalf; they assembled and were in an angry mood. When Ibn 'Umar heard the news, he sent his brother 'Āṣim against them. When he reached 1245. For this head of the shurṭah for 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, cf. Crone, 162.

1246. Ibn al-Athīr has "from," rather than "the brother of" (V, 246).

1247. For this branch of the Bakr, cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 543.

1248. Thumāmah had been head of police for Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, apparently in Wāsit (cf. Crone, 119).

them they were in Dayr Hind,[1249] where they had gathered together.[1250] He precipitated himself among them and said, "This is my hand (as a pledge) for you, so make your decision." They felt [1883] ashamed and honored and thanked ʿĀṣim. ʿĀṣim went up to their two leaders, but they remained silent and held back. In the evening, under cover of night, Ibn ʿUmar sent to ʿUmar b. al-Ghaḍbān with one hundred thousand (dirhams), and he distributed them amongst his tribe, the Banū Hammām b. Murrah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān.[1251] He sent to Thumāmah b. Ḥawshab b. Ruwaym with one hundred thousand (dirhams), and the latter distributed them amongst his tribe. He sent to Jaʿfar b. Nāfiʿ b. al-Qaʿqāʿ with ten thousand (dirhams)[1252] and to ʿUthmān b. al-Khaybarī with ten thousand.

According to Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): When the Shīʿites saw his[1253] weakness, they censured him, became enboldened against him, sought to overcome him, and called for ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah b. Jaʿfar—the person who was in charge of that was Hilāl b. Abī al-Ward, the mawlā of the Banū ʿIjl. The Shīʿites rose up with the rabble from the people and reached the mosque where they assembled. Hilāl was the one in charge of matters. The Shīʿites joined him in giving the oath of allegiance to ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah. Then they went immediately to ʿAbdallāh (b. Muʿāwiyah), removed him from the house of al-Walīd b. Saʿīd, brought him into the citadel, and prevented ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar from entering the citadel. So ʿĀṣim joined his brother ʿAbdallāh in al-Ḥīrah. The Kūfans came to Ibn Muʿāwiyah and gave the oath of allegiance to him; amongst them were ʿUmar b. al-Ghaḍbān b. al-Qabaʿtharī, Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī, and those Syrians who had family connections[1254] in al-Kūfah. He remained in al-Kūfah for a few days, and the people gave the oath of allegiance to him. The oath of allegiance was (also) given to him in Ctesiphon (al-Madāʾin) and Fam al-Nīl,[1255] and the people 1249. There were two sites known as Dayr Hind in al-Ḥīrah (Yāqūt, II, 707 and 709).

1250. Lit: "they had assembled and collected."

1251. Cf. Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 278.

1252. Ibn al-Athīr has simply "money" (V, 247).

1253. Presumably Ibrāhīm is meant here, although it could equally apply to Ibn ʿUmar.

1254. Lit: "who had family and stock."

1255. Cf. Wellhausen, 541.

flocked to him. Then he left, making for 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar in al-Ḥīrah. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar came out to (meet) him with those Syrians who were with him. One of the Syrians sallied forth demanding single combat. So al-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Ghaffār al-'Ijlī came out against him. The Syrian said to him: "I issued my challenge when I did, but I did not think that a man from the Bakr [1884] b. Wā'il would come out to me. By God, I do not want to fight against you—but I would like to tell you what (information) has reached us. I should tell you that there is no Yemeni with you, neither Manṣūr nor Ismā'īl nor any other, who has not written to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, and letters have (also) come to him from the Muḍar. (Yet) I have seen, O tribe of Rabī'ah, no letter or messenger on your behalf. They are not fighting you today, but in the morning they will do so.[1256] Therefore, if you can see to it that no blow is struck amongst you,[1257] then do so, for I am a man of Qays, and we shall be ranged opposite you tomorrow. If you want to write a letter to our master, then I will deliver it (to him); and if you want to keep faith with those in whose company you have rebelled, I have told you how matters stand with the people." Then al-Qāsim called men from his tribe, and he told them what the man had said to him and that the right wing of Ibn 'Umar, Rabī'ah and Muḍar, would be drawn up opposite his (Ibn Mu'āwiyah's) left wing, in which Rabī'ah[1258] would (also) be. 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah said: "This is a matter that will become clear to us if we wait until the morning.[1259] If 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān wishes, then let him meet me tonight; and, if some activity in which he is involved prevents him, it is (only) an excuse.[1260] Tell him that I think that the Qaysī has been lying." The messenger brought 'Umar that (news), and he sent him back to Ibn Mu'āwiyah with a letter informing him that its bearer had some standing with him

---

1256. Lit: "they are not fighting you today until you get up in the morning and they will fight you." Ibn al-Athīr has: "Tomorrow we will be opposite you, for today they are not fighting you" (loc. cit.).

1257. In istata'tum an lā takūna bikum al-ḥazzata. Cf. Gloss., p. CLXCI.

1258. The Cairo edition has min Rabī'ah, and its punctuation yields the translation: "that the left wing of Ibn 'Umar is from Rabī'ah, and Muḍar will be standing opposite his (Ibn Mu'āwiyah's) right wing, in which is Rabī'ah" (VII, 306). This is less satisfactory.

1259. Lit: "This is a sign that will appear to us if we get up in the morning."

1260. Fa-huwa ghadara. The Cairo edition prefers the reading fa-huwa 'udhrun: "it is an excuse" (loc. cit.). This latter reading has been followed in the translation.

('Umar) and ordering him to obtain assurances from Manṣūr and Ismā'īl—'Umar wanted no more than to let the two of them know what was happening.[1261] Ibn Mu'āwiyah refused to comply. The following morning the people began to fight. Ibn Mu'āwiyah had put the Yamāniyyah on the right wing and Muḍar and Rabī'ah on the left. A herald announced: "Anyone who brings a head will have such and such or (anyone who brings) a prisoner will have such and such, and the money is with 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān." The people met (in battle) and began fighting. 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān attacked the right flank of Ibn 'Umar, and they withdrew in disor-[1885] der. (Thereupon) Ismā'īl and Manṣūr departed straightaway to al-Ḥīrah. The rabble from among the people attacked the Yamāniyyah with the Kūfans, and they killed more than thirty of them. The Hāshimite al-'Abbās b. 'Abdallāh, the husband of the daughter of al-Malāt, was killed.

According to 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—his father—'Ātikah, daughter of al-Malāt: "I married a number of husbands amongst whom was al-'Abbās b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal, who was killed with 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-'Azīz in the tribal discord in Iraq." Mubakkir b. al-Ḥawārī b. Ziyād and others of them (the Kūfans) were killed. Then they (the rest), including 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah, withdrew, and he entered the citadel of al-Kūfah. The left wing, consisting of the Muḍar and Rabī'ah, remained (on the battlefield), with the Syrians opposite them. Those Syrians who were stationed amongst the people in the center launched an attack on the Zaydiyyah, and they fled and entered al-Kūfah. The left wing, numbering some five hundred men, remained (firm). 'Āmir b. Ḍubārah, Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah b. Qabīṣah, 'Utbah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Tha'labī, and al-Naḍr b. Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Ḥarashī came along and stopped at the Rabī'ah. They said to 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān: "As for us, O tribe of Rabī'ah, we do not feel that you are safe against what the people did with the Yamāniyyah, and we are afraid that you will receive similar treatment, so go away." 'Umar said: "I will not leave until I die."[1262] They retorted: "This will avail you and your companions nothing." So they took the reins of his horse and brought him into al-Kūfah.

1261. Wa-innamā arāda an yu'allamahumā bi-dhālika. This is a little obscure. Presumably 'Umar wanted by the ploy of seeking guarantees from Manṣūr and Ismā'īl to inform them of the forthcoming conflict, which would involve fellow-tribesmen fighting each other. This sentence is omitted from Ibn al-Athīr's account (V, 248).

According to 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh al-Nawfalī—his father—Khirāsh b. al-Mughīrah b. 'Aṭiyah, a mawlā of the Banū Layth—his father: "I was the scribe of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar. By God, I was with him one day, when he was in al-Ḥīrah, and somebody came to see him and said: "That man[1263] [1886] 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah has arrived with the people." 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar remained silent for a while, and his head baker came to him and stood in front of him as if notifying him that his food was ready, so 'Abdallāh made a sign to him that he should bring it in and he brought in the food. We were anxious,[1264] fearful that Ibn Mu'āwiyah would attack us while we were with Ibn 'Umar. I began to scrutinize Ibn 'Umar to see whether he had changed in any aspect of his eating or drinking or appearance or the instructions[1265] (he was giving). But no, by God! I failed to see any change either great or small in his mien. When his food was brought in, a bowl was placed in front of each pair of us. A bowl was put between me and so and so and another bowl between so and so and so and so until (all) those who were at his table were included. When he had finished his breakfast and his ablutions, he ordered (that) money (should be brought), and it was (duly) brought, together with vessels of gold and silver and clothes. He distributed most of that amongst his commanders. Then he summoned a mawlā of his, or (perhaps it was) a mamlūk, who used to bring him luck and good fortune because of his name; he was called either Maymūn or Fatḥ or one of the names of good augury.[1266] Ibn 'Umar said to him: "Take your standard, go to such and such a hill, stick it in the ground, call your companions, and 1262. Ḥattā amartu: "until I give the command." The Cairo edition has amūta (VII, 307). This has been followed in the translation, especially in view of the version of Ibn al-Athīr: ḥattā uqtala, "until I am killed" (V, 248).

---

1263. Presumably the word hādhā forms part of the sentence that forms part of the sentence that contains "'Abdallāh." This is certainly the interpretation of the Cairo editor (VII, 307).

1264. Lit: "our hearts became swelled" (disquieted).

1265. Lit: "in any thing of his affair consisting of his place of eating or drinking or outward appearance or ordering or forbidding."

1266. Lit: "from whom he used to look for a blessing (yatabarraku bihi) and remain until I come to you." So he did that. 'Abdallāh (b. 'Umar) set out, accompanied by us, and he reached the hill, where the ground was white with the companions of Ibn Mu'āwiyah. Then 'Abdallāh (b. 'Umar) gave orders to a herald, and he announced that anyone who brought a head would have five hundred (dirhams). By God, it was not long before a head was brought and placed in front of him. He ordered five hundred (dirhams) for it, and they were given to the person who had brought it. When his companions saw the way he had kept faith with the person who had brought the head,[1267] they spread (the news) amongst the people,[1268] and by God it was only a short while before I saw around five hundred heads that had been thrown in front of him. Ibn Mu'āwiyah and those with him withdrew in disarray. The first of his followers who entered al-Kūfah in flight was Abū al-[1887] Bilād, the mawlā of the Banū 'Abs, accompanied by his son Sulaymān. Abū al-Bilād was a Shī'ite supporter. Every day the Kūfans began (afresh) to yell at them as if rebuking them for the defeat of Ibn Mu'āwiyah. Abū al-Bilād began shouting to his son Sulaymān: "Go and let the camels die."[1269] 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah passed by. He hurried through al-Kūfah and did not remain there but went as far as the mountain.[1270]

According to Abū 'Ubaydah: 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah and his brothers entered the citadel. When evening came, they said to 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān and his associates: "O company of Rabī'ah, you have seen what the people have done to us. We have made you responsible for our lives with your own[1271] (lives as surety). If you fight together with us, we will fight together with you, and, if you see the people forsaking both us and you, then take a pledge from whose name he would seek a good augury (yatafā'alu bi-ismihi), being called Maymūn or Fatḥ or one of the names through which blessing is sought by uttering the name of God (al-mutabarrak bihā)." Ibn al-Athīr adds "Riyāḥ . . . or another auspicious name" (V, 247). Cf. *EI*², "fa'l" (T. Fahd).

---

1267. Lit: "the owner of the head," a phrase that might be misinterpreted as it stands!

1268. The Cairo edition has thārū bi-al-qawm: "they rose up with the people" (VII, 308).

1269. Al-nawāḍiḥ, plural of nāḍiḥ: "a camel or ass or bull upon which water is drawn"; cf. Lane, I, 2807.

1270. This is possibly a reference to al-Jibāl, since preceding accounts in al-Ṭabarī mention that area as the destination of Ibn Mu'āwiyah.

1271. Cf. Gloss., p. CCCLXXIII.

of safe-conduct both on our behalf and on your own, for whatever you take in respect to yourselves we will (also) be satisfied with for ourselves." 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān assured them: "We will not leave you without fulfilling one of two conditions:[1272] either that we will fight together with you or that we will take a pledge of safe-conduct for you as we take for ourselves. So calm yourselves." So they stayed in the citadel, whilst the Zaydiyyah were at the entrances of the streets with the Syrians hastening[1273] out to them (the Zaydiyyah) and embarking on fighting them (and beginning a conflict that lasted) for several days. Then the Rabī'ah took a pledge of safe-conduct for themselves, the Zaydiyyah, and 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah; (this specified) that they would not pursue[1274] them and that they (Ibn Mu'āwiyah's men) might go wherever they wanted. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar sent a message to 'Umar b. al-Ghaḍbān ordering him to attack the citadel and to bring out 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah. So Ibn al-Ghaḍbān sent a message to him and removed Ibn Mu'āwiyah and those of his party and his followers from amongst the people of Ctesiphon, the Sawād, and al-Kūfah who were with him. The envoys of 'Umar accompanied them until they had driven them from the bridge, and then 'Umar came down from the citadel.

In this year al-Ḥārith b. Surayj came to Marw,[1275] making his way there from the land of the Turks with the safe-conduct that [1888] Yazīd b. al-Walīd had written for him. He came to Naṣr b. Sayyār; then he opposed Naṣr and displayed hostility toward him, and a large group of people gave the oath of allegiance to him on that basis.

The Account of the Affair of al-Ḥārith and Naṣr after al-Ḥārith Came to See Him

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—his shaykhs: Al-Ḥārith went to Marw on his departure from the land of the 1272. Min iḥdā khallatayn: lit: "from one of two qualities."

1273. The text has yaghdūna. This is later corrected to yaghdū. Cf. Add., II, p. DCCXIV. The Cairo edition has the corrected form (VII, 308).

1274. The text has lā yamna'ūnahum. Nöldeke suggests allā yatba'ūhum. Cf. Add., II, p. DCCXIV. The Cairo edition follows Nöldeke (loc. cit.).

1275. Cf. al-Ṭabarī, II, 1866–69.

Turks.[1276] He reached Marw on the last Sunday of Jumādā II 127 (Sunday, April 4, 745), when the month had three days left to run. Salm b. Aḥwaz and the people met al-Ḥārith at Kushmāhan.[1277] Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl[1278] b. ʿAṭiyah al-ʿAbsī proclaimed: "Praise be to God who has caused us to rejoice at your coming and who has handed you back to the ordinance to Islam and the community." Al-Ḥārith announced: "O my people, did you not know that the many, when they are in disobedience to God, are few and that the few, when they are in obedience to God, are many? I have not been happy from the time I rebelled until today, and there is no happiness for me unless God is obeyed." When he entered Marw, he said: "O God, I have had no purpose in anything (that has transpired) between them and me other than to keep faith. If they want to act treacherously, then help me against them." Naṣr met him and lodged him in the citadel of the Bukhār Khudāh. Naṣr set aside fifty dirhams for his daily expenses, and he used to restrict himself to one dish. Naṣr released those of al-Ḥārith's family who were in his custody. He set free Muḥammad b. al-Ḥārith and al-Alūf, the daughter of al-Ḥārith and Umm Bakr. When his son Muḥammad came to him, he (al-Ḥārith) said: "O God, make him pious and God-fearing."

Al-Waḍḍāḥ b. Ḥabīb b. Budayl came to Naṣr b. Sayyār on behalf of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar. A sharp cold had afflicted him, so Naṣr wrapped him in garments and ordered hospitality and two slave girls for him. Then al-Waḍḍāḥ went in to see al-Ḥārith, who had a group of his companions standing at his head. Al-Waḍḍāḥ said:
[1889] "We in Iraq have heard a lot about the size and weight of your mace, and I would like to see it." Al-Ḥārith replied: "It is like one of those (maces) that you see wielded by those (men)" and pointed to his followers. "But whenever I strike with it, my blow becomes well known."[1279] His mace weighed eighteen Syrian *raṭl*s.

Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj came in to see Naṣr wearing the coat of mail

---

1276. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 249.

1277. For Kushmayhan, one march from Marw on the road to Bukhārā, cf. Le Strange, Lands, 400. According to al-Yaʿqūbī, it was called Kushmāhan (ibid.).

1278. The text has al-Fuḍayl. This is later corrected to al-Faḍl. Cf. Add., II, p. DCCXIV.

1279. The text seems unsatisfactory here: walākinnanī idhā ḍarabtu bihi ḍarbatī. The Cairo edition has: walākinnanī idhā ḍarabtu bihi shuhirat ḍarabatnī (V, 309). The translation given is very tentative and is based on the reading idhā ḍarabtu bihi shuhirat ḍarbatī.

that he had obtained from a khāqān. The khāqān had made al-Ḥārith choose between one hundred thousand Danbakāniyyah *dīnār*s and the coat of mail, and he had chosen the coat of mail. Al-Marzubānah, the daughter of Qudayd and the wife of Naṣr b. Sayyār, caught sight of it. She sent al-Ḥārith a sable garment of hers with a slave girl who (also) belonged to her with the message: "Greet my cousin and say to him that it is cold today, so warm yourself up with this sable garment, and praise be to God who has brought you safely (here)." Al-Ḥārith said to the slave girl: "Greet my cousin and say to her: 'Is this a loan or a gift?' " She said: "It's a gift." Then al-Ḥārith sold it for four thousand *dīnār*s and distributed them amongst his companions. Naṣr sent al-Ḥārith many carpets and a horse. Al-Ḥārith sold all that and distributed the proceeds equally amongst his companions. Al-Ḥārith used to sit on a saddle with a rough cushion folded for him. Naṣr suggested to al-Ḥārith that he (Naṣr) should entrust him with authority and give him one hundred thousand dīnārs. Al-Ḥārith refused to accept and sent a message to Naṣr saying: "I have no liking at all for this world nor for its (lit: 'those') pleasures nor for marriage with the most excellent of the Arabs. I ask only for the Book of God, may He be praised and glorified, and for conduct in accordance with the sunnah and for fair treatment of the people who are good and have merit. If you act accordingly, I will help you against your enemy." Then al-Ḥārith sent to al-Kirmānī saying: "If Naṣr deals with me by the Book of God and fair treatment of the people who are good and have merit, as I have asked him, I will support him and will fulfill God's command. If he does not do so, I will call on God's help against him, and I will help you if you guarantee to me what I want in the way of conduct in accordance with justice and the sunnah." [1890] Whenever the Banū Tamīm came in to see him, he would summon them to himself—and Muḥammad b. Ḥumrān, Muḥammad b. Ḥarb b. Jirfās al-Minqariyyān, al-Khalīl b. Ghazwān al-'Adawī, 'Abdallāh b. Mujjā'ah, Hubayrah b. Sharāḥīl al-Sa'diyyān, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abd Rabbihi al-Laythī, Bishr b. Jurmūz al-Ḍabbī, Nahār b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥutāt al-Mujāshi'ī, and 'Abdallāh al-Nubātī took the oath of allegiance to al-Ḥārith. Al-Ḥārith said to Naṣr: "I left this city thirteen years ago in disgust at tyranny, and (now) you want to incite me to that." Then three thousand men joined al-Ḥārith.

Appendix I

Problems of Translation

i. Al-Walīd's letter to Hishām (al-Ṭabarī, II, 1746–47)

(a) 1746, l.6: min . . . maḥwi mā maḥā min aṣḥābī wa-ḥuramī wa-ahlī. Al-Iṣfahānī (Aghānī, VI, 107) has min . . . maḥwi mā maḥā min aṣhābī wa-annahu ḥarramanī wa ahlī ("how he has ruined my friends and has ostracized me and my dependents").

(b) 1746, ll.7–8: wa-lam akun akhāfu an yabtaliya Allāhu amīra al-mu'minīna bi-dhālika wa-lā ubālī bi-hi minhu. For both the literal and more elegant Latin translations of this passage and a detailed discussion, cf. Gloss., CXLI. Al-Iṣfahānī has wa-lam akun akhāfu an yabtaliya Allāhu amīra al-mu'minīna bi-dhālika fiyya wa-lā yunālunī mithlahu minhu (lit., "I would never have thought that God would thus test the Commander of the Faithful through me and that he (Hishām) would defame me like that"). Cf. Aghānī, loc. cit. This version, as suggested in the Ṭabarī apparatus, is much better and has been adopted here.

Cf. also al-Balādhurī's version: "I did not fear that God would thus test the Commander of the Faithful nor that He would test me thereby" (Ansāb (Derenk), 13).

(c) 1746, l.10: The text has istiṣlāḥihi. The apparatus has the variant istiṣḥābī, which makes good sense, especially with the suggested amendment lahu (II, 1746, n. 1.) The translation given is based on the variant. Cf. al-Iṣfahānī's version: istiṣḥābī li-Ibni Suhayl. Cf. Aghānī, loc. cit.

(d) 1746, l.16–1747, l.1: fa-al-nāsu bayna dhālika yaqtarifūna al-āthāma ʿalā nufūsihim min Allāhi aw yastawjibūna al-ujūr ʿalayhi ("in such a situation men commit sin against themselves before God or deserve punishments on that basis"). The Cairo edition (VII, 213) has a very significant change in the text, a change for which no textual justification is given: wa-lā yastawjibūna al-ʿuqūbata ʿalayhi ("they do not deserve punishment on that basis").

A more satisfactory reading is that in the Aghānī, 107: wa-yaqtarifūna al-āthamā ʿalā anfusihim min Allāhi bi-mā yastawjibūna al-ʿuqūbata ʿalayhi ("They commit sins against themselves before God for which they deserve punishment"). This version has been used in the translation.

For al-Walīd's views on the Qadariyyah, cf. n. 641.

ii. Hishām's letter to al-Walīd (al-Ṭabarī, II, 1747–49)

(a) 1747, ll.11–13

The text is rather problematical. It reads: wa-amīr al-muʾminīn akhwafu ʿalā nafsihi min iqtirāfi al-maʿthami ʿalayhā fī alladhī kāna yujrī ʿalayka minhu fī alladhī aḥdatha min qaṭʿi mā qaṭaʿa wa-maḥwi mā maḥā min saḥābatika li-amrayni.

Al-Iṣfahānī's version of the same part of the letter is as follows: wa-lā yatakhawwafu ʿalā nafsihi iqtirāfa al-maʿthami fī alladhī aḥdatha min qaṭʿi mā qaṭaʿa wa-maḥwi maḥā min ṣahābatika li-amrayni ("but he (the caliph) does not fear that he has committed wrong in the matter of the cuts he has made and the way in which he has ruined those of your friends whom he has ruined. (This absence of fear is) for two reasons"). Cf. Aghānī, VI, 107.

The version in the Aghānī is adopted without comment by the Cairo al-Ṭabarī edition (VII, 213).

The version given by al-Balādhurī is of some help in clarifying the Leiden al-Ṭabarī text: wa-amīru al-muʿminīn yastaghfiru Allāha min ijrāʾihi mā kāna yujrī ʿalayka fa-inna al-maʿthama fī dhālika akhwafu minhu ʿalā nafsihi fī qaṭʿihi mā qaṭaʿa li-amraynī. Cf. Ansāb (Derenk), 14. A possible translation would be: "The Commander of the Faithful asks God's forgiveness for his having given you the allowance that he gave you, for the wrong in (doing) that is more frightening (to him) than the wrong (lit., what) he has (done) against his soul by making the cuts he has made. (This is) for two reasons".

Appendix II

Al-Walīd's Letter Appointing His Two Sons, al-Ḥakam and ʿUthmān, as His Successors: al-Ṭabarī, II, 1756–64

The notes in the commentary itself deal with small points of clarification raised by the text of al-Walīd's letter. The purpose of this appendix is to consider at greater length the manifold problems of translating the letter. Its style is tortuous and full of rhetorical devices. On a number of occasions the text is clearly corrupt. Throughout, it presents the translator with the problem of striking the right balance between a literal English version which adheres as closely as possible to the Arabic (however convoluted that may be) and a more elegant rendering which might invite the charge of straying too far from the original and thus becoming more of a paraphrase than a proper translation.

The translation offered here took many weeks because of the inherent difficulty of the text. Fortunately, Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds have also been working on this letter (cf. their recent book, God's Caliph, 116–26). As well as a literal translation, they provide a detailed discussion of the background and significance of the letter, concluding that it is authentic.

The translation presented here was made before I saw that of Drs. Crone and Hinds. However, the notes have been adjusted slightly in the light of their comments, and I have made one major emendation in my translation (specified later in this appendix) on the basis of their version. I am very grateful to them for most generously allowing me access to their work just before I completed this volume.

(a) 1757, l.14–1758, l.2.

The decision to omit the extremely problematic phrase fa-lam yabqa kāfirun, supported by the apparatus (BM and O), was made after reading the version of Crone and Hinds (cf. God's Caliph, 119), which makes much better sense. The Leiden text as it stands would require the translation: "there remained no infidel whose blood was not licit thereby and the cutting of ties which were between them (lit., him (the member of the ummah) and him (the infidel)] even if he [lit., they] were his father, son, or tribesman [lit., their fathers, sons, or kinsmen]". For this change from singular to plural, cf. Crone and Hinds, op. cit., 119, n.16.

(b) 1759, l.17–1760, l.1.

The text here is extremely corrupt. The text as it stands reads wa-fī-al ma'ṣiyati mimmā yuḥillu bi-ghayrihim min naqmātihi wa-tuṣībuhum 'alayhi wa-yuḥiqqu min sukhtihi wa-'adhābihi. Crone and Hinds (loc. cit.) make drastic but convincing emendations to the text and give better balance to the different elements of the sentence.

In this translation, the following more modest changes and additions are suggested: wa-fī-al ma'ṣiyati nāla ghayruhum mā yuḥillu bi-him min naqmātihi wa-yusībuhum 'alayhi wa-yuḥiqqu min sukhtihi wa-'adhābihi ("by disobedience others obtain those punishments with which He assails (them) and by which He strikes them and that which befalls them of His displeasure and chastisement").

(c) 1760, ll.1–3

The text has wa-yunzalu bi-al-ṭā'ati. The reading of the Cairo edition (221), wa-bi-tarki al-ṭā'ati (which is partly based on the apparatus), has been preferred in the translation. Even so, it is difficult to decide whether the whole phrase wa-bi-tarki al-ṭā'ati . . . wa-al-tabadduli bi-hā should belong to the preceding sentence or to the following one. Crone and Hinds consider it to belong to the following sentence, thus: "In abandonment and neglect of obedience, in departure from it, lack of attention to it and carelessness of it, God destroys [all] those who stray and disobey. . ." (loc. cit.). There is here, however, a slight non sequitur in the shift of subject from the miscreants to God. If, on the other hand, the phrase bi-tarki al-ṭā'ati . . . al-tabadduli bi-hā is taken with the preceding sentence, the result is perhaps more coherent (if a period is placed after bi-hā.) This alternative has been followed in the translation but with the full awareness that the result is still slightly unsatisfactory. The text would read better with a wa or fa before ahlaka.

(d) 1760, ll.13–14

Once again there is a problem of punctuation. The Cairo edition (VII, 222) makes a break in the sentence after dahmā'ihā, whereas Crone and Hinds make the next phrase dhukhru al-ni'mati part of the preceding sentence. Neither solution is entirely satisfactory. In this translation, the former alternative has been followed and the text is read as wa-dhukhru al-ni'mati 'alayhā . . . huwa al-'ahdu. . . Here 'alayhā refers to the community and the wa before huwa has been omitted.

(e) 1761, ll.1–4

Literally, "a cutting of the enticements of the Devil in that for which his followers long and to which he (the Devil) incites them, concerning the destruction of this religion, the splitting of the unity of its people, and their disagreeing about that in which God united them through it (His religion)".

(f) 1762, l.3

Tastaẓillūna fī afnānihi. There is a variant reading, afnā'ihi. Crone and Hinds read afyā'ihi (op. cit., 123), rejecting afnānihi because of the following preposition fī. Afyā'ihi ("shades") is certainly very plausible. Reading the text as it stands with afnānihi still makes quite good sense. Perhaps there is here an indirect allusion to Qur'ān 55, v.48. This sūrah enumerates the favors of God toward men.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXVII

The ʿAbbāsid Revolution

TRANSLATED BY JOHN ALDEN WILLIAMS

The Caliphate of Marwān b. Muḥammad

In this year the oath of allegiance was given in Damascus to Marwān b. Muḥammad as Caliph.[1]

Why The Oath of Allegiance Was Given to Marwan

ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm reported the following from Abū Hashīm Mukhallad b. Muḥammad, the mawlā of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān: When people announced that Marwān's cavalry had entered Damascus, Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd fled and went into hiding. At this, Sulaymān (b. Hishām) seized what was in the treasury, divided it among his troops, and left the city. Those mawlās of al-Walīd b. Yazīd who were in the city rushed to the house of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Ḥajjāj and slew him. Then they ransacked the grave of Yazīd b. al-Walīd and hung his body on the Jābiyah Gate. Marwān entered Damascus, and Footnotes followed by (J.L.) have been added by Jacob Lassner. Others are those of the translator.

1. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1879; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 392; Azdī, 62ff; FHA, 156; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 404ff; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 46; Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 366.

stopped at 'Āliyah.[2] The two young sons of al-Walīd b. Yazīd who had been slain were brought to him, as well as the body of Yūsuf b. 'Umar, and he ordered that they be given burial.[3] Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī was carried to him in shackles, and he saluted Marwān as [1891] Caliph. Up until that day, Marwān had only been hailed with the title of amīr, so he asked al-Sufyānī, "What's this?" Al-Sufyānī replied, "Both [the sons of al-Walīd] made the Caliphate over to you as their successor."

He then recited some verses composed by al-Ḥakam in prison.

Our source adds that they had both reached legal maturity; al-Ḥakam had begotten offspring, and the other had reached puberty two years before.[4]

The verses of al-Ḥakam were:

Who shall tell Marwān about me, and my noble uncle, yearning long there,

That I have been oppressed and my people have become parties to the slaying of al-Walīd?

Shall their Kalb (also: dog) take my blood and my substance while I obtain neither gristle nor fat?

And Marwān is in the land of the Banū Nizār like a lion of the thicket, a neckbreaker in his lair.

Does not the slaying of that youth of Quraysh afflict you, and their shattering the staff [of unity] of the Muslims?

Now convey my regards to Quraysh.
and to Qays in the Jazīrah, all of them:

---

2. The text is 'Āliyah; perhaps it should be read al-'Āliyah. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 403 reads Dayr al-'Āliyah. The term al-'āliyah generally means the heights of an area as distinct from the low lying areas. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 592.

3. Yūsuf had been imprisoned throughout the reign of al-Walīd. His death and that of al-Walīd was ordered by 'Abd al-'Azīz. The two boys are elsewhere identified as 'Uthmān and al-Ḥakam. They are also called the "two lambs" (ḥaml). See n.1 above.

4. That is, it was legal for them to transfer their authority. A short variant of these verses is found in FHA, 156–57.

The deficient Qadarī[5] has lorded it over us and incited war among the sons of our father.

Had the riders of Sulaym taken part in the battle, and those of Ka'b, I would not be a prisoner.

Had the lions of the Banū Tamīm taken part, we'd not have sold the inheritance we had from our fathers.

Did you break your oath to me because of my mother?
you have sworn allegiance before to a concubine's son.

Would that my maternal uncles were other than Kalb, and had been born to some other people!

Yet if I and my heir-presumptive should perish, then Marwān shall be Commander of the Faithful. [1892]

Then Abū Muḥammad said, "Stretch out your hand and I'll swear allegiance to you." Those of the Syrian army (ahl al-shām) who were with Marwān heard him, and the first to come forward was Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr with the chief people of Ḥimṣ. They swore allegiance to Marwān, whereupon he commanded them to choose governors for their military districts. The men of Damascus chose Zāmil b. 'Amr al-Jibrānī; the men of Ḥimṣ chose 'Abdallāh b. Shajarah al-Kindī; the people of the Jordan chose al-Walīd b. Mu'āwiyah b. Marwān; and those of Palestine chose Thābit b. Nu'aym al-Judhāmī, whom Marwān had extricated from Hishām's prison, and who then had betrayed him in Armenia.[6] Marwān took sure promises and binding oaths from them when they

5. Yazīd b. Walīd had been a Qadarī, or believer in free will. He was called "the Deficient," because he reduced his soldiers' pay. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1874.

6. As chief of the local Yamanī faction, Thābit acted out of partisan motives against Marwān whose support was mostly from the Qays. Thābit took the title al-Qaḥṭānī to indicate descent from the alleged progenitor of the southern tribes and to thus draw wide support. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1871ff; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 393; Azdī, 66; Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 314.

gave him the handclasp of allegiance; then he withdrew to his residence in Ḥarrān.[7]

Abū Ja'far reported that when order had been restored in Syria (al-Shām) on behalf of Marwān b. Muḥammad and he had gone off to his residence in Ḥarrān, Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd and Sulaymān b. Hishām asked for a guarantee of security (amān), and Marwān granted it.[8] Sulaymān, who was then at Tadmur (Palmyra), came to Marwān with his brothers, the members of his family and his mawlās, the Dhakwāniyyah,[9] who were there, and they swore allegiance to Marwān.

In this year, too, the people of Ḥimṣ as well as some of the other people of Syria rebelled against Marwān, and he fought with them.

Revolt of the People of Ḥimṣ[10]

According to Aḥmad—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ: When Marwān left for his residence in Ḥarrān after settling with the Syrian army, he had not been there more than three months before they openly opposed him and rebelled against him. The one who incited them to that was Thābit b. Nu'aym, who sent them messengers and wrote them letters. Information about them reached Marwān, and he marched against them himself. The army of Ḥimṣ sent word to the Kalb who were at [1893] Tadmur, whereupon al-Aṣbagh b. Dhu'ālah al-Kalbī set off toward them, accompanied by three of his sons, full grown men, Ḥamzah, Dhu'ālah and Furāfiṣah. Also accompanying him were Mu'āwiyah al-Saksakī, one of the Syrian cavalry, and 'Iṣmah b. al-Muqsha'irr, Ḥishām b. Maṣād, Ṭufayl b. Ḥārithah and about a thousand horsemen of their tribe. They entered the city of Ḥimṣ on the night of the

7. Ḥarrān thus became the unofficial capital of the new Caliph. Not surprisingly Marwān wished to avoid taking up residence among the followers of his enemies, preferring to remain instead in the area where he had long resided. For Ḥarrān see Le-Strange, Lands, 103.

8. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 393; Azdī, 64; FHA, 157; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, IV, 468.

9. A Syrian regiment named after its commander Muslim b. Dhakwān. These were apparently Sulaymān's guard. While Ṭabarī's terming them mawlās does not necessarily mean they were non-Arabs, it suggests that some of them may not have been Arabs. Such elite regiments supplied the backbone of Marwān's support. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 372, 375. For a challenging and highly speculative view of the late Umayyad military, see P. Crone, Slaves on Horses, esp. 42–57.

10. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 393ff; Azdī, 66; FHA, 158ff.

'Id al-Fiṭr[11] in 127 (June 25, 745). Marwān was at Ḥamāh, no more than thirty miles[12] from Ḥimṣ when the news of them reached him on the morning of the 'Id al-Fiṭr, so he moved quickly. With him at the time were Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd, the deposed Caliph, and Sulaymān b. Hishām. They had sent him messages and asked him for a guarantee of security, and (having received it) they traveled with him as part of his army. Treating them generously, he positioned them both near him, so they sat at his table for dinner and supper and rode with him in his train. He reached Ḥimṣ two days after the 'Id al-Fiṭr, and the Kalb in the city had blocked the gates from inside. He was prepared, as his guard (rābiṭah) was with him. Surrounding the city with his horsemen, he stationed himself opposite one of the gates and looked out over a group of defenders along the wall. His herald then called out, "What call had you to break faith?" They answered, "We still obey you; we have not broken faith with you!" He then told them, "If what you say about yourselves is true, then open the gate!" At this, they opened it. 'Amr b. al-Waḍḍāḥ burst in at the head of the Waḍḍāḥiyyah,[13] who numbered about three thousand men, as they fought the Kalb inside the city. When Marwān's cavalry became too much for them, they ran for one of the gates, called Bāb Tadmur. They went out by it, but Marwān's guard was stationed there and fought them; most of them were thus killed. Al-Aṣbagh b. Dhu'ālah and al-Saksakī got away, but Dhu'ālah and Furāfiṣah, the two sons of al-Aṣbagh, and more than thirty of their men were captured. They were brought to Marwān, who had them killed on the spot. He ordered that all their slain, some five or six hundred, be collected and crucified around the city, and he tore down about a [1984] bowshot's length of the city wall.

The inhabitants of the Ghūṭah (the oasis of Damascus), attacked the city, besieged their governor, Zāmil b. 'Amr, and chose Yazīd b. Khālid al-Qasrī to rule over them. The city and its inhabitants and an officer, named Abū Habbār al-Qurashī, with about four hundred men held fast with Zāmil. Marwān sent Abū al-Ward b. al-Kawthar b. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith, whose name was Majza'ah, from Ḥimṣ to aid the defenders, as well as 'Amr b. al-Waḍḍāḥ and ten thousand men.

11. 'Id al-Fitr is the Feast of Fast-breaking at the end of Ramaḍān, see EI s.v. 'īd.
12. One Arabic mīl is 2 km., one third of a farsakh. See E.12, s.v.
13. The Waḍḍāḥiyyah were a military contingent similar to the Dhakwāniyyah. See n.8 above.

When they came near the city they attacked the besiegers. Abū al-Habbār and his horsemen came out from the city, and they routed the rebels and seized their camp. Then they burned al-Mizzah, one of the villages of the Yamanīs. Yazīd b. Khālid and Abū ʿIlāqah sought refuge with a man of the Lakhm tribe from al-Mizzah. Their whereabouts was reported to Zāmil, who sent for them, but they were both killed before they were brought before him. He then sent their heads to Marwān at Ḥimṣ.

Thābit b. Nuʿaym of the army of Palestine rebelled, advancing as far as Tiberias,[14] and besieged its people. Their governor was Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah b. Marwān, son of the brother of the Caliph ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān. They fought the rebel for several days, whereupon Marwān wrote to Abū al-Ward ordering him to go there and assist them. Abū al-Ward set off from Damascus some days later. When word reached the inhabitants that he was near, they came out of the city against Thābit and his men and seized their camp. Thābit fled to Palestine and gathered his kinsmen and military forces (jund). Abū al-Ward now moved against him and put him to flight a second time, and those who were with Thābit deserted him. Three of his grown sons were captured: Nuʿaym, Bakr, and ʿImrān. Abū al-Ward sent them to Marwān; they were brought to him at Dayr Ayyūb,[15] wounded, and he gave orders for their wounds to be treated.

Thābit b. Nuʿaym went into hiding, and al-Rumāḥis b. ʿAbd al-[1895] ʿAzīz al-Kinānī was made governor of Palestine. Escaping with Thābit was one of his sons, Rifāʿah, who was the worst of them all. (Later) he joined Manṣūr b. Jumhūr,[16] who honored him with gifts, gave him a position and made him his lieutenant along with a brother of his called Manẓūr b. Jumhūr. But Rifāʿah assaulted Manẓūr and murdered him. This came to Manṣūr's ears as he was setting out for Multān—his brother had been at Manṣūrah,[17] so Manṣūr 14. Tiberias (Ṭabariyyah) was the headquarters of the military district of the Jordan (al-Urdunn). See EI s.v. Ṭabariyya.

15. A village situated in the Ḥawrān district near Damascus. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 645.

16. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr was a leader of the Kalb who had helped plan the death of al-Walīd b. Yazīd. He was subsequently made governor of Iraq and later, of Sind. See Ṭabarī, II, 1778, 1800, 1809, 1836; also Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 367, 368.

17. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 629 lists a Multān which he indicates is also recorded as Mūltān. It was a great city in Hind on the way to Manṣūrah (the capital of Sind). For Manṣūrah, see LeStrange, Lands, 331.

turned back and seized Rifā'ah. He then built a hollow column of burnt brick, placed Rifā'ah inside it, fastened him to it, and bricked him in.[18] Marwān wrote al-Rumāḥis to look for Thābit and display kindness to him. At last a man from Thābit's tribe told where he was, and he was taken, along with a number of others. After two months, he was brought in. Marwān ordered that Thābit and his sons, who were already in Marwān's hands, be brought forward. Then their hands and feet were cut off, and they were transported to Damascus. Abū Hāshim stated, "I saw them cut in pieces and fixed on the gate of the city mosque." This was done because word had reached Marwān that people were spreading alarming rumors about Thābit, saying that he had gone to Egypt, gained control there, and slain Marwān's governor.

Marwān now came from Dayr Ayyūb to arrange the oath of allegiance to his sons 'Ubaydallāh and 'Abdallāh. He married them to two daughters of (the Caliph) Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, Umm Hishām and 'Ā'ishah. For this occasion he gathered together all the people of his family; Muḥammad, Sa'īd and Bakkār, the sons of (the Caliph) 'Abd al-Malik, and the children of (the Caliphs) al-Walīd, Sulaymān, Yazīd and Hishām, and others of the Quraysh and the chiefs of the Arabs.

He mobilized the army of Syria, strengthened it, and placed one of the Syrian officers over each corps. He then ordered them to join Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah, whom he had sent ahead before his Syrian campaign with twenty thousand men of Qinnasrīn and the Jazīrah. He had ordered Ibn Hubayrah to camp at Dūrayn[19] until he should come, thus establishing this force as his vanguard. Marwān [1896] left Dayr Ayyūb for Damascus when all of Syria except for Tadmur had been pacified. He ordered that Thābit b. Nu'aym, his sons, and the group he had mutilated be brought forward. They were put to death and then crucified on the gates of Damascus. Abū Hāshim reports, "I saw them at the time they were slain and gibbeted." He

18. This elaborate execution may be indirectly explained by a variant in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 407. The victim is identified here as one Ibn 'Arār, governor of Sind and a relative. When the treacherous Ibn 'Arār was apprehended, Manṣūr put him to death without shedding his blood, because he was a kinsman. On the legal ramifications of such executions see Lassner, 'Abbāsid Rule, 39–57, esp. 43–46. (J.L.)

19. There is no entry for this place in Yāqūt's geographical dictionary. Dūr and Dūrān were common place names in Iraq.

adds, "Marwān spared one man among them, called 'Amr b. al-Ḥārith al-Kalbī; it is claimed he had knowledge of the wealth which Thābit had deposited with certain kinsmen." Then Marwān moved on with his men to camp at Qasṭal,[20] in the territory of Ḥimṣ adjacent to that of Tadmur, the distance between them being three days' march. Word reached him there that the enemy (i.e., the Kalb) had spoiled all the wells lying between him and Tadmur, filling them in with stones, so he prepared waterskins, canteens, fodder, and camels to transport the provisions for him and his men. Al-Abrash b. al-Walīd, Sulaymān b. Hishām and other Umayyads interceded with him and asked that they (the Kalb) be excused, and that they make representations to them. He agreed to this, and al-Abrash sent them his brother 'Amr b. al-Walīd. Al-Abrash wrote them a letter urging caution and informing them that he feared they would be the death of him and all their kinsmen. They drove 'Amr away, however, and did not comply. Al-Abrash now asked Marwān to let him go to them himself, and to give him a few days. This, Marwān did. Al-Abrash went to them, spoke to them, and put fear into them. He told them that they were stupid and that they could not withstand Marwān and his troops. Most of them agreed with this, while those who did not trust him fled into the desert lands of the Kalb. These were al-Saksakī, 'Iṣmah b. al-Muqsha'irr, Ṭufayl b. al-Ḥārithah, and Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, who was the son-in-law of al-Abrash. Al-Abrash wrote to Marwān informing him of this, and Marwān wrote back to him, "Tear down the walls of their city and come back to me with those who have given you their allegiance." He therefore went back to Marwān with their chief men, al-Aṣbagh b. Dhu'ālah and his son Ḥamzah, and a number of others. Marwān [1897] then set out with them on the desert road for Sūriyyah[21] and Dayr al-Lathiq[22] until he came to Ruṣāfah (residence of the Caliph Hishām). With him were Sulaymān b. Hishām, his paternal uncle Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik and all his brothers, as well as Ibrāhīm the deposed Caliph and a number of the sons of the Caliphs Walīd, Sulaymān and Yazīd. They stayed there for a day; and then Marwān left for

20. A place between Ḥimṣ and Damascus. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 95.

21. A place in Syria between Khunāṣirah and Salamiyyah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 87.

22. Vocalization conjectural. This place is not listed by Yāqūt.

Raqqah. Sulaymān b. Hishām asked for permission and begged Marwān to allow him to stay on for some days, so that his mawlās might recover their strength and his beasts be rested. Sulaymān would then follow after him. Marwān gave him permission and went on his way, halting at a camp on the bank of the Euphrates where he used to stay, near Wāsiṭ.[23] He remained there for three days and went on to Qarqīsiyyah (Circesium), where Ibn Hubayrah was waiting to precede him to Iraq to fight al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Shaybānī al-Ḥarūrī.[24] At this time about ten thousand men of those whom Marwān had mobilized for the campaign in Iraq while he was at Dayr Ayyūb came up with their officers and stopped at Ruṣāfah. Here they called on Sulaymān to renounce his allegiance to Marwān and fight him.

This year al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Shaybānī entered Kūfah.

The Revolt of al-Ḍaḥḥāk the Khārijite (Muḥakkim)[25]

Sources differ in their accounts of this affair. As for Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad: The occasion for the revolt of al-Ḍaḥḥāk was that when al-Walīd was slain, a Ḥarūrī called Sa'īd b. Bahdal al-Shaybānī rebelled in the Jazīrah at the head of two hundred men of the region. One of them was al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who took advantage of al-Walīd's death and Marwān's preoccupation with Syria to rebel in the territory of Kafartūtha.[26] At the same time Bisṭām al-Bayhasī, who differed [1898] with Sa'īd in his views, set out with a like number of the Rabī'ah, and each of them marched against the other. When the two forces were near each other, Sa'īd b. Bahdal sent al-Khaybarī, one of his of-

23. Not to be confused with the famous city of Wāsiṭ founded by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. This city was situated near Qarqīsiyāh. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 882 ff.

24. Ḥarūrā' was the district near Kūfah where the Khārijites rebelled against 'Alī in Rabī' I, 37 (August 17-September 15, 758). It subsequently gave its name to the sect known as the Ḥarūriyyah. See EI[2] s.v. Ḥarūrā'.

25. Literally one who submits only to God's judgment; that is, the Khārijites who opposed the arbitration at Ṣiffīn by crying out la ḥukm illā li-llāh. For al-Daḥḥāk's entry, see Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 395ff; Azdī, 67ff; FHA, 157; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 389–92, and The Religious Political Opposition Parties, 164ff; EI[2] s.v. ad-Daḥḥak b. Ḳays al-Shaybānī.

26. The Kafartūthā mentioned here is a large village in the Jazīrah some five farsakhs (30 km) from Dārā.

ficers, the one who later routed Marwān, with about a hundred and fifty riders to attack Bisṭām by night. He came to Bisṭām's camp undetected, and ordered each of his men to have with him a white cloth to wrap around his head so they might recognize each other. Then they gave the cry of "Allāhu Akbar!"[27] in Bisṭām's camp and smote them hard for their neglect (to keep watch). On this, al-Khaybarī recited:

Though he was Bisṭām, surely I am al-Khaybarī;
I strike with the sword and set guards in my camp.

They slew Bisṭām and all who were with him except for fourteen men who escaped to Marwān. They stayed with him, and he gave them positions in his personal guard (rābiṭah), putting one of them, a man called Muqātil who had the patronymic (kunyā) of Abū al-Na'thal, in charge of the others.

Sa'īd b. Bahdal then moved in the direction of Iraq, because word had reached him of the disorders there and of the differences within the Syrian army leading to clashes between the supporters of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar (b. 'Abd al-'Azīz) and al-Naḍr b. Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī. The Yaman tribesmen among the Syrians were with 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar at Ḥīrah, while the Muḍar tribesmen were with Ibn al-Ḥarashī at Kūfah, and they fought each other morning and evening in the area between them.[28]

Sa'īd b. Bahdal died of pestilence he contracted en route to Iraq, and al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays was appointed his successor. Sa'īd had a wife named Ḥawmā', and in connection with this, al-Khaybarī recited the verse:

God moisten, O Ḥawmā', the grave of Ibn Bahdal;
When the night riders saddle up, he'll no longer depart.

Around a thousand men joined al-Ḍaḥḥāk, and they turned toward Kūfah. He passed through the territory of Mosul, and around three thousand men from there and from the army of the Jazīrah followed him. Al-Naḍr b. Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī and the Muḍarīs were in Kūfah at this time, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar and the Yamanīs were in [1899]

27. The text is bakkarū; it should be read kabbarū, following the Cairo edition.
28. The distance between the old Christian town of Ḥīrah and the Muslim city of Kūfah was three farsakhs (18 km).

Ḥīrah. (They were) engaged in a tribal feud in the territory between, but when al-Ḍaḥḥāk approached, Ibn ʿUmar and al-Ḥarashī made peace and joined forces to fight him. They entrenched themselves at Kūfah, and between them at that time they had about thirty thousand men of Syria, a strong force well armed and provisioned. With them was an officer from the forces of Qinnasrīn called ʿAbbād b. al-Ghuzayyil, commanding a thousand horsemen whom Marwān had sent to reinforce Ibn al-Ḥarashī. The enemy challenged them to give combat, and they fought. ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and Jaʿfar b. ʿAbbās al-Kindī were both slain that day, and al-Ḍaḥḥāk's forces put them to a most ignominious flight. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar escaped to Wāsiṭ with his men, and Ibn al-Ḥarashī, i.e., al-Naḍr, and the Muḍarīs set out along with Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī for Marwān. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk and the men of the Jazīrah thus took possession of Kūfah and its territories, and they collected the taxes of the Sawād. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk put one of his followers, a man called Milḥān, in charge of Kūfah with two hundred horsemen, and set off with most of his men after ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar at Wāsiṭ. There, he laid siege to the city. ʿAbdallāh had with him an officer of Qinnasrīn called ʿAṭiyyah al-Thaʿlabī, one of the hardiest of men. When it seemed likely that al-Ḍaḥḥāk would besiege the city, ʿAṭiyyah left with seventy or eighty of his own men intending to reach Marwān. They left by way of Qādisiyyah, and Milḥān received word of their movements; so he moved out quickly, seeking him. ʿAṭiyyah met him at the bridge of Saylaḥūn,[29] where Milḥān had hastened with about thirty horsemen. Milḥān engaged ʿAṭiyyah, and the latter killed him and some [1900] of his men. The rest of them fled until they came into Kūfah, and ʿAṭiyyah went on with his men until he reached Marwān.

Another account, from Abū ʿUbaydah Maʿmar b. al-Muthannā—Abū Saʿīd: When Saʿīd b. Bahdal al-Murrī died and the Khārijites gave their allegiance to al-Ḍaḥḥāk as their Imām, he stayed at Shahrazūr.[30] The Ṣufriyyah[31] came to him from every direction, until he headed some four thousand of them. No such number had ever joined any Khārijite leader before him. When Yazīd b. al-Walīd perished, his functionary in Iraq was ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar. Marwān then came down from Armenia and ultimately camped in the Jazīrah. He appointed al-Naḍr b. Saʿīd, one of the officers of Ibn ʿUmar, as his governor for Iraq. Al-Naḍr set out for Kūfah, and Ibn ʿUmar settled in Ḥīrah. The Muḍar tribesmen rallied to al-Naḍr and the Yaman to Ibn ʿUmar, who fought the former for four months. Then Marwān reinforced al-Naḍr with Ibn al-Ghuzayyil, but al-Ḍaḥḥāk advanced on Kūfah. This was in 127 (744–5). Ibn ʿUmar sent a message to al-Naḍr saying, "This man means [harm] to none but you and me; so come, let us unite against him." And they made a pact agreeing to this.

29. Al-Saylaḥūn or Saylaḥīn was a village situated between Kūfah and Qādisiyyah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 219 and index, 125.

30. A large district in Jibāl between Irbīl and Hamadhān. This places al-Ḍaḥḥāk surprisingly far from the events he was to participate in. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 320.

31. The Ṣufriyyah were a less intransigent subgroup of the Khārijites. A brief description of them can be found in Watt, Islamic Thought, 24–27.

Ibn ʿUmar came forward and camped at Tall al-Fatḥ, while al-Ḍaḥḥāk advanced to cross the Euphrates, so Ibn ʿUmar sent Ḥamzah b. al-Aṣbagh b. Dhuʾālah al-Kalbī to prevent him from crossing. Then ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās al-Kindī said, "Let him cross over; it is easier for us than looking for him." Hence Ibn ʿUmar sent a message to Ḥamzah telling him to desist from this. Ibn ʿUmar then camped at Kūfah. He would pray at the governor's mosque with his followers, while al-Naḍr b. Saʿīd would pray with his own followers in the outskirts of Kūfah. He neither associated with Ibn ʿUmar nor prayed with him; however, they had both stopped fighting each other and had agreed to fight al-Ḍaḥḥāk. When Ḥamzah returned, al-Ḍaḥḥāk advanced. He crossed the Euphrates and camped at Nukhaylah[32] [1901] on the fourth of Rajab, 127 (April 9, 745). The Syrian troops of Ibn ʿUmar and al-Naḍr rushed upon them before they were settled in their camp, and killed fourteen horsemen and thirteen women. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk then dismounted, bivouacked, and set his followers in order, and they rested. Beginning early the next morning, a Thursday, the two forces fought a fierce battle. Ibn ʿUmar and his followers were put to flight, and the Khārijites slew his brother ʿĀṣim. The man who killed him was al-Birdhawn b. Marzūq al-Shaybānī. The descendants of al-Ashʿath b. Qays buried him in their residence.[33] The Khārijites also slew Jaʿfar b. al-ʿAbbās al-Kindī, the brother of

32. A place situated near Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 771.

33. Burial within a residence was a common practice in early Islam. There was, of course, the example of the Prophet, who was buried under the floor of his wife ʿĀʾishah's quarters.

ʿUbaydallāh. Jaʿfar was in command of the security force (shurṭah) of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, and the one who slew him was ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAlqamah b. ʿAbd al-Qays. Just as this man was overtaking him, Jaʿfar called to a paternal cousin of his named Shāshilah. The latter wheeled toward him, but one of the Ṣufriyyah struck him, splitting his face in two.

Abū Saʿīd reported: I saw him after that; as if he had two faces. ʿAbd al-Malik bent down and slit Jaʿfar's throat. Umm al-Birdhawn al-Ṣufriyyah[34] made up these verses:

> We slew both ʿĀṣim and Jaʿfar, also
> The Ḍabbī rider, when they came out,
> And we came to the hollowed-out trench.

The followers of Ibn ʿUmar took flight and the Khārijites came after us, stopping at our defensive trench until nightfall. Then they went away. We got up early Friday morning, and by God we hadn't come out at all before they put us to flight; we retreated behind our trench. On Saturday we got up and our people were all slipping out and running away to Wāsiṭ. They'd seen an enemy whose like they had never seen before, of the fiercest courage, like a lion over its cubs. Ibn ʿUmar went to look at his followers, and lo, most of them had run away under cover of night. The majority of them reached [1902]
Wāsiṭ. Some of those who got there were al-Naḍr b. Saʿīd, Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh, Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, Aṣbagh b. Dhuʾālah with his two sons Ḥamzah and Dhuʾālah, al-Walīd b. Ḥassān al-Ghassānī and all of the chiefs (wujūh). Only Ibn ʿUmar remained, leading such of his followers as stayed; he stood his ground and did not quit.

It is said that when ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar was made governor of Iraq, he appointed ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās al-Kindī governor of Kūfah with ʿUmar b. al-Ghaḍbān b. al-Qabaʿtharī in charge of security. Neither one of them stepped down until Yazīd b. al-Walīd died; then Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd came and reappointed Ibn ʿUmar as governor in Iraq. Ibn ʿUmar made his brother ʿĀṣim governor of Kūfah, and reappointed Ibn al-Ghaḍbān to take charge of security. They continued in this capacity until ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah rebelled,[35] whereupon 34. Khārijite women often rode with their men in battle. This is evidence that some of them also improvised mocking verses about enemies in the old Arab manner.

35. For this rebellion, see text above.

ʿUmar b. al-Ghaḍbān came under suspicion. When the affair of ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah was ended (in Kūfah), ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar appointed ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb governor of Kūfah, with al-Ḥakam b. ʿUtaybah al-Asadī, from the army of Syria, over security. Then he removed ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd from his position at Kūfah, appointing ʿUmar b. al-Ghaḍbān governor there with al-Ḥakam b. ʿUtaybah al-Asadī over security. Then he removed ʿUmar b. al-Ghaḍbān as governor of Kūfah[36] and gave this post to al-Walīd b. Ḥassān al-Ghassānī. Ibn ʿUmar then appointed Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī governor, with Abān b. al-Walīd in charge of security. He then relieved Ismāʿīl and appointed ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Abān b. al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr al-Anṣarī. Removing him, he appointed his brother ʿAṣim b. ʿUmar governor.

Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Shaybānī advanced. It is also said that al-Ḍaḥḥāk only advanced when Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī [1903] was residing in the governor's palace at Kūfah. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar was situated at Ḥīrah, and Ibn al-Ḥarashī was at the Convent of Ḥind.[37] Then al-Ḍaḥḥāk prevailed over Kūfah, and made Milḥān b. Maʿrūf al-Shaybānī governor there, with Ṣufr, a Ḥarūrī Khārijite of the Banū Ḥanẓalah, in charge of security. Then Ibn al-Ḥarashī came out, seeking to make his own way to Syria. Milḥān opposed him and Ibn al-Ḥarashī slew him. After this, al-Ḍaḥḥāk made Ḥassān governor of Kūfah, with Ḥassān's son al-Ḥarīth in charge of security. Lamenting his brother ʿĀṣim when the Khārijites killed him, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar said:

The ill vicissitudes of time cast at the object of their aim, leaving to the morrow no arrow in the hand for bow to throw;

They cast at my most precious target and killed ʿĀṣim, a brother; to me a fortress, a shelter, and a refuge.

If grief and flowing tears have dissolved the fresh blood of my vitals pooled,

36. Following the suggestion of the editor in the apparatus to the Leiden edition. The text reads, "from [his position in charge of] security."

37. There were two convents of that name at Ḥīrah. One was built by Hind bt. al-Nuʿmān b. Mundhir (Dayr Hind al-Ṣughrā), the other by Hind the mother of ʿAmr b. Hind (Dayr Hind al-Kubrā). Both were from the pre-Islamic period. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 707–708.

I've swallowed them, sipping them slowly for ʿĀṣim.
much greater are those he's supped and swallowed.

And would the Dooms had left me ʿĀṣim, so we might live together, or taken us together!

It is mentioned that ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar used to say, "I have heard that ʿAyn b. ʿAyn b. ʿAyn slew Mīm b. Mīm b. Mīm. He had hoped to kill him, but ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAli b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib killed him [Marwān b. Muḥammad b. Marwān]!"[38] [1904]

It is also mentioned that when the followers of ʿUmar fled and got away to Wāsiṭ, they asked him, "What are you staying for, when these people have run away?" He told them, "I'll linger and see!" They stayed a day or two, and saw no one but deserters whose hearts were filled with dread of the Khārijites. At last he ordered the journey to Wāsiṭ. Khālid b. al-Ghuzayyil gathered his followers together and joined Marwān, staying in the Jazīrah. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās al-Kindī saw what had befallen the people, and did not feel that he was safe, so he went over to al-Ḍaḥḥāk, swore allegiance to him and served in his army. Abū ʿAṭāʾ al-Sindī[39] coined these verses, shaming him for following al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who had slain his brother:

Tell ʿUbaydallāh, "If it were Jaʿfar who had lived, he'd not submit once you were slain.

He'd not have followed the heretics when revenge was due while in his hand was a sharp and shining blade!

A rabble who killed your brother and called your father an infidel; what do you say to that?"

When ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās heard this verse of Abū ʿAṭāʾ, he said, "Why, I say, 'God make you bite your mother's clitoris!'" Abū ʿAṭāʾ's verses continue:

May your kinship be disowned by any relative or one seeking revenge: low lies the lowly.

38. The literary device using the first initials of a name to predict a future event is characteristic of the apocalyptical traditions. For other examples of these traditions see Lassner, ʿAbbasid Rule, 42–43; also Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif, 87–88 (J.L.)

39. A pro-Umayyad poet from Kūfah. See EI[2] s.v. Abū ʿAṭaʾ al-Sindī.

You let the brother of Shaybān plunder his weapons while a fleet-wheeling horse on a long rein rescued you!

[1905] Ibn 'Umar occupied the residence of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf at Wāsiṭ, it is said, with the Yaman, while al-Naḍr b. Sa'īd and his brother Sulaymān and Ḥanẓalah b. Nubātah with his sons Muḥammad and Nubātah settled with the Muḍar on the right side of the road as you come up from Baṣrah. They abandoned Kūfah and Ḥīrah to al-Ḍaḥḥāk and the Khārijites, and everything there fell into their hands. The war between 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar and al-Naḍr b. Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī reverted to its situation before the advent of al-Ḍaḥḥāk, al-Naḍr demanding that Ibn 'Umar deliver the government of Iraq to him according to Marwān's writ and Ibn 'Umar refusing; the Yaman (siding) with Ibn 'Umar and the Nizār with al-Naḍr. This was because the forces (jund) of the Yaman were on the side of Yazīd the Deficient[40] in their feud with al-Walīd, after he delivered Khālid al-Qasrī over to Yūsuf b. 'Umar al-Thaqafī who put him to death. The Qays, however, were with Marwān, since he had called for vengeance for al-Walīd. The Qays were the maternal relatives of al-Walīd, by way of Thaqīf, since his mother was Zaynab bt. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, the niece of al-Ḥajjāj. Thus, war resumed between Ibn 'Umar and al-Naḍr.

Al-Ḍaḥḥāk entered Kūfah and stayed there, and he appointed as governor of the city Milhān al-Shaybānī in Sha'bān 127 (May 745). At the head of the Khārijites, al-Ḍaḥḥāk moved swiftly against Wāsit in pursuit of Ibn 'Umar and al-Naḍr, and he camped at the Hippodrome Gate (Bāb al-Miḍmār). When they saw that, Ibn 'Umar and al-Naḍr abstained from fighting each other and united against al-Ḍaḥḥāk, as they had at Kūfah. Al-Naḍr and his officers would cross the bridge and fight al-Ḍaḥḥāk and his followers alongside Ibn 'Umar; then they would return to their own places, and not stay with Ibn 'Umar. They continued in this fashion during the months [1906] of Sha'bān, Ramaḍān and Shawwāl (May–July 745). One day, they were engaged in combat when the battle grew fierce. At the gate called Bāb al-Quraj, Manṣūr b. Jumhūr charged at one of al-Ḍaḥḥāk's officers, a man of great rank with the Khārijites called 'Ikrimah b. Shaybān, and struck him, cutting him in two and killing him. Al-

40. See n. 5 above.

Ḍaḥḥāk sent one of his officers called Shawwāl—he was from the Banū Shaybān—to the Zāb Gate, saying, "Burn it down over them; the siege has gone on too long for us." Shawwāl set off in the company of al-Khaybarī, also one of the Banū Shaybān, at the head of their horsemen. ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAlqamah met them and asked, "Where are you going?" Shawwāl told him, "We're going to the Zāb Gate. The Commander of the Faithful (i.e., al-Ḍaḥḥāk) has ordered me to do this and that." ʿAbd al-Malik then said, "I'm with you," and went back with them, though he was bare-headed and had no breastplate on him. He, too, was an officer of al-Ḍaḥḥāk and a most redoubtable man. They went to the Zāb Gate and set fire to it, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar sent out Manṣūr b. Jumhūr against them with six hundred cavalry of the Kalb. The latter engaged them in fierce combat. ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAlqamah attacked them, although he had no armor, and killed a number of them. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr saw this, and ʿAbd al-Malik's prowess enraged him. He therefore charged him and struck him between his shoulder and neck, cutting him to the haunch, and he fell dying. A hardy Khārijite woman then came forward and seizing the bridle of Manṣūr's horse cried, "You sinner! Answer to the Commander of the Faithful!" But he cut off her hand —or, it is also said, he cut the rein of his horse while it was in her hand—and got away. Al-Khaybarī came into the city after Manṣūr, and a paternal cousin of Manṣūr from the Kalb came at him, but al-Khaybarī struck and killed him.

[Ḥabīb b. Khudrah, the mawlā of the Banū Hilāl][41] claimed that ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAlqamah was a descendant of the kings of Persia, and composed these verses lamenting him:

The woman speaks while tears flow from her eye: [1907]
"may peace be on the soul of Ibn ʿAlqamah!"

Has death overtaken you in mid-career?
each man in his due course finds death.

And so there is no trembling of the hands, nor slowing down of age;
no slackening in the battle, nor weakening with time.

41. This phrase is missing from the Leiden text and is supplied from the Cairo edition.

Being killed for the Khārijites is no disgrace;
but they are slain, and they are noble.

The dregs of mankind have no path to follow;
'tis they who make me mourn, O Ibn ʿAlqamah, the dregs.

Manṣūr then said to Ibn ʿUmar, "I've never seen anyone like these people," meaning the Khārijites. "Why are you fighting them and keeping them too busy to deal with Marwān? Give them your approval, and put them between yourself and Marwān. If you do that, they'll let us alone and go off to [fight] him. Their intensity and courage will be directed against him, and you can remain at rest here in your own place. If they defeat him, you will have gotten what you wanted, and you'll be on good terms with them. If he should defeat them and you want to oppose him and fight him, you'll do battle with him fully rested; his dispute with them will go on a long time, and they'll give him ample trouble." But Ibn ʿUmar said, "Don't rush; let's wait and see!" "What shall we wait for?" Manṣūr asked. "You can't get out with them, and you can't go on. If we went out against them, we could not stand up to them. What can we expect will happen to them? Meanwhile, Marwān is untroubled, because we have absorbed the cutting edge of their power and diverted them from him! As for me, I'm going out and joining them!" He then went out, and, standing opposite their lines, he cried, "I am ready to listen! I want to submit as a Muslim and hear the Word of God!" The informant adds, "This is their trial [mihnah]." Then Manṣūr went over to them and gave them his oath of allegiance, saying, "I have become a Muslim." With that, they invited him to the mid-morning meal, and he ate. Then he asked them, "Who was the rider who seized my bridle that day by the Zāb?" meaning the day he slew Ibn ʿAlqamah. They called, "O Umm al-ʿAnbar!" Lo, the most beautiful woman came out to them. She asked him, "Are you Manṣūr?" [1908] "Yes," he answered. "May God shame your sword wherever you mention it," she told him. "By God, it did nothing, and gave nothing!" She meant by this, why could he not have killed her when she seized his bridle so she would have entered Paradise (as a martyr). Until that moment, Manṣūr had not known that she was a woman. He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, marry her to me!" Al-Ḍaḥḥāk replied, "She has a husband." She was, in fact, the wife of 'Ubaydah b. Sawwār al-Taghlibī.[42] Finally, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar sent out to them at the end of Shawwāl (late April 745) and gave al-Ḍaḥḥāk the oath of allegiance.

In this year, 127 (744–745), Sulaymān b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān threw off his allegiance to Marwān b. Muḥammad, and waged open war.[43]

The Revolt of Sulaymān b. Hishām

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ: When Marwān set out from Ruṣāfah to Raqqah to send Ibn Hubayrah to Iraq to fight al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Shaybānī, Sulaymān b. Hishām requested his permission to stay behind a few days to rest his forces and set his affairs in order. Marwān consented and went his way. About ten thousand men came forward, of those whom Marwān had levied at Dayr Ayyūb to campaign in Iraq. They journeyed with their officers to Ruṣāfah, where they called on Sulaymān to throw off his allegiance to Marwān and fight him. They told him, "You are considered more acceptable than he is by the army of Syria, and more worthy of the Caliphate." On this, Satan caused Sulaymān to err, and he agreed. He went out to them with his brothers, his sons, and his mawlās. He formed his army, and then he marched with all his forces to Qinnasrīn. He wrote letters to the troops of Syria, and they slipped away [1909] to join him from every direction and from the district forces (jund). Then Marwān drew near, having turned back after he had gone above Qarqīsiyyā.[44]

He wrote to Ibn Hubayrah ordering him to secure himself with his troops at Dūrayn until he moved his camp to Wāsiṭ. The mawlās of Sulaymān and the children of Hishām who had been at Hanī[45] gathered together with their families and entered the fortress of al-

42. Al-Taghlibī was one of the leading Khārijites and a member of the electoral council (shūrā) that chose al-Ḍaḥḥāk.

43. See Azdī, 51; FHA, 158ff; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 405ff.

44. Qarqīsiyyah (ancient Circesium) was situated on the left bank of the Euphrates 200 miles below al-Raqqah. See LeStrange, Lands, 105.

45. the Hānī was one of two canals (the other being the Mārī) dug by the Caliph, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik. They gave their names to adjacent estates. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 994.

Kāmil, fortifying themselves within and barring the doors against Marwān. He sent to them asking, "What have you done? Have you thrown off obedience and broken your oath of allegiance to me after you gave me solemn pledge and covenants?" They replied to his messengers, "We are with Sulaymān, against all who oppose him." He then told them, "I earnestly warn you and caution you that if you oppose any one of those following me in my army, or let any harm come to him from you, you will bring my punishment upon you. There will be no safety for you from me." They sent word, "We shall desist." And Marwān passed on. Then they took to coming out of their fortress, attacking stragglers and scattered groups of the army who were following Marwān, and stripping them of their horses and weapons. Word of this came to him, and he burned with rage against them. Around seventy thousand men of the Syrian army had gathered around Sulaymān, including the Dhakwāniyyah and other groups, and camped at a village of the Banū Zufar, called Khusāf,[46] in the territory of Qinnasrīn. When Marwān drew near there, Sulaymān sent out al-Saksakī at the head of about seven thousand men, and Marwān sent ʿIsā b. Muslim with about the same number. The two forces met in the area between the two camps and fought a fierce battle. Al-Saksakī and ʿIsā, each one a heroic cavalryman, clashed in battle. They jousted until their lances were broken, then they drew their swords. Al-Saksakī struck the forepart of ʿIsā's horse so its harness fell down to its chest, and the horse went out of [1910] control. Al-Saksakī cut him off, struck him with his mace, and felled him. He then dismounted and took him prisoner. At this, one of the cavalry of Antioch called Silsāq,[47] an officer of the Slavs [Ṣaqālibah][48] appeared and captured al-Saksakī. Marwān's vanguard was put to flight, and word of this reached him en route. He kept on, concentrating on his preparations, and did not dismount until he reached Sulaymān. Marwān had set his troops in order and was now ready to fight. Sulaymān did not expect him and was taken by surprise. He and those with him fled. Marwān's horsemen pursued them, killing some and capturing others, until he reached and

46. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 441 lists a Khusāf but makes no mention of this particular village.

47. Silsāq: the initial 'i' is conjectural.

48. The Ṣaqālibah were captives of Slavic origin who were brought to the Islamic lands as slaves. The initial "i" in Silsāq is conjectural.

overran their camp. Then Marwān took up his position, and commanded his two sons to take theirs, while Kawthar, the chief of security, was in another place. He then ordered his army to take no prisoners except those who were slaves (mamlūk). The count of the slain on Sulaymān's side that day exceeded thirty thousand. Ibrāhīm the oldest son of Sulaymān was slain, and a maternal uncle of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik called Khālid b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī was brought in. A big and very fleshy man, he was brought up to Marwān with his tongue lolling out. "You profligate!" cried Marwān. "Weren't the wines and slave girls of Madīnah[49] enough to keep you from running out with this excrement to fight against me?" He said, "Commander of the Faithful, he made me do it! I beg you, for God's sake, and that of kinship!" Marwān answered, "So you tell lies, too! How would he have forced you, when you came out with your singing-girls and wineskins and guitars (barabīṭ) with you in his camp!" Marwān then killed him. Many of the prisoners from the district forces claimed that they were slaves. He therefore refrained from slaying them and commanded that they be sold with the other slaves, along with the booty taken from their camp.

Sulaymān fled on until he reached Ḥimṣ, where he was joined by those of his supporters who had escaped. He made camp there and rebuilt that part of the city walls which Marwān had ordered torn down. On the day that Sulaymān was routed, Marwān sent ahead officers and guards (rabiṭah) with a detachment of cavalry. He ordered them to reach the fortress of al-Kāmil before any news (of the battle) [1911] arrived, and in his rage against those within (he ordered this detachment) to surround it until he came there. The advance force arrived and set up camp, and Marwān advanced and halted at his camp at Wāsiṭ. He sent a message to the defenders to deliver themselves to his judgment, but they replied, "No, not until you guarantee all of us safety." He took his time with them, and had mangonels set up against them. When the stones began to fall on them, they submitted to his judgment. He made an example of them, mutilating them, but the people of Raqqah transported them, gave them shelter and treated their wounds. Some of them perished, but most of them survived. Their number altogether was around three hundred.

49. Madīnah was the resort of the idle rich in the Umayyad period and noted for its pleasures; see Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 254–44, or Hitti, History of the Arabs, 236–37.

Then Marwān set out after Sulaymān and those who had gathered around him at Ḥimṣ. As he drew near, they had a meeting, and some of them said to the others, "How long shall we be forced to run from Marwān? Come, let us make a covenant to seek death, and not disperse once we have seen him until all of us are dead!" Around nine hundred of their cavalry who were prepared to die agreed to this. Sulaymān put Muʿāwiyah al-Saksakī in charge of half his forces, setting Thubayt al-Bahrānī over the other half. They set out against Marwān, having agreed to attack him by night, if they could take him unawares. News of them and their plan reached Marwān, however, and he took precautions. He marched slowly, digging trenches, and staying in defensive battle formation. They were eager to attack him by night but could not, so they prepared for him by setting an ambush among some olive groves above the route he would take, in a village named Tall Mannas of Jabal al-Summāq.[50] They came out against him while he was marching in battle formation, and turned their weapons on those who were with him, so he withdrew and called up his cavalry. Elements of his vanguard, the two wings and the rearguard gathered about him, and they fought [1912] the enemy from midmorning until after the afternoon prayer. Al-Saksakī[51] encountered one of the riders of the Banū Sulaym, and they clashed. The Sulamī pulled him off his horse, and dismounted to deal with him. He was assisted by a man of the Banū Tamīm, and together they brought him prisoner to where Marwān had stationed himself. He said, "Praise to God who has empowered us over you; you've had too much from us!" Al-Saksakī cried, "Spare me, for I am the best rider among the Arabs!" But Marwān told him, "You lie, for the man who brought you in is a better rider than you are." He gave the order, and he was bound. The number of those bound like him and put to death was six thousand. Thubayt and those who had been put to flight escaped.

When they came to Sulaymān, he put his brother Saʿīd b.

50. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 871 lists Tall Mannas as a village in the district of Ḥimṣ and as a fortress near Maʿarrat al-Nuʿmān. The latter was situated between Ḥimṣ and Ḥalab (Aleppo) and was famous for its olive groves. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 575. The Jabal al-Summāq was a large mountain region with many settlements. It was considered part of the western districts of Ḥalab. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 21.

51. At least two men of the Banū Saksak are identified in the accounts of the times: Muʿāwiyah and Abū ʿIlāqah. The text rarely distinguishes between them. The identity of the individual here cannot be ascertained.

Hishām in charge of the city of Ḥimṣ. Recognizing that there was nothing he could do there, Sulaymān went to Tadmur and stayed there. Marwān encamped against Ḥimṣ and besieged the defenders for ten months. He erected more than eighty mangonels and bombarded them with stones night and day. Throughout this time they made daily sallies and fought him. At times they raided the outskirts of his camp by night, attacking positions where they hoped they would find a breach or a gap in his defenses. When one setback after another had befallen them, they were forced to act humbly. They asked him to guarantee them all safety on condition they deliver to him Sa'īd b. Hishām and his two sons 'Uthmān and Marwān, as well as a man named al-Saksakī,[52] who used to raid Marwān's camp, and an Abyssinian who used to insult and slander him. Marwān consented to these terms. The story of the Abyssinian was that he would climb up on the city wall and fasten to his own penis that of a donkey. Then he would shout, "O Banū Sulaym, you sons of this and that, here is your banner!"[53] and he would revile Marwān. When Marwān got control of him, he handed him over to the Banū Sulaym, who cut off his male organs and his nose and made an example of him. Marwān ordered the man called al-Saksakī killed , and Sa'īd and his two sons tightly secured. Then he began to move against al-Ḍaḥḥāk. [1913]

A source other than Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad gives a different account of what happened to Sulaymān b. Hishām after he was routed at the Battle of Khusāf: When Marwān routed Sulaymān b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik on the day of Khusāf, he fled to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar and went with him to al-Ḍaḥḥāk. He gave al-Ḍaḥḥāk his oath of allegiance and informed him of Marwān's transgressions and injustice. Inciting them against him, Sulaymān said, "I'll march with you, with my mawlās and all who follow me." He accompanied al-Ḍaḥḥāk when he moved against Marwān.

Shubayl b. 'Azrah al-Ḍubba'ī says of their pledging allegiance to al-Ḍaḥḥāk:

See ye not that God made His religion prevail, so Quraysh prayed behind Bakr b. Wā'il?

52. See n. 51 above.

53. This was an insult to Marwān who was called Marwān "al-Ḥimār," that is, "the ass." The expression "al-Ḥimār" was not intended to denigrate the Caliph's intelligence. On the contrary, it denoted strength and endurance.

Ibn 'Umar and his companions were of one accord in opposing al-Naḍr b. Sa'īd. Thus he he knew that there was nothing he could do with them, so he departed at once to seek Marwān in Syria.

According to Abū 'Ubaydah—Bayhas: By Dhū al-Qa'dah 127 (early August 745), Syria was pacified under Marwān and he had removed all those opposing him. Hence he summoned Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah and sent him as governor to Iraq, adding the troops of the Jazīrah to his command. He advanced until he camped at the Canal of Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik,[54] and Ibn 'Umar sent a message to al-Ḍaḥḥāk informing him of this. Bayhas continues: Al-Ḍaḥḥāk assigned Maysān[55] to us, saying, "That will suffice you until we see what transpires." Ibn 'Umar appointed his mawlā al-Ḥakam b. Nu'mān in charge of it.

As for Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām:[56] 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar made peace [1914] with al-Ḍaḥḥāk with the understanding that al-Ḍaḥḥāk should retain all of Kūfah and its surrounding lands, while Ibn 'Umar should retain all that he still held of Kaskar, Maysān, Dastmaysān, the districts of the Tigris, Ahwāz and Fārs. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk moved on to encounter Marwān at Kafartūthā in the Jazīrah territory.

Abū 'Ubaydah reported: Al-Ḍaḥḥāk made preparations to go against Marwān, and al-Naḍr passed making for Syria. He camped at Qādisiyyah, and word of it came to Milḥān al-Shaybānī, al-Ḍaḥḥāk's governor of Kūfah. Milḥān came out against al-Naḍr and fought him, although he had with him only a few of the Khārijites. Al-Naḍr gave battle, and Milḥān persisted until al-Naḍr slew him. In a lament for him and 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Alqamah, Ibn Khudrah said:

> How many are like Milḥān, Khārijite trusted brother, > and Ibn 'Alqamah, a Khārijite who found martyrdom?
>
> A sincere man to whom I devoted my affection, > who sold my house at highest bargain of any abode;[57]

---

54. The canal (nahr) named after Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik was situated outside of Raqqah. The reference here is probably to a second Nahr Sa'īd which was in the area of Baṣrah. See n. 54 below and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 840.

55. Maysān was a district between Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 840.

56. Hishām b. 'Ammār al-Dimashqī d. 244–46/858–60. See Ta'rīkh Dimashq, I, pp. 581, 586, 587.

57. I.e., exchanged this world for paradise.

Brothers in truth whom I hoped for and forsook;
I complain to God of my desertion and abandonment.

Word reached al-Ḍaḥḥāk of the slaying of Milḥān, so he appointed al-Muthannā b. 'Imrān of the Banū 'A'idah as his governor in Kūfah. Then al-Ḍaḥḥāk marched in Dhū al-Qa'dah 127 (May 745), and took Mosul. Ibn Hubayrah now moved from the Canal of Sa'īd and camped at Ghazzah by 'Ayn al-Tamr.[58] Word of this reached al- [1915]
Muthannā b. 'Imrān al-'Ā'idhī, al-Ḍaḥḥāk's governor in Kūfah, so he marched against Ibn Hubayrah with the Khārijite troops at his disposal. With him was Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, who had gone over to him when he pledged allegiance to al-Ḍaḥḥāk, in opposition to Marwān. The two forces met at Ghazzah and fought a violent battle for several days. Al-Muthannā was slain, as were 'Uzayr and 'Amr, two of al-Ḍaḥḥāk's chieftains, while Manṣūr fled and the Khārijites were routed. Muslim, the chamberlain of Yazīd, said concerning this:

War let al-Muthannā see his death, that day of Ghazzah, and flung 'Uzayr dead among those boulders,

She brought to 'Amr doom, while already about Manṣūr were drawn the ropes of the snare.

Ghaylān b. Ḥurayth says in his panegyric of Ibn Hubayrah:

You vanquished on the Day of al-'Ayn those whom you met, like the victory of a David over a Goliath.

When those slain on the Day of al-'Ayn were slain and Manṣūr b. Jumhūr had fled, he went straight on until he entered Kūfah and gathered together a group of the Yaman faction and the Ṣufriyyah, including those who had dispersed the day Milḥān was slain and those who had held back from following al-Ḍaḥḥāk. Manṣūr gathered all these together and marched with them to camp at Rawḥā',[59] while Ibn Hubayrah advanced with his troops until he encountered them. He fought them for several days and then put

58. 'Ayn al-Tamr is situated between al-Anbār and Kūfah. It commanded the military approaches from the western desert to Iraq and especially Kūfah. See EI^{2} s.v. 'Ayn al-Tamr. The Ghazzah mentioned here cannot be identified.

59. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 820 lists al-Rawḥā' as a village in the vicinity of Baghdad along the 'Īsā Canal.

them to flight. Al-Birdhāwn b. Marzūq al-Shaybānī was slain, and Manṣūr fled. Concerning this, Ghaylān b. Ḥurayth said:

The day of Rawḥā' al-'Udhayb when they dispatched Ibn Marzūq, a deadly swift poison.

Ibn Hubayrah advanced until he was settled in Kūfah and drove [1916] the Khārijites from the city. Word of what had happened to his followers reached al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who sent for 'Ubaydah b. Sawwār al-Taghlibī and sent him against Ibn Hubayrah's forces. Ibn Hubayrah moved from Kūfah, intending to get to Wāsiṭ while 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar was there. He appointed 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Bashīr al-'Ijlī as governor of Kūfah. On the next day 'Ubaydallāh b. Sawwār came up with his cavalry and stationed himself at the Ṣarāt Canal,[60] where he was joined by Manṣūr b. Jumhūr. Word of this reached Ibn Hubayrah and he marched against them. The two forces encountered each other at the Ṣarāt in the year 127 (745).

According to what is mentioned,[61] in this year (the 'Abbāsid naqībs) Sulaymān b. Kathīr, Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ, and Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb went to Mecca, where they met with Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad the Imām (of the 'Abbāsid Shī'ah). They informed him that they had with them twenty thousand dīnārs and two hundred thousand dirhams, as well as much musk and other goods. He ordered them to turn it over to Ibn 'Urwah the mawlā of Muḥammad b. 'Alī. This

60. It is not clear from context whether the reference to the Ṣarāt is to the canal that emptied into the Tigris at Baghdad (at this time a village) or to the Shaṭṭ al-Nīl which Ibn Serapion called the "Great Ṣarāt" that linked the Euphrates and Tigris north of the ruins of Babylon. See LeStrange, Lands, 72.

61. General surveys of the 'Abbasid Revolution can be found in G. Van Vloten, De Opkomst der Abbasiden in Khunasan (Leiden, 1882), Recherches sur la domination arabe, le chiitisme et les croyances messianiques sous le Khalifat des Omayyades (Amsterdam, 1890); Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 357–566; R. Frye, "The 'Abbāsid Conspiracy and Modern Revolutionary Theory," Indo-Iranica, 5/3 (1952–53): 9–14; C. Cahen, "Pointes de vue sur la revolution 'Abbāside," Revue Historique, 230 (1963): 295–338; F. Omar, The 'Abbāsid Caliphate 132–70/750–80 (Baghdad, 1969), 57–136; Al-'Abbāsiyyūn al-awā'il: 132–70/750–86 (Beirut, 1970), v.l; M. Shaban, The 'Abbāsid Revolution (Cambridge, 1970); H. Kennedy, The Early Abbasid Caliphate (New York, 1981), 35–45. See also the dissertations of M. Sharon, "'Alīyat ha-'Abbāsīm la-Shiltōn," Hebrew University, Jerusalem, 1970 (soon to be published in Hebrew and in an expanded two-volume work in English); and D. Dennet, "Marwān b. Muḥammad; the passing of the Umayyad Caliphate," Harvard University, 1939. (J.L.)

year they had brought Abū Muslim with them, and Ibn Kathīr told Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, "This is your mawlā."

Also this year, Bukayr b. Māhān wrote to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad informing him that he was at death's door, and that he had chosen (Abū Salamah) Ḥafṣ b. Sulaymān as his successor and the latter was willing.[62] Ibrāhīm wrote to Abū Salamah instructing him to take command of his followers, and wrote to his people in Khurāsān informing them that he had entrusted Abū Salamah with their affairs. Abū Salamah then went to Khurāsān. The Khurāsānīs approved of him and accepted his leadership, and turned over to him what had [1917] been gathered on their behalf as contributions of their Shī'ah, and the fifth part of their wealth.

'Abd al-Azīz b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Azīz led the Pilgrimage this year. He was Marwān's governor for Madīnah, Mecca and Ṭā'if. Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī reported this from someone—Isḥāq b. 'Isā—Abū Ma'shar; al-Wāqidī and others have said the same.

The governor of Iraq in this year was al-Naḍr b. al-Ḥarashī. We have already mentioned what transpired between him and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar and al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Ḥarūrī. In Khurāsān Naṣr b. Sayyār was governor, but there were also those who contended with him for power there, such as Juday' al-Kirmānī (leader of the Yamanīs) and al-Ḥārith b. Surayj (al-Murji'ī).[63]

62. Bukayr was the non-Arab leader of the revolutionary apparatus of the 'Abbāsid Shī'ah in Kufah. Abū Salamah, his son-in-law, had taken his place on a mission to Khurāsān the previous year. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 247–49; Balādhurī, Ansāb, III, 118 seemingly refers to this event and places it in the lifetime of Muḥammad b. 'Alī (d. 125 or 125 .AH.).

63. Al-Ḥārith is identified elsewhere as a Murji'ī, or member of a sect which left judgment of others to God.

The Events of the Year

128

(October 3, 745–September 21, 746)

Among the events of this year was the slaying of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj in Khurāsān.[64]

The Slaying of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj

We have already mentioned the letter of Yazīd b. al-Walīd b. al-Walīd to al-Ḥārith with a pardon for him, and how al-Ḥārith then left the land of the Turks for Khurāsān and went to Naṣr b. Sayyār. We also mentioned how Naṣr treated him,[65] and how adherents collected around al-Hārith in answer to his call.

According to 'Ali b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—his shaykhs: When Ibn Hubayrah took control of Iraq, he wrote to Naṣr b. Sayyār of his appointment, and Naṣr gave his allegiance to Marwān. Then al-Ḥārith said, "It was only Yazīd b. al-Walīd who gave me his promise of safety, and Marwān will not confirm a pardon made by Yazīd —I do not trust him."

Naṣr called for the oath of allegiance to Marwān, but Abū al-Salīl reviled Marwān. When he called on al-Ḥārith to give the oath, Salm 64. See Ibn Khayyāt, II, 405.

65. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1887ff, sub anno 126.

b. Aḥwaz al-Tamīmī came to him, as well as Khālid b. Huraym, Qaṭan b. Muḥammad, ʿAbbād b. al-Abrad b. Qurrah and Ḥammād b. ʿĀmir. They spoke with him, saying, "Why should Naṣr render his authority and his governorship into the hands of your people? Didn't he bring you out of the land of the Turks, away from the rule of the Khāqān? He delivered you so that your enemies would not take heart against you. But you opposed him; you forsook the rule of your own tribe [ʿashīrah] and emboldened their enemy against them. We would remind you of God, lest you scatter our unity [jamāʿah]!" Al-Ḥārith replied, "Truly, I see the governorship in the hands of al-Kirmānī, but the rule in the hands of Naṣr." Thus he would not agree with them as they desired. He went out to a walled garden belonging to Ḥamzah b. Abī Ṣāliḥ al-Sulamī, opposite the palace of the Bukhārākhudā,[66] and camped there. He sent a message to Naṣr saying, "Submit the [question of] rule to consultation [shūrā]."[67] But Naṣr refused. Then al-Ḥārith came out and went to the dwellings of Yaʿqūb b. Dāwud. He ordered Jahm b. Ṣafwān the mawlā of the Banū Rāsib[68] to read a document describing al-Ḥārith's program (sīrah) to the people. At that, they went away exclaiming "Allāhu Akbar!" Al-Ḥārith sent a messenger to Naṣr saying, "Discharge Salm b. Aḥwaz from your security force and employ Bishr b. Bisṭām al-Burjumī." There occurred some words between him and Mughallis b. Ziyād, whereupon the Qays and the Tamīm split into separate factions.[69] At this, Naṣr discharged Salm, but employed Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. The two groups then chose some men to nominate for them men mindful of the Book of God. Naṣr chose Muqātil b. Sulaymān and Muqātil b. Ḥayyān, while al-Ḥārith selected al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah al-Jahḍamī and Muʿādh b. Jabalah. Naṣr instructed his secretary to record whatever precedents (sunan) were acceptable to [1918]

66. Bukhārākhudā was the title of the native prince of Bukhārā.

67. That is, the ruler would have been chosen by an electoral council [shūrā]. The decision would thus have been taken out of the hands of Naṣr b. Sayyār and given to a wider community.

68. Jahm b. Ṣafwān was the secretary and advisor of al-Ḥārith as well as the intellectual protagonist of his revolt. His views were obscure, but a sect identified as his followers was later condemned by Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal as propagating belief in the created Qur'ān. They also held to an extreme view of predestination. See EI^{2} s.v. Djahmiyya. The Banū Rāsib were a sub-group of the Azd, a major group of the Yaman in Khurāsān. See EI^{2} s.v. Azd.

69. Text: faqarrat; read fatafarraqat Qays wa Tamīm following the Cairo ed.

them[70] and the governors they chose, so that he might appoint them to the two frontier zones, that is, the frontier of Samarqand and that of Ṭukhāristān.[71] He also instructed him to write to those who governed there what they saw fit in the way of programs and [1919] precedents. At this, Salm b. Aḥwaz asked Naṣr for permission to assassinate al-Ḥārith, but he refused, and appointed in his stead Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ṣā'igh, who used to send his son Isḥāq to Marw with turquoises.

Al-Ḥārith had proclaimed that he was "He of the Black Banners."[72] Naṣr sent to him saying, "If you are the one you claim, you will tear down the walls of Damascus and bring the rule of the Banū Umayyah to an end. So take five hundred men from me and two hundred camels, and load up with whatever wealth and weapons you will, and go! By my life, if you are the one you mention, then I am indeed in your hands; but if you are not that one, then you have destroyed your tribe." Al-Ḥārith replied, "I have learned that this [claim] is true, but none of my followers have given me an oath of allegiance on that basis." Naṣr answered, "Then it is clear that they are not of your opinion, and have nothing like your clairvoyance, and that they are sinners and ruffians. I exhort you in God's name for the twenty thousand of the Rabīʿah and the Yaman that shall perish in the conflict between you!" Naṣr also proposed to make al-Ḥārith governor of Transoxiana, and to give him three hundred thousand (pieces of silver), but he did not accept. Then Naṣr told him, "If you wish then begin with al-Kirmānī, and if you kill him, then I will obey you. Or if you wish, stay out of our quarrel, and if I am victorious over him, then do as you see fit. Or if you wish, then go with your followers,[73] and once you pass Rayy then I shall do as you say!"

70. Perhaps the precedents of the Prophet and his companions. Al-Ḥārith's movement had called for governing by the book of God and the precedent (sunnah) of the Prophet, and Naṣr was trying to conciliate al-Ḥārith and the pietists, who demanded justice for the convert element.

71. These areas had a large Turkish population and many Iranians who had converted to Islam. Ibn Surayj had a large following there.

72. That is, he who leads the revolt against the Umayyad regime and ushers in the messianic age. The movement of Ibn Surayj had many parallels to that of the ʿAbbāsids who were similarly imbued with messianic fervor and saw themselves as restoring the sunnah of the Prophet. See Sharon, ʿAlīyat, 139ff. On the black flags see Omar, "al-Alwān," Bulletin of the College of Arts (Baghdad University, XIV (1571): 828ff.

Naṣr and al-Ḥārith came face to face, and agreed that Muqātil b. Ḥayyān[74] and Jahm b. Ṣafwān should arbitrate their differences. Their judgment was that Naṣr should abdicate, and the government be decided by consultation (shūrā), but Naṣr did not accept it. Jahm kept telling stories in his tent in al-Ḥārith's camp, while al-Ḥārith kept opposing Naṣr. Then Naṣr issued orders to his people of the Banū Salamah and others. He sent Salm into the city to the house of Ibn Sawwār, and gave him command of the guard (rābiṭah). He gave [1920] Hudbah b. ʿĀmir al-Shaʿrāwī some cavalry, and sent him into the city as well. Naṣr appointed ʿAbd al-Salām b. Yazīd b. Ḥayyān al-Sulamī governor of the city, and transferred the weapons and the government registries to the Quhandiz.[75] He suspected that a group of his followers had corresponded with al-Ḥārith. He thus had those whom he suspected, and who had not been put to the test, sit to his left, and he had those whom he had empowered and entrusted sit at his right. He then spoke, and mentioned the Banū Marwān and those who had rebelled against them, and how God had given him victories. Then he said, "I praise God, but I blame those on my left hand. I took over Khurāsān when you, O Yūnus b. ʿAbd Rabbihi, were one of those who wanted to flee from the burden of providing for Marw. You and the people of your family were of those who wanted Asad b. ʿAbdallāh[76] to put his seal on their necks, and make foot-soldiers of them.[77] Yet I befriended you when I became your governor and treated you well. I commanded you to take away what you had received when I wanted to travel to al-Walīd. Some of you

73. Text: aṣḥābī "my followers;" read aṣḥābuka "your followers" as in the Cairo ed.

74. Muqātil b. Ḥayyān was the son of the Iranian convert and mediator Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī. For the latter see Ṭabarī, index, 158, and Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, pp. 473, 496, 536.

75. The Quhandiz was the inner citadel at Marw, the size of a small city. It was surrounded by a larger walled urban area beyond which were the suburban districts that stretched along the canals of the oasis. See LeStrange, Lands, 358.

76. That is Asad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī, the former governor of Khurāsān who favored the Yamani faction and brought Juday' al-Kirmānī in as his lieutenant.

77. Arabs rode to battle. To be made infantry was regarded as degrading. Foot-soldiers were usually non-Arabs.

took a million [pieces of silver], more or less. And then you conspired with al-Ḥārith against me. Why didn't you look at these free men who stuck with me, recipients of bounty, suffering no distress?" Here he indicated those who were on his right hand. At this, those on his left apologized to him, and he accepted their plea.

A number of people came to Naṣr from the districts of Khurāsān when word reached them of the internal strife he was encountering. Among them were ʿĀsim b. ʿUmayr al-Suraymī, Abū al-Dhayyāl al-Nājī, ʿAmr al-Fādusbān[78] al-Sughdī al-Bukhārī and Ḥassān b. Khālid al-Asadī from Ṭukhāristan with their cavalry. They also included ʿĀqīl b. Maʿqil al-Laythī, Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim and Saʿīd al-Ṣaghīr with more horsemen.

Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj wrote out his program and it was read in the [1921] great public street of Marw and in the mosques, and many people responded to it.

A man read it out at Naṣr's door in Majān,[79] whereupon Naṣr's slaves beat him. At this, al-Ḥārith broke his compact with Naṣr. Hubayrah b. Sharāḥīl and Yazīd Abū Khālid came and informed Naṣr, and he summoned al-Ḥasan b. Saʿd, the mawlā of Quraysh, ordering him to proclaim, "Al-Ḥārith b. Surayj is the enemy of God. He has broken faith and declared war, so call upon God for aid; there is no might nor power save in God!" That same night he sent ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr to al-Ḥārith, and asked al-Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, "What shall we employ as our battle cry tomorrow?" Muqātil b. Sulaymān said, "When God sent a prophet and he fought the enemy, his battle cry was 'Hā-Mīm, they shall not be victorious!'" Thus their battle cry was "Hā-Mīm, they shall not be victorious!" The emblem on their lances was wool.[80]

Salm b. Aḥwaz, ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr, Qatan, ʿĀqīl b. Maʿqil, Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, Saʿīd al-Ṣaghīr, ʿĀmir b. Mālik, and a number of others were on the edge of the Ṭukhāriyyah quarter, while Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn and the Rabīʿah were in [the quarter of] the Bukhārīs. A man from the city of Marw guided al-Ḥārith to a hole in the wall, and al-Ḥārith went there, breached the wall and entered the city in the area near the Bālīn Gate[81] with fifty men. They cried out "Yā Manṣūr! [O divinely aided]," [82] al-Ḥārith's battle cry. They then came to Bāb Nīq, where Jahm b. Mas'ūd al-Nājī fought them. A man charged at Jahm, but he speared him in the mouth, killing him. Then they went out through Bāb Nīq until they came to the pavilion (qubbah) of Salm b. Aḥwaz, where 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī, Khaḍir b. Khālid and al-Abrad b. Dāwud of the family of al-Abrad b. Qurrah fought them. At the Bālīn Gate was Ḥāzim b. Ḥātim, and they slew all who were guarding it and began to plunder the dwellings of Ibn Aḥwaz and of Qudayd b. Manī', Al-Ḥārith forbade them to take anything except mounts and weapons from these houses or [1922] from the house of Ibrāhīm and 'Īsā, the two sons of 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī. This occurred on Sunday night at the end of Jumādā II [March 14, 746].

78. Text: al-Qāwusān; Cairo ed. al-Fādusbān.

79. A large western suburb of Marw where the Government Palace [Dār al-Imārah] stood in ʿAbbāsid times. See LeStrange, Lands, 399.

80. The wearing of wool was a sign of asceticism in early Islam. It appears that Naṣr's forces were countering pietism with pietism.

A messenger from Salm came to inform Naṣr that al-Ḥārith was nearby, and he sent back the message, "Delay him until morning." Then Muḥammad b. Qaṭan b. 'Imrān al-Asadī also sent word to him that most of his followers had rebelled, and Naṣr replied, "Don't you be the one to begin the fighting." What provoked the conflict was that a slave of al-Naḍr b. Muḥammad the Jurist, a man called 'Aṭiyyah, went over to Salm's followers. At this, the followers of al-Ḥārith said, "Give him back to us." This they refused, and so they started fighting. A slave of 'Āṣim was struck in the eye and died, and 'Āṣim fought them along with 'Aqīl b. Ma'qil and put them to flight. They ran off to al-Ḥārith, who was saying the prayer of daybreak in the mosque of Abū Bakrah, the mawlā of the Banū Tamīm. As soon as he finished the prayer he went up to them, and they went back to the edge of the Ṭukharian quarter. Then two men approached him and 'Āṣim called out to them, "Hamstring his horse!" At this, al-Ḥārith struck one of them with his mace killing him, and retreated to the street of the Ṣughdīs. There he saw A'yan, the mawlā of Ḥayyān, and forbade him to fight, but he fought [nonetheless] and was killed. Al-Ḥārith turned into the street of the Banū 'Iṣmah, and Ḥammād b. 'Āmir al-Ḥimmānī and Muḥammad b. Zur'ah followed 81. The Bālīn Gate was the northwest gate of the inner city. See LeStrange, Lands, 399.

82. For messianic titles in late Umayyad and early 'Abbāsid times see Lewis, "Regnal Titles" in the Dr. Zakir Hussain Presentation Volume [New Delhi, 1968].

him. He broke both their spears, and then charged Marzūq, the mawlā of Salm. As he drew near him, however, al-Ḥārith's horse bolted with him into a shop. He drove his mount into the rear wall, and it was killed.

When Salm awoke in the morning, he rode to Bāb Nīq and ordered the people to dig a trench. They dug it, and he instructed a herald to proclaim, "Whoever brings in [an enemy] head shall have three hundred [silver pieces]." The sun had hardly risen before al-Ḥārith was routed—he had fought them all night long. When we awoke in the [1923] morning Naṣr's followers took the Razīq Canal.[83] They overtook ʿAbdallāh b. Mujjāʿah b. Saʿd, and slew him. Salm went as far as al-Ḥārith's camp and then turned back to Naṣr, who forbade him to advance, but he said, "I'm not stopping until I get into the city and fight that dabbūsī [club-wielder]!"[84] Muḥammad b. Qatan and ʿUbaydallāh b. Bassām went with him to the Dar Sankān Gate,[85] which is in the Quhandiz, and found it shut. However, ʿAbdallāh b. Mazyad al-Asadī climbed the wall with three men and opened the gate. Ibn Aḥwaz entered, and set Abū al-Muṭahhar Ḥarb b. Sulaymān to guard the gate. That day Salm slew a secretary of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj whose name was Yazīd b. Dāwud. He gave the order to ʿAbd Rabbihi b. Sīsan, who killed him. Salm went on to Bāb Nīq and opened it and killed a man from the Butchers' Quarter who had showed al-Ḥārith the hole (in the wall).

Al-Mundhir al-Raqqāshī, the paternal cousin of Yaḥyā b. Ḥudayn said, mentioning the fortitude of al-Qāsim al-Shaybānī:

None of you fought the enemy but our comrade,
With a band who fought steadfastly, unafraid;

They fought at the gate of the fortress and weakened not Till God's help came to them and they conquered.

---

83. The Razīq was one of the four main canals which issued from the basin created by damming the Murghāb River. The canals watered the Marw Oasis and then ran into a marsh and were lost in the desert. See LeStrange, Lands, 398–99.

84. Dabbūsī was a disparaging term. Clubs, which were a favored weapon of the Iranian converts to Islam, may have acquired a symbolic meaning, e.g. schismatics.

85. That is the gate leading to Dar Sankān, a village adjacent to Marw. According to Yāqūt the village was also called Sinjān or Sanjān. See Muʿjam, III, 160.

Thus Qāsim following God's command guarded it,
While you confined yourself to withdrawal from that place.

It is said that when the matter of al-Kirmānī and al-Ḥārith grew rough, Naṣr sent a message to al-Kirmānī, who came to him under a truce. Present with them were Muḥammad b. Thābit the Qāḍī, Miqdām b. Nu'aym the brother of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al- [1924]
Ghāmidī, and Salm b. Aḥwaz. Naṣr called on them to unite, and said to al-Kirmānī, "You will be the happiest of men in that." Then some words occurred between Salm and Miqdām, and Salm spoke rudely to him. Miqdām's brother then took his part, and al-Sughdī b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥazmī became angry with them both. Salm said, "I'd like to cut your nose off with a sword." And al-Sughdī told him, "Were you to touch your sword, your hand would not come back to you." At this, al-Kirmānī feared that this was a plot on Naṣr's part, so he rose and clung to Naṣr. He would not sit down, but went back to the door of the maqṣūrah.[86] His followers met him with his horse, and he mounted there in the mosque. Naṣr said, "He intended treachery to me." Al-Ḥārith then sent Naṣr the message, "We do not accept you as a leader of prayer." Naṣr replied, "How should you know [of such things]? You dissipated your life in the land of idolatry and raided the Muslims with idolators! Do you think that I would humble myself to you more than I have already done?"

That day Jahm b. Ṣafwān, the leader of the Jahmiyyah[87] was taken prisoner and he told Salm, "I have a promise[88] from your son Ḥārith!" He replied, "He should not have given it, and even if he did, I would not give you protection. Even if you filled this wrapper with stars, and Jesus the son of Mary pronounced you guiltless to me, you would not be delivered! By God, if you were in my belly, I would cut my belly open to kill you! And by God, no one will rise against us with the Yamanīs to an extent greater than you have done!" He then ordered 'Abd Rabbihi b. Sīsan to kill him, and the people said, "Abū Muḥriz is slain;" for Jahm's patronymic was Abū Muḥriz.

86. It appears that this meeting was arranged in the maqṣūrah of the mosque, the governor's prayer enclosure, so as to afford the participants maximum privacy and protection.

87. See n. 68 above.

88. The text is walī; it should be read walth, following the Cairo edition.

[1925] Hubayrah b. Sharāḥīl and ʿAbdallāh b. Mujjāʿah were taken prisoner that day, and he (Salm) said, "May God not spare him who spares you, though you are both of Tamīm." It is also said that Hubayrah was killed when the cavalry overtook him at the house of Qudayd b. Manīʿ.

When Naṣr routed al-Ḥārith, the latter sent his son Ḥātim to al-Kirmānī. At this, Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā[89] told al-Kirmānī, "They are both your enemies. Let them fight each other." But al-Kirmānī sent al-Sughdī b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥazmī back with him, and al-Sughdī entered the city near the Maykhān Gate.[90] Then al-Ḥārith came, and entered the tent of al-Kirmānī. With al-Kirmānī were Dāwud b. Shuʿayb al-Ḥuddānī and Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā. The time for prayer came, and al-Kirmānī prayed with them.[91] Then al-Ḥārith mounted, and Jamāʿah b. Muḥammad b. ʿAzīz Abū Khalaf went with him. The next day al-Kirmānī went to the gate of Maydān Yazīd, and fought Naṣr's followers. Saʿd b. Salm al-Marāghī was slain, and the banner of ʿUthmān b. al-Kirmānī was captured.

The first to bring the news of al-Ḥārith's rout to al-Kirmānī—he was encamped at Bāb Māsarjasān, one farsakh (6 km) from the city—were al-Naḍr b. Ghallāq al-Sughdī and ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. al-Munakhkhal. Then came Sawādah b. Surayj[92] (Ḥātim b. al-Ḥārith, and Khālil b. Ghazwān al-ʿAdawī, bringing him the oath of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj).[93] The first to give the oath of allegiance to al-Kirmānī was Yaḥyā b. Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah al-Shaybānī. Then al-Kirmānī sent [1926] Sawrah b. Muḥammad al-Kindī to al-Ḥārith (at Asmānīr),[94] as well

89. According to Dīnawarī, 352, this man was a chief of the Rabīʿah in Marw who joined al-Kirmānī, while Ṭabarī's accounts seem always to associate him with the Azd. Dīnawarī's extended account (352–62) of the tribal war contains details not found in Ṭabarī, but there is no mention of Ibn Surayj. The account is confined to al-Kirmānī's quarrel with Naṣr b. Sayyār.

90. Both editions read maykhān, "tavern;" mijān is also possible.

91. This was the forging of a coalition against the Qays. It was, however, an inherently unstable alliance, for while al-Ḥārith had a following of converts and tribesmen of the Yaman, he and his core following were from the Tamīm. Some of the Tamīm, such as Salm b. Ahwāz, supported Naṣr b. Sayyār. The Tamīm were the natural allies of the Qays.

92. The brother of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj.

93. This phrase is missing from the text and is supplied from the Cairo edition.

94. The text records that a word is missing. The reading is supplied by the Cairo edition. There is no entry for Asmānīr in Yāqūt.

as al-Sughdī b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Abū Ṭuʿmah, and Saʿb or Suʿayb, and Ṣabbāḥ. They entered the city from Bāb Maykhān until they came to Bāb Rakak. Then al-Kirmānī advanced to the gate of Ḥarb b. ʿĀmir and sent his followers against Naṣr on Wednesday. They exchanged volleys, but abstained from further combat, and there was no fighting on Thursday. Then they encountered each other on Friday, and the Azd fled back to al-Kirmānī. He took their standard in his hand and fought with it. Al-Khaḍir b. Tamīm charged (Naṣr's men) wearing a coat of mail, and they shot arrows at him. Then Ḥubaysh, a mawlā of Naṣr, dashed at him, and wounded him in the throat. Al-Khaḍir tore the spearhead from his throat with his left hand and his horse set off with him. He charged Ḥubaysh, speared him and threw him off his horse, and al-Kirmānī's foot-soldiers finished him off with clubs.

Naṣr's followers fled, and al-Kirmānī's men captured eighty of their horses. Tamīm b. Naṣr was thrown, and two mounts of his were taken; al-Sughdī b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān took one of them, and al-Khaḍir took the other. Al-Khaḍir encountered Salm b. Aḥwaz, took a mace from his nephew and clubbed Salm, and wrested him off his horse. Two men of Tamīm charged Salm, but he got away, and threw himself from the bridge. He had sustained some ten blows on his iron helmet, and he collapsed. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥaddād carried him to Naṣr's camp, and the forces withdrew. A few nights later, Naṣr came out of Marw, and ʿIṣmah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Asadī was slain. He was defending Naṣr's men, and Ṣāliḥ b. al-Qaʿqāʿ al-Azdī overtook him. ʿIṣmah called, "Come on, Mazūnī!"[95] And Ṣāliḥ replied, "Hold tight, eunuch!" For ʿIṣmah was childless. ʿIṣmah turned his horse and it reared, whereupon he fell. Then Ṣāliḥ speared him and killed him. Ibn al-Daylīmarī,[96] a rajaz poet, fought and was slain [1927] at ʿIṣmah's side. ʿUbaydallāh b. Ḥawtamah al-Sulamī was slain; Marwān al-Bahrānī hurled an iron bar at him, and he was killed. They brought his head to al-Kirmānī, and he recoiled, for ʿUbaydallāh had been a friend of his. A Yamanī man seized the reins of Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim's horse, but he recognized him, so he let him go. They fought each other for three days and on the last day the Muḍar put the Yaman to flight. Then al-Khalīl b. Ghazwān called, "O men of Rabi'ah and Yaman, al-Ḥārith has entered the bazaar; Ibn al-Aqṭa' [Naṣr] is slain; Muḍar's strength has been broken!" The first who fled was Ibrāhīm b. Bassām al-Laythī. Tamīm, Naṣr's son, dismounted to fight on foot, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jāmi' al-Kindī took his horse. Hayyāj al-Kalbī was slain, and Laqīt b. Akhḍar was killed by a slave of Hāni' al-Bazzār.

95. This was an insult reserved for the Azd (Mazūn was once a Persian name for ʿUmān). The Azd regarded it as an ethnic sneer. See Lisān al-ʿArab, XVII, 294 and n. 103.

96. Vocalization conjectural.

It is said that when Friday came, they prepared for battle and tore down (part of) the walls in order to give themselves more space. Al-Naṣr sent Muḥammad b. Qaṭan to al-Kirmānī with the message, "You are not like this club-wielder; fear God, and do not enter civil war [fitnah]." Tamīm b. Naṣr sent his armed retinue (Shākirīyyah),[97] who were within the house of Janūb bt. al-Qa'qā', but the followers of al-Kirmānī shot at them from the roofs and were wary of them. Then 'Aqīl b. Ma'qil said to Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā, "Why are we killing ourselves for Naṣr and al-Kirmānī? Come, let us return to our own country in Ṭukhāristān!" However, Muḥammad replied, "Naṣr did not keep faith with us, and we shall not stop fighting him."

The partisans of al-Ḥārith and al-Kirmānī used to shoot at Naṣr and his followers with a ballista. Naṣr's awning was struck while he was under it, but he did not move from it. Then he sent Salm b. Aḥwaz against them, and he engaged them in battle. At first, the victory went to Naṣr, but when al-Kirmānī saw that, he took his banner from Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. 'Umayrah and fought [1928] with it until he broke it. Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā then set out with al-Zāgh and Ḥiṭṭān for Kārābakul,[98] so that they emerged on the Razīq Canal where Tamīm b. Naṣr held the bridge. When he came up to Tamīm, Muḥammad told him, "Stand aside, boy!" Muḥammad was carrying a yellow banner while al-Zāgh accompanied him. They unhorsed A'yan the mawlā and chief clerk of Naṣr and slew him, along with a number of his Shākiriyyah. Al-Khaḍir b. Tamīm attacked Salm b. Aḥwaz and speared him, but he deflected the blow. Then al-Khaḍir struck him on the chest with an iron bar, 97. Shākiriyyah are frequently mentioned in Arabic sources of the early period. Their precise composition and function however remains unknown.

98. Reading conjectural. Al-Zagh and Ḥittān seem to be non-Arab names, and Kārābakul a place.

and again on his shoulder. He struck him a third time on his head, and Salm fell down. Naṣr defended his followers with eight hundred men, and kept the enemy from entering the market.

When the Yaman had put the Muḍar to flight, al-Ḥārith sent Naṣr the message, "The Yaman blame me for your getting away, and I am refraining from fighting. Now set the staunchest of your followers in front of al-Kirmānī." At this, Naṣr sent Yazīd al-Naḥawī or Khālid[99] to him to ascertain from him that he would keep his word to refrain from fighting. It is said that al-Ḥārith only desisted from fighting Naṣr so that 'Imrān b. al-Faḍl al-Azdī and the people of his house, and 'Abd al-Jabbār al-'Adawī and Khālid b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ḥabīb al-'Adawī and most of his followers might be avenged on al-Kirmānī for what he did to the people of Tabūshkān.[100] That was when Asad had sent al-Kirmānī against them, and they came out to submit themselves to Asad's judgment. However, he slit open the bellies of fifty men and threw them into the Oxus, and cut off the hands and feet of three hundred of them. He crucified three men and sold their households to the highest bidder. They were thus taking revenge on al-Ḥārith for helping al-Kirmānī and fighting Naṣr.

When matters changed between him and al-Ḥārith, Naṣr said to his followers, "Muḍar will not unite in support of me as long as al- [1929] Ḥārith is with al-Kirmānī. They cannot agree on anything; the best idea is to leave them both, since they are quarreling." He then went out to Julfar[101] where he found 'Abd al-Jabbār al-Aḥwal al-'Adawī and 'Umar b. Abī al-Haytham al-Ṣughdī, and asked them, "Are you pleased to stand with al-Kirmānī?" 'Abd al-Jabbār told him, "May you never lack for affliction so long as you occupy this place!" When Naṣr came back to Marw, he ordered that 'Abd al-Jabbār be given four hundred lashes.

Naṣr now went to Kharaq[102] and stayed there for four days. With him were Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim, Salm b. Aḥwaz and Sinān al-A'rābī. Naṣr told his wives, "Al-Ḥārith will take my place,

99. The text has "and Khālid," but the Cairo edition says it should read "or Khālid."

100. Tabūshkān was a fortress in upper Tukharistān where in 117 (January 31, 735—January 20, 736), Asad b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī had al-Kirmānī massacre the relatives of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1589 sub anno 118.

101. Julfar (also Julfār) was one of the villages of Marw. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 104.

102. Yāqūt lists Kharaq as a village in the Marw oasis. See Mu'jam, II, 445.

and will protect you." When he drew near to Naysābūr the people sent messengers asking, "What has brought you? Has some tribal quarrel flared up which God had extinguished?" Naṣr's governor at Naysābūr was Ḍirār b. ʿĪsā al-ʿAmirī, and Naṣr sent him Sinān al-Aʿrābī, Muslim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and Salm b. Aḥwaz, who spoke to the Naysābūrīs. Then they came out, and met Naṣr with a princely retinue, slave-girls, and gifts. At this, Salm told him, "God make me your ransom! This tribe is of Qays, and Qays was only remonstrating." Naṣr replied:

I am the son of Khindif; its tribe increases me
In good deeds, and my paternal uncle is Qays ʿAylān!

When Naṣr departed from Marw, Yūnus b. ʿAbd Rabbihi, Muḥammad b. Qaṭan and Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān accompanied him, with others who were their peers.

The source says that ʿAbbād b. ʿUmar al-Azdī, ʿAbd al-Ḥakīm b. Saʿīd al-ʿAwdhī and Abū Jaʿfar ʿĪsā b. Jurz came to Naṣr at [1930] Abrashahr[103] from Mecca, and Naṣr told ʿAbd al-Ḥakīm al-ʿAwdhī, "Do you not see what the foolish men of your folk have done?" He replied, "Say rather the foolish men of your own folk. Their rule was prolonged in your governorship, and you rendered the government to your own people, excluding Rabīʿah and Yaman, so that they became insolent. There are forbearing people and foolish ones in both the Rabīʿah and Yaman, and the foolish ones prevailed over the wise." ʿAbbād said, "Do you receive the Amīr with such words?" But Naṣr told him, "Let him alone; he's spoken the truth." Then Abū Jaʿfar ʿĪsā b. Jurz—a man who came from a village on the river of Marw—said, "O Amīr, you have merit [ḥasab] in these matters and in your governorship, for truly a momentous matter is at hand. A man of obscure origins will rise and display black colors, and call men to a revolution [dawlah][104] which is to come. He will take the authority, and you shall see it and be shaken." However, Naṣr said, "I do not think that will be, because of the lack of agreement among the people, their rancor and their mutual enmity. I sent an emissary

103. In early Islamic time Naysābūr (Nishāpūr) was known as Abrashahr. See Le-Strange, Lands, 383.

104. For the term dawlah, see EI[2] s.v. Dawla. The man of unknown origins is a reference to Abū Muslim al-Khurasānī, and the aim of the account is to score a propaganda point for the ʿAbbāsids.

to al-Ḥārith when he was in the land of the Turks and offered him a governorship and money, yet he refused and stirred up mischief, and rose up against me." Then Abū Jaʿfar ʿĪsā said, "Al-Ḥārith is already slain and crucified, and al-Kirmānī is not far from that fate." Naṣr bestowed gifts on ʿĪsā for this. Salm b. Aḥwaz used to say, "I never saw a folk more generous in response or more giving of their blood than the Qays."

When Naṣr departed from Marw, al-Kirmānī gained the upper hand there, and told al-Ḥārith, "I want only the Book of God." (Later) Qaḥṭabah said, "If he'd been telling the truth, I would have reinforced him with a thousand horsemen."[105]

Muqātil b. Ḥayyān asked, "Is it in the Book of God to tear down houses and seize wealth?" And al-Kirmānī confined him in a tent in the camp. Then Muʿammar b. Muqātil b. Ḥayyān, or Muʿammar b. Ḥayyān, spoke to al-Kirmānī, and he let Muqātil go. Later al-Kirmānī went to the mosque, and al-Ḥārith stood by. Al-Kirmānī addressed the people and gave all of them a guarantee of safety, except Muḥammad b. al-Zubayr and one other man. Dāwud b. Abī Dāwud [1931]
b. Yaʿqūb then asked him for surety for Muḥammad b. al-Zubayr. The secretary came in and gave Muḥammad a guarantee. Al-Ḥārith went to the Gate of Dūrān and Sarakhs,[106] while al-Kirmānī camped in Muṣallā Asad. He sent for al-Ḥārith, who came before him and denied that he had destroyed people's homes and taken their possessions. Al-Kirmānī pondered but did nothing, and he remained for several days. Then Bishr b. Jurmūz al-Ḍabbī rebelled at Kharqān,[107] summoning men to the Quar'ān and the sunnah. He told al-Ḥārith, "I only fought beside you seeking justice, but since you have been with al-Kirmānī I have realized that you only fight so that it will be said 'al-Ḥārith has won.' These people are [only] fighting out of tribalism, so I'm not fighting on your side." He then with-

105. The reference here is to Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, the great ʿAbbāsid general who did much to defeat the Umayyads (see *EI*² s.v. Ḳaḥṭaba b. Shabīb). This interjected tradition supports the "message" that the ʿAbbāsids alone were able and willing to support the Book of God, and so fulfill the apocalyptic traditions.

106. That is, the main gate of Marw, Bāb al-Madīnah, to the southwest. See Le-Strange, Lands, 399.

107. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 424–25 lists several places under Kharaqān, Kharqān and Kharraqān, but none seems to be the place mentioned here. He also mentions a Kharqān Canal in the vicinity of Marw (I, 66), which is mentioned later in Ṭabarī's narrative. There is also the possibility that Kharaq was intended. See n. 102 above.

drew (i'tazal)[108] at the head of fifty-five hundred men—some say with only four thousand—and said, "We are the just detachment; we summon [people] to the truth, and we fight none but those who fight us." Al-Ḥārith came to the Mosque of 'Iyāḍ, and sent to al-Kirmānī calling upon him to let the government be decided by consultation, but al-Kirmānī refused. Al-Ḥārith sent his son Muḥammad, and he moved his household[109] from the house of Tamīm b. Naṣr. At this, Naṣr wrote to his own tribe and the Muḍar, "Stay with al-Ḥārith as good advisers." So they came to him, and al-Ḥārith told them, "You are the root and branch of the Arabs, but you are about to be routed, so come out to me with your households." They replied, "We never agree on anything without encountering it."

One of the administrative assistants in al-Kirmānī's camp was Muqātil b. Sulaymān. A man of the Bukhārīs came to him and said, "Give me the payment for the mangonels I set up." He told him, "Establish the proof that you set them up for the sake of the Muslims." At this, Shaybah b. Shaykh al-Azdī testified for him. A draft on the treasury was then written for the man at Muqātil's behest.

[1932] The followers of al-Ḥārith wrote to al-Kirmānī, "We advise you to fear God and to obey Him, to follow the path of imāms of guidance and to forbid of your blood what God has forbidden. If God joins us together, it will be for al-Ḥārith's earnest desire for a relationship with God and his sincere advice to His servants. We have exposed ourselves to war, our blood to spilling, and our property to destruction. All that is little to us, beside the reward we hope for from God. We are all brothers in religion, and helpers against the enemy. So fear God and return to the truth, for truly we desire not the spilling of blood unless it be lawful."

They remained for several days, and then al-Ḥārith b. Surayj came and bored a hole in the wall, near Nawbān at the house of Hishām b. Abī Haytham. At this, cautious people parted company with al-

108. Bishr b. Jurmūz had fought with the Murji'ites of Jahm b. Safwān earlier. Some of the early Mu'tazilah were accused of following the teachings of Jahm later on. The Mu'tazilah, whose political program was "an upright Imām," took their name from a ḥadīth which orders withdrawal from factions when the Imāmate is in doubt. The expression i'tazala, "he withdrew," is at least suggestive of possible connections between the followers of Jahm b. Ṣafwān and the Mu'tazilah.

109. The text is naqalahu, "he moved him;" it should be read ḥawala thaqalahu, "he moved his household," as in the Cairo edition.

Ḥārith, saying, "You have acted treacherously." Al-Qāṣim al-Shaybānī and Rabīʿ al-Taymī remained in one group, while al-Kirmānī came into the city from the Sarakhs Gate. Al-Ḥārith opposed them. Al-Munakhkhal b. ʿAmr al-Azdī passed by, whereupon al-Samaydaʿ, one of the Banū al-ʿAdawiyyah, slew him, crying out, "Now for the avengers of Laqīṭ!" Thereupon the two sides fought one another. Al-Kirmānī put Dāwud b. Shuʿayb and his brothers Khālid, Mazyad and Muhallab on his right wing, and Sawrah b. Muḥammad b. ʿAzīz al-Kindī on his left, leading the Kindah and the Rabīʿah. The fighting grew fierce and al-Ḥārith's followers were put to flight and slain in the area between the breach in the wall and al-Ḥārith's camp. Al-Ḥārith, who was on a mule, got off it and mounted a horse. He struck it, and it sped off as his followers fled. He stayed with some of his followers, and was slain at a tree. His brother Sawādah, Bishr b. Jurmūz and Qaṭan b. al-Mughīrah b. ʿAjrad were also killed. Then al-Kirmānī stopped the fight. A hundred men were slain along with al-Ḥārith, and so were a hundred of al-Kirmānī's followers. Al-Ḥārith's headless body was crucified at the city of Marw. Hid death came thirty days after Naṣr's departure [1933] from Marw, the last Sunday of Rajab (April 25, 746).

It was said that al-Ḥārith was killed in this manner under an olive or sorb tree in the year 128 (745–746). Al-Kirmānī found sheets of gold belonging to al-Ḥārith, which he seized. He put al-Ḥārith's concubine (umm walad) in confinement; then he let her go—she had once belonged to Ḥājib b. ʿAmr b. Salamah b. Sakan b. Jawn b. Dabīb. He also seized the property of those who departed with Naṣr, and he took his choice of the furnishings of ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr. Ibrāhīm[110] asked him, "By what right do you acquire his property?" At this, Ṣāliḥ of the family of al-Waḍḍāḥ said, "Pour out his blood for me!" But Muqātil b. Sulaymān stepped between them and brought him to his house.

According to ʿAlī (al-Madāʾinī)—Zuhayr b. al-Hunayd: Al-Kirmānī went out to Bishr b. Jurmūz and camped outside the city of Marw. Bishr had four thousand men, and al-Ḥārith camped with al-Kirmānī. Al-Kirmānī stayed thus for some days, at a distance of two *farsakh*s (12 km) from Bishr's camp. Then he advanced until he was close to it, intending to do battle with Bishr. He told al-Ḥārith, 110. Perhaps Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh al-Sulamī, mentioned above.

"Move up." But al-Ḥārith regretted having followed al-Kirmānī and said, "Don't be in a hurry to fight them; I'll get them back for you." He left the camp with ten horsemen and rode until they came to Bishr's camp in the village of Darzījān and stayed with them, saying, "I was not one to fight against you with the Yamanīs!" Then the Muḍar began to steal away from the camp of al-Kirmānī to al-Ḥārith until none of the Muḍar remained with al-Kirmānī except two men: Salamah b. Abī ʿAbdallāh the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym, who said, [1934] "By God, I shall never follow al-Ḥārith, for I know that he is a deceiver;" and Muhallab b. Iyās, who said, "I will not follow him, for I have never seen him except leading cavalry which has been repulsed."

Then al-Kirmānī engaged them repeatedly. They would fight each other, and then go back behind their trenches. One time the advantage would be with one side, and another time with the other. On one such day they met in battle when Marthad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Mujāshiʿī had been drinking. He went out drunk on a horse belonging to al-Ḥārith. He was hit with a lance and thrown from his mount. Some horsemen of the Banū Tamīm protected him until he was safe, but the horse ran away. When he came back, al-Ḥārith blamed him, and said, "You almost killed yourself." He told al-Ḥārith, "You only say that because of your horse; may his wife be divorced if I don't bring you a livelier [horse than yours from their camp!" The next day they fought again, and Marthad said,][111] "Who has the liveliest horse in their camp?" They told him, "ʿAbdallāh b. Daysam al-ʿAnazī," and pointed to where he stood. Marthad fought until he reached him, and then struck him. Ibn Daysam threw himself from his horse, and Marthad hooked the reins of the horse on his lance and led it until he came to al-Ḥārith. Then he said, "Take this in place of your horse." Mukhallad b. al-Ḥasan encountered Marthad later, and said in jest, "How fine the horse of Ibn Daysam is under you!" At this, he dismounted and said, "Take it!" He replied, "You want to disgrace me! You took it from us in war, and shall I take it in peace?"

They remained thus for some days. Then al-Ḥārith moved off by night and came to the walls of Marw and bored an opening and entered within the walls. Then al-Kirmānī entered, and al-Ḥārith moved off. At this the Muḍar told al-Ḥārith, "We left the trenches when the day was ours, and you've run away more than once, so dismount and fight on foot!" He told them, "I'm more good to you as a horseman than as a foot-soldier." However, they said, "We will not be satisfied unless you dismount." He thus dismounted to fight between the wall of Marw and the city. Al-Ḥārith was killed along with his brother and Bishr b. Jurmūz and a number of cavalry from the Tamīm, while the rest were put to flight. Al-Ḥārith was crucified, and Marw was given over to the Yaman, who tore down the houses of the Muḍar. [1935]

111. The text lacks the bracketed words, which are supplied by the Cairo edition.

When al-Ḥārith was slain, Naṣr b. Sayyār composed these verses:

Now, bringer of humiliation upon his folk,
may removal and distance be yours in death!

Your evil fortune made all Muḍar to fall, and diminished the reputation of your people.

Azd and its partisans were not wont [before you] to hope to overcome ʿAmr or Mālik

Nor the Banū Saʿd, when they bridled each swift horse deadly black in color!

It is also said that Naṣr addressed these verses to ʿUthmān b. Ṣadaqah al-Māzinī. Umm Kathīr al-Ḍabbiyyah said:

May God not bless any female, but torment her to the end of time, if she marries a Muḍarī!

Convey to the men of Tamīm the word of a woman distressed, whom you lodged in the house of humiliation and poverty!

If you return not to the battle after your wheeling, until you make the men of Azd retreat in a victory,

I am ashamed for you that you give your obedience to this Mazūnī who mulcts you by oppression.

ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥārith said:

Now, O Naṣr, the hidden is revealed, though hope and expectation were protracted.

The Mazūn have exercised in the Land of Marw the office of the governor, decreeing as they will.

Their ruling is held lawful in every judgment against Muḍar, though the ruling is unjust

While Ḥimyar[112] sit in their assemblies, and blood is pouring from their [Muḍar's] necks.

If Muḍar is content with that and is abased, then may their abjection and distress be long!

And if they turned from that 'twere well; if not, [1936] then let destruction fall upon their armies!

He also recited:

Well then, O you man whom emotions have split asunder,

Wake up! and leave aside the thing you sought, and we also sought for.

For there have occurred in our presence matters of strange condition.

I beheld the Azd become mighty in Marw, while the Arabs were humiliated,[113]

And brass became current when that happened, while gold became a trifle.

112. The Banū Ḥimyar were a kingly Yamanī tribe. Here apparently all Yaman tribes are meant.

113. The Azd were taunted with being fisherfolk of 'Umān, and no true Arabs. See EI[2] s.v. Azd.

Abū Bakr b. Ibrāhīm, addressing ʿAlī and ʿUthmān the sons of al-Kirmānī:

I travel intending with my poem of praise two brothers whose qualities excel those of all men,

Outracing noble stallions, never lacking forage, while the guest, the stranger, never lacks their cheer.

Ascendant and yet racing for the height, their tribe lives under their protection.

I mean that ʿAlī and his chief helper
ʿUthmān; never was humiliated one who followed them,

Still racing that they may overtake their father, like stallions from afar who near the goal.

And if they did attain it, 'tis partly due to noble sire, that they race up the slope to catch up to a father.

And if he should outrun them, many times he ran surpassing them and others too.

Indeed I shall praise them for what my eyes have seen, though I've not numbered all their qualities.

They are two pious men, to whom all are directed;
both bearers of their tribe's burden, perfect men;

They removed from the haughtiness of kingly state a Naṣr, who found humiliation in opposing them;

They drove Ibn Aqṭaʿ [Naṣr] away after slaying his defenders; divided are his spoils among their horsemen.

Also al-Ḥārith b. Surayj, when they aimed at him so that their swords took turns in striking his head.

They took the best part of their father in his prime [1937] so that their folk are mighty, and those who follow them.

In this year Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad (the 'Abbāsid) sent Abū Muslim to Khurāsān, and wrote his followers there, "I have given him my command, so listen to him and accept his words, for I have given him command over Khurāsān and whatever he may gain control over beyond it."[114] Abū Muslim came to them, but they did not accept his words. Those who were opposed went and met in Mecca in the presence of Ibrāhīm. Abū Muslim informed Ibrāhīm that they had not acted in accord with his letter and command, and Ibrāhīm said, "I have offered this authority to more than one, and they have refused it." This was because, before he sent Abū Muslim, he had offered it to Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzā'ī, who said, "I shall never take on two functions." Then he offered it to Ibrāhīm b. Salamah, and he refused. He now informed them that he had decided on Abū Muslim, and commanded them to hear and to obey. Then he said to Abū Muslim, "'Abd al-Raḥmān,[115] you are one of us, people of the House, so learn my instructions well. Look to this tribe of Yaman; honor them and settle among them, for truly God will not complete this matter without them. Look to this tribe of Rabī'ah, and be suspicious of all they do. Look to this tribe of Muḍar; they are indeed the enemy close to the House, so slay anyone of whom you are in doubt, or in whose actions there is ambiguity, or anyone of whom you come to feel any suspicion. If you can not leave one Arab tongue in Khurāsān,[116] then do it; any boy who has attained five handspans height, whom you suspect, slay! But do not quarrel with the shaykh, that is, Sulaymān b. Kathīr, and do not disobey him. If any matter gives you difficulty then go to him rather than to me."

---

114. For Abū Muslim's mission to Khurāsān see Akhbār al-Dawlah, 267ff; FHA, 164ff; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 155ff; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, IV, 478ff; Balādhurī, Ansāb, III, 120ff; Azdī, 65; Dīnawarī, 360.

115. One of several proper names attributed to him. The most detailed treatment of his origins is found in the Akhbar al-Dawlah, 253ff.

116. Given the instruction to court one group of Arabs and known 'Abbāsid practice, this is a very problematic statement. (On it, see Sharon, 'Alīyat, 156-J.L.) The need to rely on the Yaman and Rabī'ah vis-a-vis the Muḍar is found in various traditions. See for example Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 154; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, IV, 477.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad who reported it from Abū Mikhnaf, in this year al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Khārijī was killed. [1938]

The Death of al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays the Khārijite

When al-Ḍaḥḥāk was besieging ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz at Wāsiṭ and Manṣūr b. Jumhūr gave him the oath of allegiance, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar saw that he could not withstand al-Ḍaḥḥāk. He therefore sent him a message, "Your stand against me is worth nothing. Here is Marwān, so march against him. If you do battle with him I shall be with you." He became reconciled with him, as we have mentioned in the conflicting accounts of this event. Hishām reported from Abū Mikhnaf that al-Ḍaḥḥāk set out from Ibn ʿUmar to engage Marwān at Kafartūtha in the territory of the Jazīrah, and was slain the day the armies met.

According to Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm: ʿAṭiyyah al-Thaʿlabī[117] slew Milḥān, al-Ḍaḥḥāk's follower and governor for Kūfah, at the Bridge of Saylaḥūn. News of Milḥān's slaying reached al-Ḍaḥḥāk while he was besieging ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar at Wāsiṭ, and al-Ḍaḥḥāk sent as replacement one of his followers called Muṭāʿin. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar and al-Ḍaḥḥāk made peace on the condition that Ibn ʿUmar enter into obedience to al-Ḍaḥḥāk. Ibn ʿUmar did this, and prayed behind him. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk went off to Kūfah, and Ibn ʿUmar stayed with his followers at Wāsiṭ. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk entered Kūfah, and the inhabitants of Mosul wrote to him inviting him to come there, whereupon they would give him control of their city. After twenty months he marched with all his troops to Mosul. Ruling there at that time was Marwān's governor, a man of the Banū Shaybān of the Jazīrah called al-Qaṭirān b. Akmah. The people of Mosul [1939] opened the city for al-Ḍaḥḥāk, and al-Qaṭirān fought them with a small number of his tribe and the people of his house to the last man. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk thus took possession of Mosul and its districts.

Word of this reached Marwān while he was besieging Ḥimṣ and preoccupied in fighting its inhabitants. He wrote to his son 'Abdallāh, who was his viceregent for the Jazīrah, ordering him to march with those of his guard (rawābiṭ) whom he had with him to the city of Naṣībīn[118] in order to prevent al-Ḍaḥḥāk from cutting the Jazīrah in half. 'Abdallāh set out for Naṣībīn with all of his guard, about seven or eight thousand men, leaving as his deputy at Ḥarrān an officer with one thousand men or thereabouts. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk, too, marched from Mosul toward 'Abdallāh at Naṣībīn. 'Abdallāh fought him but could do nothing against the great number of troops who were with al-Ḍaḥḥāk.These were, according to the accounts which have reached us, one hundred and twenty thousand. He paid monthly stipends of one hundred and twenty dirhams to a cavalryman, one hundred to a footsoldier, and eighty to a mule driver.

117. The text is al-Taghlibī; it should be read al-Thaʿlabī as in the Cairo edition. This is supported by FHA, 164, and is more probable, since many of the Taghlib were fighting for the Khārijites.

Al-Ḍaḥḥāk stayed at Naṣībīn besieging it, and he sent two of his officers, named 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr al-Taghlibī and Badr al-Dhakwānī the mawlā of Sulaymān b. Hishām, with four or five thousand men and they came to Raqqah. Marwān's cavalry there, about five hundred horsemen, fought them. As soon as word reached Marwān of their presence at Raqqah, he sent cavalry from his guard. As they neared the city, al-Ḍaḥḥāk's followers began leaving to go back to him. Marwān's cavalry pursued them, and more than thirty of the men in their rearguard were unhorsed. Marwān had them cut in pieces when he came to Raqqah. He went on, intent on battle against al-Ḍaḥḥāk and his forces, until they encountered each other at a place called Ghazz[119] in the territory of Kafartūtha. They [1940] fought a battle that same day. When it was evening, al-Ḍaḥḥāk and almost six thousand of his most steadfast followers dismounted to fight on foot, though the people of his camp for the most part did not know what had become of him. Marwān's cavalry surrounded them and pressed them hard until they killed them around nightfall. The remainder of al-Ḍaḥḥāk's followers went back to their camp, and neither Marwān nor al-Ḍaḥḥāk's followers knew that he was among the slain until they missed him in the middle of the night. Some of those who had seen him when he dismounted to fight on foot came and told them of it and that he was killed. They wept for him and be-

118. One of the most important towns in upper Mesopotamia on the reaches of the Hirmās, a tributary of the Tigris. See LeStrange, Lands, 94, 95.

119. The vocalization is conjectural. This place is not listed by Yāqūt.

wailed his death. 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr al-Taghlibī, the officer he had sent against Raqqah, went out to Marwān's camp, and entering Marwān's presence informed him that al-Ḍaḥḥāk had been killed. Marwān sent men from his guard with him carrying firebrands and candles to the site of the battle. They turned over the slain until they found al-Ḍaḥḥāk and carried him to Marwān. There were more than twenty cuts on his face. The people of Marwān's camp shouted "God is Great!" Then those in al-Ḍaḥḥāk's camp realized that they had learned of his death. Marwān sent his head that night to the cities of the Jazīrah, where it was paraded about.

Some say that al-Khaybarī and al-Ḍaḥḥāk were only killed in the year 129 (746–47).

According to Hishām who heard it from Abū Mikhnaf, in this year al-Khaybarī the Khārijite was slain.[120]

The Slaying of al-Khaybarī and Shaybān's Succession

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ: When al-Ḍaḥḥāk was slain, the people in his camp arose at daybreak and gave their oath of allegiance to al-Khaybarī. They remained there that day and went to him the morning of the next day. They lined up before him and he put their ranks in order. Sulaymān b. Hishām was there that day with his mawlās and the people of his house; he had come to al- [1941]
Ḍaḥḥāk at Naṣībīn with more than three thousand of the people of his house and his mawlās. Sulaymān also married the sister of Shaybān al-Ḥarūrī, the man to whom they gave the oath of allegiance after the slaying of al-Khaybarī. Al-Khaybarī attacked Marwān with about four hundred Khārijite riders, and routed Marwān's men, and him in the midst of them. Marwān fled his encampment, and al-Khaybarī entered it with his followers. They shouted their battle cry, "O Khaybarī, Khaybarī!" They also killed all those whom they overtook, until they came to Marwān's tent. They cut its ropes, and al-Khaybarī sat upon Marwān's own carpet. Marwān's right wing, commanded by his son 'Abdallāh, had held its ground, and his left wing commanded by Isḥaq b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī was still firm. When the people of Marwān's camp saw how few were accompanying al-Khaybarī, some slaves from the camp assaulted him with tentpoles and slew him and all of his companions at Marwān's tent and in the area around it. The news reached Marwān when he had fled five or six miles (mīl) from the camp. At this he returned to his camp, ordered his cavalry back from their places and stations, and spent that night in his camp. The people of al-Khaybarī's army went back and elected Shaybān as their ruler and gave him the oath of allegiance. After this, Marwān fought them only with cavalry squadrons (karādīs),[121] and he gave up using battle lines from that day forward. On the day al-Khaybarī was slain Marwān had sent Muḥammad b. Sa'īd, one of his trusted men and secretaries, to al-Khaybarī (with a message). However, word reached Marwān that this man had incited the enemy and encouraged them at that time. He was brought to Marwān as a prisoner, and Marwān cut off one of his hands and a foot and then cut out his tongue.

120. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, I, 400ff; Azdī, 71ff; FHA, 159ff.

Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah is Sent to Iraq

In this year Marwān sent Yazīd b. 'Umar Hubayrah to Iraq to fight the Khārijites who were still there.

[1942] 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz led the Pilgrimage at Mecca in this year; that is what Abū Ma'shar (al-Sindī) said, according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—from one who mentioned it—Isḥāq b. 'Isā—Abū Ma'shar. Al-Wāqidī and others say the same.

Al-Wāqidī reported: Marwān conquered Ḥimṣ and tore down its walls, and took Nu'aym b. Thābit al-Judhāmī captive and slew him in Shawwāl 128 (June 26–July 24, 746). We have mentioned those who differ with him on this earlier.

The governor of Madīnah, Mecca and Ṭā'if, according to what is mentioned for this year, was 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. In Iraq were the governors of al-Ḍaḥḥāk and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar. In charge of the judiciary of Baṣrah was Thumāmah b. 'Abdallāh. Naṣr b. Sayyār was (governor) in Khurāsān, which was torn by civil war.

121. Marwān is generally credited with having replaced the battle lines (ṣufūf) with more mobile cavalry squadrons (karādīs).

This year Abū Ḥamzah the Khārijite met ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā Ṭālib al-Ḥaqq, who summoned him to his way of religion (madhhab).[122]

According to ʿAbbās b. ʿĪsā al-ʿUqaylī—Hārūn b. Mūsā al-Farwī[123]—Mūsā b. Kathīr the mawlā of the Sāʿidīs: The beginning of the affair of Abū Ḥamzah who was al-Mukhtār b. ʿAwf al-Azdī al-Salīmī from Baṣrah is as follows. He would go each year to Mecca calling on people to oppose Marwān b. Muḥammad and the Marwānids. He continued to oppose them until ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā came at the end of 128 (August–September 746) and told him, "O Man, listen to a good word. I see that you summon people to what is just, so come with me. I am a man obeyed among my people." [1943] ʿAbdallāh then left Mecca and came to Ḥaḍramawt, where Abū Ḥamzah swore allegiance to him as Caliph and preached opposition to Marwān and to the Marwānid house. Muḥammad b. Ḥasan reported that Abū Ḥamzah passed by Maʿdin Banī Sulaym,[124] where the governor was Kathīr b. ʿAbdallāh. He heard some of Abū Ḥamzah's talk, and ordered that he be given seventy lashes. Abū Ḥamzah went on his way to Mecca. Later when he conquered Madīnah, Kathīr hid himself until matters had run their course.

122. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, I, 406ff, sub anno 129; Aghānī, XX, 97–99; Azdī, 77, 101; FHA, 168ff. ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā al-Kindī was known as the "Seeker of Justice" (Ṭālib al-Ḥaqq). A devout qāḍī for the governor of Ḥaḍramawt, he had been contacted by the leadership of Ibāḍī Khārijites in Baṣrah. They sent agents such as Abū Ḥamzah to him in order to initiate an Ibāḍī revolt in Ḥaḍramawt and the Yaman. See EI[2] s.v. Ibaḍiyya.

123. The text is Ghazawī; it should be read Farwī, following the Cairo edition.

124. Maʿdin Banī Sulaym was a populated oasis in the district of Madīnah on the road to Najd. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 572, and III, 565–66, s.v. Farān.

The Events of The Year

129

(SEPTEMBER 22, 746–SEPTEMBER 10, 747)

One of the events of this year was the death of Shaybān b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Yashkurī, known as Abū al-Dalfāʾ.[125]

The Death of Shaybān b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz the Khārijite

When al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Shaybānī the leader of the Khārijites was slain, and al-Khaybarī after him, those Khārijites who were opposing Marwān b. Muḥammad and making war on him chose Shaybān as their leader and gave him the oath of allegiance. Marwān then fought them.

Hishām b. Muḥammad and al-Haytham b. ʿAdī reported: When al-Khaybarī was slain, Sulaymān b. Hishām who was in their camp told the Khārijites, "What you are doing is not a good idea. If you accept my advice, fine. If you won't, then I'm leaving you." They asked, "What should we do?" He told them, "If one of you wins a victory, he then tries to get himself killed, and succeeds. I think we should leave here in a defensive posture so that we may set up camp at Mosul and entrench ourselves." They did this, and Marwān pursued them. The Khārijites were on the east bank of the Tigris and 125. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, I, 409; FHA, 165–66; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 405.

Marwān was directly opposite them. They then fought each other for nine months. 'Umar b. Hubayrah was at Qarqīsiyyah with a large [1944] body of troops, men of Syria and of the Jazīrah. Marwān now ordered him to go to Kūfah, which was then governed by al-Muthannā b. 'Imrān, a client ('ā'idh) of Quraysh and a Khārijite.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm —Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad: Marwān b. Muḥammad used to fight the Khārijites with the battle line (ṣaff); but when al-Khaybarī was killed and Shaybān received the oath of allegiance, Marwān fought them with cavalry squadrons, and discontinued the battle line from that time forward. The Khārijites also began to form squadrons like those of Marwān with which to protect themselves against his squadrons and to fight them. Many of those who followed them for pay now separated from them and deserted,[126] so there now remained around forty thousand. Sulaymān b. Hishām advised them to retreat to the city of Mosul and make it a place in which they could find refuge and ample supplies. They accepted his advice, and set off by night. Marwān woke the next day and set off after them. They would hardly leave a place before Marwān would alight there. They went on to the city of Mosul and camped on the banks of the Tigris, entrenched their position, and fastened pontoon bridges between their camp and the city, which was their source of provisions and facilities. Marwān dug his trench opposite them, and remained six months sallying forth against them morning and evening.

A son of Sulaymān b. Hishām's brother was brought to Marwān. He was called Umayyah b. Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām, and had been with his uncle in the camp of Shaybān at Mosul. He went out to fight one of Marwān's horsemen in single combat, and the man captured him and brought him in. He told Marwān, "I implore you, for God and kinship's sake, uncle!" But Marwān replied, "There is no kinship between me and you this day." He gave the order and, while 126. The small dedicated core of the Khārijites were mostly from the Bakr and Rabī'ah tribes of the Jazīrah. They had been joined by some former followers of Sulaymān b. Hishām and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar. These followers were drawn from the Yaman. The Khārijites had thus apparently become a large scale movement. They were the proponents of the equality of all Muslims regardless of genealogy. Marwān's support came from the Qays of the Jazīrah.

Umayyah's uncle Sulaymān and his brothers looked on, first his hands and then his head were cut off.

[1945] Marwān wrote to Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah commanding him to march from Qarqīsiyyah with all his troops against 'Ubaydah b. Sawwār, al-Ḍaḥḥāk's deputy in Iraq. He encountered 'Ubaydah's cavalry at 'Ayn Tamr, engaged them, and routed them. Commanding them at that time were al-Muthannā b. 'Imrān, of the clients of Quraysh, and al-Ḥasan b. Yazīd. They then regrouped against him at Nukhaylah[127] by Kūfah, and he put them to flight. Then they gathered at the Ṣarāt Canal, and this time 'Ubaydah was with them. Ibn Hubayrah fought them, and 'Ubaydah was slain. His followers fled, and Ibn Hubayrah plundered their camp. Now they had no one remaining in Iraq, and Ibn Hubayrah took control of the province. Marwān wrote to him from the trenches at Mosul, commanding him to send 'Āmir b. Ḍubārah al-Murrī to reinforce him, and he sent him with about six or eight thousand men. Word of this reached Shaybān and the Khārijites so they sent two officers at the head of four thousand men against Ibn Ḍubārah. These men were named Ibn Ghawth and al-Jawn. They encountered Ibn Ḍubārah at Sinn[128] outside Mosul, and engaged him in fierce combat, but Ibn Ḍubārah put them to flight. When the defeated Khārijites came back to them, Sulaymān b. Hishām advised them to move from Mosul, telling them that they would have no place to stand if Ibn Ḍubārah came upon them from the rear while Marwān mounted a frontal attack. At this, they moved on, and took the road to Ahwāz and Fārs by way of Ḥulwān.[129] Marwān sent three of his officers with about thirty thousand of his guard (rawābiṭ) to Ibn Ḍubārah. The officers were Muṣ'ab b. al-Ṣaḥṣaḥ al-Asadī, Shaqīq, and 'Uṭayf al-Sulamī).[130] Shaqīq was the one of whom the Khārijites said:

> Both your sisters know, O Shaqīq, > that you do not recover from your drunkenness.

---

127. The scene of a serious battle against the Khārijites in the time of Mu'āwiyah I. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 771.

128. For Sinn, see LeStrange, Lands, 91.

129. Ḥulwān was on the border between Jibāl and Iraq. It was situated along the great road leading to Khurāsān. See LeStrange, Lands, 191.

130. The nisbah of al-Sulaymānī is furnished by the Cairo edition.

Marwān wrote to Ibn Ḍubārah to pursue the Khārijites and not to stop until he had annihilated them. Therefore he did not cease pursuing them until they reached and then left Fārs. During all this time he picked off any of their stragglers whom he encountered. [1946] Then they scattered. Shaybān led one group to Baḥrayn and was slain there, and Sulaymān b. Hishām with his mawlās and family embarked on ships for Sind. Marwān returned to his residence in Ḥarrān and stayed there until he set out for the Zāb.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad, Abū Mikhnaf stated: Marwān ordered Yazīd b. Hubayrah, who was at Qarqīsiyyah with many troops from the armies of Syria and the Jazīrah, to march against Kūfah. At that time Kūfah was governed by a Khārijite called al-Muthannā b. 'Imrān al-'Ā'idhī, one of the 'A'idhat Quraysh. Ibn Hubayrah marched along the Euphrates until he came to 'Ayn Tamr; then he moved on and met al-Muthannā at Rawḥā'. He came to Kūfah in Ramaḍān 129 (May 17–June 14, 747), routed the Khārijites and entered the city. Ibn Hubayrah then went to the Ṣarāt Canal, while Shaybān sent 'Ubaydah b. Sawwār at the head of many cavalry. He camped on the east bank of the Ṣarāt, while Ibn Hubayrah was on the west side. They joined battle, and 'Ubaydah was slain along with a number of his followers. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr was with them at the events on the Ṣarāt, and he went on from there to gain control of the two Māhs[131] and all the mountain region. Ibn Hubayrah marched now on Wāsiṭ, seized Ibn 'Umar and confined him. He sent Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah against Sulaymān b. Ḥabīb who was ruling the districts of Ahwāz. Sulaymān sent Dāwud b. Ḥātim with a force to fight Nubātah, and they encountered each other at Muriyān[132] on the banks of the Kārūn. These people were put to flight, and Dāwud b. Ḥātim was slain. Concerning this, Khalaf b. Khalīfah said:

131. Dīnawar was called Māh al-Kūfah while Nihāwānd was known as Māh al-Baṣrah, because their tax revenues went to the two garrison towns of Iraq in early Islamic times. See LeStrange, Lands, 189, 196–97.

132. The vocalization of Muriyān is uncertain. Perhaps this is a variant of, or an error for, Mūriyān, a village in Khūzistān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 679. For the Dujayl or the Kārūn which flows in the Ahwāz district of Khūzistān, see LeStrange, Lands, 232–36; 245–47.

Would that I'd been a ransom and protection to Dāwud, when the army surrendered the son of Ḥātim!

He was a Muhallabī, shining of face, never regretting the favors he'd done.

I asked "Who will let me know the thing as it was [1947] truly [for the ignorant is not like the knowing]."[133]

They said, "We beheld him on an outcrop, attacking like a fierce lion;

Then he doubled over, falling in blood that flowed over his smooth body,

And the Copts[134] came up [to stand] over his head, quarrelling over his sword and his ring."

Sulaymān went on until he caught up with Ibn Muʿāwiyah al-Jaʿfarī[135] in Fārs, while Ibn Hubayrah stayed where he was for a month; then he sent ʿĀmir b. Ḍubārah with Syrian troops to Mosul. ʿĀmir marched until he reached Sinn, where al-Jawn b. Kilāb al-Khārijī encountered him. He put ʿĀmir b. Ḍubārah to flight, driving him into Sinn, where he fortified himself. Marwān began to send Ibn Ḍubārah reinforcements. They took the overland route until they came to the Tigris, and then crossed over to him. This continued until their number was great. At the same time, Manṣūr b. Jumhūr was supplying Shaybān with money from the mountain districts. When the troops who followed Ibn Ḍubārah became numerous, he struck out against al-Jawn b. Kilāb, and al-Jawn was slain. Ibn Ḍubārah 133. This lacuna in the text is filled by the Cairo edition.

134. The text is al-qibṭ. It seems very unlikely that Egyptian Christians were in Ibn Hubayrah's army. Probably this should be read al-qabṭ, "the group," but the text has been followed in translation.

135. That is ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar, the great-grandson of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib's brother. ʿAbdallāh revolted in Kūfah in 127. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1879–87; Ibn Khayyāṭ, I, 394–95; Azdī, 66; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 44ff. See also Sharon, ʿAlīyat, 194–201; EI[2] s.v. ʿAbd Allāh b. Muʿāwiya. Regarding the incidents recorded here see Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 409; FHA, 162–63; Masʿūdī, 67ff, 169; Azdī, 107 sub anno 129; Akhbār al-Dawlah, 251. Check also the index to the Aghānī for numerous references to him.

then continued on to Mosul. When news of al-Jawn's death and Ibn Ḍubārah's approach came to Shaybān, he did not care to stay between the two (Umayyad) armies, so he withdrew with his own troops and the Yamanī cavalry from Syria. Ibn Ḍubārah proceeded with his men to join Marwān at Mosul. Marwān supplied him with many of his own troops, and commanded him to go against Shaybān. If Shaybān maintained his position, he should do likewise; if he marched, he should march too. He should not initiate a struggle, but if Shaybān attacked him he should fight back. If Shaybān refrained, he should refrain as well, and if Shaybān withdrew, he should follow him. So it was, until Shaybān moved through the mountains and came to Bayḍā' of Iṣṭakhr,[136] where 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah was with a great body of troops. Matters between him and Ibn Mu'āwiyah had not been settled, so he continued until Jīraft in Kirmān,[137] where he halted. Ibn Ḍubārah advanced until he was opposite Ibn [1948] Mu'āwiyah and halted for several days. Then he set about attacking him, and Ibn Mu'āwiyah ran away, escaping to Harāt. Ibn Ḍubārah and his troops went on and encountered Shaybān at Jīraft in Kirmān. They fought a violent battle, the Khārijites were put to flight, and their camp was put to auction. Shaybān went on to Sijistān, where he perished in the year 130 (747–748).

Abū 'Ubaydah reported: When al-Khaybarī was slain, Shaybān b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Yashkurī took command of the Khārijites and made war on Marwān. Their war went on for a long time, but meanwhile at Wāsiṭ Ibn Hubayrah had killed 'Ubaydah b. Sawwār and driven out the Khārijites. He had with him the chief officers of the armies of Syria and the Jazīrah, and he sent 'Āmir b. Ḍubārah with four thousand men to reinforce Marwān. He took the route of Madā'in,[138] and Shaybān learned of his progress. Fearing that Marwān would join forces with Ibn Ḍubārah's men, he sent al-Jawn b. Kilāb al-Shaybānī to engage Ibn Ḍubārah. They encountered each other at Sinn, and al-Jawn detained 'Āmir for several days.

---

136. Bayḍā' was the "White City" of Fārs where Arab armies had camped when invading the country. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 791–94. Iṣṭakhr was Persepolis.

137. For Jīraft, see LeStrange, Lands, 314. The Shaybān mentioned here may actually be Shaybān b. Salamah. See n. 158.

138. Madā'in, meaning, "the cities," had a legendary history of settlement by conquerors. The Sasanian capital of Ctesiphon had been situated in this area. See LeStrange, Lands, 33–35.

According to Abū ʿUbaydah—Abū Saʿīd: We covered them, by God, and forced them to fight us. They were already afraid of us and wanted to run away, but we left them no way out. Then ʿĀmir told them, "You're dead men; there's no avoiding that, so die with honor." They hit us with a charge nothing would have stood against, and killed our leader, al-Jawn b. Kilāb. We retreated until we joined up with Shaybān, but Ibn Ḍubārah was following right behind us, until he halted a short way from our camp. We were fighting on two sides: Ibn Ḍubārah would come down on us from behind, on the Iraq side, and Marwān was in front in the direction of Syria. We were cut off from provisions and supplies, and the prices went high. A round of bread went for a silver piece; then the bread was gone, and nothing could be bought dear or cheap. Ḥabīb b. Khuḍrah[139] told Shay-[1949] bān, "Commander of the Faithful, you're in a tight place for subsistence. If only you would move to some other place!" He did, and went to Shahrazūr in the territory of Mosul, but his followers blamed him for it, and there were arguments about it."

One source says that when Shaybān took command of the Khārijites, (he went back with his followers to Mosul),[140] and Marwān followed him, halting when he halted. (Marwān fought him for a month, then)[141] Shaybān fled until he came to Fārs. Marwān sent ʿĀmir b. Ḍubārah after him (and Shaybān crossed over)[142] to the island of Ibn Kāwān (or Kishm)[143] and kept on going until he came to ʿUmān, where Julandā b. Masʿūd b. Jayfar b. Julandā al-Azdī killed him.[144]

In the year 129 (746–747), Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās commanded Abū Muslim, who had set forth from Khurāsān to visit him and had reached as far as Qūmis, to go

139. The text is Ibn Jadarah. The Cairo edition has Ibn Khudrah (vocalization uncertain), mentioned above as Ḥabīb b. Khudrah, mawlā of the Banū Ḥilāl, a Khārijite poet.

140. The text is marked by three lacunae. The phrases are supplied from the Cairo edition.

141. See n. 140.

142. See n. 140.

143. This island is known under many names. See LeStrange, Lands, 261.

144. The Banū Julandā were the hereditary Azdī princes of ʿUmān. Ironically, Ibn Julandā was also a Khārijite imām. He later fought the ʿAbbāsids as an Ibāḍī. See EI^{2} s.v. Ibāḍiyya; *D*julandā.

back to the 'Abbāsid Shī'ah in Khurāsān and order them to openly proclaim the revolution and put on the black color.[145]

Abū Muslim Preaches the 'Abbāsid Revolution in Khurāsān

'Alī b. Muḥammad reported the following from his shaykhs: Abū Muslim kept making visits to Khurāsān, until finally the tribal feuds broke out there. Then when the local authority began to unravel, Sulaymān b. Kathīr wrote to Abū Salamah al-Khallāl requesting him to write to Ibrāhīm and ask him to send a man of the people of his House. Abū Salamah thus wrote to Ibrāhīm, and he sent Abū Muslim.[146] In the year 129 (746–747), Ibrāhīm wrote to Abū Muslim asking him to come to him so that he might obtain a report from him. Abū Muslim left halfway through Jumādā II (early March 747) [1950] with seventy of the 'Abbāsid agents (nuqabā').[147] When they had come as far as Dandānqān in Khurāsān,[148] Kāmil—or Abū Ḳamil—stopped him and asked where they were going. "On pilgrimage," they said. Then Abū Muslim took him aside and summoned him to their cause. He responded favorably and let them alone. Abū Muslim continued on to Abīward and stayed there some days, and then proceeded to Nasā,[149] where 'Āṣim b. Qays al-Sulamī was the governor for Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Laythī. As he drew near, he sent al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī with a message to Asīd b. 'Abdallāh al-Khuzā'ī[150] to inform him that he was coming.

---

145. See n. 72 above.

146. See Sharon, 'Alīyat, 127–38. The Akhbār al-Dawlah, 271ff, is particularly rich in its treatment of Abū Muslim's relations with Sulaymān b. Kathīr. See also Ṭabarī, II/3, 1960ff. [J.L.]

147. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 290ff; FHA, 176ff. The agents designated as naqībs were divided into two groups, a council of twelve which retained primary control, chosen exclusively from agents in Marw, the major revolutionary station in Khurāsān; the individuals were part of a larger group of seventy that included operatives from various regional centers. For details see Sharon, 'Alīyat, 105–17. [J.L.]

148. Dandānqān was a town southwest of Marw on the road to Sarakhs. See LeStrange, Lands, 400.

149. Abīward or Bīward is on the edge of the Marw desert west of Dandānqān off the main road to Sarakhs. Nasā or Nisā is in a fertile valley west of Abīward. See LeStrange, Lands, 394. The 'Abbāsids had naqībs in these towns. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 218–19. The text gives a full listing of the 'Abbāsid agents.

150. Al-Ṭūsī was a naqīb from Abīward and Asīd al-Khuzā'ī was the agent from Nasā. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 218–19.

Al-Faḍl went on and stopped at a village of Nasā where he met a man from the Shīʿah who knew him. He asked for Asīd, but the man rebuffed him. Then al-Faḍl said, "O ʿAbdallāh, what is wrong in my asking where is the man's house?" The man replied, "There has been evil in this village. Two men were brought before the governor and slandered. It was said that they were propagandists. They were taken, and al-Aḥjam b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī, Ghaylān b. Faḍālah, Ghālib b. Saʿīd and al-Muhājir b. ʿUthmān were taken too."[151] At this, al-Faḍl went back to Abū Muslim and informed him. He left the road and took another through the villages lower down, and sent Ṭarkhān al-Jammāl to Asīd saying, "Ask him to come to me with as many of the (ʿAbbāsid) Shīʿah as he can, and beware of speaking to anyone you do not know." Ṭarkhān went to Asīd and invited him, and he told him where Abū Muslim was staying. At this, Asīd came to him, and Abū Muslim asked him what had happened. He replied, "Yes, it is true; al-Azhar b. Shuʿayb and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Saʿd came with letters from the Imām for you. They left the letters with me [1951] and started back, and they were taken;[152] I do not know who betrayed them. The governor sent them to ʿĀṣim b. Qays, and he had al-Muhājir b. ʿUthmān and other leading men of the Shīʿah beaten." "Where are the letters?" Abū Muslim asked. "At my house," Asīd said. "Bring them to me," said Abū Muslim, (so he brought him the letters and he read them).[153]

Then he went on to Qūmis,[154] which was governed by Bayhas b. Budayl al-ʿIjlī, and Bayhas came to them and said, "Where are you going?" "On pilgrimage," they said. "Do you have a good horse you

151. Al-Aḥjam and Ghaylān b. Faḍālah were naqībs. Al-Muhājir was a lesser functionary, belonging to a group known as the Propagandists of the Propagandists (duʿāt al-duʿāt). They seem to have been substitutes for a larger group of seventy known as the duʿāt. The duʿāt were undoubtedly subordinate to the naqībs. Ghālib b. Saʿīd (or Saʿd) was an ʿAbbāsid agent whose function cannot be determined. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 218–19, 222, 291. The account would seem to indicate that the authorities were extremely anxious at this time. This would explain the circuitous routes followed by Abū Muslim and his associates. (J.L.)

152. Al-Azhar b. Shuʿayb was a native of Marw who traveled with Bukayr b. Māhān in the eastern provinces soliciting support and monies for the revolutionary movement. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 223–24. It would appear from this text that he then served as a carrier from the Imām to the revolutionary centers in Khurāsān. (J.L.)

153. These words are missing in the text and are supplied by the Cairo edition.

154. That is to say the small province (or the capital of the province) adjacent to Khurāsān. See LeStrange, Lands, 364ff.

would sell?" he asked. "As for selling, no," said Abū Muslim, "but take any of our animals you wish." "Show them to me," he said. They showed them, and he admired a light bay horse. Abū Muslim then said, "It is yours." To this he replied, "No, I'll not accept it without a price." "You be the judge of its worth," Abū Muslim said. "Seven hundred [dirhams]," he said. "It is yours," said Abū Muslim. While Abū Muslim was in Qūmis a letter came from the Imām, and another for Sulaymān b. Kathīr. The one to Abū Muslim said, "I have sent you a flag of victory. Return from wherever my letter finds you, and send me Qaḥṭabah with whatever you have to deliver to me during the Pilgrimage Season." At this, Abū Muslim returned to Khurāsān, and sent Qaḥṭabah to the Imām. When they were in Nasā, the leader of an armed party confronted them in a village, and said, "Who are you?" "We intended to make the Pilgrimage," they said, "and we heard something about the road which frightened us." He brought them to ʿĀṣim b. Qays al-Sulamī who questioned them. They gave him the same answer, and he said, ("Be off." And he ordered)[155] al-Mufaḍḍal b. Sharqī al-Sulamī, who was in charge of security, to expel them from the area. Then Abū Muslim took this man aside and revealed their business to him. He responded favorably and said, "Go at your ease, and do not hurry." He remained with them until they left.

Abū Muslim came to Marw on the first day of Ramaḍān (May 16, 747), and handed the Imām's letter to Sulaymān b. Kathīr. The letter stated, "Proclaim your summons without delay; the time has come." They showed high esteem to Abū Muslim, and said, "He's a man of the People of the House [ahl al-bayt]."[156] They called on people to obey the Banū ʿAbbās, and sent to their partisans whether near or far, commanding them to reveal what was happening, and calling on them for support. Abū Muslim settled in one of the vil- [1952]

155. These words are missing in the text and are supplied by the Cairo edition.

156. Ahl al-bayt in pre-Islamic times meant the immediate family of a tribal leader. The term appears twice in the Qur'ān, once in a context which allows one to suppose that the family of the Prophet is indicated (33,33). The Shīʿah of ʿAlī have usually interpreted this through a tradition, the ḥadīth al-kisāʾ, which limits it to the family of ʿAlī. The Shīʿah of the ʿAbbāsids used another, the ḥadīth al-thaqalayn, whereby "people of the house" is extended to include the family of ʿAbbās, of ʿAlī, and of his two brothers ʿAqil and Jaʿfar, as well as their mawlās. In still another ḥadīth, Salmān al-Fārisī, a mawlā of the Prophet, is declared to be of the ahl al-bayt. See EI[2] s.v. Ahl al-bayt.

lages of the (Arab tribe of) Khuzāʿah called Safīdhanj.[157] At this time Shaybān[158] and al-Kirmāni were fighting Naṣr b. Sayyār together, so Abū Muslim circulated his summons to people, and his affair became manifest. The people said, "A man has come from the Banū Hāshim." They came to him from all directions. On the day of ʿId al-Fiṭr (ca. June 15, 747), he appeared at the village of Khālid b. Ibrāhīm.[159] Qāsim b. Mujāshiʿ al-Maraʾī led the people in prayer. Then Abū Muslim moved and settled at the village of Alīn, also called Allīn,[160] belonging to the Khuzāʿah. In one day, the people of sixty villages joined him, and he stayed there forty-two days. Abū Muslim's first victory[161] was at the hands of Mūsā b. Kaʿb al-Tamīmī at Abīward while he was occupied with the killing of ʿĀṣim [1953] b. Qays. Then victory came at Marwarrūdh.[162]

According to Abū al-Khaṭṭāb : Abū Muslim returned to the territory of Marw from Qūmis, having first sent Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb (al-Ṭāʾī) with the money and other things he had with him for the Imām Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad.[163] He arrived on Tuesday, the ninth of Shaʿbān 129 (April 27, 747), and settled in a village called Fanīn with Abū al-Ḥakam ʿIsā b. Aʿyan the naqīb.[164] This was the village of Abū Dāwud the naqīb. From there he sent Abū Dāwud, accompanied by ʿAmr b. Aʿyan to Ṭukhāristān and the areas this side of 157. Safīdhanj, following the text. The reading is problematic. Note the variants in the apparatus. The Khuzāʿah's origins were disputed, but they were frequently reckoned an offshoot of the Azd. See *EI*² s.v. Khuzāʿa.

158. Not to be confused with Shaybān b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Yashkurī who is mentioned above, this is Shaybān b. Salamah al-Ḥarūrī. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 395, 490, 498, 529, 537.

159. This is Abū Dāwud Khālid b. Ibrāhīm al-Shaybānī al-Bakrī, one of the ʿAbbāsid naqībs; see Akhbār al-Dawlah, 216. The village is later identified as Fanīn. See n. 164 below.

160. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 375 lists Allīn as a village in Marw. There is no entry for Ālīn or Bālīn. Note Ṭabarī, II/3, 1969, which gives a reading of Ālīn for Abū Muslim's headquarters and 1965, which gives Bālīn. LeStrange, Lands, 399 refers to a Bālīn Gate in Marw.

161. Details of Abū Muslim's initial campaign are found in the Akhbār al-Dawlah, 299ff.

162. Not to be confused with Marw, Marwarrūdh was situated about 160 miles from the former. See LeStrange, Lands, 404.

163. The revolutionaries transferred large sums of money and valuables to the Imām during their periodic visits with him.

164. A report that Abū Muslim stayed at the house of ʿIsā b. Aʿyan occurs in the entry on Fanīn in Yāqūt. He indicates that Fanīn was one of the villages of Marw. See Muʿjam, III, 921.

Balkh, to proclaim publicly the call (to revolution) during the month of Ramaḍān 129 (May 16–June 14, 747). He also sent al-Naḍr b. Ṣubayḥ al-Tamīmī with Sharīk b. Ghaḍī al-Tamīmī[165] to Marwarrūdh to proclaim the propaganda during Ramaḍān, and he sent Abū ʿĀṣim ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym[166] to Ṭālaqān. He sent Abū al-Jahm b. ʿAṭiyyah to ʿAlāʾ b. Ḥurayth[167] in Khwārizm to proclaim the call publicly on the twenty-fourth of Ramaḍān (June 8, 747). If their enemy should move against them before the appointed time, exposing them to injury and suffering, he permitted them to defend themselves and to bare their swords, unsheathing them in struggle against the enemies of God. Those whom the enemy distracted from rising at the appointed time would suffer no harm if they did it at a later time.

Then Abū Muslim moved from the house of Abū al-Ḥakam ʿIsā b. Aʿyan and stayed with Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzāʿī in his village, called Safīdhanj in the quarter (rabʿ) of Kharqān, on the second night of Ramaḍān (May 17, 747). On Wednesday night, the twenty-fifth of [1954]
Ramaḍān (June 9, 747), he unfurled the banner, sent to him by the Imām and called "The Shadow," on a lance fourteen cubits high, and he fastened the flag, sent by the Imām and called "The Clouds," on a lance thirteen cubits high, reciting the verse, "Permission is given to those who fight because they have been wronged; surely God is able to assist them."[168] Then he and Sulaymān b. Kathīr and Sulaymān's brothers and mawlās and those among the people of Safīdhanj who responded put on black garments. These included Ghaylān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī, who was Sulaymān's brother-in-law through his sister Umm ʿAmr bt. Kathīr, and Ḥumayd b. Razīn and his brother ʿUthmān b. Razīn.[169] All the Shīʿah from the dis-

165. These two were listed as naqībs. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 217–18.

166. Perhaps the Abū ʿĀṣim who is listed among the duʿāt al-duʿāt in the revolutionary organization. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 223. The Akhbār, 221 also lists an ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaymān who was a dāʿī, hance a member of a more prestigious network of agents. The duʿāt al-duʿāt were most likely the substitutes for the duʿāt just as the nuẓarāʾ al-nuqabāʾ substituted for the naqībs. (J.L.)

167. He is listed among the naqībs. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 215.

168. Qur. 22:39.

169. Like his brother-in-law, Sulaymān b. Kathīr, Ghaylān al-Khuzāʿī is listed among the naqībs. The Akhbār al-Dawlah lists an ʿUmayr b. Razīn, the brother of Ḥumayd b. Razīn, the mawlā of the Khuzāʿah. This ʿUmayr was one of the duʿāt al-duʿāt. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 218, 222.

trict of Kharqān lit fires that night, which was the prearranged signal, and they began to gather to Abū Muslim the next morning. The interpretation of the two names "The Shadow" and "The Clouds" was: as the clouds cover the earth, so would the ʿAbbāsid preaching, and as the earth is never without a shadow, so it would never be without an ʿAbbāsid caliph to the end of time.

The propagandists (duʿāt) of Marw came to Abū Muslim with all those who had answered their call. The first to come were the early [1955] settlers[170] who were with Abū al-Waḍḍāḥ al-Hurmuzfarrī ʿIsā b. Shubayl, consisting of nine hundred men and four horsemen.[171] Among the people of Hurmuzfarrah were Sulaymān b. Ḥassān with his brother Yazdān b. Ḥassān, al-Haytham b. Yazīd b. Kaysān, Buwayʿ the mawlā of Naṣr b. Muʿāwiyah, Abū al-Khālid al-Ḥasan, Jardā, and Muḥammad b. ʿAlwān. Then came the early settlers who were with Abū al-Qāsim Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm al-Jūbānī, with thirteen hundred men on foot and sixteen horsemen. Also with them were the propagandists Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Marwazī, Khidhām b. ʿAmmār and Ḥamzah b. Rutaym.[172] The early settlers (of the first group) began to shout "God is great!" and those with Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm would answer from their side, "God is Great!" They kept this up until they entered Abū Muslim's camp at Safīdhanj. This was on Saturday (June 12, 747), two days after Abū Muslim's public proclamation. Abū Muslim gave orders that the fort of Safīdhanj be repaired, fortified, and set in order. When the ʿId came in Safīdhanj, Abū Muslim told Sulaymān b. Kathīr to lead him and the (ʿAbbāsid) Shīʿah in prayer. He set up a minbar for him in the camp, and told him to begin the prayer before the khuṭbah address without the call to prayer or the iqāmah.[173] The Umayyads used to begin with the khuṭbah

170. The text is ahl al-Suqādim; see Ibn al-Athīr, V, 273: ahl al-taqādum. Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 522–23 reads Suqādim, as a place name, though no such place is known. Shaban, ʿAbbāsid Revolution, 158, reads taqādum, to mean "the old [Arab] settlers in Marw."

171. The early supporters of the ʿAbbāsids were not part of the active fighting force operating in Khurāsān, hence their small number of horsemen. The Arab fighters had aligned with al-Kirmānī or Naṣr b. Sayyār. The later addition of the Arab tribal forces to the ʿAbbāsid camp enabled Abū Muslim to challenge the professional armies of the Umayyads. (J.L.)

172. The text is Zunaym; read Rutaym, as in the Akhbār al-Dawlah, 222, where he is listed as one of the duʿāt al-duʿāt.

173. The iqāmah is the ritual proclamation that the prayer has begun.

and the call to prayer, and then they had the ritual prayer; the iqāmah was added on Friday. On feastdays and Fridays they used to deliver the khuṭbah seated in the minbars. But Abū Muslim told Sulaymān b. Kathīr to call "God is Great!" six consecutive times with the first prostration, then to recite (the Qur'ān portions), and afterward to bow down on the seventh "God is Great!" In the second prostration, he was to call it out five consecutive times, then recite, and bow down on the sixth call. He was to begin the khuṭbah [1956] with "God is Great!" and close it with a recitation from the Qur'ān. The Banū Umayyah used to employ four calls of "God is Great!" in the first prostration on a feast day, and three in the second.

When Sulaymān b. Kathīr completed the prayer and the khuṭbah, Abū Muslim and the Shī'ah went off to a feast spread for them by Abū Muslim. They feasted rejoicing in anticipation of future success (mustabshirīn).

While Abū Muslim was entrenching himself, he would write to Naṣr b. Sayyār, addressing him as "the Amīr Naṣr." When he had grown powerful by means of the ('Abbasid) Shī'ah who gathered in his camp, he disclosed himself and wrote to Naṣr, "As for what follows, truly God, blessed be His names and exalted be His mention, reproaches certain folk in the Qur'ān saying, 'They swore the most binding oaths by God that if a warner came to them they would be more guided than any community, but when a warner came it only increased them in aversion, waxing arrogant in the land and plotting evil; but evil plots encompass only those who make them. Do they expect anything but the way of the ancients? You will find no changing in God's way, nor any evading of the way of God.'"[174]

Naṣr was much astonished at the letter, and that Abū Muslim had shown himself. He closed one eye (and pondered long)[175] and said, "This letter has one answer." When Abū Muslim was settled in his camp at Mākhuwān,[176] he ordered Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm[177] to dig a defensive trench at Jīranj and gather together his followers with those of the Shī'ah who were so inclined and cut off the communications of Naṣr b. Sayyār with Marwarrūdh, Balkh and the districts of

174. Qur. 35:42–43.

175. This phrase is missing in text and is supplied by the Cairo edition.

176. For Mākhuwān, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 380. Jīranj was a small town (bulaydah) in the vicinity of Marw. See Yāqūt, II, 175.

177. Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm was a naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 217.

Ṭukhāristān. Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm did that, and about a thousand men gathered at his camp which was surrounded by a moat. Abū Muslim [1957] also ordered Abū Ṣāliḥ Kāmil b. Muẓaffar[178] to send a man to Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm's camp to review the troops there and enter them in a register with their names, their fathers' names and their villages.[179] He thus sent Abū Ṣāliḥ Ḥumayd al-Azraq to do that. Ḥumayd, who was a scribe, counted 804 able-bodied men in Muḥriz's camp. Among the well-known officers there were Ziyād b. Sayyār al-Azdī in the quarter of Kharqān, from the village called Asbiwādiq; Khidhām b. 'Ammar al-Kindī of the quarter of the early settlers,[180] from a village called al-Awāyiq; Ḥanīfah b. Qays of the early settlers' quarter, from the village called al-Shanj; 'Abdawayh al-Jardāmadh b. 'Abd al-Karīm, of the people of Harāt, who used to bring sheep to Marw; Ḥamzah b. Rutaym[181] al-Bāhilī of the Kharqān quarter, from the village called Mīlādhjird;[182] Abū Hāshim Khalīfah b. Mihrān of the quarter of the early settlers, from the village of Jūbān;[183] Abū Khadījah Jīlān b. al-Sughdī, and Abū Nu'aym Mūsā b. Ṣubayḥ.[184]

Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm remained entrenched in his camp until Abū Muslim entered the walls of Marw, vacated the camp at Mākhuwān and camped at Mārsarjas on the way to Naysābūr. Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm then reinforced Abū Muslim with his troops.

One of the events that occurred while Abū Muslim was at Safīdhanj was that Naṣr b. Sayyār sent a mawlā of his called Yazīd with a large force of cavalry to fight Abū Muslim eighteen days after his public proclamation, and Abū Muslim sent Mālik b. Haytham al-Khuzā'ī together with Muṣ'ab b. Qays[185] out against him. They met at the village called Alīn, and Mālik called on them to follow 178. Abū Ṣāliḥ was one of the highest ranking operatives in the revolutionary apparatus. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 215.

179. That is, the military roll was based on geographical rather than tribal affiliation, an 'Abbāsid principle. See n. 217 below.

180. The text is rab' al-Suqādim; it should be read rab' al-taqādum, following Ibn Athīr. References to early settlers below are similarly based on this reading. Also, see n. 170 above.

181. The text is Zunaym; it should be read Rutaym. See n. 172 above.

182. The text is Hātladjūr; it should be read Mīlādhjird, as in the Cairo edition.

183. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 139.

184. Vocalization is conjectural here.

185. For Mālik b. Haytham, see the entry in Crone, Slaves on Horses, 181–83. Muṣ'ab b. Qays was a naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 218.

the Chosen One (al-Riḍā) from the family of God's messenger, God bless him and give him peace. They were too haughty for that, so [1958] Mālik fought them with a battle line—he had about two hundred men—from daybreak until the time of the afternoon prayer.

Ṣāliḥ b. Sulaymān al-Ḍabbī,[186] Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd and Ziyād b. 'Isā had joined Abū Muslim, so he sent them to Mālik b. Haytham. They came to him at the time of the afternoon prayer, and he was strengthened by their presence. Then Yazīd the mawlā of Naṣr b. Sayyār said to his followers, "If we let them alone this evening, reinforcements will come to them, so attack these people." And they did. Then Abū Naṣr [Mālik b. Haytham] dismounted to fight on foot, and incited his followers saying, "Truly, I trust that God will cut off a part of the unbelievers,[187] so strike them well and truly." Both parties kept on fighting. Thirty-four men of the Marwānid party were killed, and eight were taken prisoner. 'Abdallāh al-Ṭā'ī attacked Yazīd, the mawlā of Naṣr and the leader of the enemy group; they captured him, and his followers fled. Abū Naṣr sent 'Abdallāh al-Ṭā'ī and his prisoner with some men of the Shī'ah, along with some prisoners and the heads [of the slain], while he remained in his camp at Safīdhanj. In the delegation were Abū Ḥammād al-Marwazī and Abū 'Amr al-A'jamī. Then Abū Muslim ordered the heads to be displayed on the gate of the wall in his camp. He sent Yazīd al-Aslamī to Abū Isḥāq Khālid b. 'Uthmān and ordered him to treat wounds that Yazīd the mawlā of Naṣr had received, and to treat him with great kindness and consideration. He wrote to Abū Naṣr to come to him. When Naṣr's mawlā Yazīd was healed of his wounds, Abū Muslim called him and said, "If you wish to stay with us and join our cause, then God will have guided you rightly. If you do not, then go back to your master in safety; but give us God's oath not to fight against us or to lie about us, and to say of us [only] what you have seen." Yazīd chose to return to his master, so he sent him on his way. Then Abū Muslim said, "This man will avert from us those [1959] men of piety and morality who assert that we have departed from Islam."

Yazīd came to Naṣr b. Sayyār, who told him, "No welcome to

186. A substitute naqīb who became one of the great field commanders of the early 'Abbāsid armies. His family had a long and meritorious role in the affairs of state.

187. Based on Qur. 3:127.

you; by God, I think the enemy only let you live in order to make you an argument against us." "And by God, it's just as you think," said Yazīd. "What's more, they have made me swear not to lie about them, so I'll tell you that they pray the prayers at the proper time, with a call to prayer and iqāmah; they recite the Scripture, they make frequent mention of God, and they call men to God's Messenger. I reckon their business will succeed, and were you not my master who freed me from slavery, I'd not have come back to you; I'd have stayed with them." This was the first battle between the (ʿAbbāsid) Shīʿah and the partisans of the Banū Marwān.

In this year, Khāzim b. Khuzaymah[188] prevailed over Marwarrūdh, and Naṣr b. Sayyār's governor there was killed. Khāzim sent a letter with his son Khuzaymah to Abū Muslim announcing the victory.

The Account of Khāzim b. Khuzaymah's Victory Over Marwarrūdh

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jushamī,[189] Zuhayr b. Hunayd and Ḥasan b. Rashīd: When Khāzim b. Khuzaymah was ready to set out for Marwarrūdh, leaders of the Tamīm wanted to prevent him, but he said, "I am a man of your tribe, with Marw as my object. Perhaps I shall be victorious, in which case it will be yours; if I am slain, then you will be done with me." So they let him alone, and he went out and camped in a village called Kanj Rustāh.[190] Then Naḍr b. Ṣubayḥ[191] and Bassām b. Ibrāhīm came to him from Abū Muslim. When it was evening, Khāzim attacked the [1960] people of Marwarrūdh by night, and Bishr b. Jaʿfar al-Saʿdī who was Naṣr b. Sayyār's governor in Marwarrūdh was slain. This was in the beginning of Dhū al-Qaʿdah (mid-July 747), and Khāzim sent news of the victory to Abū Muslim by Khuzaymah b. Khāzim, ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd and Shabīb b. Wāj.

---

188. Khāzim b. Khuzaymah al-Tamīmī was a deputy naqīb from Marwarrūdh, an important later general: see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 180–81.

189. The text is al-Ḥusmī, emended to al-Jushamī by the Cairo edition.

190. The text gives "Kanj Rustāh," however the textual apparatus lists the variant Kanj Rustaq, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 308, lists a Kanjrustāq, which LeStrange describes as a district between Bādhghīs and Marwarrūdh.

191. Ibn Ṣubayḥ was a naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 218.

Abū Ja'far stated, concerning Abū Muslim's proclamation of revolution, his travels to and from Khurāsān and his return there, a source other than those we have cited gives a differing account: Ibrāhīm the Imām married the daughter of Abū al-Najm to Abū Muslim at the time he sent him to Khurāsān, and sent her dowry with him.[192] Then he wrote to the naqībs in Khurāsān, ordering them to listen to Abū Muslim and obey him. According to some assertions, Abū Muslim was from the village of Khuṭarniyyah near Kūfah, and was the steward of Idrīs b. Ma'qil al-'Ijlī.[193] Then his status changed and he became the mawlā of Muḥammad b. 'Alī, then of Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, and then of the other Imāms who were Muḥammad's sons. He came to Khurāsān while he was still young in years, and Sulaymān b. Kathīr would not accept him. He feared that Abū Muslim would not be strong enough for their task, and fearing for himself and his companions, he sent him away.[194] At this time Abū Dāwud Khālid b. Ibrāhīm was away, beyond the Oxus (nahr Balkh), but when he left there and arrived in Marw, the Imām's letter was read to him, and he asked about the man whom he had sent. They told him that Sulaymān b. Kathīr had sent him away, and so he sent for all of the naqībs, who gathered in the house of 'Imrān b. Ismā'īl.[195] Then Abū Dāwud said to them, "The letter from the Imām came to you with the man he sent while I was absent, and you sent him away. Now what is your case for sending him off?" "His youth," Sulaymān b. Kathīr replied, "and our fear that he would not be able to manage this affair, and our solicitude for him we call men to, and for ourselves, and for those who are answerable [1961]

192. Abū al-Najm was a naqīb. The marriage was to establish a tie between Abū Muslim, the Imām's representative, and the Khurāsān apparatus. Despite his nisbah, "al-Khurāsānī," Abū Muslim apparently came from Iṣfahān. Note Sulaymān b. Kathīr's initial reaction to Abū Muslim's arrival in the Akhbār al-Dawlah, 271–73, and in Ṭabarī below. The relationship of the 'Abbāsid imāms to the Khurāsān apparatus is a complex problem that has not yet been fully worked out. There is reason to believe that the Khurasānīs were quite independent until Bukayr b. Māhān's mission to them following the death of Muḥammad b. 'Alī. See Sharon, 'Aliyat, 84–116. (J.L.)

193. The reports of Abū Muslim's origins are marked by considerable confusion. The confusion is perhaps deliberate so as to present Abū Muslim as a man for all peoples and seasons, that is, the ideal picture for a revolutionary operative. A full study of Abū Muslim's origins has been completed by J. Lassner and will appear in a forthcoming festschrift for Franz Rosenthal, edited by Lassner and J.V. Bellamy (J.L.)

194. See n. 192 above.

195. That is, Abū al-Najm.

to us." Then Abū Dāwud said, "Are there any among you who deny that God, blessed be He and exalted, chose Muḥammad, may He bless him and his family and give them peace, and elected him and selected him and sent him with His message to all men? Is there any among you who would deny that?" "No," they said. "Then would you doubt that God, be He exalted, sent down His Book to him, and that Gabriel the trusted spirit came to him making legal what God permits therein, and prohibiting what He forbids, and prescribing what He lays down, and showing His ways, and that he informed him therein of what had been before, and what shall be, up to the Day of Resurrection?" "No," they said. "Then do you doubt that God took His Prophet to Himself after he had delivered the message of his Lord?" "No," they said. "Then," said he, "do you believe that the divine knowledge that was revealed to him was raised [to heaven] with him, or that he left it behind him?" "Of course he left it behind," they said. "Then do you think that he left it behind with those who were not of his family [ʿitrah], nor people of his house, who were the nearest of the near to him?" "No," they said. "Then," he asked, "would any one of you who had seen this matter progressing, and people receptive to it, see fit to try to turn it all to himself?" "Good God, no!" they replied. "How should that be?" "I do not say that you have done so," he told them, "but sometimes Satan incites great evil concerning what may or may not come to pass. Is there any one of you who would like to transfer control of this matter from the People of the House to some other relatives of the Prophet?" "No," they said. "Then do you doubt that they are the mine of the divine knowledge and keepers of the legacy of the Messenger of God?" "No," they said. "Yet I see," he said, "that you [1962] doubted their command, and rejected their knowledge, for had they not known that this was the man who should manage their affairs, they would not have sent him to you. No one has accused him of not being devoted to them, or not being their assistant, or of not standing up for their due."[196]

196. Possession of esoteric knowledge was one of the qualities of a Shīʿī Īmām. There are numerous ʿAbbāsid traditions which indicate that this knowledge was passed directly from Muḥammad to the ʿAbbāsid line. Other traditions argue that when the Prophet died without leaving any surviving male offspring, his oldest surviving uncle al-ʿAbbās inherited the Prophet's legacy and passed it to his progeny. The earliest ʿAbbāsid claims were based on a transmission of the Imāmate from ʿAlī's

At these words from Abū Dāwud, they sent for Abū Muslim and brought him back from Qūmis, accepted him as their leader and listened to him and obeyed him. But there still lingered something in Abū Muslim's soul against Sulaymān b. Kathīr, and he still acknowledged it to Abū Dāwūd.

The naqībs and other members of the ('Abbāsid) Shī'ah hearkened to Abū Muslim, obeyed him, deferred to him, and accepted all that came from him. The propagandists spread their word through all the regions of Khurāsān. People joined in droves, their numbers grew, and the propagandists fanned out into all of Khurāsān. Then Ibrāhīm the Imām wrote to Abū Muslim commanding him to come to him during the Pilgrimage that year, that is in 129 (747), so that he could give him his orders for the public proclamation of revolution. He asked him to bring Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb with him, and whatever monies had been collected. Three hundred and sixty thousand dirhams had been amassed with Abū Muslim, and so he took part of it to buy goods of the stuffs that merchants of Qūh and Marw sell, and sheer and heavy silks. The rest he melted into small ingots of gold and silver and put them in the lining of their cloaks. Then he brought mules and set out midway through Jumādā II (early March 747). Among the naqībs who accompanied him were Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, Qāsim b. Mujāshi' and Talḥah b. Zurayq, along with forty-one men of the Shī'ah. They outfitted the caravan in the villages of the Khuzā'ah, loading their packs on twenty-one pack mules. An armed man from the Shī'ah was mounted on each mule. They took the desert route, avoiding the armed patrols of Naṣr b. Sayyār, until they came to Abīward.

Abū Muslim wrote to 'Uthmān b. Nahīk[197] and his followers, ordering them to come forward to him. Between them was a distance of five *farsakh*s (30 km). Fifty of their men came to him, and then he journeyed from Abīward, until reaching one of the villages of Nasā called Qāqas. He sent al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān to Andūmān, the village of Asīd, and he met there a man from the Shī'ah and asked him where Asīd was. The man replied, "Why are you asking about him? There has been great evil from the governor today, and he has been [1963] grandson Abū Hāshim b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah to the 'Abbāsid Muḥammad b. 'Alī. See, e.g., Omar, 'Abbāsid Caliphate, 59–67; EI[2] s.v. 'Abbāsids.

197. For 'Uthmān b. Nahīk, who was a dā'ī from Abīward, see the entry in Crone, Slaves on Horses, 189.

taken, along with al-Aḥjam b. ʿAbdallāh,[198] Ghaylān b. Faḍālah, Ghālib b. Saʿīd and Muhājir b. ʿUthmān, to the governor ʿĀṣim b. Qays b. al-Ḥarūrī, who has imprisoned them." Abū Muslim and his companions moved on to Andūmān, and Abū Mālik (Asīd) and the Shīʿah at Nasā came to him. Abū Mālik informed him that the letter which had been with the Imām's messenger was in his possession, so Abū Muslim told him to bring it to him. He brought him the letter and a banner and a flag. Lo, the letter told him to turn back as soon as he received it and publicly declare the revolution. At this, he fastened the flag that had come to him from the Imām to a lance and the banner as well. The Shīʿah among the people of Nasā gathered to him along with the propagandists and chiefs. He already had the people of Abīward who had come to Nasā with him.

Word of this reached ʿĀṣim b. Qays al-Ḥarūrī, and he sent (men) to Abū Muslim to question him about his situation. He told him that he was a pilgrim, traveling to the House of God, and that he had with him a number of friends who were merchants. He requested ʿAṣim to set free those of his companions whom he had detained, so that they might leave his province. They then demanded that Abū Muslim write a personal contract for them, stating that he would exchange all the slaves, riding animals and weapons that were with [1964] him so that his companions, those who had come from the province of the Imām and others, might go their ways. Abū Muslim consented to this, and his friends were set free. He now ordered those of the Shīʿah among his followers to return home. He read the Imām's letter to them, and ordered them to proclaim the revolution publicly. One group of them then went home. Abū Mālik Asīd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī, Zurayq b. Shawdhab[199] and those who had come to him from Abīward continued with him, and he ordered all who turned back to hold themselves in readiness. He went on with those of his companions who had remained, and with Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, until they camped at the borders of Jurjān. Abū Muslim then sent

198. Al-Aḥjam was a naqīb. Muhājir b. ʿUthmān was a replacement for a naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 218, 220.

199. Zurayq b. Shawdhab is listed among the duʿāt al-duʿāt. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 222.

word to Khālid b. Barmak and Abū 'Awn[200] ordering them to bring whatever funds they had collected from the Shī'ah. They both presented themselves, and he stayed there some days until the caravans had assembled. He outfitted Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb and gave him the money he had with him and the means of transporting it, and sent him on to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, while Abū Muslim and those with him went back to Nasā, and from there traveled to Abīward. From there he traveled on in disguise to Marw, where he stayed at one of the villages of the Khuzā'ah, called Fanīn. This was on the twenty-third of Ramaḍān (June 7, 747). He had designated the day of 'Īd as the time for his followers to meet him at Marw. He sent Abū Dāwud and 'Amr b. A'yan to Ṭukhāristān and al-Naḍr b. Ṣubayḥ to Amul and Bukhārā, with Sharīk b. 'Isā. Mūsā b. Ka'b[201] he sent to Abīward and Nasā, and Khāzim b. Khuzaymah to Marwarrūdh. The people then came to him, and al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' al-Tamīmī led them in the prayers on the day of the feast at the prayer-ground (muṣallā) of the Qanbar family in the village of Abū Dāwud Khālid b. Ibrāhīm.

This year most of the Arab tribesmen in Khurāsān swore an oath and made a compact to fight Abū Muslim. This was at the time his followers increased and his forces became powerful. Also still in this year he moved from his camp at Safīdhanj to Mākhuwān. [1965]

The Arab Tribesmen of Khurāsān Ally Against Abū Muslim

According to 'Alī—al-Ṣabbāḥ the mawlā of Jibrīl—Maslamah b. Yaḥyā: When Abū Muslim openly proclaimed revolution, people hastened to join him, and the people of Marw began to come to him. Naṣr did not prevent them from this nor did he forbid them. Nor did al-Kirmānī and Shaybān disapprove of Abū Muslim's activities, because he was calling for deposing Marwān b. Muḥammad. Abū Muslim was staying at a village called Bālīn[202] in a tent, without any guards or doorkeepers. The people magnified his authority and said, "A man from the Banū Hāshim has appeared, endowed with urbanity, gravity and calm." A number of young men from the people of Marw set out, pietists who sought religious insight (fiqh) and they came to him at his camp, and asked him about his genealogy.[203] He responded, "What I have to say is better for you than my genealogy." Then they asked him about matters relating to fiqh. He told them, "The command to do good and reject what is reprehensible is more important for you than this. We have work to do, and have more need of your assistance than of your questions, so excuse us." They said, "By God, we do not know your genealogy, and we think that it won't be long before you are slain. Nothing is lacking for that except for one of these two to be free."[204] Abū Muslim replied, "On the contrary, it is I who shall slay them both, God willing."

200. For Khālid b. Barmak and his progeny, who later served the 'Abbāsid house, see EI[2] s.v. Barāmika; Lassner, 'Abbāsid Rule, index, 319; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 176–77. For Abū 'Awn, see the entry in Crone, ibid., 174.

201. Mūsā b. Ka'b al-Tamīmī was one of the highest ranking agents in the 'Abbāsid revolutionary apparatus. He later served as a great field commander and security officer. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 215–16; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 186.

The young men returned and went to Naṣr b. Sayyār and told him (what they had heard). He told them, "May God reward you well; you are the sort to seek him out and learn about him." Then they went to Shaybān and informed him, whereupon he sent a message to [1966] Naṣr, "We have each choked the other." Naṣr then wrote to him, "Desist from attacking me so that I can fight him or, if you wish, join me in fighting him until I kill him or drive him away; then we may return to the business we are now engaged in." Shaybān was anxious about what to do, and that became apparent to those in his camp. The spies of Abū Muslim now came to him and informed him of this. Sulaymān said, "What is this matter that has reached them? Have you been talking to somebody?" Abū Muslim then informed him about the young men who had come to him, and Sulaymān said, "Then this is all because of that." They wrote to ʿAlī b. al-Kirmānī saying, "You are a wronged man unable to take revenge. Your father has been murdered.[205] We know that you are not of the

202. Bāb Bālīn was the northwest gate of Marw. However, the reference to Bālīn here may be an error for "Allīn," one of villages of Marw. See n. 160 above.

203. The name he used, "Father of a Muslim, Khurāsānī," was deliberately ambiguous.

204. That is Naṣr b. Sayyār and Shaybān al-Khārijī.

205. According to Dīnawarī, 362, the death of Juday' al-Kirmānī was arranged by Naṣr, who invited him to a parley. Other sources indicate that it was a son of al-same mind as Shaybān; you are only fighting for revenge, so prevent Shaybān from a reconciliation with Naṣr." ʿAlī went to Shaybān and spoke to him, and deterred him from what he intended. Naṣr then wrote to Shaybān, "Truly you are being deceived, and I swear by God that this matter is so momentous[206] that by the side of it, you should find me small."

While they were thus engaged, Abū Muslim sent al-Naḍr b. Nuʿaym al-Ḍabbī to Harāt, which was governed by ʿIsā b. ʿAqīl al-Laythī, and al-Naḍr drove him out of Harāt, so that ʿIsā fled to Naṣr and al-Naḍr took over the city. Then Yaḥyā b. Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah said (to the Khārijites), "Choose whether you will perish before the Muḍar, or the Muḍar before you." They asked, "How is that?" He replied, "This man's affair only surfaced a month ago, but already as many men as are in your army have joined his army." "What shall we do?" they asked. "Make peace with Naṣr," he told them, "for if you have peace with him, these people will fight Naṣr and leave you alone, because the Muḍar have the government. If you do not make peace with Naṣr, they will, and they will fight you and it will go against you." "What shall we do?" they said. "Get ahead of them," Ḥārith b. Surayj al-Murjiʾī who killed him. See Ṭabarī II/3, 1975; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, 408; Ibn Khayyāṭ, I, 410; FHA, 188. Juday''s son ʿAlī succeeded him as leader of the Azd.

206. Naṣr wrote verses in which he urged the Arabs to unite with him to war against Abū Muslim, as follows:

> Go tell both the Rabīʿah in Marw and the Yamanīs:
> arouse yourselves, before it will be of no avail;
>
> What are you thinking of, to enkindle the feud between you > as if men of wit were absent from your counsels?
>
> You neglect an enemy who has surrounded you, > a rabble of no religion or consequence,
>
> Not Arabs like those among men you would know, > nor yet true mawlās, if their origins be reckoned;
>
> Who would ask me about the root of their religion?
> truly, their religion is that the Arabs should perish;
>
> A sect professing doctrines you never heard of > from the Prophet, nor brought by the Scriptures.

—Ibn Athīr, v. IV. 304, and also quoted by al-Dīnawarī, 361.

he said, "if by only one hour, and comfort yourselves by their slaying."

[1967] Then Shaybān sent to Naṣr offering him a truce, and he agreed. Following that, he sent a message to Salm b. Aḥwaz, and between them they concluded an agreement. Shaybān came, with Ibn al-Kirmānī on his right and Yaḥyā b. Nuʿaym on his left, and Salm said to Ibn al-Kirmānī, "One-eyed one, I do not take you to be the one-eyed man at whose hands we are told that the Muḍar will perish."[207] They then made a truce for one year, and put their agreement in writing. This came to Abū Muslim, and he wrote to Shaybān, "We would make a truce with you for some months, so grant us a truce of three months." Then Ibn al-Kirmānī said, "I never made peace with Naṣr; it was Shaybān who did so while I was unwilling. I am a man with blood to avenge, and I will not stop fighting Naṣr." Ibn al-Kirmānī resumed hostilities, but Shaybān refused to help him, saying, "Treachery is not permissible." At this Ibn al-Kirmānī sent a message to Abū Muslim asking his help against Naṣr b. Sayyār. Abū Muslim proceeded to al-Mākhuwān, and sent Shibl b. Ṭahmān[208] to Ibn al-Kirmānī with the message, "I am with you against Naṣr." Ibn al-Kirmānī said, "I should indeed like Abū Muslim to meet me," and Shibl brought word of this. Abū Muslim waited fourteen days, and then he went to Ibn al-Kirmānī, leaving his army behind at al-Mākhuwān. ʿUthmān b. al-Kirmānī met him with cavalry and rode with him until he entered the camp. Then Abū Muslim went to ʿAlī b. al-Kirmānī and stayed mounted outside his chamber. He was asked to dismount, and entered saluting ʿAlī as "Amīr." ʿAlī had prepared a lodging[209] for him in a palace belonging to Makhlad[210] b. Ḥasan al-Azdī. Abū Muslim stayed two days, and then went back to his camp at al-Mākhuwān. This was on the fifth day of Muḥarram, 130 (September 16, 747).

---

207. "One-eyed one" is an insult renderable as "you prick." It is also a reference to the Dajjāl, the one-eyed "great deceiver" who will persecute the faithful and usher in the second coming of Jesus and the Messianic age according to certain ḥadīths. Ibn Aḥwaz appears to be saying, "You may be this and that, but you are not the Antichrist who will precede the messianic age and destroy the Muḍar." For al-Dajjāl see *EI*² s.v. ad-Dadjdjāl.

208. Shibl b. Ṭahmān was a naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 216.

209. The text is qaṣrān, "a palace"; it should be read manzilān, "lodging," as in the Cairo edition.

210. According to the Cairo edition, Mukhallad.

Abū al-Khaṭṭāb reported that when the Shī'ah in Abū Muslim's camp became numerous, Safīdhanj was too confining for him, and he desired a more spacious encampment. Al-Mākhuwān answered his need. It was the village of al-'Alā' b. Ḥurayth, and Abū Isḥāq Khālid b. 'Uthmān, and Abū al-Jahm b. 'Aṭiyyah and his brothers [1968] lived there.[211] His stay at Safīdhanj had lasted forty-two days, and from there he went to al-Mākhuwān. He stopped at the house of Abū Isḥāq on Wednesday, the ninth night of Dhū al-Qa'dah (July 19, 747). He dug a trench around the place, with two entrances to it, and he and the Shī'ah camped there. He put Muṣ'ab b. Qays al-Ḥanafī and Bahdal b. Iyās al-Ḍabbī[212] in charge of one entrance, and Abū Sharāḥīl and Abū 'Amr al-A'jamī in charge of the other. He appointed Abū Naṣr Mālik b. Haytham in charge of security, and made Abū Isḥāq Khālid b. 'Uthmān captain of the guard. Kāmil b. Muẓaffar Abū Ṣāliḥ was put in charge of the army register, and Aslam b. Ṣubayḥ was in charge of his chancery. Qāsim b. Mujāshi' the Tamīmī naqīb he made qāḍī, and he reinforced Mālik b. al-Haytham with Abū al-Waḍḍāḥ and a number of the early settlers.[213] He put the men from the two villages (called) Nawshān—they were eighty-three men—under Abū Isḥāq in the guard.[214]

Qāsim b. Mujāshi' used to lead the prayers for Abū Muslim in the camp and narrate anecdotes after the afternoon prayer, mentioning the virtues of the Banū Hāshim, and the shameful deeds of the Banū Umayyah. Abū Muslim now settled at the camp at al-Mākhuwān, appearing like any man of the Shī'ah, until 'Abdallāh b. Bisṭām came to him and brought him tents, pavilions, cooking vessels, nose-bags for the horses and leather troughs for water. The first official that Abū Muslim appointed was Dāwud b. Karrāz.[215] Abū Muslim refused to let the (runaway) slaves join him at his camp, and had an entrenched position dug for them at the village of Shawwāl,[216] putting it in the charge of Dāwud b. Karrāz. When a large number of [1969]

211. It was thus the village of two naqībs and a substitute naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 221.

212. Ibn Iyās was one of the du'āt. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 221.

213. The text is ahl al-Suqādim.

214. Nawsh was the name of several villages in Marw. The two villages here are not specified. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 823–24.

215. Ibn Karrāz was a subsitute naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 221.

216. Shawwāl was a village situated three farsakhs (18 km) from Marw. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 332.

slaves had gathered, he sent them to Mūsā b. Kaʿb at Abīward. He ordered Kāmil b. Muẓaffar to enroll the people at the camp according to their names and their fathers' names and designate them by their villages, recording all that in the register.[217] Kāmil, who was called Abū Ṣāliḥ, did so, and their numbers came to seven thousand men. Their pay was three dirhams per man; then each of them received four at the hands of Abū Ṣāliḥ Kāmil.

At last the tribesmen of the Muḍar, the Rabīʿah and the Qaḥṭān[218] agreed to lay aside their feuds and unite as one in fighting Abū Muslim. Once they had driven him from Marw, they would look to their own affairs and what they had agreed upon. They therefore wrote a carefully worded treaty among themselves, and word of this reached Abū Muslim. It alarmed him, and he took it seriously and reconsidered his situation. Lo, the water supply of Mākhuwān dropped, and he feared that Naṣr b. Sayyār might cut off his water, so he moved to Alīn, the village of Abū Manṣūr Ṭalḥah b. Zurayq[219] the naqīb. This was after he had stayed four months at the camp at Mākhuwān, and he settled at Alīn on Thursday the sixth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 129 (August 14, 747). He dug a trench at Alīn between Alīn and Balāsha Jird.[220] Thus the village was behind the camp, and he (dug so as to) place the house of Muḥtafiz b. ʿUthmān b. Bishr al-Mazanī inside the trench. The inhabitants of Alīn drank the water of a canal called the Kharqān, so Naṣr b. Sayyār could not cut off the [1970] drinking-water from Alīn. The Feast of the Day of Sacrifice[221] came, and Qāsim b. Mujāshiʿ led the prayers for Abū Muslim and the Shīʿah at the prayer-ground of Alīn.

Naṣr b. Sayyār was camped on the ʿIyād Canal, and he positioned ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr at Balāsha Jird and Abū al-Dhayyāl at Ṭūsān. Bishr b. Unayf al-Yarbūʿī he placed at Julfar, and he stationed Ḥātim b. al-Ḥārith b. Surayj at Kharaq, seeking to attack Abū Muslim. Abū Dhayyāl quartered his troops with the inhabitants of Ṭūsān while 217. That is, they were officially enrolled according to place, not tribe, or origin. This became the standard ʿAbbāsid practice. The advantage was that it played down tribal feelings (ʿaṣabiyyah). See n. 179 above.

218. That is, the Yaman.

219. The text is Ruzayq; read Zurayq, as in textual apparatus variants and Akhbār al-Dawlah, 215, 216.

220. The text is Balāsha Jird. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 708, lists a Balāshjird which was a village four *farsakh*s (24 km) from Marw.

221. See EI[2] s.v. ʿId al-Aḍḥā.

Abū Muslim was in his camp, and they injured the people there, treating them like servants, butchering their chickens, cattle and pigeons, and making them bear the cost of their victuals and fodder. The Shī'ah complained of this to Abū Muslim, and he sent some cavalry with them. They encountered Abū Dhayyāl and drove him away, and captured Maymūn al-A'sar al-Khwārizmī with about thirty men. Abū Muslim gave them clothing, treated their wounds, and set them free.

In this year, Juday' b. 'Alī al-Kirmānī was slain and crucified.[222]

The Account of the Slaying of Juday' b. 'Alī al-Kirmānī

We have already mentioned the slaying of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj and that al-Kirmānī was the one who killed him. When al-Kirmānī had slain al-Ḥārith, Marw became wholly his, due to that slaying, and Naṣr b. Sayyār removed from Marw to Abrashahr. Al-Kirmānī's rule grew stronger, and according to what is said, Naṣr sent Salm b. Aḥwaz against him. He marched with Naṣr's guards and cavalry until he encountered the followers of al-Kirmānī; he found Yaḥyā b. Nu'aym al-Maylā' stationed at the head of a thousand soldiers of the [1971]
Rabī'ah, Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā at the head of seven hundred horsemen of the Azd, Ibn al-Ḥasan b. al-Shaykh al-Azdī with one thousand of their young men (fityān), and al-Ḥazmī al-Sughdī with a thousand Abnā' of the Yaman.[223] When they stood opposite each other, Salm b. Aḥwaz called to Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā, "O Muḥammad al-Muthannā, get these sailors (i.e., the Azd)[224] to come out against us!" Then Muḥammad said to Salm, "Whoreson, do you say that to Abū 'Alī?" The two armies moved slowly against each other, and fought with swords. Salm b. Aḥwaz was routed, and over one hundred of his followers were slain, while more than twenty of Muḥammad's followers were killed. Naṣr's men returned to him in disorder, and 'Aqīl b. Ma'qil told him, "Naṣr, you've brought bad luck on the Arabs; when you've gone this far, exert yourself and bare your shank!" Naṣr now sent 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī, who stood

222. See n. 205 above.

223. From the context it is not certain whether these fityān were Arabs of the Azd or slaves that they had formed into a military contingent. For the Abnā', see *EI*² s.v. Abnā'.

224. See n. 113 above.

where Salm b. Aḥwaz had stood. He called out, "O Muḥammad, you know well that a fish can't beat a sea-wolf!" Muḥammad replied, "Then hold on until we get there, you bastard!" He ordered Muḥammad al-Sughdī to go out to him with the Yaman, and they fought a fierce battle. ʿIṣmah fled until he came back to Naṣr b. Sayyār; four hundred of his followers had been slain.

Naṣr then sent Mālik b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī, and he advanced with his followers. He called out, "O Ibn Muthannā, come out and fight [1972] me, if you're a man!" He answered his challenge, and the Tamīmī struck him between his neck and his shoulder, without effect. Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā struck him in turn with a mace and smashed his head. The fighting became desperate, and they fought a fierce battle, as great a battle as any. Naṣr's followers were routed, and seven hundred of them were slain. Three hundred of al-Kirmānī's followers were killed, and the bad blood between them kept on, so that they all went out to the trenches and fought each other bitterly.

When Abū Muslim was certain that each side had inflicted great losses on the other and would not receive reinforcements, he began to write letters to Shaybān.[225]

Then he would say to the messenger, "Make your way by the Muḍar. They will stop you and take your letters." They would take the letters, and read in them, "I observe that the Yaman will not last, and there is no good in them, so do not rely on them or put trust in them, for I trust that God will show you what you desire, and if He spares me I shall leave them neither hair nor nails." Then he would send another messenger by a different road with a letter in which he mentioned the Muḍar and praised the Yaman in similar terms, so that each party came to favor him. He now began to write to Naṣr b. Sayyār and to al-Kirmānī, "The Imām has recommended you to me, and I shall not act counter to his opinion of you." At the same time he wrote to the districts of the province (telling them) to proclaim the revolution (by showing their colors), and the first one to put on black—it is reported—was Asīd b. ʿAbdallāh at Nasā, who cried, "O Muḥammad! O Manṣūr!"[226] Muqātil b. Ḥakīm and Ibn 225. That is, the Khārijite leader operating in Khurāsān.

226. See n. 82 above.

Ghazwān put on black at the same time. So did the people of Abīward and Marwarrūdh and those of the villages around Marw.

Abū Muslim advanced to a position midway between the camps [1973] of Naṣr b. Sayyār and that of Juday' al-Kirmānī. Both sides came to fear him, and his followers grew in number. Naṣr b. Sayyār wrote to Marwān b. Muḥammad, informing him of Abū Muslim's circumstances and his revolt. He told him of the multitude that were with Abū Muslim and his following, and that he was proclaiming a summons to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad. He wrote him some verses of poetry:

I see among the ashes the flash of live coals, and deem that they will have a kindling;

A fire may be kindled with two sticks, and a war begin with a few words.

I say in astonishment "Would that I knew;
is [the Clan of] Umayyah awake, or sleeping?"

But Marwān wrote him, "The witness sees what the absent cannot see; cauterize the wart according to your own lights." Then Naṣr exclaimed, "Well, your master has shown us plainly that there is no assistance (naṣr: a pun) with him." He then wrote to Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah the governor of Iraq, requesting aid, and wrote these verses for him:

Go tell Yazīd—for the best speech is the truest; long since, I saw that there's no good in lying—

Khurāsān is a land wherein I have seen eggs which, were they to hatch, would astonish you; [1974]

Chicks two years hatching, and already big, though they haven't yet flown, and are covered with down.

But should they fly before they are prevented, they will set warfires blazing, wherever fires may blaze.

But Yazīd said, "There's no winning without numbers, and I have not a man." Naṣr then wrote to Marwān informing him about Abū Muslim and his manifesting a revolution and about his strength, and that he was summoning men to follow Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad. The letter found Marwān when a messenger from Abū Muslim to Ibrāhīm had already fallen into his hands. The messenger had been returning from Ibrāhīm to Abū Muslim with a letter from Ibrāhīm in answer to one from Abū Muslim. In it he cursed and reviled Abū Muslim for not exploiting his opportunity with Naṣr and al-Kirmānī while he could, and told him not to leave one Arab in Khurāsān unslain.[227] The messenger handed the letter over to Marwān, and Marwān wrote to al-Walīd b. Mu'āwiyah b. 'Abd al-Malik, his gover-

[1975] nor for Damascus, ordering him to write to the administrator of the Balqā'[228] to go to Ḥumaymah Wells, and seize Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, bind him securely and send him to him with a mounted escort. Al-Walīd wrote to the governor of the Balqā', and he came upon Ibrāhīm at the mosque in the village. He seized him, tied his hands behind his back, and brought him to al-Walīd. The latter sent him to Marwān, who threw him into a prison.[229]

To return to the account of Naṣr and al-Kirmānī, when their quarrel was at its height, Abū Muslim sent word to al-Kirmānī, "I am with you." Al-Kirmānī accepted this and Abū Muslim joined him, so that matters grew critical for Naṣr. He sent word to al-Kirmānī, "Woe to you! Do not make a mistake! By God, I am fearful for you and your followers from this man. Make a truce with me; we shall enter Marw, and write a treaty of peace between us." He hoped in this way to separate al-Kirmānī from Abū Muslim. Al-Kirmānī then went to his dwelling, and Abū Muslim remained at his camp. Then al-Kirmānī went forth until he halted at the courtyard (raḥbah) with one hundred horsemen, wearing a tunic of khashkashūnah, and sent

227. See n. 116 above on the matter of killing Arabs in Khurāsān. It is, of course, possible that statements of this sort were used by the Umayyads to rally support against the 'Abbāsids.

228. The Balqā' was a name given to all of Transjordan or to the central part of it. See EI^{2} s.v. Balḳā'. Note FHA, 189, reads "Kirār and al-Ḥumaymah," indicating two distinct places.

229. It is highly unlikely that Ibrāhīm al-Imām would have been identified in correspondence. His true identity would have been known only to the inner circles of the movement and they were enjoined not to risk exposing him. This tradition would appear to be part of the 'Abbāsid historiography which describes various members of the Banū 'Abbās as martyrs. There is reason to doubt that he was "imprisoned" because the Umayyads became fully aware of his activities, or that they had him murdered. For a detailed exposition see Sharon, 'Alīyat, 237–61. (J.L.)

word to Naṣr, "Come out, so we may write that treaty between us." Naṣr perceived deceit in him, and sent the son of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj against him with about three hundred horsemen. They clashed in the courtyard and fought each other for a long time. Finally al-Kirmānī was speared in his side and fell from his horse. His followers protected him until they were overwhelmed. Naṣr then had al-Kirmānī killed and crucified the body with a fish[230] beside it. Al-Kirmānī's son ʿAlī now advanced; he had gone to Abū Muslim and had gathered a large force which he led against Naṣr b. Sayyār. He fought him until he drove him from the governor's palace, whereupon Naṣr went to one of the mansions in Marw. Then Abū Muslim [1976] entered Marw, and ʿAlī b. Juday' al-Kirmānī came to meet him. Abū Muslim saluted him with the title of "Amīr" and informed him of his support, saying, "Give me your orders." ʿAlī then told him, "Do just what you are doing until I have some other order to give you."

In this year ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib gained control of Fārs.[231]

ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah al-Jaʿfarī Gains Control of Fārs

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—ʿĀṣim b. Ḥafṣ al-Tamīmī and others: When ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib was driven out of Kūfah, he went to Madā'in,[232] where the people swore allegiance to him, and a group from Kūfah joined him. He then went to Jibāl and seized control there as well as in Ḥulwān, Qūmis, Iṣbahān and Rayy. The slaves of the Kūfans ran away to join him. When he had prevailed, he resided at Iṣbahān.

Muḥārib b. Mūsā, a mawlā of the Banū Yashkur, had been very powerful in Fārs, and he came walking in his sandals to the Govern-

230. A contemptuous symbol for the Azd.

231. The revolt of ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah, the Jaʿfarid, represented a great threat to the ʿAbbāsids. Their own revolution was predicted in the collapse of the ʿAlid movement of Zayd b. ʿAlī. They assumed that they could attract his following. The movement of the Jaʿfarid pretender thus threatened to undercut ʿAbbāsid support at a critical moment. Ibn Muʿāwiyah attracted support and initially met with success in battle. The ʿAbbāsids at first supported the revolt in order to show the solidarity of the Banū Hāshim, but they were ready to abandon him at first opportunity. They later had him killed. For a detailed treatment of his revolt, see Sharon, ʿAlīyat, 154–205. (J.L.)

232. Meaning "the cities." The Arab name of the site of Ctesiphon-Seleucia, the Persian capitals on the Tigris just to the south of later Baghdad. See LeStrange, Lands, 33–35.

ment House of Iṣṭakhr (Persepolis) and expelled the governor appointed by Ibn ʿUmar (b. ʿAbd al- ʿAzīz) and said to a man whose name was ʿUmārah, "Have the people swear allegiance." The inhabitants said, "On what?" He then said, "On what you love and hate." They then swore allegiance to Ibn Muʿāwiyah. Then Muḥārib went to Kirmān and raided there, and on his raid he took some camels belonging to Thaʿlabah b. Ḥassān al-Māzinī and drove them back with him. Thaʿlabah then went out looking for his camels at a village of his called Ashhar. With Thaʿlabah was a mawlā of his, who asked him, "Why don't we murder Muḥārib? If you like, you can strike him down while I keep his people busy, or if you like I'll kill him [1977] while you keep them busy." Thaʿlabah replied, "Alas! Would you commit murder [and the camels get away from us, when we didn't even meet][233] the man?" Then he went in to see Muḥārib, who welcomed him, and said, "What would you ask of me?" "My camels," he told him. "[Yes", he said, "I took them][234] not knowing whose they were. Now I know, and here are your camels." Then Thaʿlabah took them and said to his mawlā, ["This is better. And what was it you wanted?"][235] The mawlā replied, "Something which, if we had taken it, would have been even more useful."

Muḥārib was joined by officers and commanders of the Syrian army, and he moved against Muslim b. Musayyab who was governing Shīrāz for Ibn ʿUmar, and slew him in the year 128 (745–746), and then went up to Iṣbahān. ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah then moved to Iṣṭakhr, appointing his brother Ḥasan to govern Jibāl. Then he settled at a monastery one mile (mīl) away from Iṣṭakhr. He appointed his brother Yazīd to rule Fārs, and remained where he was. People came to him, members of the Banū Hāshim and others. He collected taxes, and sent out governors. With him were Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, Sulaymān b. Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik, and Shaybān b. al-Ḥils b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Shaybanī the Khārijite. Abū Jaʿfar ʿAbdallāh and ʿAbdallāh and ʿIsā b. ʿAlī came to him as well.[236]

Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah then came as governor of Iraq, and sent Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah al-Kilābī against ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah.

233. The text has three lacunae here. The Cairo edition supplies the missing phrases from manuscripts not available to the earlier editors.

234. See n. 233 above.

235. See n. 233 above.

236. That is, the future Caliph al-Manṣūr and two of his paternal uncles.

Sulaymān b. Ḥabīb learned that Ibn Hubayrah had made Nubātah governor of Ahwāz, and he dispatched Dāwud b. Ḥatim, who stationed himself at Kurbuj Dīnār[237] to keep Nubātah out of Ahwāz. [1978] Then Nubātah advanced and fought him and Dāwud was killed. Sulaymān fled to Sābūr,[238] where the Kurds had seized control and driven out al-Masīḥ b. al-Ḥawārī.[239] Sulaymān fought them and drove them out. He then wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah swearing allegiance to him, but ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab said, "He will not keep faith with you; he only wants to keep you away from him and devour Sābūr. Write to him and have him come before you, if he is sincere." He wrote to him, and Sulaymān came. But he told his followers, "Come in with me, and if anyone tries to prevent you, fight him." Then they went in, and he told Ibn Muʿāwiyah, "I am the most obedient of men to you." Ibn Muʿāwiyah told him, "Return to your position." And he went back.

Then Muḥārib b. Mūsā broke with Ibn Muʿāwiyah. He gathered a force and marched on Sābūr. His son Mukhallad[240] b. Muḥārib was detained at Sābūr, for Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, brother of ʿAbdallāh, had seized him and put him in prison. Someone told Muḥārib, "Your son is in this man's hands, and you make war on him! Aren't you afraid that he'll kill your son?" But he replied, "May God put him far away!" Yazīd fought him, and Muḥārib was put to flight. He went to Kirmān where he stayed until Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath approached, whereupon he went with him. But he broke with Ibn al-Ashʿath, who killed him and twenty-four of his sons. ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah remained at Iṣṭakhr, until Ibn Ḍubārah came against him with Dāwud, the son of Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah. Ibn Muʿāwiyah gave orders to cut the (pontoon) bridge at Kūfah, so Ibn Hubayrah sent Maʿn b. Zāʾidah from the other side. Sulaymān then said to Abān b. Muʿāwiyah b. Hishām, "The enemy has come against you." And he replied, "I was not commanded to fight them." Sulaymān said, "And by God, you'll never get any orders about 237. The text is Kurbukh Dīnār; it should be read Kurbuj Dīnār, which was a place near Ahwāz. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 249.

238. Sābūr of Bishāpūr had been a Sasanian royal residence, and was one of the five great districts (kūrah) of Fārs. See LeStrange, Lands, 248.

239. A curious name; "Messiah son of Disciple." The Cairo edition gives al-Ḥimārī.

240. Vocalization is conjectural.

them, either!" Maʿn came and fought them by Marw al-Shādhān,[241] and recited this rajaz:

[1979] The Prince of the enemy is not the great deceiver;
he fled from death, and fell into death.

Both Ibn al-Muqaffaʿ and another authority give: "He fled from death, and in it he fell." (Maʿn) called out, "A stay? I told you, I've done." Then Ibn Muʿāwiyah fled, and Maʿn did not pursue them. In the battle, a man from the family of Abū Lahab was killed.[242] It had been predicted that a man of the Banū Hāshim would be slain in Marw al-Shādhān. Many prisoners were taken, and Ibn Ḍubārah put a large number of them to death. It is said that among those killed that day was Ḥakīm al-Fard, Abū al-Majd. But it is also said that he was killed at Ahwāz, by Nubātah.

When Ibn Muʿāwiyah fled, Shaybān fled to the island of Ibn Kāwān, and Manṣūr b. Jumhūr to Sind. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd ran away to ʿUmān, and ʿAmr b. Sahl b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz escaped to Egypt. The remainder of the prisoners were sent to Ibn Hubayrah.

Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl reported: He set those prisoners free, and none of them were put to death except Ḥuṣayn b. Waʿlah al-Sadūsī. When Ibn Hubayrah ordered him slain, Ḥuṣayn said, "I alone am to be killed, among all these prisoners?" "Yes," he said, "you are a polytheist, for you composed the verse:

And were I to command the sun, it would not rise.

Ibn Muʿāwiyah went directly to Sijistān; then he came to Khurāsān and Manṣūr b. Jumhūr went to Sind. Maʿn b. Zāʾidah went in search of him along with ʿAṭiyyah al-Thaʿlabī and others of the Banū [1980] Thaʿlabah, but they could not catch him and turned back. Ḥuṣayn b. Waʿlah al-Sadūsī had been with Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, who then abandoned him, [and he joined up with ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah.][243]

241. That is the Marw of Fārs which was originally a quarter of Iṣṭakhr. Perhaps it had already become the separate village it was in later times. See LeStrange, Lands, 280.

242. Abū Lahab was an uncle of the Prophet; in his position of leadership of the Banū Hāshim following the death of Abū Ṭālib, he cooperated with the Prophet's enemies. See EI^{2} s.v. Abū Lahab.

243. These passages in parenthesis are given in the Cairo edition and fill in the lacunae of the text.

Muwwari' al-Sulamī [captured Ḥusayn].[244] He had seen him go inside a thicket and seized him and brought him [to Ma'n b. Zā'idah][245] who sent him to Ibn Ḍubārah, and he sent him to Wāsiṭ. Ibn Ḍubārah marched against 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah at Iṣṭakhr, and settled down opposite the city along the river of Iṣṭakhr.[246] Then Ibn al-Ṣaḥṣaḥ crossed the river with a thousand men. Abān b. Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām and his Syrian troops, followers of 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah who had once supported Sulaymān b. Hishām, met this force and they engaged in battle. Ibn Nubātah made for the bridge, and those of the Khārijites who followed Ibn Mu'āwiyah engaged his force. Abān and the Khārijites were routed and a thousand of them were captured and brought to Ibn Ḍubārah, who let them go.[247]

One who was taken that day was 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās. Ibn Ḍubārah learned his genealogy, and said, "What brought you to Ibn Mu'āwiyah, when you knew that he was opposing the Commander of the Faithful?" He replied, "I had a debt, and I paid it." Then Ḥarb b. Qaṭan al-Kinānī spoke on his behalf, saying, "He is our sister's son!"[248] Ibn Ḍubārah gave 'Abdallāh to him, and said, "I wouldn't have proceeded against a man of Quraysh." Then Ibn Ḍubārah said, "The man you were with is charged with certain offenses; do you have any knowledge of them?" "Yes," he said, and he reproached Ibn Mu'āwiyah and accused his friends of sodomy. They brought Ibn Ḍubārah youths who were wearing bright mantles dyed in different colors, more than a hundred boys, and Ibn Ḍubārah stood them before the people, so that they might look upon them. Then Ibn Ḍubārah sent 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī by post-horse to Ibn Hubayrah so he might give him his information. Ibn Hubayrah sent him with Syrian troops to Marwān, and he used to reproach him. [1981]

At this time, Ibn Ḍubārah was in the Kirmān desert pursuing 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah. Word of Nubātah's death[249] had reached

244. See n. 243 above.

245. See n. 243 above.

246. That is, the Pulwār. See LeStrange, Lands, 275–77.

247. This was a departure from the usual practice with these intransigents. Ibn Ḍubārah seems to have dealt mildly with all the vanquished that day.

248. That is, there were blood relations between them. The Quraysh are a subgroup of the Kinānah.

249. Nubātah was not killed until 130 (September 11, 747–August 30, 748). See Ṭabarī, II/3, 2003 sub anno 130, and III/1, 4ff sub anno 131. The revolt of 'Abdallāh b.

Ibn Hubayrah. He sent Kurab b. Maṣqalah, al-Ḥakam b. Abī Abyaḍ al-ʿAbsī and Ibn Muḥammad al-Sakūnī, all of whom were eloquent speakers, and they spoke in praise of Ibn Ḍubārah. Ibn Hubayrah also wrote to Ibn Ḍubārah to march with his troops to Fārs; then there came a letter from him ordering him to march to Iṣbahān.

In this year Abū Ḥamzah al-Khārijī led the Pilgrimage acting on behalf of ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā Ṭālib al-Ḥaqq, and as a Khārijite manifesting open opposition to Marwān b. Muḥammad.[250]

How Abū Ḥamzah the Khārijite Led the Pilgrimage

According to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿIsā al-ʿUqaylī—Hārūn b. Mūsā al-Farwī—Mūsā b. Kathīr the mawlā of the Sāʿidīs: At the end of 129 (August 747), the pilgrims had not yet gone to ʿArafah[251] when standards appeared (in Mecca) made of black turbans of ḥirqānī stuff fixed to the heads of lances, carried by seven hundred men. The people were frightened as soon as they saw them, and asked, "What are you doing, and what do you want?" The men then told them of their opposition to Marwān and the Marwānids, and their disavowal of him. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Sulaymān, who was at that time governor of Madīnah and Mecca,[252] sent messages to them under the truce (of the Pilgrimage), and they replied, "Our minds are resolved upon our pilgrimage, and we begrudge any other business." He made a peace agreement with them on the condition that each party should guar-[1982] antee the other's safety until the last pilgrims returned from Minā.[253] However, they rose early on the morrow and took their stance as a separate group on Mt. ʿArafah,[254] and ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b.

Muʿāwiyah extended over several years. He was ultimately killed by the ʿAbbāsids. See n. 231 above.

250. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1942, 1943 and 2006–2014; III/1, 11; FHA, 168ff; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, 406, 417.

251. The assembly on Mt. ʿArafah on the ninth day of the Month of Pilgrimage from noon to sunset is the central rite of the pilgrimage. See EI^{2} s.v. ʿArafa and Ḥadjdj.

252. His father Sulaymān was the son of the Umayyad Caliph ʿAbd al-Malik.

253. The three days at Minā conclude the pilgrimage season in a mood of celebration and festivity from the 11th to the 13th of the month. See EI^{2} s.v. Ḥadjdj. The text then has yaṣbaḥū, "they rise at morning," corrected by the Cairo edition to aṣbaḥū.

254. As followers of a different caliph, the Khārijites could not follow the rites of Marwān's appointee.

Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān was pushed aside with the people. When the pilgrims were at Minā, people reproached ʿAbd al-Wāḥid and said, "You made a mistake with them. Had you incited the pilgrims against them, they'd have been no more than an itch on your head." Abū Ḥamzah stayed at Qurayn al-Thaʿālib,[255] and ʿAbd al-Wāḥid at the governor's residence (manzil al-sulṭān). Then ʿAbd al-Wāḥid sent ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb as well as Rabīʿah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and such (notables) to visit Abū Ḥamzah. They found him wearing a rough cotton waist-wrapper. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan (the ʿAlawī) and Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh (the ʿUthmānī) presented them to him, and he asked for their own genealogies, so they traced their lineage for him. He looked sternly into their faces and showed his aversion.[256] He then asked ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Qāsim (the Bakrī) and ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar (the ʿUmarī), and they traced their lineage for him. He was cheerful toward them, and smiling in their faces, he said, "By God, we only became Khārijites that we might follow the course of both your forefathers!" At this, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan (the ʿAlawī) told him, "And by God, we didn't come out so that you could show your favor to some of our forefathers; the amīr sent us to you with a message, and Rabīʿah will inform you of it!"

When Rabīʿah mentioned "breach of agreement," Balj and Abrahah, who were two of his officers, said, "Now! Now!" But Abū Ḥamzah turned to them and said, "God forbid that we should break our agreement or detain you. By God, I would not do it, though this [1983] neck of mine were to be cut. However, you are breaking the truce that is between us and you." When he had refused them, they left and informed ʿAbd al-Wāḥid. When the pilgrims left Minā, ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was in the first party. He left Mecca to Abū Ḥamzah, who entered it without a fight.

ʿAbbās—Hārūn—Yaʿqūb b. Ṭalḥah al-Laythī recited some verses in which ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was satirized. He said, "They are by some poet whose name I don't remember:"

255. For Qurayn al-Thaʿālib, see Azraqī, I, 410, 414.

256. The Khārijites regarded both ʿUthmān and ʿAlī as grave sinners. For them, only Abū Bakr and ʿUmar among the first four caliphs were "rightly guided shaykhs."

There visited the pilgrims a gang who contravened God's own religion, so ʿAbd al-Wāḥid fled.

He left his women and his amirate running, striking the ground like a runaway camel.

Had his father stripped his bone of flesh, his origin had been purer, due the father's root.

Then ʿAbd al-Wāḥid went on until he entered Madīnah and called for the registry (dīwān). He called up the people in a levy, and gave each of them a ten dirham increase in their pay. According to ʿAbbās—Hārūn—Abū Ḍamrah Anas b. ʿIyāḍ: He was among those who were registered, but then his name was erased. He also said, "More than one of our companions told me that ʿAbd al-Wāḥid appointed ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān to lead the people, and they went out. When they were at the Ḥarrah[257] they came upon slaughtered camels, and passed on."

[1984] ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān led the Pilgrimage this year, according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Isḥāq b. ʿIsā—Abū Maʿshar al-Sindī. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī and others say the same. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was governor of Mecca and Madīnah. The governor of Iraq was Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah. According to what is mentioned, al-Ḥajjāj b. ʿĀṣim al-Muḥāribī was in charge of the judiciary at Kūfah, while at Baṣrah it was ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr. Khurāsān was ruled by Naṣr b. Sayyār, and there was civil war.

257. The basalt desert outside of Madīnah. See *EI*² s.v. al-Ḥarra.

The Events of the Year 130

(SEPTEMBER 11, 747–AUGUST 30, 748)

Among the events of this year was Abū Muslim's entry into the walled city of Marw and his occupation of the Government House (Dār al-Imārah) there, and the agreement of 'Alī b. Juday' al-Kirmānī to join him in fighting Naṣr b. Sayyār.[258]

How Abū Muslim Entered the Walled City of Marw

Abū al-Khaṭṭab reported:[259] Abū Muslim's entrance into the walled city of Marw and his occupation of the Government House where the governors of Khurāsān reside occurred on Thursday, the ninth of Jumādā II 130 (February 14, 748). The reason for 'Alī b. Juday' al-Kirmānī's move to Abū Muslim was as follows. Sulaymān b. Kathīr was camped opposite 'Alī b. Kirmānī when the latter made a pact with Naṣr to fight Abū Muslim. Sulaymān b. Kathīr said to 'Alī, "Abū Muslim says, 'Aren't you reluctant to make up with Naṣr b. Sayyār, when only yesterday he killed your father and crucified him? I had not reckoned you would join with Naṣr b. Sayyār [even] [1985] to pray in one mosque with him.'" At this, 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī's zeal 258. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 310ff; Ibn Khayyāṭ, I, 412.

259. That is Ḥamzah b. 'Alī b. Muḥfiz al-Rāwī. See index to Cairo edition, X, 230.

was stirred, and he went back on his decision; the truce of the Arabs thus came apart.

When the truce came apart, Naṣr sent to Abū Muslim asking him to come in on the side of the Muḍar, while the Rabī'ah and the Qaḥṭān sent similar requests on their own behalf. They had exchanged messages on this for some days, when Abū Muslim told them to let delegations from both factions come to him so that he might choose one or the other. They did so. But Abū Muslim ordered the ['Abbāsid] Shī'ah to choose the Rabī'ah and the Qaḥṭān, since authority (sulṭān) was vested in Muḍar and it was they who were governing for Marwān al-Ja'dī[260] and the murderers of Yaḥyā b. Zayd.[261] The two delegations then appeared. In the delegation of Muḍar there were 'Aqīl b. Ma'qil b. Ḥassān al-Laythī, 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd Rabbihi al-Laythī, al-Khaṭṭāb b. Muḥriz al-Sulamī and others among their leading men. The delegation of Qaḥṭān were 'Uthmān b. al-Kirmānī, Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā, Sawrah b. Muḥammad b. 'Azīz al-Kindī and other leading men of theirs. Abū Muslim told 'Uthmān b. al-Kirmānī and his companions to go into the orchard of al-Muḥtafiz where carpets and cushions were spread for them. They seated themselves there while Abū Muslim took his place in a room of the house of al-Muḥtafiz. Permission was given to 'Aqīl b. Ma'qil and his companions from the delegation of Muḍar, and they entered. There were seventy men of the Shī'ah[262] in the room with Abū Muslim. He read aloud a document he had written for the Shī'ah, that said they should choose one side or the other. When he had finished reading the document, Sulaymān b. Kathīr rose and spoke. He was an eloquent orator, and he chose 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī and his followers. Then Abū Manṣūr Ṭalḥah b. Zurayq the naqīb stood up. He was also an accomplished speaker, and he said much the same as [1986] Sulaymān b. Kathīr. Mazyad b. Shaqīq al-Sulamī[263] then rose and 260. That is, the Caliph. The name "Ja'dī" can mean "curly-haired." This is most often used to discredit Marwān.

261. Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī was the son of the Zayd from whom the Zaydī Shī'ah take their name, who had been killed in an uprising in Kūfah in 122(740). Yaḥyā fled to Khurāsān and hid in Balkh for three years and was slain in 126 (744). His death aroused great sympathy in Khurāsān. There had been links between him and the 'Abbāsids, and Abū Muslim's acting as his avenger was a popular move. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 338.

262. Presumably the seventy naqībs and du'āt.

263. Mazyad b. Shaqīq was a naqīb. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 217.

said, "Muḍar are the slayers of the Prophet's family, the supporters of the Banū Umayyah and the party of Marwān al-Ja'dī. Our blood is on their necks, our possessions are in their hands, and the consequences (of their acts) await them. Naṣr b. Sayyār is Marwān's governor for Khurāsān, who carries out his orders, and calls for allegiance to him in his minbar, and calls him 'Commander of the Faithful.' Before God, we are innocent of all that, or that Marwān should command the Faithful or that Naṣr should judge what is guidance or right behavior. We have chosen 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī and his followers from the Qaḥṭān and the Rabī'ah." Then the seventy who had gathered in the room agreed with the words of Mazyad b. Shaqīq.

The delegation of Muḍar then got up humiliated and distressed, and Abū Muslim sent al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' with horsemen to escort them back to where they were safe, while the delegation of 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī returned full of joy and triumph. Abū Muslim stayed at Alīn for twenty-nine days, and from there went back to his camp at Mākhuwān. He told the Shī'ah to build dwellings for themselves and to lay in supplies for the winter, since God had spared them from a united Arab front against them, and at their hands, had led the Arabs to disunity, as He had preordained in His might. After journeying from Alīn, Abū Muslim entered Mākhuwān on Thursday, midway through Ṣafar 130 (October 25, 747). He stayed at Mākhuwān three months, or ninety days, and entered the walled city of Marw on Thursday, the ninth night of Jumādā I that same year (January 26, 748).

The walled city of Marw was then held by Naṣr b. Sayyār, since he was the governor of Khurāsān. 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī now sent a message [1987] to Abū Muslim, "Enter the walled city and my tribe with me will also enter, and thus we shall gain control of the walled town." Abū Muslim sent this reply, "I fear that you will join with Naṣr b. Sayyār to fight me, but go on; enter and engage him and his followers in combat." 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī did so, and Abū Muslim sent Abū 'Alī Shibl b. Ṭahmān the naqīb with a force. They came inside the walled city, settled in the palace of the Bukhārākhudā and sent word to Abū Muslim to come. Abū Muslim came into the city from the camp at Mākhuwān. Over his vanguard he put Asīd b. 'Abdallāh al-Khuzā'ī, Mālik b. Haytham al-Khuzā'ī led the right flank, and al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' al-Tamīmī the left. He proceeded until he was inside the walls, where the two factions were fighting each other. He then ordered them to desist, reciting the words from God's Book, "And he entered the city at a time when its people were careless, and found there two men fighting; the one was of his own Shī'ah, and the other was one of his enemies."[264] Abū Muslim then went on to the Government Palace of Marw, where the governors of Khurāsān stayed. This was on Thursday, the ninth of Jumādā I (January 27, 748).

The next day, Friday, the tenth of Jumādā (January 28, 748), Naṣr b. Sayyār fled Marw, leaving the city to Abū Muslim. When he entered the walled city of Marw, Abū Muslim ordered Abū Manṣūr Ṭalḥah b. Zurayq to administer the oath of allegiance to the forces of the Hāshimiyyah.[265] Abū Manṣūr was an eloquent man of noble mien, skilled in speech, and learned in the polemics of the Hāshimiyyah and their esoteric doctrines. He was one of the twelve naqībs whom Muḥammad b. 'Alī had selected from among the seventy who had responded favorably to him when he sent his emissary to Khurāsān in 103 or 104 (721 or 722). Muḥammad b. 'Alī had instructed the emissary to have them swear allegiance to the Chosen One (al-Riḍā) but not to specify anyone by name.

[1988]

He set patterns of action for his emissary, and described what justice should be like. The latter then went out to them and propagandized secretly, and people responded to him. When their numbers reached seventy, he took twelve of them as naqībs. From the Khuzā'ah, Sulaymān b. Kathīr, Mālik b. al-Haytham, Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ, Ṭalḥah b. Zurayq and 'Amr b. A'yān. From the Ṭayy', Qaḥṭabah whose name was Ziyād b. Shabīb b. Khālid b. Ma'dān. From the Tamīm, Mūsā b. Ka'b called Abū 'Uyaynah, Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ and al-Qāsim b. Mujashi', all from the Banū Imru' al-Qays, and Aslam b. Sallām, called Abū Sallām.[266] From Bakr b. Wā'il there were Abū Dāwud

264. Qur. 18:15.

265. The Hāshimiyyah in Khurāsān are almost certainly to be identified with the Rāwandiyyah. They believed that Abū Hāshim b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭalib at his death, ca. 98 (716-717) had transferred the Imāmate to Muḥammad b. 'Alī the 'Abbāsid. Most of his following, based in Iraq, had transferred their allegiance to the 'Abbāsids. This Iraqī group represented only one part of the 'Abbāsid Shī'ah but it was the inner core, in which the Khurāsānī following was subsumed. See EI[2] s.v. Hāshimiyya.

266. The Akhbār al-Dawlah, 282, 288, 291, mentions an Aslam b. Abī Sallām who was active in the 'Abbāsid cause. He is, however, not listed among the naqībs.

Khālid b. Ibrāhīm, the brother of Sadūs, of the Banū ʿAmr b. Shaybān and Abū ʿAlī al-Harawī. Elsewhere it is stated that Shibl b. Ṭaḥmān was in place of ʿAmr b. Aʿyan, and that ʿIsā b. Kaʿb or Abū al-Najm ʿImrān b. Ismaʿīl was in the place of Abū ʿAlī al-Harawī, who was a relative of Abū Muslim's wife.[267]

The only one of the naqībs whose father was still alive was Abū Manṣūr Ṭalḥah b. Zurayq b. Asʿad known as Abū Zaynab al-Khuzāʿī. He had seen the campaign of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, and had been a comrade of al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah in frontier raids (maghāzī). Abū Muslim used to consult him on matters, and ask him about his experiences in wars and raids. He would call him by his kunyā of Abū Manṣūr, and would say, "Abū Manṣūr, what do you say? What do you think?"

Abū al-Khaṭṭāb reported: One who was there when Abū Manṣūr [1989] administered the oath of allegiance to the Hāshimiyyah told us he said, "I ask you for allegiance to the Book of God, may He be exalted and glorified, and to the sunnah of His prophet, God bless him and give him peace, and to obey the Chosen One from the family of God's messenger. You must swear to do this by solemn oath and covenant with God, that [otherwise] your wives will be divorced and your slaves set free and you must go on foot to the House of God. Pledge that you will not ask for wage or pay until your superiors [wulāt] initiate it for you. Even if the enemy of one of you should be beneath his foot, you will not stir up strife except by the order of your superiors." When Abū Muslim had imprisoned Salm b. Aḥwaz, Yūnus b. ʿAbd Rabbihi, ʿAqīl b. Maʿqil and Manṣūr b. Abī al-Khirqāʾ and his companions, he consulted Abū Manṣūr. He told him, "Make your whip the sword, and your prison the grave." So Abū Muslim brought them out and killed them. Their number was twenty-four men.

267. If one substitutes the replacements indicated by Ṭabarī, his list is identical to that of the Akhbār al-ʿAbbās, 215ff. This list, as it stands in this text of Ṭabarī, is identical to the first group of naqībs allegedly formed at the turn of the first Islamic century. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1358 sub anno 100. The earlier account of Ṭabarī is apparently recalled here. This would imply that there were two lists of naqībs: one drawn up in 100 (718-719) and the other drawn up by Bukayr b. Māhān after the death of Muḥammad b. ʿAlī in 125 (November 4, 742-October 23, 743). It would have been remarkable that so many naqībs of the Khurāsān apparatus continued to be active in their positions thirty years after their initial recruitment to the ʿAbbāsid cause. It may well be that the early list mentioned by Ṭabarī sub anno 100 (August 3, 718-July 23, 719) is a backformation to give the ʿAbbāsids an active revolutionary presence in that region from almost the beginning of Muḥammad b. ʿAlī's imāmate, and that the likes of Sulaymān b. Kathīr, Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb and the others only later became part of a formal revolutionary organization. (J.L.)

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Ṣabbaḥ the mawlā of Jibrīl—Maslamah b. Yaḥyā: Abū Muslim appointed Khālid b. 'Uthmān chief of his guard; Mālik b. al-Haytham was made chief of security; al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' was put in charge of the judiciary; and Kāmil b. Muẓaffar was in charge of the registry (dīwān).[268] He gave each man a salary (rizq) of four thousand dirhams. Abū Muslim stayed in his camp at Mākhuwān for three months and then marched by night with a large force for the camp of Ibn al-Kirmānī. Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ had command of his right, al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' had the left, and Abū Naṣr Mālik b. al-Haytham commanded the vanguard. He left Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Mākhuwānī in charge of his fortified camp. By the early morning, Abū Muslim was in the camp [1990] of Shaybān, so Naṣr feared that Abū Muslim and Ibn al-Kirmānī would join together to fight him. He therefore sent a message to Abū Muslim proposing that the latter enter the city of Marw and he would be reconciled with him. Abū Muslim responded favorably, so Naṣr was reconciled toward Abū Muslim. All that same day, Naṣr had exchanged messages with Ibn Aḥwaz, while Abū Muslim was in the camp of Shaybān. The next morning Naṣr and Ibn al-Kirmānī engaged in combat, and Abū Muslim came up to enter the city of Marw. He warded off Naṣr's cavalry as well as that of Ibn al-Kirmānī, and entered the city on the seventh or ninth of Rabī' II 130 (January 12 or 14, 748) reciting the verse, "And he entered the city, at a time when its people were careless, and found there two men fighting; the one was of his own Shī'ah, and the other was one of his enemies. Then the one that was of his Shī'ah cried to him to aid him against the one that was of his enemies; so Moses struck him and killed him, and said, 'This is of Satan's doing; surely he is a misleading and manifest enemy!' "[269]

According to 'Alī—Abū al-Dhayyāl and Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍabbī:

---

268. That is, Abū Muslim created elements of a shadow government even before he displaced the Umayyads from rule in Khurāsān. The expanded shadow governments in Khurāsān and Iraq (under Abū Salamah) then became the 'Abbāsid government in place and tended to ease the transition between the end of the Umayyads and the establishment of their successors. See Sharon, 'Alīyat, 176–84. (J.L.)

269. Qur. 28:15.

When Abū Muslim entered the city of Marw, Naṣr told his followers, "I see that this man's strength has grown and that the people have come running to him. I have made a truce with him, and what he wants will be, so let us get out of this city and leave him here." Then they differed, some saying "yes" and some "no". At last he said, "You will surely remember what I said." He told his particular friends among the Muḍar, "Go off to Abū Muslim, meet him, and obtain whatever terms you can from him." Abū Muslim sent Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ to Naṣr to summon him, and Lāhiz quoted the Qur'ānic verse, "The Council are conspiring to kill you."[270] He recited the verses before that as well. Naṣr understood, and he told his slave, "Prepare my ablution for me." He rose as if he were going to make his ablutions, went into an orchard, slipped out of it and mounted a horse and fled.[271]

According to ʿAlī—Abū al-Dhayyāl—Iyās b. Ṭalḥah b. Ṭalḥah: I was with my father, and my paternal uncle had gone to Abū Muslim to offer him his allegiance but had delayed until I prayed the afternoon prayer. There was little daylight left and we were waiting for [1991] him. We had prepared dinner for him, and I was sitting with my father, when Naṣr suddenly passed by us on a horse which I knew was the best in his palace. With him were his chamberlain and al-Ḥakam b. Numaylah al-Numayrī. My father said, "Surely he's fleeing; no one is with him, and there is no spear or banner carried before him." He passed by us and barely saluted us. When he'd gone past, he struck his horse, and al-Ḥakam b. Numaylah called to his slaves, and they mounted and followed him.

According to ʿAlī—Abū al-Dhayyāl—Iyās: Our place was four *farsakh*s (24 km) from Marw, and Naṣr passed by us after dark. The people of the village began to clamor and ran away. My family and my brothers said, "Get out, don't be killed!" They wept, so I left with my father's brother, al-Muhallab b. Iyās, and we caught up with Naṣr after part of the night had passed. He had forty men with him. His horse had stopped, and he had dismounted from it. Bishr b. Bisṭam b. ʿImrān b. al-Faḍl al-Burjumī put him on his own horse. Then Naṣr said, "I don't feel safe from pursuit. Who's going to lead us?" ʿAbdallāh b. ʿArʿarah al-Ḍabbī said, "I'll lead you." "You're the man to do it," Naṣr told him. He hurried us through that night, until we stopped at dawn at a well in the desert twenty farsakhs (120 km) or so away. We were six hundred now, and we traveled all day and dismounted at the afternoon prayer within sight of the houses and strongholds of Sarakhs. By now we were fifteen hundred. I went off with my uncle to a friend of ours from the Banū Ḥanīfah called Miskīn, and we slept through the night there without eating anything. We woke up next morning and he brought us a dish of gruel of which we ate. We were very hungry, not having eaten for a day and a night. Then the people gathered together, and they had become three thousand. We stopped at Sarakhs two days, and when no one came after us, Naṣr went on to Ṭūs and told them the news about Abū Muslim. He stopped there for fifteen days, and then moved on, as did we, to Naysābūr and stayed there.

270. Qur. 28:20.

271. Dīnawarī, 363, indicates that Naṣr had agreed to join Abū Muslim and had in fact been given a surety. Nevertheless, he fled.

Now Abū Muslim had settled in the governor's palace after Naṣr [1992] fled Marw. Ibn al-Kirmānī had come and had entered Marw when Abū Muslim did. Abū Muslim said when Naṣr escaped, "Naṣr considers me a wizard, but by God, he's one."

Another source that I have not mentioned says this on the matter of Naṣr and Ibn al-Kirmānī and Shaybān al-Ḥarūrī: Abū Muslim moved in 130 (747–748) from his camp at the village of Sulaymān b. Kathīr to a village called Mākhuwān and camped there. He sought the aid of ʿAlī b. Juday' al-Kirmānī and his Yamanī followers, and he also sought help from Naṣr b. Sayyār and his followers. He sent messages to both sides, showing each of them that he was prepared to make peace with them and come to an agreement with them, and ready to obey them. ʿAlī b. Juday' accepted this, and acted as Abū Muslim wanted him to by entering into a pact with him. When Abū Muslim was assured by ʿAli b. Juday''s pledge to him, he wrote to Naṣr b. Sayyār to send a delegation to be present when he and his companions discussed the promise he had made to side with Naṣr. He sent a similar message to ʿAlī b. Juday'. This source describes how the leaders of the Shīʿah chose the Yaman over the Muḍar, much as it is described by the man whose account we have mentioned above in this book, and he observes that when Abū Muslim sent Shibl b. Ṭahmān with others to Marw to occupy the palace of the Bukhārākhudāh, he only sent him as a reinforcement for ʿAlī b. Al-Kirmānī. He says (that) Abū Muslim and all his followers went from his fortified camp at Mākhuwān to 'Alī b. Juday'. The chief men (ashrāf) of the Yaman were there with 'Alī and his brother 'Uthmān, as well as their allies of the Rabī'ah. When Abū Muslim was opposite the walled city of Marw, 'Uthmān b. Juday' and the chief men of the Yaman and Rabī'ah received him with a great body of horsemen. He entered the camp of 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī and Shaybān [1993]

b. Salamah al-Ḥarūrī along with the naqībs, and waited at 'Alī b. Juday''s chamber. 'Alī entered and agreed to (the alliance), and gave him and all those with him guarantees of safety. They then went together to the chamber of Shaybān, who was saluted in those days as Commander of the Faithful (that is, Caliph). Abū Muslim told 'Alī to go sit beside Shaybān, informing 'Alī that it was not lawful for him to salute Shaybān (in this way). Abū Muslim wanted to greet 'Alī as "Amīr," so that Shaybān would think that he was saluting Shaybān. 'Alī did this, and then Abū Muslim went in and said, "Peace be to you, Amīr." He was gracious to Shaybān and made much of him. Then Abū Muslim took his leave and stayed two nights at the palace of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan al-Azdī. He then returned to his entrenched camp at Mākhuwān and stayed there three months. He moved from Mākhuwān to Marw on the seventh of Rabī' II 130 (January 12, 748) leaving Abū 'Abd al-Karīm al-Mākhuwānī behind in charge of his army. Abū Muslim appointed Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ to command his right wing, Qāsim b. al-Mujāshi' his left, and Mālik b. al-Haytham over his vanguard. Marching by night, he came early in the morning to the gates of Marw, and sent word to 'Alī b. Juday' to send his cavalry. When he came to the gate of the governor's palace, he found the two factions engaged in a violent battle within the walled city. He sent messengers to them to cease fighting and each go to their own camp, and they complied. He then sent Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ, Quraysh b. Shaqīq, 'Abdallāh b. al-Bakhtarī and Dāwud b. Karrāz to Naṣr, summoning him to the Book of God and obedience to the Chosen One, from the family of Muḥammad. When Naṣr saw what the Yaman and the Rabī'ah and the non-Arabs were doing, and that he was powerless against them, he saw no way out but to show his acceptance of the message sent [1994] him, that is, to come to Abū Muslim and pay his allegiance. He delayed until evening, due to the thoughts of faithlessness and of flight which troubled him. He then ordered his followers to leave that night for a place where they would be safe. However, it was not easy for them to leave that night and Salm b. Aḥwaz told him, "It is not feasible for us to leave tonight, but we shall leave the next." When dawn came, Abū Muslim began to array his cavalry squadrons, and kept at this into the afternoon. He sent Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ, Quraysh b. Shaqīq, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Bakhtarī, Dāwud b. Karrāz and a number of the non-Arabs of the Shīʿah to Naṣr. They went in to see him, and Naṣr said, "How evil is what you return for." Lāhiz replied, "There is no way out of this for you." Then Naṣr said, "Well then, if there is no way out, I shall make my ablutions and go out to him. I shall send a messenger to Abū Muslim, and if this is his idea and his command I shall go to him, and may it be pleasant in his sight. I shall ready myself until my messenger returns." Then Naṣr stood, and when he stood, Lāhiz recited this verse of the Qur'ān, "The council are conspiring to kill you; depart, for I am one of your sincere advisers."[272] Naṣr went into his dwelling and told them he would wait for his messenger's return from Abū Muslim. As soon as night fell, he slipped out from behind his chamber with Tamīm his son and al-[1995] Ḥakam b. Numaylah al-Numayrī, his chamberlain, and his wife, and they fled. When Lāhiz and his companions missed him, they entered his dwelling and discovered that he had left. When this came to (the ears of) Abū Muslim, he went to the camp of Naṣr and took his trusted followers and their chief men and tied their hands behind their backs. One of these was Salm b. Aḥwaz, Naṣr's chief of security. The others were al-Bakhtarī his secretary, and two of his sons; Yūnus b. ʿAbd Rabbihi, Muḥammad b. Qaṭan, Mujāhid b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn, [Naṣr b. Idrīs, Manṣūr b. ʿUmar b. Alī al-Khirqā', ʿAqīl b. Maʿqil al-Laythī, Sayyār b. ʿUmar al-Sulamī, and leading men of the Muḍar]. He put them in irons [and put ʿIsā b. Aʿyan in charge of them].[273] They stayed in confinement with him until Abū Muslim ordered them all put to death.

Naṣr stopped at Sarakhs with the Muḍar who had followed him, who numbered three thousand. Abū Muslim and ʿAlī b. Juday' set out in pursuit of him, and followed him all that night, until at daybreak they came to a village called Naṣrāniyyah. They found that

272. Qur. 28:20.

273. These passages in brackets are taken from the Cairo edition and replace lacunae in the text.

Naṣr had left his wife, al-Marzubānah, behind in the village and (thus) saved himself.

Abū Muslim and ʿAlī went back to Marw, and Abū Muslim asked those whom he had sent to Naṣr, "What made him suspicious of you?" "We do not know," they replied. "Did one of you say anything?" he asked. They replied, "Lāhiz recited this verse of the Qur'ān, 'The council are conspiring to kill you.'" "That is what put him to flight," Abū Muslim said. Then he asked, "Lāhiz, would you corrupt religion?" and cut off his head.

This year Shaybān b. Salamah al-Ḥarūrī was killed.

The Death of Shaybān b. Salamah the Khārijite and the Reason for It

According to what has been reported the reason for his death is as follows. ʿAlī b. Judayʿ and Shaybān had joined forces to fight Naṣr b. Sayyār because of Shaybān's hostility to Naṣr. This was because he was one of Marwān b. Muḥammad's governors, while Shaybān held [1996] the opinions of the Khārijites. ʿAlī b. Judayʿ was opposed to Naṣr because ʿAlī was a Yamanī and Naṣr was a Muḍarī and (because) Naṣr had killed ʿAlī's father and crucified him, and because of the tribal feeling ('aṣabiyyah) that separated the two factions, Yaman and Muḍar. When ʿAlī b. al-Kirmānī entered an agreement with Abū Muslim and Shaybān abandoned them, Shaybān left Marw, since he knew he could not fight Abū Muslim and ʿAlī (combined against him). Meanwhile Naṣr had fled Marw (and gone to Sarakhs).[274]

According to ['Alī b. Muḥammad—Abū Ḥafṣ and] al-Ḥa [san b. Rashīd and Abū al-Dhayyāl]: When [the period of truce between Abū Muslim and Shaybān][275] was over, Abū Muslim sent to Shaybān asking him for his allegiance. Shaybān said, "It is I who call on you for allegiance." Abū Muslim then sent him this message, "If you will not live under our rule, then leave the place where you are dwelling." At this, Shaybān sent to ʿAlī al-Kirmānī asking for help, but he refused to give it. Shaybān thus went to Sarakhs, where a large number of the Bakr b. Wā'il joined him. Abū Muslim sent him nine men of the tribe of Azd, among them al-Muntaji' b. al-Zubayr, calling on him to join their movement and asking him to stop what he was doing. Shaybān sent back an answer, and then arrested Abū Muslim's messengers and put them in prison. At this, Abū Muslim wrote to Bassām b. Ibrāhīm, the mawlā of the Banū Layth at Abīward, ordering him to march against Shaybān and fight him. Bassām did so, and put him to flight and pursued him into the town. Shaybān was killed along with a number of the Bakr b. Wā'il. Someone told Abū Muslim, "Bassām is taking revenge for his father, and slays the innocent with the guilty." Abū Muslim wrote him to come to Marw, and he did, leaving a man behind in charge of his forces.

274. See n. 273 above.
275. See n. 273 above.

According to 'Alī—al-Mufaḍḍal: When Shaybān was killed, a man [1997] of Bakr b. Wā'il called Khafāf came upon the messengers whom Abū Muslim had sent to Shaybān. They were imprisoned in a house, and he took them out and killed them. It is also said that Abū Muslim sent a force on his behalf against Shaybān, headed by Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and Bassām b. Ibrāhīm.

In this year Abū Muslim killed 'Alī and 'Uthmān the sons of Juday' al-Kirmānī.

Why Abū Muslim Killed the Sons of Juday' al-Kirmānī

The reason for this, according to what is said is that Abū Muslim had sent Mūsā b. Ka'b against Abīward. He captured the city, wrote of this to Abū Muslim, and sent Abū Dāwūd to Balkh, where Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī was. When word that Abū Dāwud was making for Balkh reached Ziyād, he left there for Jūzjān together with troops of Balkh, Tirmidh, and others from the districts of Ṭukhāristan. When Abū Dāwud drew near, they fled back to Tirmidh, and Abū Dāwud entered the city of Balkh. Abū Muslim wrote Abū Dāwud ordering him to come to him, and sent Yaḥyā b. Nu'aym Abū al-Maylā' to replace him [at Balkh. Abū Dāwud left][276] and a letter from Abū Muslim came to him on the way, ordering him to turn back. He did, and Abū al-Maylā' advanced toward him. Yaḥyā b. Nu'aym al-Maylā' then wrote to Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī that they should join forces, and Ziyād responded favorably. Ziyād then returned, with Muslim b. 'Abd al-

276. This passage is taken from the Cairo edition and replaces a lacuna in the text.

Raḥmān b. Muslim al-Bāhilī, ʿIsā b. Zurʿah al-Sulamī and the inhabitants of Balkh and Tirmidh and the kings of Ṭukhāristan and the districts on both sides of the river (Oxus). Ziyād and his followers camped one farsakh (6 km) from the city of Balkh. Yaḥyā b. Nuʿaym Abū Maylāʾ came out to him with his own followers, and [1998] they joined forces. In full accord, the Muḍar, the Yaman, the Rabīʿah and the non-Arabs with them, as well, agreed to fight the black-clad warriors. They gave the command to Muqātil b. Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī, disliking that it should go to anyone from the three tribal divisions. Abū Muslim now ordered Abū Dāwud to al-ʿŪd,[277] and Abū Dāwud proceeded together with his men until they gathered at the river Sarjanān. Ziyād b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and his men had already sent Abū Saʿīd al-Qurashī as a lookout in the area between ʿŪd and a village called Amadiyān, lest the followers of Abū Dāwud come upon them from the rear, and Abū Saʿīd's flags and banners were the (ʿAbbāsid) black.

When Abū Dāwud and Ziyād gathered with their followers in battle formation, Abū Saʿīd al-Qurashī ordered his own men to join Ziyād and his followers from their rear. They turned and came out behind them from the road to ʿŪd with black banners, so Ziyād's men supposed that this was a surprise attack from Abū Dāwud's side. The battle between the two factions had already been joined, and Ziyād and his followers fled, while Abū Dāwud pursued them. Most of Ziyād's followers plunged into the river Sarjanān, while the majority of his men who stayed behind were killed. Abū Dāwud settled at their camp, taking possession of all that was in it. He did not follow Ziyād or [his followers. Most of those who did pursue them were the forward units of the vanguard][278] of Abū Dāwūd's cavalry, but [only as far] as the city [of Balkh].[279] Ziyād and Yaḥyā and those with them went on to Tirmidh, while Abū Dāwud stayed all that day and part of the next where he was and did not enter the city of Balkh, plundering the goods of those killed at the Sarjanān and of [1999] the Arabs and others who had fled. Balkh was now secure for Abū Dāwud.

Abū Muslim then wrote Abū Dāwud ordering him to come to 277. A large village three farsakhs (18 km) from Balkh. See text apparatus n. C.

278. See n. 276 above.
279. See n. 276 above.

him, and sent al-Naḍr b. Ṣubayḥ al-Murrī to govern Balkh. Abū Dāwud came, and he and Abū Muslim agreed to separate 'Alī and 'Uthmān the two sons of al-Kirmānī. Abū Muslim thus sent 'Uthmān to serve as governor of Balkh, and when he got there he appointed al-Furāfiṣah b. Ẓuhayr al-'Absī as his deputy in the city. Meanwhile the Muḍar advanced from Tirmidh, under the command of Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Bāhilī. The forces confronted each other, while 'Uthmān's followers were at a village between Barūqān and Dastajird.[280] They fought each other in a violent battle, and 'Uthmān b. Juday''s followers were routed while the Muḍar and Muslim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān took possession of the city of Balkh, driving out al-Furāfiṣah. The news reached 'Uthmān b. Juday' and al-Naḍr b. Ṣubayḥ while they were at Marwarrudh, so they marched against them. Word of their approach reached Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān's men, and they fled that night. Al-Naḍr was slow to pursue them, hoping they would get away. 'Uthmān b. Juday''s men then encountered them, and they engaged in a violent battle. 'Uthmān's forces were routed, many of his men were killed, and the Muḍar made their way to their friends.

Abū Dāwud returned from Marw to Balkh, and Abū Muslim, accompanied by 'Alī b. Juday', went to Naysābūr. Abū Muslim had agreed with Abū Dāwud that he would kill 'Alī while Abū Dāwud would kill 'Uthmān on the same day. So, when Abū Dāwud arrived at Balkh, he sent 'Uthmān as governor to Khuttal,[281] along with his [2000] troops from the Yaman and Rabī'ah of Marw and of Balkh. When he left Balkh, Abū Dāwud left [in pursuit of him, and caught up with him on the banks of the Wakhshāb at Wakhsh][282] in the land of Khuttal. Abū Dāwud then fell upon 'Uthmān and his followers. He imprisoned them all, and bound them and beheaded them. Abū Muslim killed 'Alī b. al-Kirmānī that same day. He had already told 'Alī to name for him his special friends, so that he might award

280. These were villages in the vicinity of Balkh. Dastajird was probably the village known as Dastajird Jumūkiyān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 597; II, 573.

281. Khuttal was the region between the Wakhsh river on the west and the Upper Oxus river, or Jaryāb, on the east. To the south, Khuttal was bounded by the Oxus, or Amū Daryā. See LeStrange, Lands, 437–38.

282. This passage is taken from the Cairo edition and fills in a lacuna in the text. For the Wakhshāb and Wakhsh, see LeStrange, Lands, 434–35.

them positions of trust and give them presents and raiment. ʿAlī had given him the names, so he now put all of them to death.

In this year, Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb came to Abū Muslim in Khurāsān from Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī. Qaḥṭabah brought the standard which had been given to him by Ibrāhīm, and as soon as he arrived, Abū Muslim put him in charge of his vanguard. He put troops under Qaḥṭabah's command and granted him the power to remove and appoint officers. Abū Muslim then wrote to the army to pay heed to Qaḥṭabah and obey him.

He sent Qaḥṭabah this same year to Naysābūr to encounter Naṣr. According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū Dhayyāl, al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd and Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jushamī: When Shaybān b. Salamah al-Ḥarūrī was killed, his followers joined Naṣr who was at Naysābūr. Al-Nābī b. Suwayd al-ʿIjlī wrote to Naṣr asking for aid, and Naṣr sent him his son Tamīm b. Naṣr with two thousand men. Meanwhile, Naṣr was preparing to go to Ṭūs. Abū Muslim then sent Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb with other officers, including al-Qāsim b. Mujāshiʿ and Jahwar b. Marrār. Al-Qāsim went by way of Sarakhs, while Jahwar went by way of Abīward. Tamīm sent ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr al-Sughdī against Jahwar, who was nearest to him, and ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr drove him off. Jahwar then entrenched himself at Kubādqān. Qaḥṭabah and al-Qāsim drew near where al-Nābī was, so Tamīm sent word to ʿĀṣim, "Turn away from Jahwar and confront them." He did, and Qaḥṭabah fought his men. [2001]

Abu Jaʿfar reported from another source than those from whom ʿAlī b. Muḥammad received the information we have cited about Qaḥṭabah and how Abū Muslim sent him against Naṣr and his followers: When Abū Muslim had killed Shaybān al-Khārijī and the sons of al-Kirmānī, driven Naṣr out of Marw and gained the upper hand in all of Khurāsān, he sent his governors to all its territories. He appointed Sibāʿ b. al-Nuʿmān al-Azdī for Samarqand and Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm for Ṭukharistān. He sent Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath to the two Ṭabases and Fāris[283] and set Mālik b. al-Haytham over his security forces. Qaḥṭabah he sent to Ṭūs with a number of officers, including Abū ʿAwn ʿAbd al-Malik Ibn Yazīd, Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-'Akkī, Khālid b. Barmak, Khāzim b. Khuzaymah, Mundhir b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 'Uthmān b. Nahīk, Jahwar b. Marrār al-'Ijlī, Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī, 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān al-Ṭā'ī, Salamah b. Muḥammad, Abū Ghānim 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Rib'ī, Abū Ḥumayd, Abū al-Jahm, whom Abū Muslim appointed as army secretary for Qaḥṭabah, 'Āmir b. Ismā'īl, and Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm, who had with him a number of officers. They engaged the forces at Ṭūs, who were put to flight; the number of those who were trampled to death in the rout was greater than those who were slain in combat. The total number killed that day was about ten thousand.

283. Ṭabas al-ʿUnnāb, Ṭabas al-Tamr and Fāris were the chief towns of the province south of Nīshāpūr (Naysābūr). See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 513; LeStrange, Lands, 352ff.

[2002] Abū Muslim sent al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' to Naysābūr along the main road, and wrote to Qaḥṭabah ordering him to engage Tamīm b. Naṣr b. Sayyār and al-Nābī b. Suwayd and those Khurasānīs who were attached to them. He also ordered him to send Mūsā b. Ka'b to him from Abīward. When Qaḥṭabah arrived at Abīward, he sent Mūsā to Abū Muslim and wrote to Muqātil b. Ḥakīm ordering him to send a man to Naysābūr to relieve Qāsim b. Mujāshi'. Abū Muslim sent 'Alī b. Ma'qil with ten thousand men against Tamīm b. Naṣr, ordering him to go to Qaḥṭabah with his men, so that [when Qaḥṭabah entered][284] Ṭūs they could reinforce him. 'Alī b. Ma'qil went on to camp at a village called Ḥulwān. Word reached Qaḥṭabah of 'Alī's march and the position he had taken, so he hastened to march to Sūdhqān, the camp of Tamīm b. Naṣr and al-Nābī b. Suwayd. He sent his vanguard with Asīd b. 'Abdallāh al-Khuzā'ī commanding [three thousand men of the Shī'ah] from Nasā and Abīward, and Asīd marched to camp at a village called [Ḥabūsān as Tamīm and al-Nābī prepared] to do battle with him. Asīd then wrote Qaḥṭabah informing him [of their resolve to do battle, and that if][285] Qaḥṭabah did not come to him soon, he would be summoning Asīd's men to the judgment of God. He informed him, as well, that these two commanded thirty thousand of the best Khurasānī troops and their cavalry. Qaḥṭabah then sent Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-'Akkī

284. The phrase in parentheses is taken from the Cairo edition and replaces the lacuna in the text.

285. The passages in parentheses are taken from the Cairo edition and replace lacunae in the text.

with a thousand men and Khālid b. Barmak[286] with another thousand. They went to join Asīd, but word reached Tamīm and al-Nābī, who drove them off. Then Qaḥṭabah and his followers came up and prepared to do battle with Tamīm. Qaḥṭabah put Muqātil b. Ḥakīm, Abū ʿAwn ʿAbd al-Malik b. Yazīd and Khālid b. Barmak in charge of his right wing, and Asīd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī, al-Ḥasan b. [2003] Qaḥṭabah, al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr and ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān in charge of his left, while he himself took the center. He then moved slowly toward the enemy, and called on them to obey the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet, as well as the Chosen One from the family of Muḥammad. However, they did not respond affirmatively. With that, he ordered his right and left wings to attack, and the two forces fought a violent battle, as violent as it could be. Tamīm b. Naṣr was killed in the fighting, and there was great slaughter of his men. Their camp was overrun. Al-Nābī took flight with a number of others, and they locked themselves up in the town. The soldiers then laid siege to the town, breached the wall and entered it, and al-Nābī and those with him were slain. ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr al-Samarqandī and Sālim b. Rāwiyah al-Saʿīdī fled to Naṣr b. Sayyār at Naysābūr and told him how his son, Tamīm, and al-Nābī had been slain, along with their followers.

When Qaḥṭabah gained possession of their camp and all that was in it, he placed it in the charge of Khālid b. Barmak and sent Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-ʿAkkī in command of his vanguard to Naysābūr. News of this reached Naṣr b. Sayyār and he set out, fleeing after the people of Abrashahr. He camped in Qūmis, where his followers left him to join Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah in Jurjān. Meanwhile Qaḥṭabah advanced on Naysābūr with his troops.

This same year Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah, governor of Jurjān for Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah (the Umayyad governor of Iraq) was slain.[287]

---

286. The ancestor of the Barmakī family of wazīrs. He was son of the last Parmak or hereditary high priest of the Nawbahār Buddhist temple near Balkh, and he was active in the Hāshimiyyah movement. EI[2] s.v. Barāmika.

289. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 328–31; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 413ff; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 410; FHA, 193.

The Slaying of the Governor of Jurjan

[2004] According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Zuhayr b. Hunayd, Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jushamī, Jabalah b. Farrūkh and Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Iṣbahānī: Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah sent Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah al-Kilābī to Naṣr. He went to Fārs and Iṣbahān and then marched to Rayy and on to Jurjān, but he did not reinforce Naṣr b. Sayyār. At this the Qays told Naṣr, "You'll not take us to Qūmis." They then went off to Jurjān. Nubātah dug a defensive trench. When it ran through the habitation of a particular group, they would bribe him and he would put it off. His trench extended for about a farsakh (6 km).

Qaḥṭabah came into Jurjān in Dhū al-Qaʿdah 130 (July 748), with Asīd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī, Khālid b. Barmak, Abū ʿAwn ʿAbd al-Malik b. Yazīd, Mūsā b. Kaʿb al-Marāʾī, al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, and ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī. Mūsā b. Kaʿb commanded his right wing, Asīd b. ʿAbdallāh his left, and al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah led the vanguard. Qaḥṭabah addressed (his forces), "Men of Khurāsān, do you know against whom you are marching and with whom you will do battle? You are going to fight with the remnants of those who burned the House of God, Mighty and Glorified be He."[288]

Al-Ḥasan went forward with the vanguard to the borders of Khurāsān and camped. He sent out ʿUthmān b. Rufayʿ, Nāfiʿ al-Marwazī, Abū Khālid al-Marwarrūdhī and Masʿadah al-Ṭāʾī against an armed party of Nubātah headed by a man called Dhuʿayb. They attacked him by night, killing Dhuʿayb and seventy of his men, and then returned to al-Ḥasan's camp. Qaḥṭabah now arrived and camped opposite Nubātah. The Syrians appeared in greater number than people had ever seen, so that upon beholding them the Khurasānīs were awed and spoke openly to this effect. This reached Qaḥṭabah, and he addressed them saying, "Men of Khurāsān, this land belonged to [2005] your forefathers before you, and they were given victory over their enemies because they were just and behaved rightly, until they changed and behaved unjustly. God the Mighty and Glorious was then angered with them. Their authority was taken from them, and the humblest people [ummah] to share the earth with them was given power over them and took their land and their women and en-

288. The reference is to the Syrian troops of the Umayyads who had ravaged Mecca in 64 (683) and 74 (694). See EI^{2} s.v. Kaʿba, history.

slaved their children. Yet this people ruled justly withal and kept their word and succored the oppressed. Then they changed and altered; they went astray in their governance, and people of probity and piety came to fear from the race of God's Apostle, may God's benediction be on him, and peace! Thus God has empowered you against them in order that revenge be enacted through you, that you should be their greatest punishment, for you have sought them out for vengeance. The Imām has sworn to me that you would encounter them in numbers great as these, but that God would give you victory over them, and you will rout and slay them."[289]

Qaḥṭabah had a letter from Abū Muslim read out loud: "From Abū Muslim to Qaḥṭabah, in the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Rise up against your enemy, for God the Mighty and Glorified is your helper. And when you prevail against them, let the slaughter be great."

They clashed on a Friday, the first night of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 130 (about June 29, 748), and Qaḥṭabah said, "Men of Khurāsān, God—blessed and glorified be He—has preferred this day above all days, when deeds are increased manifold above all days. This is a great month, wherein is the greatest of your feasts in the sight of God. The Imām has already informed us that you will win a victory on this day of this month against your enemy, so meet him firmly and steadfastly, reckoning on God's reward, for truly, God is with those who persevere."

Qaḥṭabah set off against them with al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah commanding his right wing and Khālid b. Barmak and Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-'Akkī commanding his left. The armies engaged in combat, each persevering against the other. Nubātah was slain, the Syrians were put to flight, and ten thousand of them were killed. Qaḥṭabah then sent Abū Muslim the head of Nubātah and that of his son Ḥayyah. [2006]

According to an elder of the Banū 'Adī—his father: Sālim b. Rāwiyah al-Tamīmī was one of those who had fled from Abū Muslim and left with Naṣr. Then he was with Nubātah and fought against Qaḥṭabah in Jurjān. When the army fled, he stayed on fighting by himself. 'Abdallāh al-Ṭā'ī, who was one of Qaḥṭabah's cavalrymen, attacked him, and Sālim b. Rāwiyah struck him in the face, putting out his eye. Sālim continued to fight until he was pushed back to the mosque. He went in, and his opponents followed him. Everywhere he attacked them, he made them scatter. He then began shouting, "Give me a waterjug, and by God I'll really give them trouble this day!" They set fire to the roof of the mosque and threw stones at him until they killed him. They brought his head to Qaḥṭabah; there was not a single unmarked spot on the head or the face, so that Qaḥṭabah said, "I've never seen anything like this."

289. This speech, if it is authentic, would seem to show that the majority of Qaḥṭabah's "Men of Khurāsān" were non-Arab Muslims: a disputed question.

In this year the battle at Qudayd between Abū Ḥamzah the Khārijite and the people of Madīnah[290] took place.

Abū Ḥamzah's Battle with the Madīnans at Qudayd

According to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿIsā al-ʿUqaylī—Hārūn b. Mūsā al-Farwī—more than one source: ʿAbd al-Waḥīd b. Sulaymān (b. ʿAbd al-Malik) appointed ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān to lead the people, and they went out (from Madīnah). When they were at the Ḥarrah,[291] they came upon slaughtered camels, and went on. When they were at ʿAqīq[292] their banner caught on a thorn tree, and the pole broke. They thought this beginning boded ill, but kept going until they halted at Qudayd for the night. The village of Qudayd was in the vicinity of the castle which is standing there today; the [2007] water-tanks were in that place. They made a camp close together, being no warriors, and no one paid attention to them but a group who came out to them from the castle.[293]

Some have asserted that it was the tribe of Khuzāʿah who showed Abū Ḥamzah their exposed situation, and who led them to the Khārijites who slew them. The killing was at the expense of the Quraysh, they being most of the people, the ones with effective power (al-shawkah); a great number of them were slain.

According to ʿAbbās—Hārūn—one of his informants: A man of the Quraysh saw a man from the Yaman who was saying, "Praise be 290. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, I 413ff; FHA, 168–70; Azdī, 108–110; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 406. Qudayd was a place between Mecca and Madīnah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 42.

291. See *EI*² s.v. al-Ḥarra.

292. The "blessed valley" west of Madīnah, where according to tradition the Prophet was once told to pray by an angel. See *EI*² s.v. al-ʿAḳīḳ.

293. The reading al-qaṣr is from the Cairo edition, emending al-faḍl in the text.

to God, who has cooled my eye with the slaughter of Quraysh!"[294] Then he said to his son, "My boy, begin with this one." And it was one of the men of Madīnah. His son came up near him and cut off the man's head. Then the father would say to his son, "Come lad, up this way." And so they fought, until they both were killed. The survivors fled back to Madīnah, and the people mourned their slain. Women grieved at great length for their relatives and would not leave until news about their men arrived. Then the women went out, one after another, each going to her relative, until not one woman remained.

Abū Ḍamrah recited these verses to me concerning his kinsmen slain at Qudayd; one of their comrades lamented them, and said:

What a loss for me; and a loss, no mistake, for the riders in the dry gulch on the uplands;

There is ʿAmr, and ʿAmr, and ʿAbdallāh among them, and both their sons—five, and al-Ḥārith makes six.

In this year, Abū Ḥamzah the Khārijite entered Madīnah, city of the Messenger of God, may God bless him and give him peace, and ʿAbd al-Waḥīd b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik fled to Syria.

Abū Ḥamzah's Entry into Madīnah and What Came of It [2008]

According to ʿAbbās b. ʿIsā—Hārūn b. Mūsā al-Farwī—Mūsā b. Kathīr: Abū Ḥamzah entered Madīnah in the year 130 (747–748), as ʿAbd al-Waḥīd b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik fled to Syria. Abū Ḥamzah ascended the minbar,[295] praised God and eulogised Him, and said, "People of Madīnah, we have asked you about these rulers of 294. To the Khārijites, who recognized "no genealogy [nasab] in religion," the Quraysh were the subverters of the Prophetic community.

295. The minbar was the governor's throne in a mosque at this time, and this particular minbar had been the pulpit of the Prophet. Abū Ḥamzah's addresses from this pulpit were considered models of excellent rhetoric and are preserved in a number of collections dealing with Arab eloquence. Parts of the addresses are translated in various editions of Williams, Islam s.v. The Khārijīs. See also Ibn Khayyaṭ, I, 407ff sub anno 129; Azdī, 106; Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, IV, 144ff; al-Jaḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 124ff; Ibn Qutaybah, ʿUyūn, II, 249ff.

yours, and as God lives, what you had to say of them was bad. We asked you, 'Did they put people to death on suspicion?' You told us, 'Yes.' We asked you, 'Did they take, as lawful, wealth and women that are forbidden to them?' You replied, 'Yes.' So we said to you, 'Come, let us go together and ask them in God's name to turn away from you and from us.' You said, 'They will not do it.' Then we told you, 'Come, let us go and fight them together, and if we prevail, we shall bring those who will establish among us the Book of God, and the (sunnah) tradition of His Prophet Muḥammad, God's blessing and peace be upon him.' You said, 'We are not strong.' Then we told you, 'Then leave us and them alone. And if we are victorious, we shall be fair in our judgments towards you, and rely with you on the sunnah of your Prophet, and divide your fay' among you'.[296] Yet you refused, and fought us without them, and we therefore killed you. May God keep you from good and from prosperity!"

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar[297]—Ḥizām b. Hishām: The Khārijites numbered four hundred. One group was headed by al-Ḥārith, and one group by Bakkār b. Muḥammad al-'Adawī (that is, the) 'Adī of Quraysh, and another was led by Abū Ḥamzah. They clashed with the people of Madīnah after the latter had made ready to fight them after pleas from the Khārijites to desist. These told them, "By God, we have no need to fight you. Let us go on against our ene-[2009] mies." But the men of Madīnah refused. They met in battle on Thursday, after the seventh night of Ṣafar 130 (October 19, 747), and the men of Madīnah were massacred. None escaped but those who ran away. Their commander 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh was slain, and the Quraysh suspected that the Khuzā'ah had betrayed them with the Khārijites. Ḥizām told me (Muḥammad b. 'Umar), "By God, I gave shelter to some men from Quraysh until people were given a guarantee of safety. Balj had charge of the vanguard, and the

296. Fay' was revenue of properties taken in conquest. The disposition of these revenues by the second and third caliphs was a sore topic. 'Umar and 'Uthmān had in effect held the properties in trust and used the revenues for the community. 'Alī and his followers, and the later Khārijites, were known to favor dividing the fay' among the victors. 'Umar had not permitted Arabs to farm land outside the Arabian Peninsula. This especially offended the Yamanīs, who had old agricultural traditions. See EI[2] s.v. Fay'.

297. That is, Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī, a historian of Madīnah whose works reflect the traditions of the city. He was, however, a beneficiary of the 'Abbāsids, and careful not to offend his patrons. See Petersen, 'Alī and Mu'āwiya, 83–93.

Khārijites advanced on Madīnah on the 19th night of Safar [October 31, 747]."

According to 'Abbās b. 'Isā—Hārūn b. Mūsā—some of their shaykhs: When Abū Ḥamzah entered Madīnah, he stood up and delivered an address, saying, "People of Madīnah, I passed among you in the time of the squint-eyed Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, when a blight had struck your dates. You wrote to him requesting him to lower the tax on them, and he wrote back lowering it for you. The rich became richer, and the poor became poorer, but you said, 'May God reward you with good!' May God reward neither you nor him with good!"

According to 'Abbās—Hārūn—Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyā': Abū Ḥamzah gave the following address; he went up into the minbar, praised God and lauded Him, and then said,

> Know, O people of Madīnah that we did not leave our homes and our possessions lightly or carelessly, or to no avail, nor to overthrow a kingdom wishing to immerse ourselves in government, nor for revenge for an old grievance that touched our honor; but when we saw the lamps of truth had been neglected, and the speaker of truth was upbraided, and that he who stood up for justice was slain, then the earth in all its width became narrow for us, and we heard a herald [dā'ī] calling us to obey the Merciful Lord and the rule of the Qur'ān. We responded to the summoner of God, "And he who answers not God's summoner shall not frustrate God's plan on earth."[298] We came forward from scattered tribes, a group of us on one camel carrying ourselves and our supplies, sharing one blanket among ourselves, little people, held as weak on earth; and He received us and aided us by His succor, and we all became brothers to each other, by God, through His grace. Then we met your men at Qudayd, and we summoned them to obey the Merciful Lord and the rule of the Qur'ān. But they summoned us to obey Satan and the judgment of the family of Marwān. And by God's life, far apart are guidance and error! They scurried forward hastening, for Satan had struck in them his partners; his cauldrons boiled with their blood, and his supposition about them was con- [2010]

298. Qur. 46:32.

firmed. But the helpers of God, Mighty and Majestic, came forward in small bands and in squadrons, with every sharpened blade gleaming; and our coil turned, and their coil twisted away, with a blow from which triflers recoil. As for you, O people of Madīnah, if you aid Marwān and the family of Marwān, the God of might and majesty shall destroy you with punishment delivered by Himself or at our hands, and the breasts of faithful folk will recover health. O people of Madīnah, the first among you were the very best, and the last among you are the very worst. O people of Madīnah, the people are of us, and we are of them, unless it be a polytheist who worships idols, or a polytheist among the People of the Book,[299] or an imām who acts unjustly. O People of Madīnah, if anyone asserts that God the Mighty, the Majestic, charges any soul with what is beyond its power or asks of it more than is given to it, then he is an enemy of God, and we have war. O People of Madīnah, they have told me that there are eight divisions of the zakāt[300] which God has ordained upon strong and weak alike in his Book. Now a ninth has come, due no part of it, not one portion, and takes all of it for himself, arrogant in opposition to his Lord!

O People of Madīnah, it has reached me that you belittle my comrades. You say they are callow young men, barefoot bedouins. Alas for you, O people of Madīnah! What were the followers of the Messenger of God, God bless him and give him peace, but callow young men? Youths, by God, who were fully mature in their youth—youths whose eyes were closed to evil and whose feet were slow to approach wrongdoing; exchanging with God the life that dies for the life that dies not, they mingled all that was theirs with their fatigue, and rose at night to watch and pray after fasting all the day. They bent their backs over por-[2011] tions of the Qur'ān, and so oft as they came upon a verse [of fear,

299. "People of the Book," e.g., Jews and Christians who possessed revealed scriptures, are often accused of having "associated" lesser being with God, thereby becoming guilty of idolatry, the worst of sins. See *EI*² s.v. Ahl al-Kitāb.

300. The zakāt is a tax imposed on all, as it says in Qur'ān 10:60, for carefully defined community purposes. The eight legal beneficiaries are the poor, needy, collectors of the tax, "those whose hearts are to be reconciled," slaves to be ransomed, debtors, "those in God's Way," and travelers. The abbreviated form in which this address is cast, even omitting the proof-text as the speaker would not have done, demonstrates that we have here only a sketch of the main points.

they were racked with terror of the Fire, and when they came upon a verse][301] of desire they were racked with longing for Paradise. When they looked to swords drawn against them, lances pointed at them, arrows notched for them, when a detachment of cavalry thundered at them with bolts of death, they made little account of the threat of that detachment beside the threat of God. They did not take God's threat lightly beside the threat of a detachment; so blessed were they, and fair the place where they returned! And how many an eye which had overflowed long in the depth of night from fear of God met the beak of a bird! How many a hand left its wrist whereon its owner long supported himself [in his prostration to God! How many an excellent cheek and fine forehead was cleft by maces of iron! God have mercy upon those bodies, and make their souls to enter His gardens].[302] I say my say, and I ask God to forgive our deficiencies, for there is no success for me but in God; in Him have I put my trust, to Him shall I repair.

According to 'Abbās—Hārūn—his grandfather Abū 'Alqamah: I heard Abū Ḥamzah on the minbar of God's messenger saying, "Whoever fornicates is an infidel; whoever doubts it is an infidel. Whoever steals is an infidel; whoever doubts that he is an infidel is also an infidel."

According to 'Abbās—Hārūn—his grandfather: He had conducted himself so well among the people of Madīnah that people inclined to him even when they heard him say, "Whoever fornicates is an infidel."

According to 'Abbās—Hārūn—one of his companions: When he ascended the minbar he said, "The concealed has been revealed, wherever you may be taken. Whoever fornicates is an infidel; whoever steals is an infidel." Hārūn also said that someone recited these verses about the Battle of Qudayd:

What's wrong with Time, and wrong with me, ah—[303] [2012]
Qudayd has destroyed my menfolk, ah—

301. This phrase is missing in the text and is added from the Cairo edition.
302. See n. 301 above.
303. Read mā li-l-zamān with the Cairo edition and al-Aghānī; the text has mā li-Qudayd.

Then let me weep by all means secretly;
and surely I shall weep in public, ah—

I'll weep until I gasp,[304] like the dogs that bark, ah—

Abū Ḥamzah and his men entered Madīnah on the 17th of Ṣafar (October 29, 747). The authorities differ about how long they remained there: al-Wāqidī says it was three months. Another says they stayed there for the rest of Ṣafar, the two months of Rabī', and part of Jumādā I (i.e., into January 748). The number of the people from Madīnah who were slain at Qudayd according to al-Wāqidī was seven hundred.

It is mentioned that Abū Ḥamzah sent ahead a group of his men commanded by Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar al-Qurashī. After him, it was one of the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b, then Balj b. 'Uyaynah b. al-Hayṣam al-Asadī, a man of Baṣrah. Marwān b. Muḥammad sent 'Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. 'Aṭiyyah, one of the Banū Sa'd, from Syria with a Syrian contingent.

According to 'Abbās b. 'Isā—Hārūn b. Mūsā—Mūsā b. Kathīr: Abū Ḥamzah went out from Madīnah, leaving one of his followers in charge, and went on until he halted at the Wādī.[305]

According to 'Abbās—Hārūn—a companion from whom Abū Yaḥyā al-Zuhrī used to recite traditions: Marwān picked four thousand men of his army, put Ibn 'Aṭiyyah in command, and ordered [2013] him to move resolutely. He gave each man a hundred gold dīnārs, an Arab horse, and a mule for his baggage. He ordered Ibn 'Aṭiyyah to go engage them, and if he was victorious, to go on to the Yaman and fight 'Abdallāh b. Yaḥyā and his followers. Ibn 'Aṭiyyah went out and halted at 'Ulā.[306] A man from Madīnah called al-'Alā' b. Aflaḥ

304. Read shajītu, "I gasp," with the Cairo edition; the text has shaḥantu, "I chase in vain."

305. Presumably the Wādī al-Qurā, a long valley of many villages which was the gateway from the Ḥijāz to Syria. Whoever controlled this Wādī could exert great pressure on the Ḥijāz by cutting off supplies from the north. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 81, 878; Lassner, 'Abbāsid Rule, 71, 264, n. 44. For this account see Ibn Khayyāt I, 416ff; Azdī, 110ff; FHA, 181–85; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 66ff. (J.L.)

306. 'Ulā is the biblical Dedan, an oasis town on the incense road in the north Ḥijāz with extensive remains of an advanced pre-Islamic civilization. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 709.

the mawlā of Abū al-Ghayth used to say, "I was a boy at that time, and one of Ibn ʿAṭiyyah's men met me and asked, 'What's your name, boy?' I told him, 'al-ʿAlā.' 'Son of whom?' he asked. 'Son of Aflaḥ,' I told him. 'Mawlā of whom?' he asked. 'Mawlā of Abū al-Ghayth,' I told him. 'Where are we?' he asked. 'At ʿUlā,' I told him. 'And where shall we be tomorrow?' said he. 'At Ghālib,'[307] I told him. He said nothing, but mounted me behind him and rode off taking me to Ibn ʿAṭiyyah. 'Ask this boy his name,' he said. He asked me the questions and I answered as before. He was pleased at that, and gave me several dirhams."

According to ʿAbbās—Hārūn—ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Mājashūn: When Abū Ḥamzah and Ibn ʿAṭiyyah encountered each other, Abū Ḥamzah told his people, "Don't engage them until you are informed about them." They called out to Ibn ʿAṭiyyah's men, "What do you say about the Qur'ān, and doing as it says?" Ibn ʿAṭiyyah shouted back, "We put it in a bag." They called, "What do you say about the property of the orphan?" He replied, "Let's consume the property and commit debauchery with his mother!" These are only some of the things I have heard that they questioned them about. When they had heard their answers, they fought with them until evening. Then they called, "Woe to you, Ibn ʿAṭiyyah; God has made the night for repose;[308] so you repose and we'll repose!" But he refused, and fought them until he killed them.

According to ʿAbbās—Hārūn: When Abū Ḥamzah went out, he took leave of the people of Madīnah saying, "O people of Madīnah, we are going out against Marwān. If we prevail, we will be fair in ruling you, and treat you in accord with the sunnah of your Prophet Muḥammad, and divide fairly your fay' among you. If it goes as they [2014] wish, 'those who have done wrong shall learn by what an overturning they will be overturned.'"[309]

According to ʿAbbās—Hārūn—one of his companions: "When the news of Abū Ḥamzah's death came to the people [of Madīnah], they fell upon his followers and slew them."

---

307. Ghālib was a place in the Ḥijāz near Madīnah; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 869. There is a play on ghālib here, which means "a winner," as well as on other words in the responses with fortunate connotations.

308. Qur. 6:96.

309. Qur. 26:227.

Muḥammad b. ʿUmar reported that Abū Ḥamzah and his followers marched against Marwān, and his cavalry, led by Ibn ʿAṭiyyah al-Saʿdī of Qays, met them in Wādī al-Qurā and attacked them. They returned in flight to Madīnah, and the people of Madīnah met them and killed them. He continues: The commander of Marwān's army, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. ʿAṭiyyah al-Saʿdī, that is, Saʿd of Hawāzin,[310] came on to Madīnah at the head of four thousand Arab horsemen. Each had a mule, and some wore two breastplates, or one breastplate and armor[311] and coats of mail and other equipment the likes of which had not been seen at that time. They then went on to Mecca.

Another source reports that when Ibn ʿAṭiyyah entered Madīnah, he stayed there for a month, and then went on to Mecca. He appointed as his deputy in Madīnah al-Walīd b. ʿUrwah b. Muḥammad b. ʿAṭiyyah and continued on to Mecca and the Yaman. He appointed as his deputy in Mecca Ibn Māʿiz, from the Syrian army. Ibn ʿAṭiyyah went on; word reached ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā at Ṣanʿā' that he was coming against him, so he advanced against him with his supporters. The two forces clashed, and Ibn ʿAṭiyyah killed ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā, and sent his son Bashīr to Marwān. Ibn ʿAṭiyyah went on to enter Ṣanʿā', and then sent ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā's head to Marwān.[312] Then Marwān wrote Ibn ʿAṭiyyah, ordering him to march posthaste and lead the Pilgrimage at Mecca. According to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿIsā—Hārūn: He left leading a small group of his men, until they [2015] camped at Jurf,[313] as ʿAbbās has it. This attracted the attention of some of the people of the village, who said, "He's running away, by God!" Then they started to attack him. He told them, "Woe betide you! This is the leader of the Pilgrimage! By God, the Commander of the Faithful has written to me!"

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Abū al-Zubayr b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān: I went out along with twelve other men with Ibn ʿAṭiyyah

310. The Saʿd b. Bakr were a subtribe of the Hawāzin, a large North Arabian group of tribes of Qays ʿAylān, which was mostly of Ḥijāzi origin. See EI^{2} s.v. Hawāzin.

311. Read sannawar with the Cairo edition, emending the text which has tannūr.

312. The head would have been taken first to Ṣanʿā' to show people there the proof that ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā's reign was over.

313. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 63, lists a place called al-Jurf in the Yaman. However Azdī, 113, and Masʿūdī, Murūj, IV, 67, say the place was al-Jurash. Yāqūt, 59, describes Jurash as both a province of the Yaman and a place where a great city had flourished.

al-Sa'dī, who had Marwān's deed of appointment for the Pilgrimage. He had forty thousand dīnārs in his saddlebag. His army and cavalry were behind at Ṣan'ā', and until he camped at Jurf making for the Pilgrimage, by God, we felt secure and confident. Then I overheard a woman saying, "God smite both the sons of Jumānah! How grim-faced[314] they are!" I stood up as if I were going for water, and went up on a hillock. And lo, there was a band of men with swords, horses, and slings. Then the aforementioned sons of Jumānah were standing over us; we were surrounded on every side. We said, "What do you want?" They then said, "You're robbers!" Ibn 'Aṭiyyah took out his document and said, "This is the letter of the Commander of the Faithful, and his deed of appointment for the Pilgrimage. I am Ibn 'Aṭiyyah." But they said, "This is no good; you are robbers!" At this, we foresaw evil, and al-Ṣafar b. Ḥabīb mounted his horse, and fought well until he was slain. Ibn 'Aṭiyyah got on his horse, and fought until he too was killed. Then all those who were with us were killed, and I remained. They said, "Who are you?" "A man of Hamdān,"[315] I replied. "What Hamdān are you from?" they said. I traced back a lineage to one of their sub-groups, since I knew the sub-groups of Hamdān, and they let me alone. They told me, "Your life is safe, and everything that is yours in this place you can take." If I had claimed all of the money, they'd have given it to me. Then they sent some riders with me as far as Ṣa'dah, and I was safe and went on until I came to Mecca.

In this year the summer campaign against the Byzantines was led by al-Walīd b. Hishām. He went down to 'Amq and built the citadel of Mar'ash.[316]

This year the plague broke out at Baṣrah.

This year Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb killed many of the people of Jurjān; some say it was as many as thirty thousand. A version coming from people of Jurjān has it that after the slaying of Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah [2016]

315. The Hamdān were a large tribe of northern Yaman, whose range was between Ṣan'ā' and Sa'dah. The western moiety, the Hāshid, are still active there. Historically, they have been mostly Shī'īs. See EI^{2} s.v. Hamdān. Sa'dah is a district some 60 farsakhs (360 km) from Ṣan'ā'. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 388.

314. The text is mā ashtam; the Cairo edition has mā ash'am, "how inauspicious."

316. 'Amq is the alluvial plain of Cilicia, situated northeast of Antioch. See EI^{2} s.v. al-'Amḳ. The Marwānid construction of the citadel of Mar'ash is confirmed by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 498. See also LeStrange, Lands, 128–29.

they all decided to fight Qaḥṭabah. When word reached Qaḥṭabah of this, he went in and indiscriminately killed those whom I have mentioned.

When Naṣr b. Sayyār learned that Qaḥṭabah had killed Nubātah and a number of people of Jurjān, he was in Qūmis. He then moved to Khuwār of Rayy.[317]

Naṣr's reason for camping at Rayy according to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū Dhayyāl, Ḥasan b. Rashīd and Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jushamī: Abū Muslim sent a letter with al-Minhāl b. Fattān to Ziyād b. Zurārah al-Qushayrī with a deed of appointment to govern Naysābūr, after Tamīm b. Naṣr and al-Nābī b. Suwayd al-ʿIjlī were killed. He also wrote to Qaḥṭabah ordering him to pursue Naṣr. Qaḥṭabah then sent al-ʿAkkī with his vanguard, while he went to Naysābūr and stayed there for the months of Ramaḍān and Shawwāl 130 (early May to end of June 748). He was there while Naṣr was staying at a village in Qūmis called Badhash.[318] The Qaysīs with him stayed in [2017] another village, called Mumidd.[319] Naṣr then wrote to Ibn Hubayrah at Wāsiṭ asking him for aid, and sent the message with notables of Khurāsān to stress the importance of the matter. But Ibn Hubayrah threw his messengers in prison. Naṣr then wrote to Marwān, "I have sent some of the leading men of Khurāsān to Ibn Hubayrah to inform him on our behalf of the situation of the people there and to ask him for reinforcements. He has imprisoned my messengers and has not reinforced me with a single man. My situation is that of a man driven from his bedroom to his chamber, and from his chamber to his sitting-room, and from the sitting-room to the courtyard. If someone will come to him and help him, he may perhaps return to his house and it will remain his; but if he is driven from the house to the street, he will have neither house nor courtyard." Marwān wrote to Ibn Hubayrah ordering him to assist Naṣr, informing him of that. Naṣr then sent a letter to Ibn Hubayrah with Khālid the mawlā of the Banū Layth, asking him to send the army to

317. Khuwār of Rayy was the westernmost town of Qūmis, on the road from Khurāsān, and the first important town east of Rayy. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 479; also LeStrange, Lands, 367.

318. Badhash was the first village inside Jurjān on the post-road from Nīshāpūr (Nayṣābūr). Yāqūt states that it was two farsakhs (12 km) from Bisṭām. See also LeStrange, Lands, 368.

319. The text is al-Maydā, corrected by the Cairo edition. The vocalization is uncertain.

him quickly, "For I have lied to the people of Khurāsān until not a man among them will believe a word I say; so reinforce me with ten thousand men before you have to reinforce me with a hundred thousand, and after that nothing will be of use."

In this year Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān led the Pilgrimage. That is what is related by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Isḥāq b. ʿIsā—Abū Maʿshar (al-Sindī).

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik was governor of Mecca, Madīnah and Ṭāʾif.

Iraq was governed by Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah.

Al-Ḥajjāj b. ʿĀṣim al-Muḥāribī was in charge of the judiciary at Kūfah, and ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr at Baṣrah.

Naṣr b. Sayyār was governor of Khurāsān, but matters there were as we have mentioned.

The Events of the Year

131

(AUGUST 31, 748–AUGUST 19, 749)

[1/III]

One of the events of this year was that Qaḥṭabah sent his son al-Ḥasan to Naṣr while he was in Qūmis.[320]

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Zuhayr b. Hunayd, al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd and Jabalah b. Farrūkh al-Tājī: When Nubātah was killed, Naṣr moved from Badhash and entered Khuwār, whose governor was Abū Bakr al-ʿUqaylī. Qaḥṭabah sent his son al-Ḥasan to Qūmis in Muḥarram 131 (September 748), and after that he sent Abū Kāmil, Abū al-Qāsim Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm, and Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Marwazī to Ḥasan with seven hundred men. When they were close to him, Abū Kāmil ran away from them, left his camp, and went over to Naṣr informing him of the whereabouts of the officer who was leading them. Naṣr then sent troops against them and besieged them in the walled town where they were. Jamīl b. Mihrān then pierced the wall and fled with his followers, leaving part of their equipment which [2] Naṣr's followers seized, and which Naṣr sent to Ibn Hubayrah. ʿUṭayf[321] interfered in this at Rayy; he took Naṣr's letter and the

320. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 331ff; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 419; Dīnawarī, 362; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 410; Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 370.

321. Probably ʿUṭayf al-Sulamī sent by Marwān to join Ibn Hubayrah. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1945. He was now following the orders of Ibn Hubayrah, who would not help Naṣr.

booty from the messenger, and sent them on to Ibn Hubayrah. At this Naṣr was furious, and said, "Does Ibn Hubayrah want to play with me? Is he stirring up all the good-for-nothings of Qays against me? By God, I will surely have nothing to do with him. Let him fully understand that he is nothing, and neither is his son from whom great things are expected." He went on and stopped at Rayy, which was being governed by Ḥabīb b. Budayl al-Nahshalī. 'Uṭayf left Rayy as soon as Naṣr came there, for Hamadhān. Mālik b. Adham b. Muḥriz al-Bāhilī was at Hamadhān commanding the Ṣaḥṣaḥiyyah corps,[322] so when 'Uṭayf saw that Mālik was at Hamadhān, he turned away from there and went to 'Āmir b. Ḍubārah at Iṣbahān. 'Uṭayf had three thousand men with him, and Ibn Hubayrah sent him to Naṣr at Rayy. 'Uṭayf went to Rayy and stayed there, but did not go to see Naṣr. Naṣr stayed a couple of days at Rayy; then he fell ill and had to be carried on a litter until he reached Sāwah, near Hamadhān, and there he expired. When he died, his followers went on into Hamadhān. It is said that his death occurred on the twelfth of Rabī' I 131 (November 9, 748), when he was eighty-five years old.

It is also said that when Naṣr set out from Khuwār towards Rayy, he did not enter Rayy but stayed in the desert between Rayy and Hamadhān, and died there.

Returning to what 'Alī (al-Madā'inī) was told by his shaykhs: When Naṣr died, Qaḥṭabah's son al-Ḥasan sent Khāzim b. Khuzaymah to a village called Simnān[323] while Qaḥṭabah came up from Jurjān sending Ziyād b. Zurārah al-Qushayrī ahead of him. Ziyād regretted having followed Abū Muslim, and deserted Qaḥṭabah. He took the road to Iṣbahān, wishing to join 'Āmir b. Ḍubārah, but Qaḥṭabah sent al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr al-Ḍabbī after him, who caught up with him the next afternoon and fought him. Ziyād fled, and most of his followers were killed. Musayyab then returned to Qaḥṭabah and Qaḥṭabah went to Qūmis where his son al-Ḥasan was. Khāzim came forward from the direction in which al-Ḥasan had sent him, and Qaḥṭabah had his son advance to Rayy. News of [3]

322. This was apparently a regiment organized along the lines of the Dhakwāniyyah, perhaps by Muṣ'ab b. Ṣaḥṣaḥ (see Ṭabarī, II/3, 1945, 1980). They were Marwān's own men and 'Uṭayf was avoiding them as part of Ibn Hubayrah's plan to appear to be helping Naṣr without doing so.

323. Simnān later became an important town. It was situated on the Khurāsān road east of Khuwār. See LeStrange, Lands, 366.

al-Ḥasan's march reached Ḥabīb b. Budayl al-Nahshalī and the Syrian troops who were with him, so they left Rayy. Al-Ḥasan then entered the city and stayed there until his father joined him. Upon arriving at Rayy, Qaḥṭabah wrote to Abū Muslim, informing him that he was encamped there.

In the same year, Abū Muslim moved from Marw to Naysābūr and camped there.

Qaḥṭabah at Rayy and Abū Muslim at Naysābūr

When Qaḥṭabah wrote to Abū Muslim that he was encamped at Rayy, the latter left Marw, as we have mentioned, and settled at Naysābūr, where he dug a defensive trench. Qaḥṭabah sent his son al-Ḥasan on to Hamadhān three days after he himself had entered Rayy.

ʿAlī reports the following from his shaykhs and other authorities. When al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah set out for Hamadhān, Mālik b. Adham and the Syrians and Khurāsānīs who were with him there left for Nihāwand. Mālik summoned them to take their allowances, saying, "Let everyone who is registered in a diwān take his pay." At this, a great number of people left their registries and went away. Mālik positioned himself with those who stayed with him, Syrians and Khurāsānīs who had been with Naṣr b. Sayyār. Meanwhile al-Ḥasan marched from Hamadhān to Nihāwand and camped four *farsakh*s (24 km) from the city. Qaḥṭabah then reinforced him with Abū Jahm
[4] b. ʿAṭiyyah the mawlā of the (tribe of) Bāhilah and seven hundred men, so that he was now able to surround the city and lay siege to it.[324]

In this year ʿĀmir b. Dubārah was slain.

The Death of ʿĀmir b. Ḍubārah and the Reason For It

The reason for his slaying was that ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar fled toward Khurāsān when he was put to flight by Ibn Ḍubārah. He took his route by way of Kirmān, and ʿAmir b. Ḍubārah set off in pursuit of him. Meanwhile word reached Yazīd b. ʿUmar of Nubātah b. Ḥanẓalah's death in Jurjān.

---

324. For these events, see Akhbār al-Dawlah, 333–39.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū al-Sarī al-Marwazī, Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jushamī, al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd, Jabalah b. Farrūkh and Ḥafṣ b. Shabīb: When Nubātah was killed, Ibn Hubayrah wrote to ʿAmir b. Ḍubārah and to his son Dāwud b. Yazīd b. ʿUmar to march against Qaḥṭabah; they were both in Kirmān. They went with fifty thousand men and halted in (the oasis of) Iṣbahān at the city of Jayy.[325] People used to call Ibn Ḍubārah's army "the army of armies." Qaḥṭabah sent Muqātil (al-ʿAkkī) against him with Abū Ḥafṣ al-Muhallabī, Abū Ḥammad al-Marwazī the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym, Mūsā b. ʿAqīl, Aslam b. Hassān, Dhuʿayb b. al-Ashʿath, Kulthūm b. Shabīb, Mālik b. Ṭarīf, al-Mukhāriq b. Ghifar and al-Haytham b. Ziyād, with al-ʿAkkī in command. They marched to Qumm and halted there. Word reached Ibn Ḍubārah that al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah had camped among the people of Nihāwand, and he wanted to go to them and aid them. News of this reached al-ʿAkkī so he sent to inform Qaḥṭabah of it. Qaḥṭabah then dispatched Zuhayr b. Muḥammad to Qāshān[326] while al-ʿAkkī quit Qumm, leaving behind Ṭarīf b. Ghaylān. However, Qaḥṭabah wrote to al-ʿAkkī ordering him to wait until he could catch up with him and to then return to Qumm. Qaḥṭabah joined the latter's forces to his own. Then ʿĀmir b. Ḍubārah came against them—the distance between him and Qaḥṭabah's force was one farsakh (6km). ʿĀmir stayed there some days, and then Qaḥṭabah marched against his forces and the two armies met in battle.[327] Al-ʿAkkī, who had Khālid b. al-Barmak with him, commanded Qaḥṭabah's right wing, and ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Ribʿī al-Ṭaʾī, assisted by Mālik b. Ṭarīf, commanded the left wing. Qaḥṭabah had twenty thousand men and Ibn Ḍubārah a hundred thousand—it is even said he had a hundred and fifty thousand. Qaḥṭabah gave orders for a copy of the Qurʾān, which was fixed on a lance, and then proclaimed, "Men of Syria, we would call you to what is in this Book!" They then reviled him with foul language, so Qaḥṭabah sent the order, "Attack them!" Al-ʿAkkī attacked the Syrians and the forces rushed into combat. There was not much fighting before the Syrians were routed, suffering extensive casualties. [5]

325. For this city, see LeStrange, Lands, 203.

326. See LeStrange, Lands, 209.

327. That is, at the battle of Jābalq, a place in the district of Iṣfahān (Iṣbahān). See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 2. For the battle, perhaps the most important of the ʿAbbāsid revolution, see Akhbār al-Dawlah, 343ff; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 418ff; Azdī, 116.

Qaḥṭabah's forces took possession of their camp and obtained quantities of weapons, equipment and slaves that could not be reckoned. Qaḥṭabah sent word of the victory by Shurayḥ b. ʿAbdallāh to his son al-Ḥasan.

ʿAlī reported the following from Abū al-Dhayyāl: When Qaḥṭabah met ʿĀmir b. Ḍubārah (in battle) the latter had with him leading men from Khurāsān, including Ṣāliḥ b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Numayrī, Bishr b. Bisṭām b. ʿImrān b. al-Faḍl al-Burjumī, and ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Shammās al-Māzinī. Ibn Ḍubārah was commanding only cavalry while Qaḥṭabah had both horse and foot soldiers, so his men shot arrows at the horses, and Ibn Ḍubārah fled back into his camp. Qaḥṭabah pursued him, so Ibn Ḍubārah quit his camp and gave the call, "To me!" Nonetheless, his people fled and he was killed.

[6] ʿAlī reported the following from al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī: When Qaḥṭabah met Ibn Ḍubārah, Dāwud b. Yazīd b. ʿUmar fled. ʿĀmir asked about him and was told, "He's fled." At this, ʿĀmir exclaimed, "God has cursed our wickedness with this reversal!" Then he fought on until he was killed.

According to ʿAlī—Ḥafṣ b. Shabīb—an eyewitness with Qaḥṭabah: I've never seen any army that collected what the Syrians had collected at Iṣbahān in the way of horses, weapons and slaves. It was as if we had conquered a city. We obtained more guitars (barābiṭ), drums and flutes than one might count. There was not a tent or shelter that we entered in which we did not find a wineskin, be it large or small. Thus one of the poets said:

When we overthrew the chiefs of Muḍar,[328]
Qaḥṭabah cut them up a dry fare;

They called on Marwān as one calls on the Lord.

In this year befell Qaḥṭabah's battle at Nihāwand with the troops of Marwān b. Muḥammad who had taken refuge there. Also, it is said that the battle at Jābalq in Iṣbahān occurred on Saturday, the twenty-third of Rajab 131 (March 18, 749).

328. A line is missing in the text and is supplied by the Cairo edition.

Qaḥṭabah's Battle at Nihāward

ʿAlī reported the following from al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd and Zuhayr b. al-Hunayd: When Ibn Ḍubārah was killed, Qaḥṭabah wrote of it to his son al-Ḥasan[329] (at Nihāwand). When the letter arrived, he cried, "Allāhu Akbar!" and so did all his army. Then they shouted that Ibn Ḍubārah had been killed. At this, ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr al-Sughdī said, "These people would never shout about killing Ibn Ḍubārah unless it were true, so go out to Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah and his followers and don't stand about for them; leave any way you please before his father comes to him or sends him reinforcements." At this, the footsoldiers said, "You'll go out as cavaliers on horseback and then run off and leave us!" Then Mālik b. Adham al-Bāhilī said, "Ibn Hubayrah has written to me. I will not retreat until he comes [7] to me." At this, they stayed where they were, and Qaḥṭabah stayed at Iṣbahān for twenty days. He then moved to join al-Ḥasan at Nihāwand, where he besieged the city for some months. Then he offered the defenders a safe-conduct, but they rejected it, so he set up mangonels against them. When Mālik saw that, he sought a guarantee for himself and the Syrian troops, unbeknownst to the Khurāsānīs (in his forces). Qaḥṭabah gave him his guarantee, and kept his word. Not one of these men was killed, but all the men of Khurāsān who were in Nihāwand were slain except al-Ḥakam b. Thābit b. Abī Masʿar al-Ḥanafī. Among the people of Khurāsān who were killed were Abū Kāmil, Ḥātim b. al-Ḥārith b. Shurayḥ, the son of Naṣr b. Sayyār, ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr, ʿAlī b. ʿAqīl and Bayhas b. Budayl of the Banū Sulaym of the people of the Jazīrah, and a man of Quraysh known as al-Bukhturī who was a descendant of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb—some assert that the family of al-Kaṭṭāb do not recognize him—and Qaṭan b. Ḥarb al-Hilālī.

According to ʿAlī—Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam al-Hamadhanī—one of their mawlās: When Mālik b. Adham made terms with Qaḥṭabah, Bayhas b. Budayl said, "Ibn Adham has made peace at our expense, and by God we will surely murder him." The attackers from Khurāsān found that the gates had been opened for them, and they entered 329. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 336–38, 353–56.

the city. One of the Khurāsānīs with Qaḥṭabah then let him in [8] through a protective wall.

Other sources say that Qaḥṭabah sent to the Khurāsānīs inside Nihāwand inviting them to come out to him, and offered them a guarantee of safeconduct, but they refused. He then sent the same offer to the Syrian troops there, who accepted. They entered an agreement after they had been besieged for three months: Shaʿbān, Ramaḍān, and Shawwāl (April, May and June 749). The Syrians sent word to Qaḥṭabah, requesting him to keep the people of the city occupied so that they might open the gate unperceived.

Qaḥṭabah did this, keeping the people of the city busy in combat. Then the Syrians opened the gate that they were defending. When the Khurāsānī troops who were inside the city saw the Syrians going out, they asked what they were doing. The Syrians told them, "We have made terms for ourselves and for you." The Khurāsānī leaders (inside the city) went out to Qaḥṭabah, who put each one of them in the care of an officer from Khurāsān. Later he ordered his herald to proclaim, "Let everyone who has a prisoner from those who came out to us from the city cut off his head and bring it to me." They acted accordingly, and not one of those who had fled from Abū Muslim to the walled city remained alive, except for the Syrians. These he set free, exacting their promise not to conspire with the enemy against him.

Returning to the account of ʿAlī on the authority of his shaykhs: When the Syrians and Khurāsānīs who were in Nihāwand had let Qaḥṭabah inside the walls, ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmayr told them, "Woe to you! Now they enter the walls!" ʿĀṣim then went out. He had already put on his breastplate and a black garment he had. He was met by a Shākirī trooper who had been attached to him in Khurāsān, who recognized him and said, "You're wearing black now?" "Yes," he replied. At this, the Shākirī brought him to an underground conduit, and told a slave of his, "Watch over him, and let no one come upon him here." Then Qaḥṭabah ordered, "Whoever has a prisoner with him, bring him to me." At this the slave who was entrusted with ʿĀṣim said, "I have a prisoner that I fear will be taken from me by force." A man from the Yamanī troops heard this and said, "Let me see him." The slave showed ʿĀṣim to the Yamanī, and he recognized him. He went off to Qaḥṭabah and informed him, saying, "Here is one head of the tyrants!" Then Qaḥṭabah sent for ʿĀṣim and put him to death. But he kept his word to the men of Syria so that not a single one of them was killed.

According to 'Alī—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Khurāsānī and Jabalah b. Farrūkh: When Qaḥṭabah came to Nihāwand and al-Ḥasan was laying siege to it, Qaḥṭabah took charge and sent al-Ḥasan to Marj al-Qal'ah.[330] Al-Ḥasan sent Khāzim b. Khuzaymah on to Ḥulwān where 'Abdallāh b. al-'Alā' al-Kindī was governing, and 'Abdallāh fled the city leaving it unprotected. [9]

'Alī reported the following from Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm: When Qaḥṭabah conquered Nihāwand, people wanted to write to Marwān using Qaḥṭabah's name, and they said, "This is an abominable name; turn it around." It then came out "Habaṭḥaq." At this they said, "The first name, awful as it is, is easier than that." Hence they changed it back to Qaḥṭabah.[331]

Abū 'Awn's Battle at Shahrazūr

In this year occurred Abū 'Awn's battle at Shahrazūr. 'Alī reported the following from Abū al-Ḥasan and Jabalah b. Farrūkh: Qaḥṭabah sent Abū 'Awn 'Abd al-Malik b. Yazīd al-Khurāsānī and Mālik b. Ṭarīf[332] al-Khurāsānī with four thousand men to Shahrazūr, where 'Uthmān b. Sufyān commanded the advance forces of 'Abdallāh b. Marwān. Abū 'Awn and Mālik came up and camped two *farsakh*s (12 km) from Shahrazūr. They held their positions for a day and a night, and then fought 'Uthmān b. Sufyān on the twentieth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 131 (August 10, 749). 'Uthmān b. Sufyān was killed, and Abū 'Awn sent Ismā'īl b. al-Mutawakkil with the good news. Abū 'Awn then stayed in the area of Mosul.

Some say that 'Uthmān b. Sufyān was not killed but fled to 'Abdallāh b. Marwān, while Abū 'Awn decimated his army and killed an enormous number of his followers after a violent battle. It is said that Qaḥṭabah sent Abū 'Awn to Shahrazūr with thirty thousand men at the order of Abū Muslim himself. They also say that when news of Abū 'Awn's victory came to Marwān at Ḥarrān, he set out [10]

330. Marj al-Qal'ah (Castle Meadow) was two days travel from Ḥulwān on the way to Hamadān, in Jibāl. By the tenth century, it was a large and fine walled town. See LeStrange, Lands, 192.

331. His name was actually Ziyād. See EI^{2} s.v. Ḳaḥṭaba b. Shabīb.

332. Ibn Athīr has "Ṭarāfah."

from there with the troops of Syria, the Jazīrah and Mosul. The Umayyad family rallied their Abnā' to Marwān as he moved to meet Abū 'Awn, until he reached Mosul. He then began to dig a network of trenches, until he was encamped at the Greater Zāb river. Abū 'Awn stayed at Shahrazūr for the rest of the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 131 and Muḥarram 132 (August and early September 749), and he gave military pay to five thousand men.

Other Events

[11] This year Qaḥṭabah marched against Ibn Hubayrah. According to 'Alī—Abū al-Ḥasan, Zuhayr b. Hunayd, Ismā'īl b. Abī Ismā'īl and Jabalah b. Farrūkh: When Ibn Hubayrah's son fled to him from Ḥulwān, Ibn Hubayrah came out and gave battle to Qaḥṭabah. With him he had a great number of men that could not be reckoned, as well as Ḥawtharah b. Suhayl al-Bāhilī whom Marwān had sent to reinforce him. Putting Ziyād b. Sahl al-Ghaṭafānī in charge of his rear guard, Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah marched until he came to the battleground of Jalūlā'.[333] He dug in there, clearing out the old trench dug by the Persians at the Battle of Jalūlā'. Qaḥṭabah advanced until he came to Qirmāsīn.[334] He then marched to Ḥulwān and stopped in Khāniqīn. Then he left Khāniqīn, and Ibn Hubayrah left his position, returning to Daskarah.

Hishām reported the following from Abū Mikhnaf: Qaḥṭabah advanced, while Ibn Hubayrah was entrenching himself at Jalūlā', and then went up to 'Ukbarā' and crossed the Tigris, moving on until he stopped at Dimimmā below Anbār on the Euphrates.[335] Ibn Hubayrah and those with him then left to get to Kūfah before Qaḥṭabah. He stopped on the east bank of the Euphrates and sent on Ḥawtharah with fifteen thousand men to Kūfah (on the west bank and to the south). Qaḥṭabah crossed the Euphrates at Dimimmā so that he was on the west side and marched for Kūfah, until he reached the place where Ibn Hubayrah was.

This year the Pilgrimage was led by al-Walīd b. 'Urwah b. Muḥam-

333. A district and town in the Sawād of Iraq between Daskarah and Khānaqīn. It was famous as the site of a great battle won by the Muslims in 16 (637) against the Sasanians. See LeStrange, Lands, 62; EI[2] s.v. Djalūlā'.

334. See LeStrange, Lands, 186–87.

335. See LeStrange, Lands, 50; 65–66.

mad b. ʿAṭiyyah al-Saʿdī, of the Saʿd division of the tribe of Hawāzin, who was brother's son to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Muḥammad b. ʿAṭiyyah who killed Abū Ḥamzah al-Khārijī. Al-Walīd was governor of Madīnah on behalf of his uncle, as I have been told by Aḥmad b. Thābit—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar. Al-Wāqidī and others report the same.

It has also been reported that al-Walīd b. ʿUrwah was just outside Madīnah when Marwān wrote to al-Walīd's uncle ʿAbd al-Malik ordering him to lead the Pilgrimage though he was in the Yaman, busied as we have mentioned elsewhere.[336] When his uncle was detained, al-Walīd forged a letter from him deputing him to lead the Pilgrimage, and then led it. It has been mentioned that word reached al-Walīd b. ʿUrwah that his uncle ʿAbd al-Malik had been killed, whereupon al-Walīd went against those who had killed his uncle and slew a great number of them. He ripped open the bellies of their women and slew the male children, burning in fires all those who fell into his hands.

Al-Walīd b. ʿUrwah al-Saʿdī was governor of Mecca, Madīnah and Ṭāʾif this year in place of his uncle ʿAbd al-Malik b. Muḥammad. The governor of Iraq was Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah, while in Kūfah al-Ḥajjāj b. ʿĀṣim al-Muḥāribī was in charge of the judiciary. ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr al-Nājī was in charge of the judiciary in Baṣrah.

336. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 2014 sub anno 130. For his activities in the Yaman see FHA, 175ff.

The Events of the Year

132

(AUGUST 20, 749–AUGUST 8, 750)

[12] One of the events of this year was the death of Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb.[337]

The Death of Qaḥṭabah and the Reasons For It

The reason is as follows. When Qaḥṭabah stopped at Khāniqīn en route to Ibn Hubayrah, who was at Jalūlā', the latter moved from Jalūlā' to Daskarah. According to what is mentioned, Qaḥṭabah sent his son al-Ḥasan as a scout to learn news of Ibn Hubayrah. Ibn Hubayrah was returning to his trench at Jalūlā', and al-Ḥasan found him there, so he returned to his father and told him of Ibn Hubayrah's whereabouts.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Zuhayr b. Hunayd, Jabalah b. Farrūkh, Ismāʿīl b. Abī Ismāʿīl and al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd: When al-Ḥasan returned and informed his father concerning Ibn Hubayrah's activities, Qaḥṭabah asked his companions, "Do you know a road that will bring us to Kūfah bypassing Ibn Hubayrah?" Khalaf b. Muwarriʿ al-Hamadhānī, one of the Banū Tamīm, replied, "Yes, I will guide you." Qaḥṭabah crossed the Tāmarrā with him at Rūstuqbādh and took the main road until he halted at Buzurg Sābūr. Then he came to 'Ukbarā' and crossed the Tigris to Awānā.[338]

337. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 369–71; Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 422ff; Azdī, 118ff; FHA, 194-95; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh,, II, 412; Dīnawarī, 368; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 73.

According to 'Alī—Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd al-Khurāsānī: Qaḥṭabah camped at Khāniqīn when Ibn Hubayrah was at Jalūlā' with a distance of five *farsakh*s (30 km) between them. Qaḥṭabah sent out his scouts to gain information about Ibn Hubayrah, and they returned and informed him that Ibn Hubayrah had taken up a position. Qaḥṭabah then ordered Khāzim b. Khuzaymah to cross the Tigris. [13] Khāzim crossed over and proceeded between the Tigris and the Dujayl until he came to Karnabā.[339] Qaḥṭabah now wrote to Khāzim ordering him to march to Anbār (on the Euphrates) and send down to him whatever boats and craft he could find to cross with. Qaḥṭabah would then meet him at Dimimmā. He crossed the Euphrates in Muḥarram 132 (August–September 749). He sent the baggage into the open country while the horsemen proceeded with him along the bank of the Euphrates. Ibn Hubayrah now camped in the area of Upper Fallūjah[340] at the mouth of the Euphrates, twenty-three *farsakh*s (138 km) from Kūfah. Ibn Ḍubārah's fleeing men had gathered there with him and Marwān had reinforced him with Ḥawtharah b. Suhayl al-Bāhilī at the head of twenty thousand Syrian troops.

'Alī reported the following from al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd and Jabalah b. Farrūkh: When Qaḥṭabah left Ibn Hubayrah and marched on Kūfah, Ḥawtharah b. Suhayl al-Bāhilī and chiefs of the Syrian army told Ibn Hubayrah, "Qaḥṭabah has turned toward Kūfah. So you set out for Khurāsān and leave him to Marwān, and you'll break him; or more likely, he'll follow you." But Ibn Hubayrah replied, "That's not how I see it. He won't follow me and leave Kūfah, so the best thing is to beat him to Kūfah."

When Qaḥṭabah had crossed the Euphrates and marched along the 338. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 604 lists a Buzurjsābūr as one of the districts (tassūj) of Baghdad. Rustuqbādh was a district of Kūfah, see Yāqūt, II, 733–34. For 'Ukbarā', see LeStrange, Lands, 50. The course of his travels was northwest.

339. The Dujayl or "little Tigris" was also known as the Karun. See LeStrange, Lands, 232ff. The text has Kūthbā; read Karnabā as in Ms. B. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 268.

340. Upper and Lower Fallūjah were districts between the main stream of the Euphrates on the west and the Sūrā Canal on the east, after it bifurcated below the ruins of Babylon. See LeStrange, Lands, 74.

river bank, Ibn Hubayrah moved from his camp in the Fallūjah district. He put Ḥawtharah b. Suhayl in charge of his vanguard, ordering him to march to Kūfah, so both groups were marching along the banks of the Euphrates—Ibn Hubayrah between the Euphrates and the Sūrā branch, and Qaḥṭabah to the west, adjacent to the open country. Qaḥṭabah halted, and a bedouin crossed over to him in a skiff and greeted him peaceably. Qaḥṭabah asked, "What tribe are you from?" "From Ṭayy'," he replied. Then the bedouin said to Qaḥṭabah, "Drink of this water, and give me what you leave over to drink." Qaḥṭabah filled a bowl and drank, and gave the bedouin to [14] drink. Then the bedouin said, "Praise be to God, who has delayed my death until I beheld this army drink of this water!" "Is your thirst quenched now?" asked Qaḥṭabah. "Yes," replied the bedouin. "Then who are you from?" Qaḥṭabah asked him. "Of Ṭayy'," said the bedouin, "One of the Banū Nabhān." Qaḥṭabah then exclaimed, "My Imām has spoken truthfully. He said that I shall fight a battle on this river and have the victory. Brother of the Banū Nabhān, is there a ford in this place?" "There is, but I don't know it," said the bedouin. "I can show you who does: al-Sindī b. ʿAṣamm." Qaḥṭabah sent for this man, who came with his father and with help, and they showed him the ford. That evening they came against Ibn Hubayrah's vanguard, twenty thousand men led by Ḥawtharah.

ʿAlī reported the following from Shihāb al-ʿAbdī: Qaḥṭabah camped at Jabbāriyyah,[341] and he said, "The Imām has spoken truthfully to me. He informed me that the victory would occur in this place." He then paid the troops their allowances. The paymaster gave him back sixteen thousand dirhams, more or less, and said, "You'll do fine, as long as you're like this." The Syrian cavalry met him, and the bedouins had already showed him the ford, so he said, "I only wait for a holy month and the eve of ʿAshūrā'."[342] This was the year 132 (749–750).

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: Qaḥṭabah reached the site of a ford which had been mentioned to him at sundown on the night of Wednesday, the eighth of Muḥarram 132 (August 28, 749). When he came to the ford he rushed blindly forward with some of his men to attack Ibn Hubayrah, whose men turned and fled. Then they dismounted at the mouth of the Nīl Canal, while Ḥawtharah continued until he stopped at Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah.[343] At dawn the Khurāsānīs found that their commander was missing and reconciled themselves, and al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah took command of the army.

341. The text is unclear. The Cairo edition gives "al-Jabbāriyyah."

342. ʿAshūrā', the tenth of the "holy month" of Muḥarram, marked the anniversary of the slaying of the Prophet's grandson al-Ḥusayn by the Umayyad governor of Iraq at the Euphrates in the vicinity of Kūfah. See *EI*² s.v. 'Ashūrā' and al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī.

Going back to the account of 'Alī—Shihāb al-'Abdī: As for Qaḥṭabah's personal standard-bearer, his mawlā Khayrān or Yasār, Qaḥṭabah told him, "Cross over!" He said the same to his flag-bearer Mas'ūd b. 'Ilāj who was from the Bakr b. Wā'il. To his chief of security 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Rib'ī, called Abū Ghānim, a man of the Banū Nabhān of Ṭayy', he called out, "Cross over, Abū Ghānim, and bring us good news of the plunder!" A group crossed over until they numbered four hundred, whereupon they fought Ḥawtharah's troops until they denied them access to the water. They met with Muḥammad b. Nubātah's forces and fought them. They raised their torches, and the Syrian troops fled. The 'Abbāsid forces then found that Qaḥṭabah was missing, and they reluctantly acclaimed Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah as their leader. They appointed a man called Abū Naḍr with two hundred men to see after the baggage, and Ḥumayd pressed on until he came to Karbalā', then to Dayr al-A'war, then to 'Abbāsiyyah.[344] [15]

According to 'Alī—Khālid b. al-Aṣfaḥ and Abū al-Dhayyāl: Qaḥṭabah was found, and Abū al-Jahm buried him. Then a prominent man said, "If anyone knows of some testament of Qaḥṭabah, then let him inform us of it." Muqātil b. Mālik al-'Akkī said, "I heard Qaḥṭabah say, 'If anything happens to me, then al-Ḥasan is the army's commander.'" The army then gave its allegiance to Ḥumayd who accepted on behalf of al-Ḥasan, and they sent word to al-Ḥasan. The messenger caught up with him outside the village of Shāhī,[345] and al-Ḥasan came back. Abū al-Jahm gave him Qaḥṭabah's seal, and the 343. The government complex near the Sūrā Bridge midway between Kūfah and Baghdad. It is frequently confused with Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah. See Lassner, 'Abbāsid Rule, 283, n. 41.

344. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 644, lists Dayr al-A'war as a place adjacent to Kūfah. There were several places of that name, but none conveniently fit the topographical setting here. See Yāqūt, III, 600ff for Karbalā', the site of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī's death. See *EI*² s.v. Karbalā'.

345. A place near Qādisiyyah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 246.

army swore allegiance to him. Al-Ḥasan said, "If Qaḥṭabah is dead, I am Qaḥṭabah's son." On this night were slain Ibn Nabhān al-Sadūsī, Ḥarb b. Salm b. Aḥwaz and ʿIsā b. Iyās al-ʿAdawī and a man of the Asāwira[346] called Muṣʿab. Those who claimed to have killed [16] Qaḥṭabah were Maʿn b. Zāʾidah and Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn.

ʿAlī reported the following from Abū Dhayyāl: They found Qaḥṭabah slain in a ditch, with Ḥarb b. Salm b. Aḥwaz slain beside him, and they supposed that they had killed each other.

ʿAlī gives the following from ʿAbdallāh b. Badr: I was with Ibn Hubayrah on the night Qaḥṭabah attacked. They crossed over to us and fought us on a quay on which were five horsemen. Ibn Hubayrah sent Muḥammad b. Nubātah who engaged them in combat and we pushed them back some distance. Then Maʿn b. Zāʾidah struck Qaḥṭabah on the tendon of his shoulder, and the sword went deep. Qaḥṭabah fell into the water, and they pulled him out. He said, "Tie up my arm," and they tied it up in a turban. Then he said, "If I die, throw me into the water so that no one will know I've been killed." Then the Khurāsānīs returned the charge, and Ibn Nubātah and the Syrians were surrounded. They pursued us—one of the patrols on the flank had already been taken. A group of Khurāsānīs caught up with us, and we fought them a long time. Had it not been for two soldiers of the Syrian army who put up a terrific struggle on our behalf, we would not have been saved. Then one of the Khurāsānīs said in Persian, "Leave these dogs!" At this, they went away from us. Qaḥṭabah died, but before dying he said, "When you get to Kūfah, the Imām's wazīr is Abū Salamah. Put yourselves at his disposal." After that, Ibn Hubayrah went back to Wāsiṭ.

Other reports have been given of Qaḥṭabah's death than those we have mentioned from ʿAlī b. Muḥammad's shaykhs. One such account states that when Qaḥṭabah came up opposite Ibn Hubayrah on the west side of the Euphrates, with the river between them, he sent Ḥasan his son on with an advance force, and then ordered ʿAbdallāh al-Ṭāʾī, Masʿūd b. ʿIlāj, Asad b. al-Marzubān and their troops to cross the Euphrates on their horses. They crossed in the late afternoon. The first rider of Ibn Hubayrah's men they met was speared, and the others took flight, as far as the bridge over the Sūrā. Here 346. A Persian military unit that had become mawlās of the Tamīm. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 38, 237, n. 362.

Suwayd, Ibn Hubayrah's chief of security, opposed them, striking [17] the leaders and their mounts until he had forced them to retreat to their position at sundown. The Syrians pressed until they came up against Mas'ūd b. 'Ilāj and his men, a force that they outnumbered.

Then Qaḥṭabah ordered al-Mukhāriq b. Ghiffār, 'Abdallāh b. Bassām and Salamah b. Muḥammad, who were attached to a contingent of cavalry, to cross over and help Mas'ūd b. 'Ilāj. They crossed, and Muḥammad b. Nubātah came against them. He surrounded Salamah and those with him in a village on the bank of the Euphrates. Salamah and those with him dismounted, and the fighting grew hot. Muḥammad b. Nubātah would attack Salamah and those with him, and ten or twenty of Salamah's men would be killed. Then Salamah and his men would attack Muḥammad b. Nubātah and kill one or two hundred of his men. Salamah sent to Qaḥṭabah asking him for reinforcements, and he sent all his officers to reinforce him. Then Qaḥṭabah crossed over with his cavalry, ordering every horseman to carry a footsoldier with him. This was on the eve of the first Thursday of Muḥarram (August 25, 749). Then Qaḥṭabah attacked Muḥammad b. Nubātah and those with him. They fought a violent battle, and Qaḥṭabah put the enemy to flight, forcing them to retreat until they joined up with Ibn Hubayrah. He then fled as well, seeing the rout of Ibn Nubātah. The Syrians abandoned their camp and all that was in it in the way of wealth, weapons, furnishings, vessels and other things. The rout continued until they cut the pontoon bridge across the Ṣarāt Canal, and then, retreating all that night, they came at morning to the mouth of the Nīl Canal. When Qaḥṭabah's men greeted the morning, they had already noted that he was missing, but they kept on hoping to find him until the day was half spent. Then they gave up hope and realized he had drowned. The officers agreed on al-Ḥasan, his son, and put him in command and swore to follow him, whereupon he took charge. He ordered that what was in Ibn Hubayrah's camp be reckoned. He put the booty in charge of a Khurāsānī, called Abū al-Naḍr,[347] with two hundred horsemen and ordered that it be taken to Kūfah in boats. Al-Ḥasan moved on with the troops to camp at Karbalā', then moved again and stopped at Sūrā.[348] After that he halted at Dayr al-A'war, then [18]

347. The text is al-Naṣr; it should be read al-Naḍr, as in the Cairo edition.
348. That is, the settlement. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 184.

marched from there and settled at 'Abbāsīyyah. Ḥawtharah was informed of Ibn Hubayrah's flight, and he and such men as were with him joined Ibn Hubayrah at Wāsiṭ.

The cause of Qaḥṭabah's death, according to these authorities, was what Aḥlum b. Ibrāhīm b. Bassām the mawlā of the Banū Layth stated: When I saw Qaḥṭabah in the Euphrates, his horse had already carried him until he had nearly crossed over to the side where I was positioned with my brother Bassām b. Ibrāhīm who was in charge of Qaḥṭabah's vanguard. Then I thought of the sons of Naṣr b. Sayyār who had been slain, and of other things. I was apprehensive for my brother Bassām because of a report that had reached him about Qaḥṭabah, and I said, "May I never seek revenge again if you are spared this night." Bassām said, "Then go meet him." Qaḥṭabah's horse was about to emerge from the Euphrates, while I was standing on the bank. I struck him with my sword on the forehead. His horse reared and death came to him quickly, as he fell into the Euphrates with his weapons.[349]

A similar account was related by Ibn Ḥuṣayn al-Sa'dī after Aḥlum b. Ibrāhīm's death. Ibn Ḥuṣayn said of this, "Were it not that Aḥlum confirmed it as he was dying, I'd not have repeated anything about it."

This year Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Qasrī rebelled in Kūfah and put on black before al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah had entered the city. Ibn Hubayrah's governor left the city, and al-Ḥasan occupied it.[350]

Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Qasrī Revolts at Kūfah

Hishām reported the following from Abū Mikhnaf: Muḥammad b. Khālid rebelled in Kūfah on the eve of 'Ashūrā', while Zīyād b. Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥārithī was governing the city. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Bashīr al-'Ijlī was in charge of security for him. Muḥammad put on black and [19] marched to the fortress (qaṣr), and Zīyād b. Ṣāliḥ, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Bashīr al-'Ijlī and the Syrians they had with them moved out, aban-

349. Bassām had defected to Abū Muslim after first serving Naṣr in Khurāsān. He was to lead an uprising against the 'Abbāsids in 133 (749–750) at Tadmur. He had been in trouble with Abū Muslim for taking private revenge on members of the Bakr b. Wā'il. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1996.

350. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 371–73; FHA, 195ff; Azdī, 119ff; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 412–13.

doning the castle, which Muḥammad b. Khālid occupied. When he woke on Friday, the second morning after Qaḥṭabah's death, he learned that Ḥawtharah and those with him had camped at Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah,[351] and were getting ready to march against Muḥammad. Most of the common sort who were with Muḥammad split from him as soon as word reached them that Ḥawtharah was camped at Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah and was coming to fight him. The exceptions were some horsemen from the Yamanī cavalry drawn from those who had fled from Marwān, and Muḥammad's mawlās. Abū Salamah al-Khallāl, who had not yet declared himself, sent word to Muḥammad b. Khālid ordering him to go out of the castle and get to the lowlands of the Euphrates. He feared for Muḥammad due to the small number (of men) with him and the large number with Ḥawtharah—neither of the two groups had as yet learned that Qaḥṭabah had perished. Muḥammad b. Khālid declined to act until it was full day. Ibn Ḥawtharah prepared to march against Muḥammad when word reached him that few supported Muḥammad and that the common people had abandoned him. While Muḥammad was still at the fortress, one of his scouts came to him and said, "Horsemen are coming—Syrians." At this, he sent a detachment of his mawlās. They had positioned themselves at the door of the house of 'Umar b. Sa'd, when the Syrian standards came into view. They prepared to fight them, when the Syrians called out, "We are of Bajīlah![352] Malīḥ b. Khālid al-Bajalī is with us, and we've come to enter the service of the Amīr!" They then entered the fortress. Then came an even greater body of horsemen, with a man of the family of Baḥdal. When Ḥawtharah saw what his followers were doing, he and those with him left for Wāsiṭ. That night Muḥammad b. Khālid wrote to Qaḥṭabah, not knowing he had perished, informing him that he had prevailed in Kūfah. He dispatched the message with a fast rider who then came before al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah. When he handed him Muḥammad b. Khālid's letter, al-Ḥasan read it to his people, and then set out for Kūfah. Muḥammad stayed in Kūfah Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, and al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah came to him [20] early on Monday morning. They then went to Abū Salamah who 351. Not to be confused with Qaṣr b. Hubayrah, this government complex was situated adjacent to Kūfah. See n. 343 above.

352. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī had been of the tribe of Bajīlah. Hence the tribesmen now deserted to his son.

was with the Banū Salamah and brought him out. Abū Salamah camped at Nukhaylah for two days, and then set out for Ḥammām Aʿyan,[353] sending Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah to Wāsiṭ to fight Ibn Hubayrah.

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad reported the following from ʿUmārah, the mawlā of Jibraʾīl b. Yaḥyā: The Khurāsānīs took the oath to al-Ḥasan after Qaḥṭabah, and went to Kūfah which was commanded at that time by ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Bashīr al-ʿIjlī. A man of the Banū Ḍabbah came to him and said, "Al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah will enter today or tomorrow." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said, "You act as if you'd come to threaten me!" He then gave him three hundred lashes. Then ʿAbd al-Raḥmān fled, and Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Qasrī put on black. He came out with eleven men, called on the people to give their allegiance, and took control of Kūfah. Al-Ḥasan came in the next day. They had been asking on the way, "Where is Abū Salamah the wazīr of the family of Muḥammad staying?"[354] People guided them to him, and they came and stood at his door. He came out to them, and they presented him with one of Qaḥṭabah's horses, which he mounted and rode as far as the cemetery (jabbānah) of the Sabīʿ.[355]

The Khurāsānīs then swore allegiance to him. Abū Salamah Ḥafṣ b. Sulaymān the mawlā of al-Sabīʿ, who was called "wazīr of the family of Muḥammad," stayed where he was and appointed Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī to govern Kūfah, and he was called the Amīr until Abū al-ʿAbbās appeared.

ʿAlī reported the following from Jabalah b. Farrūkh, Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Marwazī, ʿUmārah the mawlā of Jibrīl, Abū al-Sarī and others who knew about the beginnings of the ʿAbbāsid propaganda: Abū Salamah sent al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah against Ibn Hubayrah at Wāsiṭ.[356] The officers he attached to his command included Khāzim b. Khu-

353. Ḥammām Aʿyan was actually located in Ḥīrah, the old Christian town that stood three farsakhs (18 km) from Kūfah. The area of Ḥīrah had enjoyed a revival in late Umayyad times when it actually became the government center of Kūfah. It was only natural, then, that the ʿAbbāsid armies would prefer to situate themselves in an established military camp some distance from the unruly population of Kūfah. Ḥammām Aʿyan functioned as the first of several ʿAbbāsid administrative centers in Iraq. See Lassner, ʿAbbāsid Rule, 143–51, especially 143–45, also n. 29. (J.L.)

354. Abū Salamah's role in what followed is discussed in detail by Sharon, ʿAlīyat, 237ff. See also Lassner, ʿAbbāsid Rule, 59–64, 145–47. (J.L.)

355. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 16–17.

356. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, II 424ff; Azdī, 125ff.

zaymah, Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-ʿAkkī, Khafāf b. Manṣūr, Saʿīd b. ʿAmr, Zīyād b. Mushkān, al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān, ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Muslim, ʿUthmān b. Nahīk, Zuhayr b. Muḥammad al-Azdī, al-Haytham b. Zīyād, Abū Khālid al-Marwazī and others; altogether sixteen officers, with al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah heading them. He sent Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah to Madāʾin with officers, including ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym and Masʿūd b. ʿIlāj, each officer accompanied by his men. In addition, Abū Salamah sent al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr and Khālid b. Barmak to Dayr Qunnā,[357] and al-Muhallabī and Sharāḥīl with four hundred men to ʿAyn Tamr. Bassām b. Ibrāhīm b. Bassām was sent to Ahwāz where ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah was. [21]

When Bassām got there, ʿAbd al-Wāḥid left Ahwāz for Baṣrah. Bassām then sent a letter with Ḥafṣ b. al-Sabīʿ to Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah (al-Muhallabī) appointing him to govern Baṣrah. Al-Ḥārith Abū Ghassān al-Ḥārithī, one of the Banū al-Dayyān who had some pretensions to being a soothsayer, said, "This appointment will not be carried out." Nonetheless Ḥafṣ forwarded the letter to Sufyān. Then Salm b. Qutaybah[358] fought Sufyān, and so his appointment came to nought.

Abū Salamah left where he was and camped at Ḥammām Aʿyan, some three *farsakh*s (18 km) from Kūfah, while Muḥammad b. Khālid resided in Kūfah.

The reason that Salm b. Qutaybah fought Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, according to what is mentioned, is that when Abū Salamah al-Khallāl assigned governors to the provinces, he sent Bassām b. Ibrāhīm the mawlā of the Banū Layth against ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah who was at Ahwāz, and Bassām fought him until he chased him out. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid then joined Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī in Baṣrah. Salm was governing for Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah. Abū Salamah wrote to al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah to send whomever he thought best among his officers to fight Salm. He wrote to Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah appointing him governor of Baṣrah and commanding him to proclaim there the claims of the Banū ʿAbbās in the city, to summon people to al-Qāʾim among them, and to [22]

357. Dayr Qunnā, also known as the Monastery of Marmarī, was just east of the Tigris above Dayr al-ʿAqūl, the "Monastery of the River Loop," with a town which was the chief place of the Middle Nahrawān district. Yāqūt states that it had over a hundred places for monks and high walls like a castle. See LeStrange, Lands, 36–37.

358. That is, the local governor of the Umayyads.

drive out Salm b. Qutaybah.[359] Sufyān wrote to Salm, ordering him to vacate the Government Palace, and informed him of what Abū Salamah had in mind, on the basis of reports he had received. However, Salm refused to comply and prepared his defense. All the Yamanīs rallied to Sufyān, with their allies among the Rabīʿah and others. One of Ibn Hubayrah's officers went over to him—Ibn Hubayrah had sent this officer with two thousand men of the Kalb tribe to assist Salm. They concurred on a plan to march on Salm b. Qutaybah, and Salm prepared for the battle. Rallying to Salm were the Qays and divisions of the Muḍar over whom he had control, as well as those Umayyads and their mawlās who were at Baṣrah. The Banū Umayyah hastened to come to his aid.

Sufyān advanced on a Thursday in the month of Ṣafar 132 (25 September or 2, 9, or 16 October 749). Salm came to the Mirbad of Baṣrah[360] and took his stand there at the camel-market. He sent horsemen on the Mirbad Road and other roads into Baṣrah, to encounter those whom Sufyān sent against him. He also proclaimed, "Whoever brings a head shall have a thousand." Muʿāwiyah b. Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah came with a special force of Rabīʿah, and the cavalry[361] of the tribe of Tamīm met him on the road which connects with (the settlement of) the Banū ʿĀmir from the Mirbad Road—at the house which became the property of ʿUmar b. Ḥabīb. One of the Tamīm speared Muʿāwiyah's horse, and it reared and threw him. At this, a man of the Banū Ḍabbah, called ʿIyāḍ, threw himself upon him and killed him, and he carried his head off to Salm b. Qutaybah, who gave him a thousand dirhams for it. Sufyān was shattered by the slaying of his son, and he and those with him retreated. He and the people of his house departed immediately and traveled to Qaṣr al-Abyaḍ,[362] and they occupied it. Then they moved from there to Kaskar.

After Salm got the upper hand at Baṣrah, Jābir b. Tawbah al-Kilābī 359. The term al-Qāʾim is a title for a promised deliverer, a "messianic" title. See Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, IV, 476, also above. The text has "yaqiya Salm," emended by the Cairo edition as yanfiya.

360. The Mirbad of Baṣrah was the famous caravan quarter at the western end of the city. See LeStrange, Lands, 45.

361. The text has rajul, emended by the Cairo edition as khayl.

362. The identification of this place is not given. It is not to be confused with locations of that name situated at Ctesiphon and in Fārs. This place was between Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ, the major city of the Kaskar district. For Kaskar, see LeStrange, Lands, 39.

and al-Walīd b. 'Utbah al-Firāsī, descendants of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah, advanced toward him with four thousand men. Ibn Hubayrah had written to them to go to the aid of Salm while he was at [23] Ahwāz. The next day Jābir and the men with him appeared at the dwellings of the Muhallab and the rest of the Azd. They attacked them, but the Azd who remained there fought them in a fierce battle until many of the defenders were slain. The Azd then fled, and Jābir and his followers took their women captive, destroyed the houses and plundered for three days. Salm stayed on at Baṣrah until he received word that Ibn Hubayrah was slain, whereupon he left the city. Then the descendants of al-Hārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib who were in Baṣrah gathered behind Muḥammad b. Ja'far and selected him as leader. He governed for a few days, until Abū Mālik b. 'Abdallāh b. Asīd al-Khuzā'ī came to Baṣrah on behalf of Abū Muslim and governed for five days. When Abū al-'Abbās became Caliph, he gave the city to Sufyān b. Mu'āwiyah to govern.

In this year the oath of allegiance was given to Abū al-'Abbās 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim on the eve of Friday, the thirteenth of Rabī' II (November 26, 749). This is according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone—Isḥāq b. 'Isā—Abū al-Ma'shar. Hishām b. Muḥammad said the same. As for al-Wāqidī, he says: Abū al-'Abbās had allegiance sworn to him as Caliph at Madīnah in Jumādā I 132 (December 6, 749–January 4, 750). Al-Wāqidī also says that Abū al-Ma'shar told him it was in the month of Rabī' I 132 (October 18–November 16, 749), and Abū Ma'shar is the trustworthy authority.

The Caliphate of Abū Al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās

The Origins of His Caliphate

According to what has been mentioned as coming from God's Messenger, may God bless him, it all began when he informed al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib that he would pass the caliphate to his descendants. His descendants therefore never stopped expecting it, and passed on the tradition among themselves. [24]

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Ismāʿīl b. al-Ḥasan—Rashīd b. Kurayb: Abū Hāshim (b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib) went to Syria and met Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās and said, "Cousin, I have religious knowledge ('ilm) which I shall leave to you by default. Do not divulge it to anyone; this authority which men long for will be in your family." He said, "I knew it already; by no means let anyone hear it from you!"

According to ʿAlī—Sulaymān b. Dāwud—Khālid b. ʿAjlān: When Ibn al-Ashʿath opposed al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf and the latter wrote of it to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, ʿAbd al-Malik sent a message to Khālid, son of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, informing him of developments. Yazīd replied, "If the rupture (fatq) is in Sijistān, then have no fear; we need only worry if it comes from Khurāsān."[363]

'Alī reported the following from al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd, Jabalah b. Farrūkh al-Tājī, Yaḥyā b. Ṭufayl Nu'man b. Sarī, Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī and others: The Imām Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās said, "There are three turning points for us: the death of the profligate Yazīd b. Mu'wiyah, the turn of the first century, and disruption in Ifrīqiyah. With that, propagandists will call men to our cause, then our helpers will advance from the east until the hooves of their horses strike the lands of the Maghrib and extract the treasures hidden there by tyrants." When Yazīd b. Abī Muslim was slain in Ifrīqiyah and the Berbers revolted, Muḥammad b. 'Alī sent a man to Khurāsān, ordering him to call men to the Chosen One, not mentioning any other name.

We have already mentioned the story of Muḥammad b. 'Alī and the propagandists whom he sent to Khurāsān.[364] Then Muḥammad [25] b. 'Alī died, appointing his son Ibrāhīm as his legatee. Ibrāhīm sent Abū Salamah Ḥafṣ b. Sulaymān the mawlā of al-Sabī' to Khurāsān, with letters to the naqībs there. They received his letters and Abū Salamah remained with them. Then he returned to Ibrāhīm, who sent him back (to Khurāsān) with Abū Muslim, whose story we have mentioned earlier. A letter from Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad to Abū Muslim then fell into the hands of Marwān b. Muḥammad. It was an answer to a letter from Abū Muslim, in which Ibrāhīm ordered him to kill everyone who spoke Arabic in Khurāsān. At this Marwān wrote to his governor in Damascus, ordering him to write to his colleague in the Balqā' to go to Ḥumaymah, seize Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, and send him to Marwān.[365]

---

363. This statement is typical of the many forebodings the Umayyads allegedly had of the revolt in Khurāsān and the coming of 'Abbāsid rule. These traditions were to establish the legitimacy of 'Abbāsid claims. The turn of the first Islamic century was to have ushered in the Messianic age. Various 'Abbāsid traditions deal with these expectations and tie them to the transfer of authority from Abū Hāshim to Muḥammad b. 'Alī. See Kūfī, Futūh, VIII, 153 and Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, IV, 476. A full study of these traditions is being prepared by J. Lassner. (J.L.)

364. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1358 sub anno 100.

365. The internment of Ibrāhīm al-Imām is a complex problem. Later 'Abbāsid tradition makes him out to be a revolutionary martyr. For a detailed discussion of his internment, death and succession, see Sharon, 'Alīyat, 237ff, which includes full references to primary sources. (J.L.)

According to Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Isā b. 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib—'Uthmān b. 'Urwah b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. 'Ammār b. Yāsir: I was with Abū Ja'far at Ḥumaymah and his two sons Muḥammad and Ja'far. I was bouncing them on my knee, when Abū Ja'far said, "What are you doing? Don't you see what's happening?" I looked, and there were the messengers of Marwān looking for Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad. I said, "Let me go out to them." He said, "You would go out of my house, and you're the descendant of 'Ammār b. Yāsir?"[366] They seized the doors of the mosque when (the 'Abbāsids) were at dawn prayer, and then said to the Syrians[367] who were with them, "Where's Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad?" They told them, "That's him there." And they took him. When Marwān had ordered them to seize Ibrāhīm, he had described the appearance of Abū al-'Abbās, as he found it in books that such a one would kill the Umayyads. When they brought him Ibrāhīm, Marwān said, "This is not the man I described to you!" They said, "We did not see such a one as you described." He sent them back to look for him, but the 'Abbāsids were warned and fled from him to Iraq.[368]

According to 'Umar—'Abdallāh b. Kathīr b. al-Ḥasan al-'Abdī—'Alī b. Mūsā—his father: Marwān b. Muḥammad sent a messenger to Ḥumaymah to bring him Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, describing him to him, and the messenger came and found that the description fitted Abū al-'Abbās 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad. When Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad appeared and was given safety, people told the messenger, "You were ordered to bring Ibrāhīm, but this is 'Abdallāh!" When this was made clear to him he let Abū al-'Abbās go, and he took Ibrāhīm and departed with him. Mūsā said, "We set out with him, I and a crowd of the Banū 'Abbās and their mawlās. The messenger went off with Ibrāhīm, who had with him a concubine (umm walad) of whom he was very fond. We told Ibrāhīm, "Only one man came for you, so come, let us kill him. Then we'll turn off [26]

366. 'Ammār had been the staunch supporter of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. His father, Yāsir, had been tortured by the Meccan ancestors of the Umayyads in the time of the Prophet. It was therefore not politic to be seen leaving the house of an 'Abbāsid to confront them. See EI[2] s.v. 'Ammār b. Yāsir.

367. Following the Cairo edition.

368. This is another of the apocalyptical traditions spoken of earlier. See n. 363 above.

for Kūfah where the people are our Shīʿah." He replied, "That's for you to do." We said, "Wait until we get to the road that takes us to Iraq." So we went on until we reached the fork where one road goes off to Iraq while the other goes on to the Jazīrah. Then we made camp. Whenever Ibrāhīm stopped for the night, he would withdraw to the place of his concubine. The time came for us to do what we had agreed on, and we called out to him to come. He got up to come out, but his concubine threw herself on him and cried, "This is no time for you to leave; what's making you go?" He went aside with her and explained to her, and she said, "I conjure you by God not to kill this man and bring misfortune on your family! By God, if you slay him Marwān will kill every member of the family of ʿAbbās in Ḥumaymah." She wouldn't let go of him until he'd sworn to her not to do it. When he came out to where we were and informed us, we said, "You know best."

ʿAbdallāh says that a son of ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Yaḥyā the secretary of Marwān told his father: "I asked Marwān b. Muḥammad, 'Are you suspicious of me?' 'No,' he replied. So I asked him, 'Is Ibrāhīm related to you by marriage?' 'No,' he said. I told him, 'Well, in my opinion this is what you must do—give him a wife and take a wife from him. Then if he is victorious you will have tied a knot between you that will not reduce you to beggary; and if you beat him, the marriage won't dishonor you.' He told me, 'Woe to you! By God, if I [27] knew he was the one [foretold] I'd hurry to do it, but he's not the man for that.'"

It is mentioned that when Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad was seized to be taken to Marwān, he foretold his death to the people of his house who accompanied his departure. He ordered them to go to Kūfah with his brother, Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad, and to hear and obey him. Then he bequeathed his authority to Abū al-ʿAbbās, appointing him as his successor. At this, Abū al-ʿAbbās set out with the people of his house for Kūfah. Among them were ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad and Dāwud b. ʿĪsā; Ṣāliḥ, Ismāʿīl, ʿAbdallāh and ʿAbd al-Ṣamad the sons of ʿAlī; Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad and ʿIsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī; ʿAbd al-Wahhāb and Muḥammad the two sons of Ibrāhīm; Mūsā b. Dāwud and Yaḥyā b. Jaʿfar b. Tammām. They traveled until they arrived in Kūfah in Ṣafar (ca. September 15–October 17, 750), and Abū Salamah put them up in the house of Walīd b. Saʿd, the mawlā of the Banū Hāshim, situated among the Banū Awd. He concealed their business for some forty nights from all the officers and the Shī'ah. According to what is mentioned, Abū Salamah wanted to change the succession to the family of Abū Ṭālib when word reached him of the death of Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad.

'Alī b. Muḥammad reported the following from Jabalah b. Farrūkh, Abū al-Sarī and others: The Imām came to Kūfah with some of the people of his House, and Abū al-Jahm said to Abū Salamah, "What is the Imām doing?" He replied, "He still has not come." But Abū al-Jahm pressed him until Abū Salamah said, "You ask too many questions. This is not the time for him to emerge." Finally Abū Ḥumayd met a servant of Abū al-'Abbās, called Sābiq al-Khuwārizmī, and asked him where his masters were. He informed Abū Ḥumayd that they were in Kūfah, and that Abū Salamah had told them to conceal themselves. At this he went with Abū Ḥumayd to Abū al-Jahm and informed him about the 'Abbāsids. Abū al-Jahm then sent Abū Ḥumayd with Sābiq to learn where they were staying in Kūfah, and he came back bringing with him Ibrāhīm b. Salamah, a man with the 'Abbāsid family. He told Abū al-Jahm about their lodging, that the Imām was staying among the Banū Awd, and that when they arrived the Imām had sent to ask Abū Salamah for a hundred dīnārs, but he had not sent the money. Then Abū al-Jahm and [28]
Abū Ḥumayd and Ibrāhīm went to Mūsā b. Ka'b and told him the story, and they sent the Imām two hundred dīnārs. Abū al-Jahm then went to Abū Salamah and questioned him about the Imām. Abū Salamah told him, "This is no time for him to come out, for Wāsiṭ has not been conquered."[369] Abū al-Jahm went back to Mūsā b. Ka'b and informed him, and they decided to meet the Imām. Then Mūsā b. Ka'b, Abū al-Jahm, 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Rib'ī and Salamah b. Muḥammad, Ibrāhīm b. Salamah and 'Abdallāh al-Ṭā'ī, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, Sharāḥīl, 'Abdallāh b. Bassām, Abū Ḥumayd Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, Sulaymān b. al-Aswad and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn all went to the Imām. Word of this got to Abū Salamah and he made inquiries about them and was told, "They rode to Kūfah on some errand they had."

The group came to Abū al-'Abbās, entered into his presence, and 369. That is, the Umayyad capital of Iraq held by Ibn Hubayrah, the governor of the province.

said, "Which of you is ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥārithiyyah?" "This one," the ʿAbbāsids said. The officers then saluted him as the Prophet's successor. Mūsā b. Kaʿb and Abū al-Jahm left the last, remaining with the Imām. Then Abū Salamah sent to Abū al-Jahm, asking, "Where have you been?" He replied, "I rode to my Imām." At this, Abū Salamah rode to the ʿAbbāsids. Abū al-Jahm then sent word to Abū Ḥumayd, "Abū Salamah is on his way to you. By no means let him go in to the Imām unless he is alone." So when Abū Salamah arrived they forbade him to go in accompanied by anyone. Thus he entered alone and greeted Abū al-ʿAbbās as successor of the Prophet.

On Friday, Abū al-ʿAbbās went out on a piebald horse, and prayed with the people.[370] ʿAmmār the mawlā of Jibraʾīl and Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Sulamī reported that when Abū Salamah greeted Abū al-ʿAbbās as Caliph, Abū Ḥumayd said to him, "He's Caliph in spite [29] of you, you mother-sucker!" And Abū al-ʿAbbās said, "Easy does it."

It is mentioned that when Abū al-ʿAbbās ascended the minbar on the day they swore allegiance to him as Caliph, he stood at the top, while Dāwud b. ʿAlī ascended and stood below him. Abū al-ʿAbbās spoke, and said:

> Praise be to God who has chosen Islam as the pillow of His glory, who has exalted it and made it great, who has chosen it for us, and aided it by means of us. He has made us the people of Islam, its cave and its fortress, and made us to uphold it, to protect it and support it. He has caused us to cleave to His word of piety, and deemed us worthy of that as the people of the Word. He has specified us as the kin of God's Messenger, God's benediction and peace be upon him and his family. He created us from the ancestors of the Prophet, causing us to grow from his tree, and be derived thereby from common origins, making him one of us, causing what distresses us to weigh heavy on him, and making him watchful over us, for with the faithful He is gentle, compassionate. God placed us in the exalted place with Islam and its folk, sending down to the people of Islam the written Word to be recited to them, for He has spoken—glorious is 370. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 424; Azdī, 123ff; FHA, 200ff; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 413; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 98ff.

He who speaks—in unambiguous verses sent down in the Qur'ān, "God only desires to put far from you abomination, O people of the house, and to cleanse you with purification".[371] He has said, "Say [O Muḥammad]: I ask not of you any wage for this save affection for the kinfolk."[372] He has said, "And warn your clan, your closest kin."[373] He has said, "Whatever spoils God has given His Messenger from the people of the towns is for God and for the Messenger, and the near kinsman, and orphans."[374] He has said, "Know that if you take anything as booty, one fifth of it is for God and for the Messenger and for the near kinsmen and for orphans".[375] So He, glorious be His praise, has informed them of our merit and made our rights and affection for us incumbent on them. He has bestowed upon us our share of the booty and the spoils in kindness toward us and in favor to us. God is the Lord of mighty favor.

The erring Sabā'iyyah[376] have asserted that others than we are more worthy of headship, authority, and the successorship than we; may their faces be struck by an evil eye! By what and [30] for what, ye people? By us God guided the people when they were gone astray, and caused them to see when they were ignorant, and delivered them after they had perished. By us He caused right to prevail, and through us refuted falsehood, setting aright by us the corrupt, uplifting by us the vile, completing by us what was defective, and joining together the separation. Thus after their enmity men became a family of mutual affection, kindness and solace in both their religion and their worldly affairs, "brothers reclining on couches face to face"[377] in their after-life. That is what God has opened up [for men] in grace and favor to Muḥammad, God bless him and give him peace. When God took him to Himself, his companions took on this authority after him, and their affair was by mutual counsel.

371. Qur. 33:33.
372. Qur. 42:23.
373. Qur. 26:214.
374. Qur. 59:7.
375. Qur. 8:41.
376. The followers of 'Abdallāh b. Sabā', the extremist whom enemies of the Shī'ah of 'Alī accused of founding the 'Alid doctrine in early Islam. See EI[2] s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Sabā'.
377. Qur. 15:47.

They took possession of the inheritance of the nations and distributed it justly, put it in its proper place, gave it to those entitled to it, and left with their own bellies empty. Then up reared the Banū Ḥarb and the Banū Marwān.[378] They took it away and passed it among themselves, and did battle for it, appropriating it to themselves, tyrannizing, oppressing those entitled to it; and God forbore with them for long, until they had afflicted Him; and when they afflicted Him, He took revenge on them at our hands. He restored to us our rights, and our Community became united through us. He vouchsafed our victory and established our authority in order to grant benefit through us to those grown feeble on the earth, closing an (epoch) with us as He had begun it with us. Most truly I hope that tyranny will not come upon you even as good has come, nor corruption overtake you as soundness has done. For what support have we, as People of the House, except in God?

People of Kūfah, you are the halting-place of our love, the lodging of our affections. You it is who remained steadfast, you who were not deflected from our love by the injustice of the people of tyranny against you until you reached our epoch and God brought you our revolution. You of all mankind are most fortunate in us and most worthy of our generosity. We have increased your allowances to a hundred dirhams. Make ready, then; for I am the manifest Spiller (Saffāḥ),[379] the desolating Avenger.

He had been exhausted by a fever, and his weakness now in-[31] creased. So he sat in the minbar, and Dāwud b. 'Alī went up and stood below him on the steps of the minbar and said:

Praise be to God, with gratitude, gratitude, and yet more gratitude! Praise to Him who has caused our enemies to perish and brought to us our inheritance from Muḥammad our Prophet, God's blessing and peace be upon him! O ye people, now are the dark nights of this world put to flight, its covering lifted; now light breaks in the earth and the heavens, and the sun rises from 378. The two branches of the Umayyad dynasty.

379. This sobriquet, which does not appear to be a regnal title, can mean either a spiller of wealth or of blood; a generous or an implacable ruler. During his lifetime the first 'Abbāsid caliph seems always to have been known as Abū al-'Abbās.

the springs of day while the moon ascends from its appointed place. He who fashioned the bow takes it up, and the arrow returns to him who shot it. Right [to rule] has come back to where it originated, among the people of the house of your Prophet, people of compassion and mercy for you and sympathy toward you. O ye people, by God we did not rebel seeking this authority to grow rich in silver and in gold; nor to dig a canal or build a castle. What made us rebel was the shame of their taking away our rights, our anger for our cousins,[380] our grief for your affairs and the burden that oppressed us for your sakes. It was for your situation that we burned in anger on our beds, and the evil conduct of the Banū Umayyah toward you increased our pain: their coarseness with you, their contempt for you, their appropriation of your booty, your alms and your spoils. You are under the protection of His Messenger, may God bless him and his family and give them peace, and the protection of 'Abbās, may God have mercy on him. We shall rule you according to what God has sent down and treat you in accordance with the Book of God, and act with the commoner and the elite among you according to the behavior of God's messenger. Woe, woe to the Banū Ḥarb b. Umayyah and the Banū Marwān! In their space and time they preferred the ephemeral to the eternal, the transient abode to the everlasting one. Crime them obsessed; God's creatures they oppressed; women forbidden to them they possessed, all honor grieving and by sin deceiving. They tyrannized God's servants by their deport with evil custom where they sought disport; themselves with vice's burdens decked and their idolatry unchecked; at management of every fault most lively, cheerful; withal to race on error's course not fearful; God's purpose in respiting sin not comprehending and trusting they had tricked Him by pretending![381] God's severity came on [32] them like a night raid when they were sleeping, and at dawn

380. That is, the 'Alids. The 'Abbāsids professed to avenge the wrongs against their kinsmen, while at the same time denying them any prior right to rule.

381. According to the Qur'ān, God permits sinners to flourish, so as to increase their guilt. See 17:15–19; 57:20; 35:39. This section of rhymed prose, generally intended to denigrate Umayyad rule, is a rhetorical flight which can be only approximately translated.

they were only legends. They were torn all to tatters, and thus may an oppressive people perish!

God has let us prevail over Marwān, for by God he was deceived with delusions, an enemy of God given the rein until he should stumble because of the superiority of his harness; for this enemy of God supposed that we should never prevail over him. He called upon his factions, employed all his stratagems and threw in his squadrons. Yet he found before him, behind him, and to his right and left, God's stratagem, His affliction and His judgment, to put to death his falsehood and efface his error. It was He who appointed the changes of ill-fortune for him, and revived our honor and our glory, returning to us our rights and our heritage.

O ye people, God has indeed helped the Commander of the Faithful to a mighty victory, but he turned to the minbar only after the prayer, for he hated to mix aught else with the congregation's words [with God], and only the severity of his fever deterred him from finishing his remarks. So call upon God to restore the Commander of the Faithful's health; for God has given you an exchange for Marwān, the enemy of the Merciful, the vice-regent of Satan, followed by base folk who corrupted the world when once it was wholesome, who replaced the true religion and violated the honor of the Muslims' protected women. [God has replaced him] with a youthful man of maturity and deliberation, one who is guided by his forefathers, those just and best who made the earth wholesome once it was corrupted, by following the waymarks of guidance and the well-traced road of piety.

The people then raised their voices in prayers for Abū al-ʿAbbās, and Dāwud continued:

Men of Kūfah, surely we continued wronged and bereft of our rights, until God ordained for us our Shīʿah, the people of Khurāsān, and by them revivified our rights. By them He adduced our compelling argument, and made our revolution to prevail. God has let you behold what you were awaiting, and now you look upon him. He has made manifest among you a Caliph of the clan of Hāshim, brightening thereby your faces and making you [33] to prevail over the army of Syria, and transferring the sovereignty and the glory of Islam to you. He has graced you with an Imām whose gift is equity, and granted him good government. Receive with gratitude what God has given you, cleave to our allegiance, and practice not deceit against yourselves, for surely this authority is your authority; surely every dynasty has its center-point, and you are our center-point.[382] Has any successor to God's Messenger ascended this your minbar save the Commander of the Faithful 'Alī b. Abī Tālib and the Commander of the Faithful 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad?[383]

and he gestured with his hand toward Abū al-'Abbās

So know that the authority is with us, and shall not depart from us until we surrender it to Jesus the son of Mary[384]—God's benediction be on him—and praise be to God, Lord of the universe, for that with which He has tried us and entrusted us!

Then Abū al-'Abbās descended from the minbar, with Dāwud b. 'Alī in front of him until they entered the palace. He had Abū Ja'far sit and receive the handclasp of allegiance (bay'ah) from the people in the mosque. He kept on receiving it until he had prayed both the afternoon and the sunset prayer with them and night had enfolded them. Then he entered (the palace).

It is mentioned that when Dāwud b. 'Alī and his son Mūsā were in Iraq, or somewhere else, they had left wishing to reach Sharāt. Abū al-'Abbās met them at Dūmat al-Jandal while on his way to Kūfah. With him were his brother Abū al-Ja'far 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad, 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, 'Isā b. Mūsā, and Yaḥyā b. Ja'far b. Tammām b. al-'Abbās and a party of their mawlās. Dāwud asked them, "Where are you going, and what is your story?" Abū al-ʿAbbās told him their story, and said that they were heading for Kūfah to make their appearance there and openly proclaim their authority. Dāwud told him, "Abū al-ʿAbbās, you are coming to Kūfah when the shaykh of the Umayyads, Marwān b. Muḥammad, is at Ḥarrān to oversee Iraq along with the armies of Syria and the Jazīrah. And Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah, the shaykh of the Arabs, is already in Iraq with the cavalry[385] of the Arabs!" Abū al-ʿAbbās replied, "O uncle,[386] Abū al-[34] Ghanā'im says, 'He who loves life will be humbled.'" And he quoted the words of al-Aʿshā:

382. This reference to Kūfah was hardly reflected by 'Abbāsid practice. They immediately withdrew to Ḥīrah and eventually established their administrative center at a new capital, Baghdad. See n. 353 above.

383. The question has a twofold thrust: that all caliphs between 'Alī and Abū al-'Abbās were in fact illegal usurpers, and that there is a special relationship between the Kūfans and the Prophet's family.

384. That is, at the Messianic age which will precede the end of the world. According to one ḥadīth, "There will be no Mahdī but Jesus." This is preserved only in Sunnī collections of ḥadīths, however. The 'Alid Shī'ī sects emphasize the Mahdist ḥadīths which state that the Messianic rule of justice will be fulfilled by a Mahdī of the line of 'Alī. This statement therefore rejects the claims of the 'Alids and suggests that the 'Abbāsids are ushering in a messianic age which will see the second coming of Jesus. For a detailed treatment of Mahdism see J.A. Williams, Themes of Islamic Civilization, Ch. V, "The Expected Deliverer."

'Tis no kind of death if I die not powerless, and a shame if what destroys a life is not its own demon.

Then Dāwud turned to his son Mūsā and said, "By God, your cousin's right, so let us go back with him and either live graciously or die nobly." At this they all turned back together. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā used to say when he mentioned their exodus from Ḥumayah to Kūfah, "A party of fourteen men left their homes and families to stake our claim; mighty was their purpose, great were their spirits, and strong their hearts."

The Remaining Reports of Events of this Year

Completion of the account of the oath of allegiance that was given to Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, and what came of his authority: As Abū Jaʿfar said, we have previously mentioned [information] concerning Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī on the authority of certain scholars. We have also mentioned something of his affair and that of Abū Salamah. A reason that the Caliphate of Abū al-ʿAbbās was confirmed is what I now mention. When word reached Abū Salamah that Marwān b. Muḥammad had killed Ibrāhīm, who had been called the Imām, he thought it proper to declare for the descendants of ʿAbbās. Thus he suppressed any declaration for others. When Abū al-ʿAbbās arrived in Kūfah, Abū Salamah had settled him and the people of his house who came with him in the house of al-Walīd b. Sa'd among the Banū Awd. When Abū Salamah was asked about the Imām, he would say, "Don't be hasty." This situation continued while he was at his camp at Ḥammām A'yan, until Abū Ḥumayd went out to go to the Kunāsah[387] and met a servant of Ibrāhīm called Sābiq al-Khwārizmī. He recognized him, for he used to come to them in Syria. Now he asked him, "What is the Imām Ibrāhīm doing?" Sābiq then informed him that Marwān had treacherously slain him and that Ibrāhīm had bequeathed his authority to his brother Abū al-'Abbās, appointing him as his successor. Moreover, Abū al-'Abbās had come to Kūfah with most of the people of his family. Abū Ḥumayd begged Sābiq to set off with him to the 'Abbāsids. Sābiq told him, "The appointment between us is tomorrow morning in this place;" he was reluctant to show him where the 'Abbāsids were without their permission. The following day, Abū Ḥumayd went out to the place where he had promised to meet Sābiq. He found him, and went off with him to Abū al-'Abbās and the men of his family. When he entered where they were, Abū Ḥumayd asked, "Which of them is the Caliph?" Then Dāwud b. 'Alī said, "Here is your Imām and Caliph," pointing to Abū al-'Abbās. Abū Ḥumayd then greeted him with the title of Caliph, and kissed his hands and his feet, saying, "We are at your command." He also condoled with him on the death of the Imām Ibrāhīm. [35]

385. The text is ḥalbah, "fast horses," Perhaps read jillah, "great men," as in Akhbār al-Dawlah, 410–11.

386. The text is fa-qāla Abū al-Ghanā'im. Ibn Athīr supplies fa-qāla yā ʿammī.

Ibrāhīm b. Salamah had entered the army of Abū Salamah in disguise. He went to Abū al-Jahm and asked him for protection. Then he informed him that he was the messenger of Abū al-'Abbās and the people of his house. He also told him who was in the group and where they were. He added that Abū al-'Abbās had sent him to Abū Salamah to ask him for a hundred dīnārs with which to pay the cameldriver for the camels that brought them to Kūfah, but Abū Salamah had not sent them the money. Abū Ḥumayd also went back to Abū al-Jahm and informed them of their situation. Abū al-Jahm and Abū Ḥumayd together with Ibrāhīm b. Salamah went on foot until they entered where Mūsā b. Ka'b was. Abū al-Jahm told him the story, and what Ibrāhīm b. Salamah had related to him. Mūsā then said, "Hasten to send him the dīnārs, and see that the man gets there." So Abū al-Jahm went off and handed the money over to Ibrāhīm b. Salamah. He put him on a mule and sent two men with him to see him into Kūfah. Then Abū al-Jahm told Abū Salamah, "It is rumored in the army that Marwān b. Muḥammad has slain the Imām. If he has been slain, then his brother Abū al-ʿAbbās [36] is the successor and the Imām after him." Abū Salamah replied, "Abū al-Jahm, stop Abū Ḥumayd from entering Kūfah, for these people spread falsehood and corruption."

387. One of the major quarters of Kūfah on the western side of the town. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Kunāsah, and LeStrange, Lands, 75.

On the second night, Ibrāhīm b. Salamah came to Abū al-Jahm and Mūsā b. Kaʿb and delivered to them a letter from Abū al-ʿAbbās and the people of his family. He visited the officers and the Shīʿah that same night. They then gathered in the house of Mūsā b. Kaʿb. Among them were ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Ribʿī, Salamah b. Muḥammad, ʿAbdallāh al-Ṭāʾī, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, Sharāḥīl, ʿAbdallāh b. Bassām and other officers. They disagreed as to whether to go see Abū al-ʿAbbās and those of his family. Then they stole away the next morning into Kūfah, led by Mūsā b. Kaʿb, Abū al-Jahm and Abū Ḥumayd al-Ḥimyarī—that is, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm. They came at last to the house of al-Walīd b. Saʿd, and went in. Mūsā b. Kaʿb and Abū al-Jahm said, "Which of you is Abū al-ʿAbbās?" At this the people pointed him out. They then wished him peace and condoled with him on the death of the Imām Ibrāhīm. Afterward they went off to the camp leaving behind with him Abū Ḥumayd, Abū Muqātil, Sulaymān b. al-Aswad, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥārith, Nahār b. Ḥusayn, Yūsuf b. Muḥammad and Abū Hurayrah Muḥammad b. Farrūkh.

Abū Salamah then sent to Abū al-Jahm to come to him. The latter had let him know that he had gone into Kūfah. "Where were you?" Abū Salamah asked. "I was with my Imām," Abū al-Jahm replied. Abū al-Jahm went out and called Ḥājib b. Ṣaddān and sent him to Kūfah, saying, "Go in and salute Abū al-ʿAbbās as Caliph." He sent word to Abū Ḥumayd and his friends, "If Abū Salamah comes to you, let him in only by himself. If he enters and offers allegiance, then let him go his way; otherwise, cut off his head." They had not waited long before Abū Salamah came, went in by himself, and greeted Abū al-ʿAbbās with the title of Caliph. Abū al-ʿAbbās or-[37] dered him to go back to his camp, and he went off that night. The people waited for morning wearing their weapons and in formation, waiting for Abū al-ʿAbbās to emerge. They gave him horses, and he and the members of his family who were with him rode until they entered the governor's palace of Kūfah on Friday, the twelfth night of Rabīʿ II (November 28, 729). He then entered the mosque from the govenor's palace and went up into the minbar, where he praised God and magnified Him, mentioning the mightiness of the Lord and the excellence of the Prophet. He then traced authority to the rule and the succession (to the Prophet) down to himself. He promised the people good times to come, and then was quiet.

Dāwud b. ʿAlī who was in the minbar three steps lower than Abū al-ʿAbbās then spoke. He praised God and glorified Him and spoke benedictions on the Prophet. Then he said, "Ye people, truly there has been no Caliph after God's Messenger save ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and this Commander of the Faithful who now sits behind me." Abū al-ʿAbbās then came down and left. He made his camp at Ḥammām Aʿyan in the camp of Abū Salamah, staying with him in the same chamber, with a curtain between them. The chamberlain (ḥājib) of Abū al-ʿAbbās at this time was ʿAbdallāh b. Bassām. Abū al-ʿAbbās left his paternal uncle Dāwud b. ʿalī to govern Kūfah and its province and sent his uncle ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī to Abū ʿAwn b. Yazīd. He sent his nephew ʿĪsā b. Mūsā to al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah who was at this time at Wāsiṭ besieging Ibn Hubayrah. He also sent Yaḥyā b. Jaʿfar b. Tammām b. ʿAbbās to Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah at Madāʾin, Abū al-Yaqdhān ʿUthmān b. ʿUrwah b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār b. Yāsir to Bassām b. Ibrāhīm b. Bassām at Ahwāz, and Salamah b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān to Mālik b. Ṭarīf.[388] Abū al-ʿAbbās stayed with the army for some months, and then moved and settled at (the new) Hāshimite City (Madīnah al-Hāshimiyyah) in the fortress at Kūfah.[389] He had disguised his intention to Abū Salamah before he moved, until Abū Salamah learned of it.

In this year, Marwān b. Muḥammad was put to flight at the Zāb.[390] [38]

388. The ʿAbbāsid family thus began the transition from a secretive revolutionary leadership into a ruling family. See Lassner, ʿAbbāsid Rule, 7ff. (J.L.)

389. This appears to be a broken text. It is hard to believe that Abū al-ʿAbbās would have chosen to establish his government in the city itself. He had, in similar circumstances, abandoned the Kūfans and gone to Ḥammām Aʿyan. It is more likely that what was originally intended was a place in the general vicinity of Kūfah. The text apparatus suggests such a reading. See Lassner, ʿAbbāsid Rule, 152–53. (J.L.)

390. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 427ff; Azdī, 126ff; FHA, 201ff; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 413ff; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 85ff; Tanbīh, 327.

Marwan's Defeat at the Zāb and Why and How it Came

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū al-Sarī, Jabalah b. Farrūkh, al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd, Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Marwazī and others: Abū ʿAwn ʿAbd al-Malik b. Yazīd al-Azdī was sent by Qaḥṭabah to Shahrazūr from Nihāwand. He then slew ʿUthmān b. Sufyān and stayed in the neighborhood of Mosul. Marwān was informed that ʿUthmān had been killed, and he advanced from Ḥarrān. He stayed at a place along the way, and asked, "What's the name of this place?" "Balwā [Calamity]," they told him. "Bal ʿAlwā [Nay, Superiority]; a good omen," he replied. He came to Ra's al-ʿAyn,[391] then to Mosul. Camping at the Tigris, he dug a moat. Abū ʿAwn marched to him and camped at the Zāb, and Abū Salamah sent Abū ʿAwn, ʿUyaynah b. Mūsā, Minhāl b. Fattān and Isḥāq b. Ṭalḥah, each at the head of three thousand men. When Abū al-ʿAbbās was proclaimed Caliph, he reinforced Abū ʿAwn sending Salamah b. Muḥammad with two thousand men, ʿAbdallāh al-Ṭāʾī with two thousand, and Wadās b. Naḍlah with five hundred. Then he asked, "Who among the men of my house will march against Marwān?" ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī said, "I." And Abū al-ʿAbbās told him, "Go with God's blessing."[392] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī came up with Abū ʿAwn, and Abū ʿAwn vacated his own pavilion, leaving it and all that was in it for ʿAbdallāh. The latter now appointed Ḥayyāsh b. Ḥabīb al-Ṭāʾī in charge of security and Nuṣayr b. al-Muḥtafiz in charge of his guard. Abū al-ʿAbbās put Mūsā b. Kaʿb in charge of the postal intelligence (barīd)[393] and sent him with thirty men to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī. On the second night of [39] Jumāda II 132 (January 16, 750), ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī asked where there was a ford of the Zāb, and one was pointed out to him. He gave the order to ʿUyaynah b. Mūsā, who crossed over with five thousand men and proceeded to Marwān's camp. Marwān gave battle until evening fell and fires were lit. They broke off fighting and ʿUyaynah returned to the camp of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, crossing the river at the

391. For Ra's al-ʿAyn, see LeStrange, Lands, 95–96.

392. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī later based his claims to the caliphate on having taken the field against Marwān. See Ṭabarī, III/1, 92–93; Azdī, 163ff; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 438–39; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 177.

393. The posting system existed primarily for getting information to the Caliph with maximum efficiency. The "postmaster" in each province operated as the eyes and ears of the Caliph, and controlled the system by which information was carried by post horses to the capital. See *EI*² s.v. Barīd.

ford. Upon rising in the morning, Marwān secured the pontoon bridge and sent his son ʿAbdallāh to dig a moat further downriver from the camp of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī. At this, ʿAbdallāh sent al-Mukhāriq b. Ghifār with four thousand men. He advanced five miles from ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī before halting. ʿAbdallāh b. Marwān sent al-Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah against him. Al-Walīd engaged al-Mukhāriq, whose followers were put to flight or captured, and a good number of them were killed that day. Al-Walīd sent the prisoners to ʿAbdallāh, who sent them on to Marwān with the heads. Marwān ordered, "Send in one of the prisoners to me." They brought him al-Mukhāriq, who was a very thin man. Marwān said, "You're al-Mukhāriq." But he told him, "No, I am one of the slaves of the people of the army." "Then do you know al-Mukhāriq?" asked Marwān. "Yes," he said. "Then look at these heads—do you see him?" He looked at one of the heads and said, "He's the one." Then Marwān let him go. At the time, a man who was with Marwān stared at al-Mukhāriq and, not knowing him, said, "God curse Abū Muslim for bringing such as these to do battle with us!"

ʿAlī heard the following from a shaykh of the people of Khurāsān: Marwān said, "Do you know al-Mukhāriq when you see him? They say that his is among these heads that were sent to us." "I know him," al-Mukhāriq told him. Then Marwān said, "Show him those heads." And he looked and said, "I don't see his head among these. I can only suppose he escaped." Then they let him go. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī learned of the rout of al-Mukhāriq, and Mūsā b. Kaʿb told him, "Go out to Marwān before news of the rout reaches the army and what happened to al-Mukhāriq becomes widely known." ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī called Muḥammad b. Ṣūl and put him in charge of the army. [40]
Abū ʿAwn had command of the right wing, and in command of Marwān's left wing was al-Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah. With Marwān were three thousand of the Muḥammirah,[394] and he had with him the Dhakwāniyyah, the Ṣaḥṣaḥiyyah, and the Rāshidiyyah. When the two armies were face to face, Marwān told ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿUmar b.

394. Literally, "Redwearers." Later this word is used for Iranian heretics with Mazdakite doctrines. However, the later Qays faction of Greater Syria used red as their distinctive color. See e.g., *EI*² s.v. Ḳays ʿAylān. The "Muḥammirah" appear here as one of several elite regiments that served the last Umayyad Caliph, For colors as political tags, see the article of Omar cited in n. 72. See also Crone, Slaves on Horses, 241, n. 93.

ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, "If the sun declines today before they have fought us, then it is we who shall yield up rule to Jesus the son of Mary; if they fight us before it declines, then we are God's, and to Him we shall return!"[395]

Marwān sent to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī asking for terms, and ʿAbdallāh said, "Ibn Zurayq[396] lied; God willing, before the sun declines our horses shall have trampled him." Marwān told the Syrians, "Hold off, and do not begin battle," while he kept looking at the sun. Then al-Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah b. Marwān (b. al-Ḥakam), who was married to Marwān's daughter, attacked. At this, Marwān became furious and cursed him. Ibn Muʿāwiyah fought the troops of the (ʿAbbāsid) right wing, and Abū ʿAwn fled toward ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī. Then Mūsā b. Kaʿb said to ʿAbdallāh, "Order the troops to dismount." At this the cry went out, "To the ground!" The troops dismounted and extended their lances while crouched. Then they engaged the enemy. The Syrians began to pause, as if they were quitting, and ʿAbdallāh went along on foot, saying, "Lord, how long shall we be slain for your sake?" He called out, "Men of Khurāsān! Revenge for Ibrāhīm! Yā Muḥammad! Yā Manṣūr!"[397] And the battle grew fiercer. Marwān shouted to the Qudāʿah, "Dismount!" They replied, "Say it to the Banū Sulaym; let them dismount!" He sent word to the Saksakīs, "Attack." They replied, "Tell the Banū ʿĀmir; let them attack." He then sent word to the Sakūn, "Charge!" They said, "Tell the Ghaṭafān; let them charge." He told his chief of security, "Dismount!" The man replied, "No, by God, I'll never make myself a [41] target!" Marwān told him, "Well, by God, I'll surely cause you harm!" He replied, "By God, I wish you were able!" The Syrians fled, and then Marwān fled too, cutting the pontoon bridge. More were drowned that day than were slain in battle. Among those drowned was Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik (the deposed Caliph). At ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's command the pontoon bridge over the Zāb was retied, and they took out the drowned—some three hundred—among whom were Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī then recited the verse, "And we divided the sea for you, 395. See n. 384 above. The expression "We are God's" is found in several verses of the Qur'ān.

396. Ibn Zurayq is an insulting name for Marwān, perhaps reflecting the story that he was not the son of Muḥammad b. Marwān at all. See Ṭabarī, III, 51.

397. For the title Manṣūr mentioned in this battle cry, see n. 82 above.

and delivered you, and drowned Pharaoh's people while you were beholding."[398]

'Abdallāh b. 'Alī remained in his camp for seven days. A man descended from Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ said these words, reviling Marwān:

Flight importunes Marwān, and I have told him,
'now the oppressor is one oppressed, whose desire is to flee.

What are flight and abdication of kingship, once gone from you all forbearance? There is no religion or honor;

Lightwit in patience, a Pharaoh in persecution; and if you seek his generosity, he's a dog before whom is a mad dog.'

'Abdallāh b. 'Alī wrote to the Commander of the Faithful of the victory and Marwān's flight, and he took possession of Marwān's army and all it had carried with it. They found many weapons and much wealth, but they found no women except a slavegirl of 'Abdallāh b. Marwān. When 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī's letter reached Abū al-'Abbās, he prayed two prostrations, and then recited the verses, "When Saul set out with the host, he said, 'God will try you by a river; whosoever drinks thereof is not of me, and whosoever tastes it not, he is of me, save him who scoops it with his hand.' Yet they drank thereof, all save a few of them, and when he had crossed with those who believed with him, they said, 'We can do nothing this day against Goliath and his hosts.' Those who reckoned that they were to meet God however said, 'How often a little band has overcome a numerous company by God's leave! God is with the patient.' So, when they went out against Goliath and his hosts, they said, 'Our Lord, bestow on us patience, make firm our feet, and aid us against the people of the unbelievers!' And they routed him, by God's leave, and David slew Goliath, and God gave him the kingship, and wisdom, and taught him such as He willed."[399] Then Abū al-'Abbās ordered that each man who had been at the battle should receive five hundred (dirhams) and he raised their monthly salaries to eighty (dirhams).

Aḥmad b. Zuhayr reported the following from 'Alī b. Muḥammad

398. Qur. 2:47.
399. Qur. 2:249–51.

—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Umayyah: When the men of Khurāsān met up with Marwān, he could manage nothing that was free of disorder and corruption. Aḥmad said that he received this account. On the [42] day he was routed Marwān was standing firm, and the troops were engaged in combat, when he sent for money. It was brought, and he told the troops, "Stand fast and fight, and this money will be yours." Then some of the troops began to seize the money, and they sent word to him, "The troops are eager for the money, and we're not sure they won't run away with it." So he sent word to his son ʿAbdallāh, "Go with your men to the rear of your camp and kill anyone who takes that money, and stop them." ʿAbdallāh moved (to the rear) with his standard, and the troops said, "It's a retreat." and fled.

According to Aḥmad b. ʿAlī—Abū Jārūd al-Sulamī—a man from the Khurāsān army. We encountered Marwān at the Zāb, and the Syrians attacked us as if they were a mountain of iron; then we crouched and extended our lances and they turned from us like a cloud (of dust) and God gave us the backs of them. When they crossed (the river) the bridge was cut in front of those following them. A Syrian remained on it, so one of our men went out to him, and the Syrian slew him. Then another man went out, and he killed him, until finally he had killed three men. Then one of our men said, "Find me a sharp sword and a tough shield," so we got them for him. Then he went for him. The Syrian struck at him, but he fended him off with the shield and struck the Syrian's leg, cutting off his foot. He went on to kill him, and came back to us. We picked him up shouting, "Allāhu Akhbar!" The man was ʿUbaydallāh al-Kābulī.

The rout of Marwān at the Zāb, according to what is mentioned, took place on Saturday morning, the eleventh night of Jumādā II (January 25, 750).

In this year Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās was killed.

The Death of the Imām Ibrāhīm the ʿAbbāsid

The biographers have differed on the matter of Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad. Some of them say that he was not killed but that he died of plague in the prison of Marwān b. Muḥammad.[400]

400. See n. 365 above. However, death by plague is also regarded as a martyr's death, following a well-known ḥadīth.

Those Who Say He Died in Prison

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Waḥḥāb b. Ibrāhīm b. Khālid—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ: Marwān [43]
b. Muḥammad came to Raqqah the time he set out against al-Ḍaḥḥāk. He had with him Sa'īd b. Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik and Sa'īd's two sons 'Uthmān and Marwān. All of them accompanied him in bonds. He sent them to his lieutenant at Ḥarrān, who put them in the prison there along with Ibrāhīm (b. Muḥammad) b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd, and Abū Muḥammad the Sufyānī, who was called the Farrier (al-Bayṭār). Of them there perished in prison from an epidemic that broke out in Ḥarrān, 'Abbās b. al-Walīd, Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. One week before Marwān was routed at the Zāb by 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, Sa'īd b. Hishām and those who were imprisoned with him escaped when they killed the man in charge of the prison. Abū Muḥammad al-Sufyānī stayed behind in confinement and did not leave with those who escaped. Others who did not view escape from the prison as lawful stayed with him. The people of Ḥarrān and some of the rabble (ghawghā') in the city killed Sa'īd b. Hishām, Sharāḥīl b. Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik, 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr al-Taghlibī and the Patrikios of Armenia IV, whose name was Kūshān, by stoning them to death. Only fifteen days or so after they were killed, Marwān came to Ḥarrān fleeing from the Battle of the Zāb and set Abū Muḥammad and those confined with him in the prison free.

According to 'Umar—'Abdallāh b. Kathīr al-'Abdī—'Alī b. Mūsā—his father: Marwān pushed down the walls of a room on Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad and killed him.[401]

According to 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Ma'rūf b. Suwayd—his father—al-Muhalhil b. Ṣafwān ('Umar: Later al-Mufaḍḍal b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān also told me that al-Muhalhil b. Ṣafwān told this story): I [44] was with Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad in the prison in which 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz and Sharāḥīl b. Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik were detained. They would visit each other, especially Ibrāhīm and

401. The same method of assassination was reportedly utilized by the Caliph al-Manṣūr against his uncle 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī. The latter tradition with full explication of the legal consequences of this kind of killing is discussed in Lassner, 'Abbāsid Rule, 39–57, esp. 40–46. (J.L.)

Sharāḥīl. One day Sharāḥīl's messenger brought Ibrāhīm some milk and said, "Your brother says, 'I drank some of this milk and enjoyed it, and I'd like you to have some too.'" He accepted it and drank, and immediately thereafter became ill and collapsed. It was a day when he was supposed to go see Sharāḥīl, but he delayed, so Sharāḥīl sent word to him, "Let me be your ransom, you have delayed; what has detained you?" He sent word back, "When I drank the milk you sent me, it disagreed with me." Sharāḥīl came to him badly frightened, and said, "No, by God, no god there is but He; I drank no milk today and I sent none to you! Truly we are God's, and to Him we shall return. By God, you have been deceived!" By God, he survived only that night and no other. The following morning Ibrāhīm was dead.[402]

Ibrāhīm b. ʿAlī b. Salamah b. ʿĀmir b. Ḥurmah b. Hudhayl b. al-Rabīʿ b. ʿĀmir b. Subayḥ b. ʿAdī b. Qays, that is, Qays b. al-Ḥārith b. Fihr, lamented Ibrāhīm as follows:

I reckoned myself strong, but my wits are scattered by a grave at Ḥarrān in which is religion's defense.

In it is the Imām and the best of all mankind, among the slates and the stones and the clay;

The Imām whose misfortune became widespread, depriving every rich man or poor.

May God not absolve Marwān for any wrongdoing, but God pardon all who here say "Amen!"

This year Marwān b. Muḥammad b. Marwān b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam was slain.

The Death of Marwān and His Battle with the Syrians

[45] Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—ʿAbd al-Waḥḥāb b. Ibrāhīm b. Khalīd—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad: When Marwān fled from the 402. Sudden or unexpected deaths from natural causes (e.g., appendicitis) were always prone to be later described as murder by poisoning. See Lassner, ʿAbbāsid Rule, 46ff.

Zāb I was in his army, and Marwān had one hundred twenty thousand men in his forces at the Zāb; sixty thousand were in his own army and about the same number were with his son ʿAbdallāh, with the Zāb between them. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī engaged Marwān with the troops accompanying him, Abū ʿAwn and a group of officers among whom was Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah. When Marwān's forces were put to flight, they went to Ḥarrān, where Abān b. Yazīd b. Muḥammad b. Marwān, his brother's son, was governor. Marwān stayed at Ḥarrān more than twenty days. When ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī drew near, he packed up his people and children and family and fled, leaving at Ḥarrān Abān b. Yazīd who was married to a daughter of Marwān called Umm ʿUthmān. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī advanced and Abān went out to meet him dressed in black as a sign of his allegiance. Abān then took the oath to ʿAbdallāh and entered his service, while ʿAbdallāh gave him and all those in Ḥarrān and the Jazīrah guarantees of safety. Marwān continued past Qinnasrīn with ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī pursuing him. Then he moved on from Qinnasrīn to Ḥimṣ where the people met him in the markets ready to hear and obey. He stayed there for two or three days, and then set out. When people saw how few there were with him they became emboldened against him, saying, "He's a coward, running away." They pursued him after he had set out from them and caught up with him some miles away. When he saw the dust raised by their horses, he set two officers of his mawlās, one called Yazīd and the other Mukhallad, in two ravines (wādīs). When the pursuers came near him and passed the two ambush parties and his womenfolk had gone, he set his men in battle formation, and besought the pursuers in God's name. They refused to do anything but bandy words with him and do battle, so fighting broke out between them. Then the ambushers attacked them from the rear, and he put them to flight. His cavalry pursued them, killing them until they reached the vicinity of the city.

Marwān went on until he passed Damascus, which was governed by al-Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah b. Marwān, who was Marwān's son-in-law, married to a daughter of his called Umm al-Walīd. Marwān continued on his way, leaving al-Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah in charge of the city until ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī came against him. ʿAbdallāh besieged [46]
Damascus some days, and the city was taken. He entered Damascus by force, opposing its people. Al-Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah fell among those who were slain. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī tore down the walls of the city. Marwān passed by the Jordan, and Thaʿlabah b. Salāmah al-ʿĀmilī, who was his governor there, set off with him, leaving the district without a governor until ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī arrived and appointed one for it. Then Marwān came to Palestine, which was governed on his behalf by al-Rumāḥis b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. Rumāḥis also left with him, and Marwān went on until he arrived at Miṣr.[403] Then he left there and stopped one stage away at a place called Būṣīr.[404] He was attacked by night and slain there by ʿAmīr b. Ismāʿīl and Shuʿbah, accompanied by some of the cavalry of Mosul. On the same night that he was attacked, ʿAbdallāh and ʿUbaydallāh, the two sons of Marwān, fled to the land of the Abyssinians. They met misfortune at the hands of the Abyssinians, who fought them and slew ʿUbaydallāh. ʿAbdallāh got away with a number of men who were with them, including Bakr b. Muʿāwiyah al-Bāhilī. Bakr stayed free until the caliphate of al-Mahdī, when Naṣr b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, the governor of Palestine, caught him and sent him to al-Mahdī.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Bishr b. ʿĪsā, al-Nuʿmān Abū Sarī, Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm, Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Marwazī and ʿAmmār the mawlā of Jibrīl: Marwān met ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī with one hundred and twenty thousand men, and ʿAbdallāh had only twenty thousand. The number who were with ʿAbdallāh that day is disputed, however, by other authorities.

Muslim b. al-Mughīrah reported the following from Muṣʿab b. al-Rabīʿ al-Khuthʿamī, father of Abū Mūsā b. Muṣʿab, who was a secretary of Marwān: When Marwān fled and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī conquered Syria, I asked for a guarantee of safety, and he accorded it to me. One day I was sitting in his presence, and while he was reclining, someone mentioned Marwān and his flight. He asked, "Were you at the battle?" "Yes," I told him, "May God make things right with the [47] Amīr!" "Tell me about him," he said. So I said, "On that very day he told me, 'Count the enemy.' I told him, 'I'm only a man of the pen, not a man of war.' Then turning to the right and the left, he looked

403. Miṣr was both the name for Egypt and the general name for its capital, Fusṭāṭ. The context makes it clear that the city is intended here.

404. There were several locations of that name in Egypt. This was probably Būṣīr called Būṣīr al-Malaq on the west bank of the Nile at the entrance to the Fayyūm Oasis in Upper Egypt. Yāqūt calls it Būṣīr Qūrīdis. See *EI*² s.v. Būṣīr; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 760.

and said, "They are twelve thousand." At this, ʿAbdallāh sat up and said, "God smite him, what was with him? I do not reckon the military rolls carried more than twelve thousand men that day!"

Returning to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: Marwān fled until he came to the city of Mosul which was governed by Hishām b. ʿAmr al-Taghlibī and Bishr b. Khuzaymah al-Asadī, and they cut the pontoon bridge. The Syrians shouted to them, "It's Marwān!" But they replied, "You lie; the Commander of the Faithful doesn't run away!" He therefore went to a village. He crossed the Tigris and went to Ḥarrān and then to Damascus, where he left al-Walīd b. Muʿāwiyah in charge, saying, "Fight them, until the people of Syria are united." Then Marwān moved on to Palestine and stopped at the River of Abū Fuṭrus. Al-Ḥakam b. Ḍabʿān al-Judhāmī had seized power in Palestine, so Marwān sent word to ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Rawḥ b. Zinbāʿ appointing him to power, but the treasury was in the hands of al-Ḥakam. Abū al-ʿAbbās wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī commanding him to pursue Marwān, so ʿAbdallāh proceeded to Mosul. He was met by Hishām b. ʿAmr al-Taghlibī and Bishr b. Khuzaymah who had displayed the color black with the people of Mosul, and they now opened up the city to him. He then marched to Ḥarrān, appointing Muḥammad b. Ṣūl as governor of Mosul. In Ḥarrān ʿAbdallāh demolished the house in which Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad had been confined. He then marched to Manbij, where the people had displayed black. He stopped in Manbij and appointed Abū Ḥumayd al-Marwazī as governor. The people of Qinnasrīn sent ʿAbdallāh their oath of allegiance; one of those who came to him on their behalf was Abū Umayyah al-Taghlibī. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī arrived from Abū al-ʿAbbās to reinforce him with four thousand men. [48]
ʿAbdallāh stayed there a couple of days after the arrival of ʿAbd al-Ṣamad, but then moved to Qinnasrīn. When he came there, the people had already displayed the color black. He stayed a couple of days, and then moved on to stop at Ḥimṣ. ʿAbdallāh stayed there several days, while the inhabitants swore the oath of allegiance. Then he marched to Baʿalbakk where he stayed a couple of days before moving on. He stopped next at ʿAyn al-Jarr,[405] remaining there two days before moving on. 'Abdallāh then camped at Mizzah,[406] one of the villages of Damascus. Then Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī arrived with reinforcements and he camped at Marj 'Adhra'[407] with eight thousand men. With him were Bassām b. Ibrāhīm, Khafāf, Shu'bah, and al-Haytham b. Bassām. Then 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī moved, and camped at the East Gate (Bāb Sharqī).[408] Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī settled at the Jābiyah Gate, Abū 'Awn at Bāb Kaysān, Bassām at Bab al-Ṣaghīr and Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah at Bāb Tūmā. 'Abd al-Ṣamad, Yaḥyā b. Ṣafwān and al-'Abbās b. Yazīd were at Bāb al-Farādīs—al-Walīd b. Mu'āwiyah was still inside Damascus. The attackers laid siege to the people of Damascus and the Balqā'. Then the people of the city broke into factional rivalry; some of them killed others, and they slew al-Walīd. The 'Abbāsids forced the gates on Wednesday, the twentieth of Ramadān (May 2, 750). The first to scale the wall of the city from the East Gate was 'Abdallāh al-Ṭā'ī, and the first at Bāb al-Ṣaghīr was Bassām b. Ibrāhīm. They fought for three hours in the city. 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī stopped at Damascus for fifteen days, and then set out for Palestine and stopped at the Kuswah River.[409] From there he sent Yaḥyā b. Ja'far the Hāshimite to Madīnah, and then he moved to the Jordan. The people had already adopted black, and they came out to meet him. He camped at Baysān,[410] then moved to Marj al-Rūm and came to the River of Abū Fuṭrus.[411] Marwān had fled, and 'Abdallāh stayed in Palestine. A letter from Abū al-'Abbās came to him, "Send Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī in pursuit of Marwān." And Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī marched from the 406. See LeStrange, Palestine, 237.

405. The Umayyad princely city built by al-Walīd II in the anti-Lebanon and known today as ʿAnjar. See *EI*² s.v. ʿAyn al-Djarr.

407. A meadow lying twelve mīl (24 km.) from Damascus. See LeStrange, Palestine, 503.

408. Bāb al-Farādīs was the northern gate of Damascus. The Kaysān Gate was southeast, and Bāb al-Saghīr on the south. Bāb Tūmā was on the northeast. See EI[2] s.v. Dimashḳ.

409. Meaning the Nahr al-A'waj which flows from Mt. Hermon into the area known as al-Kuswah. The latter was situated some twelve mīl (24 km.) from Damascus. See LeStrange, Palestine, 488.

410. A town in the Jordan Valley known today as Bet Shan. See LeStrange, Palestine, 410ff.

411. Abū Fuṭrus was the ancient Antipatris on the Awjā', near Ramlah. Ṭabarī barely mentions, later on, a massacre of some eighty members, more or less, of the Umayyad family here by 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, though Ibn Athīr, Ya'qūbī, Azdī, and al-Aghānī all give details. See Ibn Athīr, II, 333; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 355; and Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 551–52. Ya'qūbī II, 356–57, also mentions how 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī opened the graves of the Umayyad caliphs and burned their bodies "sparing none." Others state that the tomb of 'Umar II was spared.

River of Abū Fuṭrus in Dhū al-Qa'dah 132 (June 11–July 10, 750). He had with him Ibn Fattān, 'Āmir b. Ismā'īl al-Ḥārithī and Abū 'Awn, [49] and he sent Abū 'Awn to lead his vanguard along with 'Āmir b. Ismā'īl. Ṣāliḥ marched on, stopping at Ramlah;[412] then he continued, and they camped at the seacoast. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī gathered vessels and provisioned them to go after Marwān who was at Faramā. Ṣāliḥ marched along the coast road while the ships sailed alongside him until he stopped at 'Arīsh.[413]

Word of this reached Marwān, so he had the fodder and foodstuffs around him burned, and fled. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī pressed on, and stopped at the Nile, before moving on and camping in Upper Egypt (al-Sa'īd). Word reached Ṣāliḥ that Marwān's cavalry along the banks of the river were burning the fodder, so he sent some officers against them. These captured ten men and brought them to Ṣāliḥ, who was at Fusṭāṭ.[414] Marwān crossed the Nile, cut the pontoon bridge, and burned the fields. Ṣāliḥ went in pursuit of him, and clashed with a contingent of Marwān's cavalry at the Nile; they fought an engagement and Ṣāliḥ put them to flight. He then went on to a canal, where some (more) of Marwān's cavalry chanced upon him. He wounded some of them and drove the party away. Then he went on to another canal, and his force crossed over. They then saw a cloud of dust, and supposed it was Marwān, so Ṣāliḥ sent out a scouting party under al-Faḍl b. Dīnār and Mālik b. Qādim. They found no one to oppose, so they went back to Ṣāliḥ and he moved on. He then stopped and camped at a place called Dhāt al-Sāḥil. Abū 'Awn sent ahead 'Āmir b. Ismā'īl al-Ḥārithī along with Shu'bah b. Kathīr al-Māzinī. Encountering some of Marwān's cavalry, they put them to flight and took some men who were on foot as prisoners. Some of these they slew, and some they let live. They asked about Marwān's whereabouts, and the prisoners told them where he was, on condition that they be given guarantees of safety. They rode on, and found Marwān staying at a church in Būsīr. They attacked his force at the 412. Situated between the hill country and the coast, Ramlah was the administrative center of Palestine. See LeStrange, Palestine, 303ff.

413. That is, he was marching along the Via Maris, the ancient route to Egypt. Faramā' was between Egypt proper and 'Arīsh. The latter oasis was on the border between Sinai and Palestine. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 883.

414. See n. 403 above. Fusṭāṭ was the earliest Arab settlement in Egypt and the first of a series of settlements that was to comprise the area of Greater Cairo. See EI^{2} s.v. al-Fusṭāṭ.

night's end, and his soldiers ran away. Marwān came out against them with a small party of men, and they surrounded him and killed him.

According to ʿAlī—Ismāʿīl b. al-Ḥasan—ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl: We [50] found Marwān at Būsīr. We were a small party, so they pressed us hard. We gathered together in a palm-stand, and if they had known how few we were, they would certainly have killed us. I said to the men with me, "If we wait until morning and they see how few we are in number, not one of us will get away." Then I recalled the words of Bukayr b. Māhān, "By God, you will slay Marwān; it's as though I hear you cry [in Persian], 'Give it to them, bullies! [dahīd yā juvānkashān].'"[415] Then I broke the sheath of my sword, and my companions broke theirs. And I cried out, "Dahīd yā juvānkashān!" It had the effect of molten fire poured on them, and they fled. Then a man attacked Marwān and struck him with his sword, killing him.

ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl rode back to Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī, who wrote to the Commander of the Faithful Abū al-ʿAbbās, "We pursued al-Jaʿdī, the enemy of God, until we caused him to seek refuge in the land of God's enemy, Pharaoh—he who made himself like unto God—and in that land I slew him."

ʿAlī reported the following from Abū Ṭālib al-Anṣārī: It was a man from Baṣrah they called al-Maghūd who stabbed Marwān; he didn't recognize him when he felled him. Then someone gave a great cry, "The Commander of the Faithful is down!" They raced over to him, and a man from Kūfah, who used to sell pomegranates, got there first and cut off his head. ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl sent Marwān's head to Abū ʿAwn, who sent it to Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī, and Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī sent the head with Yazīd b. Hāniʾ, his chief of security, to Abū al-ʿAbbās on Sunday, the third day before the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 132 (August 6, 750). Ṣāliḥ went back to Fusṭāṭ, then he left for Syria, turning over the booty to Abū ʿAwn, and the weapons, money and slaves to al-Faḍl b. Dīnār, and left Abū ʿAwn in command in Egypt.

According to ʿAlī—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Khurāsānī—a shaykh of the tribe of Bakr b. Wāʾil: I was at Dayr Qunnā with Bukayr b. Māhān, and we were talking together when a young man passed by with two [51] waterskins, went to the Tigris and got water. Then he returned, and

415. Following the Cairo edition.

Bukayr called him, saying, "What's your name, young man?" "'Āmir," he said. "Son of whom?" asked Bukayr. "Of Ismā'īl," he replied. "Of Balḥārith?"[416] asked Bukayr. "I am of Balḥārith," he said. "Then you'll be of the Banū Musliyyah," Bukayr said. "I am," he told him. "Then, by God," said Bukayr, "you will slay Marwān; it is as though I hear you cry: 'Ya juvānkashān, dahīd!'"

'Alī reported the following from al-Kinānī: I used to hear our shaykhs at Kūfah say, "The Banū Musliyyah will be the death of Marwān."[417] According to some, Marwān was sixty-two years old on the day that he was slain. Others say he was sixty-nine, and still others that he was fifty-eight. He was slain on Sunday three days before the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (August 6, 750), and his reign from the time that allegiance was sworn to him until he was killed was five years, ten months and sixteen days. His patronymic (kunyā) was 'Abū 'Abd al-Malik. Hishām b. Muḥammad asserts that his mother was a Kurdish concubine.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad—'Alī b. Mujāhid and Abū Sinān al-Juhnī: It was said that the mother of Marwān b. Muḥammad used to belong to Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar,[418] and that Muḥammad b. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam acquired her the day Ibn al-Ashtar was slain; he took her to be a refined woman, from Ibn al-Ashtar's household. She bore Marwān in Muḥammad's bed. When Abū al-'Abbās took power, 'Abdallāh b. al-'Ayyāsh al-Mantūf came into his presence and said, "Praise be to God, who has exchanged for us the ass of the Jazīrah and the son of the slaughtered man's bondmaid with a descendant of the paternal uncle of God's Messenger and the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib!" This same year 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī killed those of the Banū Umayyah who were slain at the River of Abū Futrus. They were seventy-two men.[419]

---

416. The Balḥārith were the Arab tribe of the Yaman which included the Christians of the Najrān oasis. See *EI*² s.v. Ḥārith b. Ka'b.

417. The Banū Musliyyah were the earliest supporters of the 'Abbāsid revolution. Most leaders of the Kūfah apparatus were counted among them. Abū al-'Abbās was married to Rayṭah, one of the noble women of this clan. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 192–93. (J.L.)

418. That is, the famous 'Alid commander who also fought for the Zubayrids and was killed in 72 (October 691). See *EI*² s.v. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar.

419. See n. 411 above. The traditions concerning the annihilation of the Umayyad house are problematic.

In this year Abū al-Ward threw off his allegiance to Abū al-'Abbās at Qinnasrīn, and adopted the color white along with others.[420]

[52] Abū al-Ward's Adopting White and What Happened

The cause of this, according to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ: Abū al-Ward, whose name was Majza' ah b. Kawthar b. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith al-Kilābī, was a companion of Marwān and one of his cavalry officers. When Marwān was routed, Abū al-Ward was at Qinnasrīn, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī came there. Abū al-Ward gave him allegiance, and he and his troops placed themselves at 'Abdallāh's disposal. The descendants of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik lived next to Abū al-Ward at Bālis and Nā'ūrah.[421] One of the "Thousanders,"[422] an officer of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, came to Bālis at the head of a hundred and fifty cavalry and manhandled the sons of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik and their womenfolk. Some people complained of this to Abū al-Ward, and he came out in an agricultural settlement there called Zarā'at Banī Zufar—it was also called Khusāf—[423] with a number of people of his family to attack the officer, who was staying in Maslamah's fort. Abū al-Ward fought him until he had killed him and the men with him, and then he proclaimed the adoption of the color white and the deposing of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī. He called on the people of Qinnasrīn to do the same, and all of them displayed the white. Abū al-'Abbās was staying at this time in Hīrah, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī was occupied in armed conflict with Ḥabīb b. Murrah al-Murrī, fighting him in the Balqā', Bathaniyyah and Ḥawrān.[424] 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī had already encountered Ḥabīb with his 420. White became the color of the opposition to 'Abbāsid rule. See the article on colors and politics by Omar cited in n. 72 above. See also Azdī, 146.

421. Bālis, the ancient Barbalissus, was situated on the Syrian side of the Euphrates west of Raqqah. Nā'ūrah was between Aleppo and Bālis. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 477ff, and IV, 832.

422. The text is al-azārmardīn," it should be read hazārmard, literally, "thousandman." The epithet hazārmard occurs regularly for outstanding officers in this period, and is probably traceable to the old Sasanian practice of giving certain officers of great merit and bravery the pay and importance of a thousand ordinary soldiers. See Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, Futūḥ Miṣr, 61.

423. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 922, who lists a Zurā'at Zufar near Bālis. He also lists a Khusāf in the same region (ibid, 441).

424. For these districts of Syria, see EI^{2} s.v. al-Bathaniyya, Ḥawrān.

troops and engaged them in several clashes. Ḥabīb had been one of Marwān's cavalry officers, and his reason for adopting white had been fear for himself and for his people. The Qays and other groups allied to them among the inhabitants of these districts, Bathaniyyah and Ḥawrān, had sworn to follow him. However, when word reached ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī of their adopting white (in Qinnasrīn), he invited Ḥabīb b. Murrah to make peace, made peace with him, pardoned him and those with them, and set out for Qinnasrīn to engage Abū al-Ward. He passed by Damascus and appointed as his deputy there Abū Ghānim ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Rib'i al-Ṭā'ī, giving him command of four thousand men from his army. Also at Damascus at this time was the wife of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, Umm al-Banīn bt. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib al-Nawfaliyyah, the sister of ʿAmr b. Muḥammad, as well as concubine mothers of ʿAbdallāh's children, and some of his household. As ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī arrived at Ḥimṣ on his way, the people of Damascus rebelled against him when his back was turned, adopted white, and rose against him with ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Surāqah[425] al-Azdī. They encountered Abū Ghānim and those with him and put him to flight, killing a great number of his followers. They carried off all that ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī had left behind in the way of household goods and chattels, but did not harm his family. Displaying white, the people of Damascus united in opposition to (the ʿAbbāsids). ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī however continued on his way. Some of the people of Qinnasrīn had joined with Abū al-Ward, and had corresponded with their associates at Ḥimṣ and Tadmur. Thousands had come to join them under Abū Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān.[426] The rebels made Abū Muḥammad their leader and called men to follow him, saying, "This is the Sufyānid who was foretold."[427] Their numbers were now about forty thousand. [53]

425. The text is Surāqah; emended by the Cairo edition to Sarādiqah.

426. That is, the descendant of Yazīd I, the second Umayyad Caliph and the son of the founder of the dynasty.

427. There is frequent mention of a Sufyānid as an eschatological figure in the ḥadīth collections on fitan, "troubles." What his role will be depends on the orientation of the source, Umayyad, ʿAlid, or ʿAbbāsid. Al-Maqdisī, al-Badʾ wa al-Taʿrīkh, II, 186, reports, "The Banū ʿAbbās will be destroyed at the hands of a man from the house of this woman" (the Prophet's wife Umm Ḥabībah bt. Abī Sufyān). All of these ḥadīths are politically tendentious; some of them come from a Syria resentful of ʿAbbāsid domination.

When ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī was near them, he sent his brother ʿAbd al-Ṣamad ahead with ten thousand of his cavalry. Abū Muḥammad had camped with his following at a meadow called Marj al-Akhram. Abū al-Ward was in charge of the camp, and was Abū Muḥammad's executive and battle-chief. He thus came out to oppose them, and met them on the field between the two armies. There was a confused engagement between the two forces, but the enemy stood fast. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad and those with him were routed, and thousands of his men were killed that day. When ʿAbd al-Ṣamad came back to him, ʿAb-[54] dallāh advanced, along with Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah and a group of officers who were with him. They engaged the enemy again at Marj al-Akhram, and fought a fierce battle with them. A group of those who were with ʿAbdallāh were put to flight, but they regrouped, while ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah stood firm and repulsed the attackers. Abū al-Ward and about five hundred men of his family and clan held fast and were all killed. Abū Muḥammad and the Kalb who were with him fled until they got to Tadmur. ʿAbdallāh gave the people of Qinnasrīn a guarantee of safety, and they displayed black, swore allegiance to him, and became submissive to him. He then set out to go back to the people of Damascus because they displayed white in rebellion against him and drove out Abū al-Ghānim. As he neared Damascus, the people fled and scattered without any battle between them, and ʿAbdallāh pardoned the city's inhabitants. They swore allegiance to him, and he did not prosecute them for what they had done.

Abū Muḥammad continued to absent himself as a fugitive, and he reached the Ḥijāz. Word of his hiding place reached Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī, Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr's governor, and he sent cavalry for him. They engaged him in battle until he was killed and two sons of his were captured. Ziyād sent his head and his two sons to the Commander of the Faithful Abū Jaʿfar, who ordered that the sons be set free, and he pardoned them.

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad reported the following from al-Nuʿmān Abū al-Sarī, Jabalah b. Farrūkh, Sulaymān b. Dāwud and Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Marwazī: Abū al-Ward threw off his allegiance at Qinnasrīn and Abū al-ʿAbbās wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī at (Abū) Fuṭrus to engage Abū al-Ward in battle. ʿAbdallāh sent ʿAbd al-Ṣamad to Qinnasrīn at the head of seven thousand men, with Mukhāriq b. Shabīb in charge of security. He then sent five thousand men after him under the command of Dhu'ayb b. al-Ash'ath, and after that he began to send the main contingents. 'Abd al-Ṣamad encountered Abū al-Ward at the head of a great force. The people fled from 'Abd al-Ṣamad until [55] they came to Ḥimṣ, so 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī sent al-'Abbās b. Yazīd b. Ziyād, Marwān al-Jurjānī and Abū al-Mutawakkil al-Jurjānī, each with their own followers, to Ḥimṣ. 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī himself arrived, and camped four miles (mīl) from Ḥimṣ. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī was also at Ḥimṣ. 'Abdallāh wrote to Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, and he came to him from the Jordan. The people of Qinnasrīn swore allegiance to the Sufyānid Abū Muḥammad Ziyād b. 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, and Abū al-Ward b. . . . .[428] They swore allegiance to him and he stayed forty days. 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, together with 'Abd al-Ṣamad and Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah came against them, and the two forces engaged in the fiercest of battles. Abū Muḥammad drove them into a narrow pass, and the people began to scatter. Then Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah said to 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, "What are we waiting for? They are increasing in numbers, and our followers are decreasing! Let us go forth against them!" They fought each other on Tuesday, the last of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 133 (July 27, 751). Abū Muḥammad had Abū al-Ward on his right, and in command of his left was al-Aṣbagh b. Dhū'ālah. Abū al-Ward was wounded and carried back to his people, and then he died. A group of Abū al-Ward's followers fled into a bushy area, and it was set on fire over their heads. The people of Ḥimṣ had thrown off their allegiance and wanted to follow Abū Muḥammad, but when they learned of his flight they stayed where they were.

In this year, Ḥabīb b. Murrah al-Murrī threw off (black) and put on white along with those of the people of Syria who were with him.

Ḥabib b. Murrah Puts on White

'Alī reported the following from his authorities: Ḥabīb b. Murrah al-Murrī and the people of the Bathaniyyah and Ḥawrān put on white [56] while 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī was in the camp of Abū al-Ward, who was slain in this year.[429]

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrā-

428. There is a lacuna in the text and in the Cairo edition.
429. See Azdī, 144ff sub anno 133.

hīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad: Ḥabīb b. Murrah's display of white and his struggle with 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī occurred before Abū al-Ward put on white, and Abū al-Ward only did this while 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī was occupied in fighting Ḥabīb b. Murrah in the Balqā', or in the Bathaniyyah and Ḥawrān. 'Abdallāh had already encountered Ḥabīb with his troops and engaged them in several clashes. Ḥabīb had been one of Marwān's cavalry officers, and the reason for his putting on white had been fear for his own safety and his people. The Qays and its allies among the inhabitants of those districts, i.e., Bathaniyyah and Ḥawrān, pledged allegiance to him. When word of the rebellion of the people of Qinnasrīn reached 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, he invited Ḥabīb b. Murrah to make peace. 'Abdallāh then made peace with him and pardoned him and his men and set out for Qinnasrīn to encounter Abū al-Ward.

In this year also the people of the Jazīrah put on white and threw off their allegiance to Abū al-'Abbās.

The Revolt of the Jazarīs

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm—Abū Hāshim Mukhallad b. Muḥammad: The people of the Jazīrah displayed white and threw off their allegiance as soon as word came to them of the revolt of Abū al-Ward and the uprising of the people of Qinnasrīn. The rebels marched to Ḥarrān, where at this time Mūsā b. Ka'b was stationed with three thousand men of the army. The defenders stuck fast to the city, and wearers of white flocked to it from every direction. They besieged Mūsā and those with him, but their command was not unified and they had no single chief to unite them.

[57] Following this, Isḥāq b. Muslim came from Armenia.[430] He had set out from there when word came to him of Marwān's defeat. The people of the Jazīrah made him their leader, and he besieged Mūsā b. Ka'b upwards of two months. Abū al-'Abbās sent Abū Ja'far, his brother, with the troops he had with him besieging Ibn Hubayrah at Wāsiṭ. He went on past Qarqīsiyyah, where the inhabitants had displayed white and locked the gates of the city. Then he came to Raqqah, which was in the same condition under Bakkār b. Muslim, brother of Ishāq. Abū Ja'far continued on toward Ḥarrān, and Isḥāq b. Muslim then moved to Ruhā'.[431] This occurred in the year 133 (750–751). Mūsā b. Ka'b and his followers came out of Ḥarrān and met Abū Ja'far, while Bakkār b. Muslim went to his brother, Isḥāq b. Muslim, who went to a group of the Rabī'ah at Dārā and Mārdīn. The leader of the Rabī'ah at this time was one of the Ḥarūriyyah (Khārijites) called Buraykah. Abū Ja'far went after him, and the two forces engaged in a violent battle in which Buraykah was killed. Bakkār then went back to his brother Isḥāq in Ruhā'. Isḥāq left him in charge of Ruhā' and went with most of their army to Sumaysāṭ,[432] where he entrenched himself with his troops. Abū Ja'far proceeded with his units until Bakkār confronted him at Ruhā', and there were several battles between them.

430. That is, Isḥāq b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī, the "chief man of Qays," who was an Umayyad commander along the Armenian frontier. See Ṭabarī, II/3, 1871, 1940.

Abū al-'Abbās wrote to 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī to march with his troops against Isḥāq at Sumaysāṭ, and he came from Syria to camp opposite Isḥāq at Sumaysāṭ. There were sixty thousand men, all of them from the Jazīrah. Between the two forces lay the Euphrates. Abū Ja'far now came from Ruhā', whereupon Isḥāq wrote the 'Abbāsid commanders requesting guarantees of safety (in return for surrender). They assented to this and wrote to Abū al-'Abbās, who ordered them to give him and all those with him pledges of safety. They therefore composed a document in which Isḥāq was given firm assurances. Isḥāq then came out to meet Abū Ja'far, and there was a complete reconciliation between them. He later became one of Abū Ja'far's chosen men. The people of the Jazīrah and of Syria were thus pacified, and Abū al-'Abbās appointed Abū Ja'far as governor of the Jazīrah, Armenia and Ādharbayjān. He continued in that capacity [58] until he became Caliph.

It is mentioned that Isḥāq b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī stayed at Sumaysāṭ seven months while Abū Ja'far besieged him. He used to say, "There is an oath of allegiance on my neck, and I shall not put it aside until I know that the man to whom I gave it has died or been killed." At this, Abū Ja'far sent word to him that Marwān had been slain, and he replied, "Let me be sure of this." Then he sought peace, 431. For Ruhā' (Edessa), see LeStrange, Lands, 103–4.

432. For Sumaysāṭ, ancient Samosata, which lay on the north bank of the Euphrates, see LeStrange, Lands, 108.

saying, "I have learned that Marwān has been slain." So Abū Jaʿfar pardoned him, and he went with Abū Jaʿfar and held a place of great esteem with him. It has also been said that it was ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī who pardoned him.

Also in this year, Abū Jaʿfar set out for Abū Muslim in Khurāsān to seek his opinion about slaying Abū Salamah Ḥafṣ b. Sulaymān.

Abū Jaʿfar's Journey to Khurāsān

Earlier I mentioned the matter of Abū Salamah and what he had done to arouse the suspicions of Abū al-ʿAbbās and those of the Banū Hāshim who accompanied him when they arrived at Kūfah.

According to ʿAlī b. Muhammad—Jabalah b. Farrūkh—Yazīd b. Asīd—Abū Jaʿfar: When Abū al-ʿAbbās became Commander of the Faithful, we sat up one evening talking and mentioned what Abū Salamah had done. Then one man there said, "What do you know; maybe what Abū Salamah did was done by the advice of Abū Muslim!" Not one of us spoke, and then the Commander of the Faithful Abū al-ʿAbbās said, "Well, if that was by the advice of Abū Muslim, then we are up against trouble, unless God should rid us of him." Then we dispersed, and Abū al-ʿAbbās sent for me to ask, "What is your opinion of this?" I replied, "Whatever you think." He told me, "None of us is nearer to Abū Muslim than yourself, so go out to see him until you learn his thoughts. He will not disguise them from you. If you encounter him and discover that it was by his advice that Abū Salamah acted, we shall look to ourselves. If it was not, then our souls will be at peace."

[59] I left in some disquiet, and when I got to Rayy, the man in charge there had received a letter from Abū Muslim saying, "Word has reached me that ʿAbdallāh b. Muhammad is headed your way. When he arrives, send him on within the hour of his arrival." So, when I got there, the governor of Rayy came to me, informed me of Abū Muslim's letter, and ordered me to travel on. My disquiet increased; I left Rayy cautious and fearful and traveled on. As soon as I was at Naysābūr, the governor there came to me with a (second) letter from Abū Muslim, "If ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad arrives there, send him on and do not let him tarry, for your area is one of rebels and there is no security for him there." I felt better then, and said, "I see he is concerned about me." So I went on, and when I was two farsakhs (12 km) from Marw, Abū Muslim came with the notables to meet me. As soon as he drew near, he (dismounted and) walked toward me to kiss my hand. I told him, "Mount," At this he got on his horse and we went into Marw. I stayed in a house there for three days, and he didn't ask me about anything. Then on the fourth day, he asked me, "What brought you here?" I told him, and he said, "That was Abū Salamah's doing! I shall take care of him for you." Then he called Marrār b. Anas al-Dabbī and told him, "Set out for Kūfah, and kill Abū Salamah as soon as you encounter him. Finish with this as the Imām thinks best." Marrār then arrived at Kūfah, when Abū Salamah was spending the evening with Abū al-'Abbās. He waited in his path, and when Abū Salamah came out, Marrār killed him. It was then said that it was the Khārijites who had killed him.

'Alī reported the following from a shaykh of the Banū Sulaym—Sālim:[433] I accompanied Abū Ja'far from Rayy to Khurāsān as his chamberlain. Abū Muslim would come to see him, dismount at the door of the house, sit down in the antechamber, and say, "Ask for leave for me to enter." Then Abū Ja'far grew angry at me, and told me, "Woe to you! When you see him, open the door for him and tell him to ride in on his mount!" I did so, and told Abū Muslim, "He says thus-and-so." "Yes," he said, "I know. Go and ask him for leave for me to enter."

It was also said that Abū al-'Abbās had a dislike for Abū Salamah [60] even before he left his camp at Nukhaylah. He then moved from his camp to Hāshimiyyah[434] and stayed at the government palace there. He was hostile to Abū Salamah; this was known about him. He wrote to Abū Muslim informing him what he thought, telling him about the duplicity that concerned him and what he feared in consequence. Abū Muslim wrote, "If the Commander of the Faithful has come across such information about Abū Salamah, then have him killed." But Dāwud b. 'Alī told Abū al-'Abbās, "Do not do it, Commander of the Faithful. It will be used against you by Abū Muslim and the people of Khurāsān who now are with you—his position 433. The text is Sālim, probably an error. The chamberlain's name was Sallām b. Sulaym.

434. That is, the Hāshimiyyah that was at Madīnat b. Hubayrah, near Kūfah. There were several 'Abbāsid administrative centers before the building of Madīnat al-Salām at Baghdad. Each was known as Hāshimiyyah. There is thus much confusion about them. For a full discussion, see Lassner 'Abbāsid Rule, 151–62. (J.L.)

with them being what it is. Rather, write to Abū Muslim and let him send someone to kill Abū Salamah." So he wrote Abū Muslim to this effect, and Abū Muslim sent Marrār b. Anas al-Ḍabbī. He came to Abū al-ʿAbbās at the city of Hāshimiyyah and let him know the reason for his coming. Abū al-ʿAbbās then ordered a crier to proclaim, "The Commander of the Faithful is well pleased with Abū Salamah and has summoned him and given him robes of honor." Abū Salamah went to visit him one evening after that, and he did not quit him until the greater part of the night had passed. Then he went out to go home, walking alone, until he entered the arcade. Along with some confederates who accompanied him, Marār b. Anas confronted Abū Salamah and killed him. The city gates were locked, and they said, "The Khārijites have murdered Abū Salamah." He was carried out the next day. Yahyā b. Muhammad b. ʿAlī led prayers over him, and he was buried in Hāshimiyyah. On this, Sulaymān b. Al-Muhājir al-Bajalī said:

> Indeed the wazīr, the wazīr of the family of Muḥammad > has perished, and he who hates you became wazīr.

Abū Salamah was called "Wazīr of the Family of Muḥammad," and [61] Abū Muslim "Trustee (amīn) of the Family of Muḥammad." Thus when Abū Salamah was slain, Abū al-ʿAbbās sent his brother Abū Jaʿfar at the head of thirty men to Abū Muslim; among them were al-Ḥajjāj b. Arṭāh and Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl al-Hāshimī.

When Abū Jaʿfar came to Abū Muslim, ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥusayn al-Aʿraj kept pace with him. Alongside him rode Sulaymān b. Kathīr. Sulaymān then said to al-Aʿraj, "Friend, we have been hoping that your business would be done. If you wish, call on us, as regards your desire." ʿUbaydallāh then thought that he was an agent from Abū Muslim, and he became fearful. Word reached Abū Muslim of Sulaymān b. Kathīr's ride with him. ʿUbaydallāh went to Abū Muslim and mentioned what Sulaymān had said, thinking that if he did not do this, Abū Muslim would devise some mischief against ʿUbaydallāh and kill him. Abū Muslim sent for Sulaymān b. Kathīr and said to him, "Do you remember how the Imām told me, 'Whomever you suspect, kill him?'" "Yes," said Sulaymān. "Well," said Abū Muslim, "I suspect you." "I beseech you in God's name!" said Sulaymān. "Do not beseech me in God's name when you are plotting treachery to the Imām," said Abū Muslim. He then ordered his head cut off. Abū Ja'far saw no one else whom Abū Muslim had beheaded, but he went home from Abū Muslim and told Abū al-'Abbās, "You are no Caliph, and your rule is nothing, if you leave Abū Muslim alone and do not kill him." "How so?" said Abū al-'Abbās. "By God, he does just what he pleases," said Abū Ja'far. Abū al-'Abbās told him, "Be quiet, and keep this to yourself."[435]

The Battle for Wāṣit

In this year, Abu al-'Abbas sent his brother Abū Ja'far to Wāṣit to do battle with Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah.[436] We have mentioned what happened when the troops of the Khurāsān army encountered Ibn Hubayrah (first) under Qaḥṭabah and then under Qaḥṭabah's son al-Ḥasan—how Ibn Hubayrah was routed and how his supporters among the Syrian troops had gotten to Wāṣit and fortified themselves in that city.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Abū 'Abdallāh al-Sulamī— [62]
'Abdallāh b. Badr, Zuhayr b. Hunayd, Bishr b. 'Īsā and Abū al-Sarī: When Ibn Hubayrah was routed, people deserted him. He had put a group of men in charge of the baggage, and they ran away with it. At this, Ḥawtharah asked him, "Where will you go? These people's leader (Qaḥṭabah) has been killed. Go to Kūfah; you have many troops with you. Then fight them until you are slain or win the fight." Ibn Hubayrah replied, "No, we shall go to Wāṣit and see what happens." Ḥawtharah said, "You will only strengthen them yourself that way, and (in the end) you'll be slain." Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn told him, "There is truly nothing dearer you could bring to Marwān than these troops. Follow the Euphrates until you come to him, and beware of Wāṣit; you'll walk into a siege there, with no future but death." He refused, however, since he was afraid of Marwān. He had written to Marwān about the situation, and Marwān had opposed him. He therefore feared that Marwān would kill him if he came to him. Hence he went to Wāṣit, entered the city and fortified it.

435. The murder of the veteran revolutionary was listed among the charges allegedly read against Abū Muslim shortly before the latter's execution. One could nevertheless argue that the 'Abbāsids would not have been sorry to see Ibn Kathīr eliminated since he seems to have represented an independent voice among the old guard operatives in Khurāsān. See FHA, 223. (J.L.)

436. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, II, 424ff; FHA, 208ff; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 202ff; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 42; Dīnawarī, Ibn Ṭabāṭabā, 160.

Abū Salamah sent al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah (off to Wāṣit), and al-Ḥasan and his followers dug trenches and camped in the area between the Zāb and the Tigris. Al-Ḥasan pitched his pavilion opposite the Hipprodrome Gate (Bāb al-Miḍmār), and the first battle that occurred between them was on a Wednesday. The Syrians said to Ibn Hubayrah, "Give us permission to fight them." This he did. They rode out and Ibn Hubayrah was with them. With his right flank was his son Dāwud, along with Muḥammad b. Nubātah and some men from Khurāsān.[437] Among them was Abū al-'Ūd al-Khurāsāni. The two armies met, with Khāzim b. Khuzaymah leading al-Ḥasan's right flank. Now Ibn Hubayrah was just in front of the Hip-[63] podrome Gate, so Khāzim attacked him. He routed the Syrians, and they sought refuge behind their trenches. The people ran for the gate of the city, so many of them that the Hippodrome Gate was choked, and the men manning ballistas hurled stones as al-Ḥasan stood by. They began to move with the cavalry in the area between the river and the trench. The Syrians turned back, and al-Ḥasan outflanked them. At this, they shifted between him and the city and forced his men into the Tigris, so that many of them were drowned. The defenders also came out against them in boats. Then the ('Abbāsid) Khurāsānīs counterattacked. Ibn Nubātah threw away his weapons that day and rushed blindly into the water. They followed him in a boat, and he got in.

After this they abstained from fighting, remaining as they were for seven days, but on Tuesday the defenders made a sortie and engaged in battle. One of the Syrians attacked Abū Ḥafṣ Hazārmard[438] and struck him. Referring to his tribe, the Syrian crowed, "I am the Sulamī lad!" Abū Ḥafṣ struck him back retorting, "And I am the 'Atakī lad!" and felled him. The Syrians fled in disgrace and entered the city. They stayed there so long as God wished, fighting no more, except to cast missiles from behind the barbican.

While he was besieged there, Ibn Hubayrah heard that Abū Umayyah al-Taghlibī had appeared in black garments. He thus sent Abū 437. These, of course, were Umayyad troops.

438. See n. 422 above.

ʿUthmān to al-Taghlibī's quarters. He came upon Abū Umayyah in his tent and said, "The Amīr has sent me to you to search your tent. If there is a black livery in it, I am to hang it about your neck, put a halter on you, and go with you to him. If there are no black garments in your quarters, then these fifty thousand (dirhams) are a gift to you." Abū Umayyah declined to let him search his tent, so he took him to Ibn Hubayrah, who imprisoned him. Man b. Zāʾidah and leading men of the Rabīʿah discussed this turn of events and then seized three men of the Banū Fazzārah. They detained them and insulted Ibn Hubayrah. Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn then came to them and spoke with them, but they said, "We will not let them go until he lets our comrade go." Ibn Hubayrah refused, however, so Yaḥyā told him, "You are hurting no one but yourself. You are under siege; let [64] this man go his way." Ibn Hubayrah said, "No, not even as a favor." Ibn Ḥuḍayn returned to them and informed them (of his conversation). At this, Maʿn and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿIjlī withdrew (their support from Ibn Hubayrah) and Ibn Ḥuḍayn told Ibn Hubayrah, "These are your cavalry. You have already alienated them. If you persist in this, they will be harder on you than those who are besieging you." At this, he called for Abū Umayyah, gave him a robe of honor and let him go. The disaffected were thus reconciled to Ibn Hubayrah, and they became obedient as before.

Abū Naṣr Mālik b. Haytham arrived from Sijistān, and al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah sent a delegation to inform Abū al-ʿAbbās of Abū Naṣr's arrival, putting Ghaylān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī at the head of it. Ghaylān was grieved with al-Ḥasan because he had sent him to reinforce Rawḥ b. Ḥātim, and when he came before Abū al-ʿAbbās, he said, "I bear witness that you are the Commander of the Faithful, that you are God's firm bond, that you are the Imām of the pious." Abū al-ʿAbbās replied, "What do you want, Ghaylān?" He then said, "I beg your pardon." Abū al-ʿAbbās said, "May God pardon you." Dāwud b. ʿAlī added, "May God prosper you, Abū Fuḍālah." Then Ghaylān said, "Commander of the Faithful, favor us with a man from the people of your house [to lead us]!" Abū al-ʿAbbās said, "Why, is there not already a man from the people of my house in command of you, al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah?" Ghaylān repeated "Commander of the Faithful, favor us with a man from the people of your house!" Abū al-ʿAbbās replied as he had done at first. Then Ghaylān said, "Commander of the Faithful, favor us with a man from the people of your house, that we may look on his face and our eyes be consoled by him" Abū al-ʿAbbās said, "Alright, Ghaylān." He then sent Abū Jaʿfar. He appointed Ghaylān as chief of security for him, and Abū Jaʿfar went to Wāṣit. Abū Naṣr then said to Ghaylān, "What I wished was not what you did." Ghaylān replied, "It was better this way [beh būd]." He stayed some days as chief of security, then he said to Abū Jaʿfar, "I am not forceful enough for the security, but I can point out someone who is tougher than I." "Who is he?" Abū [65] Jaʿfar asked. "Jahwar b. Marrār," he told him. "I am not able to release you," Abū Jaʿfar said, "because it was the Commander of the Faithful who appointed you." "Write to him and inform him," Ghaylān told him. So Abū Jaʿfar wrote to Abū al-ʿAbbās, who replied, "Do as Ghaylān advises." He then made Jahwar his chief of security. Abū Jaʿfar said to al-Ḥasan, "Tell me a man I can appoint to command my guard." Al-Ḥasan said, "My own choice would be ʿUthmān b. Nahīk." At this, he put ʿUthmān in command of the guard.

According to Bishr b. ʿĪsā: When Abū Jaʿfar got to Wāṣit, al-Ḥasan turned over his quarters to him, and Abū Jʿfar engaged the enemy in combat. One day Abū Naṣr fought with the Syrians, and they fled to their defensive trenches. Maʿn b. Zāʾidah and Abū Yaḥyā al-Judhāmī had concealed themselves in ambush. When the Khurāsānīs passed through, they came out against them and fought them until nightfall. Abū Naṣr dismounted to engage them, and they fought each other at the trenches. Fires were lit for them while Ibn Hubayrah was at the tower at the Vinegar-sellers' Gate (Bāb al-Khallālīn). They fought each other for as long as God wished that night; then Ibn Hubayrah gave word to Maʿn to turn back, whereupon he returned. They remained this way for some days. Then the Syrians came out again, with Muḥammad b. Nubātah, Maʿn b. Zāʿidah, Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ and certain cavaliers of Syria. The Khurāsānīs fought them, and drove them toward the Tigris. They began to fall into the river, and Abū Naṣr called in Persian, "Men of Khurāsān, be waterless for these men of treachery, make them rise!"[439] The Khurāsānīs returned. Abū Naṣr's son had been felled, and Rawḥ b. Ḥātim had protected him. His father passed by him and said in Persian, "They've killed you, my son, and so to hell with all the world, now that you're gone." Then they charged the Syrians and chased them back into Wāsiṭ. The Syrians began to tell each other, "No, by God, there's no good fortune for us after this. We went out against them—we the cavalry of the Syrian army—and they drove us back into the city." Killed that evening among the Khurāsānī army were Bakkār al- [66]

439. Persian: mardumān-i khāʾineh beyābān hastīd ve bar khīzīd.

Anṣarī and another man, both of them cavalrymen. During the siege of Ibn Hubayrah, Abū Naṣr used to fill boats with wood and set them ablaze to consume all that passed by, while Ibn Hubayrah had prepared fireboats with iron hooks to drag these boats away. So things remained for eleven months, and when this grew too tedious for them the defenders asked for peace. However, they did not ask for peace until the news of Marwān's slaying reached them. It was brought by Ismā'īl b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī who asked them, "Why are you killing yourselves? Marwān has been slain!"

It has been said that Abū al-'Abbās sent Abū Ja'far to fight Ibn Hubayrah as soon as he arrived from Khurāsān, coming back from Abū Muslim. Abū Ja'far traveled to reach al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah who was besieging Ibn Hubayrah at Wāsiṭ. Al-Ḥasan turned over his quarters to Abū Ja'far, and Abū Ja'far settled there. When the siege grew tedious to Ibn Hubayrah and his followers, they became disaffected. The Yamanīs said, "We see no Marwān, and what he did to us, he did." The Nizārīs said, "We won't fight until the Yamanīs fight alongside us." The only people who did fight for him were the ragamuffins (ṣa'ālīk) and young toughs (fityān). Then Ibn Hubayrah thought of appealing to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan,[440] and wrote to him, but he delayed his answer. Abū al-'Abbās corresponded with Ibn Hubayrah's Yamanī followers and raised their hopes. Then the Ḥārithīs Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ and Ziyād b. 'Ubaydallāh went over to Abū al-'Abbās. They promised Ibn Hubayrah that they would bring about good relations between him and Abū al-'Abbās, but they did not do it. Emissaries went back and forth between Abū Ja'far and Ibn Hubayrah until the latter sent him a (version of) a guarantee of safety. Ibn Hubayrah had consulted the experts for forty days until he was satisfied with it. He then sent it [67] to Abū Ja'far, who transmitted it to Abū al-'Abbās, and he ordered 440. The strategy was to get a person of the Banū Hāshim to intercede. In this case the 'Alid known as al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah was chosen.

Abū Ja'far to implement it.[441] It was Abū Ja'far's opinion that everything in it must be faithfully carried out, but Abū al-'Abbās was not accustomed to making a final decision without Abū Muslim. Abū al-Jahm was the "eye" that Abū Muslim kept on Abū al-'Abbās, and Abū Jahm thus wrote to him with all the news about him. So Abū Muslim wrote Abū al-'Abbās, "Truly an easy road is spoiled if a boulder is thrown into it: by God, no road with Ibn Hubayrah in it is in good order."

When the document was completed, Ibn Hubayrah came out to Abū Ja'far at the head of thirteen hundred warriors.[442] He wanted to enter Abū Ja'far's enclosure while on his horse; however, the chamberlain Sallām b. Sulaym stood before him and said, "Welcome to you, Abū Khalīd! Dismount in good order!" The enclosure was encircled by upwards of ten thousand men of Khurāsān, so Ibn Hubayrah dismounted. Sallām called for a cushion for Ibn Hubayrah to sit upon, and he sent for the officers to come in. Then Sallām said, "Go in, Abū Khālid." The latter asked, "I and who else with me?" Sallām replied, "I sought permission for you alone." He went in, and a cushion was placed for him, and he spoke with him a while. Then he rose to leave and Abū Ja'far followed him with his gaze until he disappeared from view. Ibn Hubayrah continued to visit Abū Ja'far, absenting himself one day and waiting on him the next, at the head of five hundred riders and three hundred foot soldiers. Yazīd b. Ḥātim then said to Abū Ja'far, "Truly, Amīr, Ibn Hubayrah comes here and the whole camp is humble before him; nothing is lacking in his sovereignty. If he is to make a progress with all this cavalry and infantry, what will 'Abd al-Jabbār and Jahwar say?" Then Abū Ja'far told Sallām, "Tell Ibn Hubayrah to leave this crowd behind him and come to us with a retinue [of about thirty]."[443] Sallām told Ibn Hubayrah this and his face changed. He then came with a retinue of about thirty, and Sallām said to him, "It seems you come so [68] proudly!" He replied, "If you order us to, we shall come on foot."

441. The text of the document was reportedly framed by Ibn al-Muqaffa'. The agreements forced upon Abū Ja'far by the document were so carefully worded that they made him very uneasy.

442. The text has bukhāriyyah, which seems most unlikely. Following a suggestion in the textual apparatus, the reading muhāribah has been adopted.

443. The words in brackets are missing in the text, and are supplied by the Cairo edition.

Sallām told him, "We do not wish to treat you lightly; the Amīr ordered what he did so as to pay full attention to you." After that, Ibn Hubayrah would come with three companions.

The Death of Ibn Hubayrah

Abū Zayd reported the following from Muḥammad b. Kathīr: Ibn Hubayrah spoke to Abū Jaʿfar one day and said, "Look here," or "O man." Then he came back and said, "O Amīr, it has been my fashion to address people as I just spoke to you, and my tongue slipped, forcing me to say something I did not intend." Abū al-ʿAbbās used to press Abū Jaʿfar, ordering him to kill Ibn Hubayrah. But Abū Jaʿfar would refer it back to him, until finally Abū al-ʿAbbās wrote him, "By God, you shall certainly kill him, or I will certainly send someone to drag him out of your enclosure." At this, he undertook to have Ibn Hubayrah killed and made up his mind to do it. He sent Khāzim b. Khuzaymah and al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah b. Ẓuhayr and ordered them to seal the treasuries. He then sent for the leading men of the Qays and Muḍar who were with Ibn Hubayrah. Coming to him were Muḥammad b. Nubātah, Ḥawtharah b. Suhayl, Ṭāriq b. Qudāmah, Ziyād b. Suwayd, Abū Bakr b. Kaʿb al-ʿUqaylī, Abān and Bishr the two sons of ʿAbd al-Malik b. Bishr, with twenty-two men of the Qays, as well as Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah and Hazzān b. Saʿd. Sallām b. Sulaym went out and said, "Where are Ḥawtharah and Muḥammad b. Nubātah?" They both stood up and went in. ʿUthmān b. Nahīk, al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān and Mūsā b. ʿAqīl had been sitting with one hundred men in an enclosure outside Abū Jaʿfar's enclosure. Both men had their swords taken away and their hands pinioned behind their backs. Then Bishr and Abān the sons of ʿAbd al-Malik b. Bishr entered, and the same was done with them. Then Abū Bakr b. Kaʿb and Ṭāriq b. Qudāmah entered. At this, Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah rose up and said, "We are the chiefs of the army; why have these men been given precedence over us?" Sallām said, "What tribe [69] are you from?" "From Bahrā,'" he said. And Sallām said, "You would do well to get out of here." Then Hazzān stood and spoke, and he was held back. Rawḥ b. Ḥātim then said, "Abū Yaʿqūb, the men's swords have been taken away!" Mūsā b. ʿAqīl now came out against them, and they told him, "You gave us an oath before God, and now you break it. We hope that God may catch up with you."

Ibn Nubātah began to make rude noises in his beard, and Ḥawtharah told him, "That will be of no use to you." He replied, "It seems to me I told you this would happen." Then they were slain, and their signet rings were taken from them.

Khāzim, al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah and al-Aghlab b. Sālim went off with about a hundred men and sent word to Ibn Hubayrah, "We intend to transport the money." Ibn Hubayrah told his chamberlain, "Go, Abū ʿUthmān, and show them where it is." They posted some men in each room, and began to look throughout the house. With Ibn Hubayrah were his son Dāwud, his secretary ʿAmr b. Ayyūb, his chamberlain, and a number of his mawlās. Also with him was a very young son whom he held in his arms. He began to feel misgiving at their looks, and said, "I swear by God that there is evil in the faces of these men." They came towards him, and his chamberlain stood up to them, and said, "Get out of here!" Al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah struck the chamberlain in the shoulder tendon, and felled him. His son Dāwud put up a struggle and was killed, and his mawlās were slain. Ibn Hubayrah put aside the child in his arms and said, "You have no need for this little boy." Then he prostrated himself in prayer, and was slain while prostrating himself. The slayers went with the heads to Abū Jaʿfar, whereupon he proclaimed amnesty for all the important poeple except al-Ḥakam b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Bishr, Khālid b. Salamah al-Makhzūmī and ʿUmar b. Dharr. However, Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh sought pardon for Ibn Dharr, and Abū al-ʿAbbās accorded it. Al-Ḥakam fled. Abū Jaʿfar gave a guarantee of safety to Khālid, but Abū al-ʿAbbās had Khālid killed and did not honor Abū [70] Jaʿfar's guarantee. Abū ʿAllāqah and Hishām b. Hashīm b. Ṣafwah b. Mazyad, both of the Banū Fazzār, fled, but Ḥujr b. Saʿīd al-Ṭāʾī caught up with them and killed them both at the Zāb. Abū al-ʿAṭāʾ al-Sindī recited in lament:[444]

Surely an eye that did not find that day at Wāṣit for you its tears overflowing was incapable of tears,

At evening when the wailing women rose, and torn were neck-openings at their hands, and cheeks were gashed.

444. A Kūfan poet known for his pro-Umayyad activity. The elegy on the death of Ibn Hubayrah is one of his most famous poems. See *EI*² s.v. Abū ʿAṭa al-Sindī.

And if your courtyard is empty at evening now, yet often there used to stay in it envoys after envoys.

You are not far away from one who frequents your grave, though surely one who lies beneath the dust is far.

Munqidh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥilālī recited in a lament:

The burning in my breast forbade all consolation and grief prevented my heart's firm resolve on patience,

When once I heard a blow that struck all white my hair at its place of parting.

Vanished those noble defenders, when appeared snares of treachery, and promises were broken.

That noose entrapped in its toil a man like the full moon, by stars surrounded.

A crier proclaimed the report of their death, and I said,
"Why did you not come with the cry of Doomsday?

May God reckon with you, you who assert to us that the vicissitudes of time have encompassed him."

Who is there for the minbars, after their perishing, or who could supply their excellent qualities of character?

Whenever I remember them, my heart complains of pain for the bright-faced cavaliers

Slain at the Tigris; nothing could cover them but billows of raging waves of the sea.

Now let our womenfolk weep for their riders, best of defenders, through nights of terror.

According to Abū Zayd—Abū Bakr al-Bāhilī—a shaykh of the Khurāsānīs: (The Caliph) Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik asked Yazīd b. [71]

ʿUmar b. Hubayrah for his daughter as wife for Hishām's son Muʿāwiyah, but Yazīd refused. After this some words passed between Yazīd b. ʿUmar and al-Walīd b. al-Qaʿqāʿ, and Hishām sent Yazīd to al-Walīd b. Qaʿqāʿ, who beat him and had him incarcerated. Then Ibn Ṭaysalah recited:

> Little good is there for men who have no intelligence.
> who will justly treat the man detained at Aleppo,
>
> A man never struck by time's mischances > but he made light of it, with heart at ease?

It is said that when Abū al-ʿAbbās sent Abū al-Jaʿfar to Wāṣit to fight Ibn Hubayrah, he wrote to al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah, "The army is your army, and the officers are your officers. Still, I should like for my brother to be present, so listen to him and obey him and help him as best you can." He wrote something similar to Abū Naṣr Mālik b. Haytham. Then al-Ḥasan was the one who managed the army, by al-Manṣūr (Abū Jaʿfar)'s orders.

Other Events

This same year Abū Muslim sent Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath to rule Fārs, commanding him to seize the governors of Abū Salamah there and cut off their heads. This he did.

In the same year Abū al-ʿAbbās sent his paternal uncle ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī to Fārs, which Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath was controlling, and Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath worried what to do. Someone told him, "This is not a man you can treat like others." He however replied, "On the contrary, Abū Muslim ordered me not to let anyone he had not sent come here claiming to be a governor without cutting off his head." He shrank from that, fearing what the consequences might be, but he obliged ʿĪsā by the most binding oath not to go up into a minbar, [72] nor to gird on a sword except on jihād. ʿĪsā never held a governorship after that, nor put on a sword except in a campaign. After this, Abū al-ʿAbbās sent Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī as governor over Fārs.

In this year, Abū al-ʿAbbās sent his brother Abū Jaʿfar to the Jazī-rah, Adharbayjān and Armenia as governor, and his brother Yaḥyā as governor for Mosul.[445]

He also removed his paternal uncle Dāwud b. ʿAlī as governor of Kūfah and its territory and gave him Madīnah, Mecca, the Yaman and Yamāmah to govern. In his place over Kūfah and its territory he appointed ʿĪsā b. Mūsā.

In this year, while he was in the Jazīrah Marwān had dismissed al-Walīd b. ʿUrwah as governor of Madīnah, and he appointed in his place al-Walīd's brother Yūsuf b. ʿUrwah. Al-Wāqidī mentions that he came to Madīnah on the fourth of Rabīʿ I (October 10, 750).

This year ʿĪsā b. Mūsā appointed Ibn Abī Laylā as judge for Kūfah.

The governor for Baṣrah this year was Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah al-Muhallabī. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Arṭāh was in charge of the judiciary there. The governor of Fārs was Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, and that of Sind was Manṣūr b. Jumhūr.[446] ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad governed the Jazīrah, Armenia, and Ādharbayjān, while Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad governed Mosul. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī governed the Syrian provinces, Abū ʿAwn ʿAbd al-Malik b. Yazīd governed Egypt, Abū Muslim ruled Khurāsān and Jibāl, and the Landtax Bureau was headed by Khālid b. Barmak. The leader of the Pilgrimage this year was Dāwud b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās.

445. Azdī states that this occurred the following year, 133 (749–750), and gives eyewitness reports of the pitiless massacre of the inhabitants carried out by Yaḥyā to punish them for repudiating the previous governor, a mawlā of the Ḥijāz tribe of Khath'am. See Azdī, 145–53; Ibn Athīr, IV, 339–40. Ṭabarī does not mention this act of the new dynasty, in which the people were persuaded to come out of hiding by proclamation of a general amnesty and then slain, it is said to the number of about thirty thousand men, women and children. Azdī also alludes to ʿAbbāsid massacres in Syria.

446. Ṭabarī does not discuss it, but this perennial rebel against the Qaysīs had at last joined the ʿAbbāsid revolt and had been rewarded with the governorate of Sind. See Omar, 161.

THE EVENTS OF THE YEAR 133

(AUGUST 9, 750–29 JULY, 751)

[73]

The Events of this Year

Among the events, Abū al-ʿAbbās sent his paternal uncle Sulaymān b. ʿAlī as governor for Baṣrah and its dependencies, as well as the Tigris districts, Baḥrayn, ʿUmān and Mihrijānqadhaq.[447] His paternal uncle Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī was made governor of the districts of Ahwāz.

This year Dāwud b. ʿAlī slew all members of the family of Umayyah arrested at Mecca and Madīnah.

In this year also, Dāwud b. ʿAlī died at Madīnah during Rabīʿ I (ca. October 18–November 16, 750). His governorship, according to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar, lasted three months. He had chosen his son Mūsā to succeed him when his death drew near, but when the word of his death reached Abū al-ʿAbbās, the Caliph sent his maternal uncle Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Madān al-Ḥārithī as governor for Madīnah, Mecca, Ṭaʾif and Yamāmah, and he sent Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Madān as governor for the Yaman. This man arrived in the Yaman in Jumādā I (December 447. Mihrijānqadhaq was a fertile district in the extreme west of Jibāl. The major town was Saymarah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam s.v. Mihrijānqadhaq, and LeStrange, Lands, 184, 202.

16, 750–January 14, 751). Ziyād stayed at Madīnah, while Muḥammad went on to the Yaman. Then Ziyād sent Ibrāhīm b. Ḥassān al-Sulamī, who was Abū Ḥammād al-Abraṣ, against al-Muthannā b. Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah, who was in Yamāmah. Abū Ḥammād killed him and slew his followers.

This year Abū al-'Abbās wrote to Abū 'Awn, continuing his appointment as governor of Egypt. He did the same with 'Abdallāh and Ṣāliḥ, the sons of 'Alī, who ruled over the military districts in Syria.

He also sent Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath to Ifrīqiyah, and the latter [74] engaged in fierce combat with (the Berber Khārijites) until he conquered the province.

This year Sharīk b. Shaykh al-Mahrī rebelled against Abū Muslim in Khurāsān at Bukhārā and reviled him, saying, "It was not for this that we followed the family of Muḥammad, to shed blood and act unjustly."[448] More than thirty thousand men followed his banner, so that Abū Muslim sent Ziyād b. Ṣaliḥ, who fought him and slew him.

Also, Abū Muslim sent Abū Dāwud Khālid b. Ibrāhīm from the Oxus to Khuttal, and he entered the country. Ḥanash b. al-Subul,[449] the king there, did not oppose him, but the leading men among the dihqāns of Khuttal came to him and put themselves in the fortress with him, while some of them resisted along the roads and in the mountain passes and forts. When Abū Dāwud pressed Ḥanash, he went out from his fortress by night accompanied by his dihqāns and his Shākiriyyah to the land of Farghānah, and from there to the land of the Turks, until he came to the King of China. Abū Dāwud took those he captured among the enemy and crossed back to Balkh, where he sent the captives to Abū Muslim.

In this year 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was slain by Sulaymān, called al-Aswad, who killed him with a safe-conduct he had written for him.

In this year Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī sent Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh to lead the summer expedition behind the frontiers (of the Byzantines). Yaḥyā b.

448. This man had been an early 'Abbāsid partisan. Narshakhī states that his rebellion was in favor of the 'Alids, though Ṭabarī, writing under the 'Abbāsids, draws a veil over his affiliations. Sharīk is quoted as saying that the plagues of the house of 'Abbās should not afflict him, and that the children of the Prophet must be the Prophet's successors. See Narshakhī (trans.), 62.

449. Ibn Athīr gives his name as Ḥubaysh b. al-Shibl (IV, 342).

Muḥammad was removed from the governorship of Mosul, and [75] Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī was appointed in his place. Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī led the Pilgrimage this year, as I was told by Aḥmad b. Thābit—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar. Al-Wāqidī and others say the same.

ʿĪsā b. Mūsā governed Kūfah and its surrounding territory, while Ibn Abī Laylā was in charge of the judiciary there. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī governed Baṣrah, its dependencies, the Tigris districts, Baḥrayn, ʿUmān, ʿIrd[450] and Mihrijānqadhaq. In charge of the judiciary was ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī governed Ahwaz, and Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath governed Fārs. The governor of Sind was Manṣūr b. Jumhūr, and Abū Muslim governed Khurāsān and Jibāl. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī governed Qinnasrīn, Ḥimṣ, the districts of Damascus and the Jordan. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī governed Palestine.

ʿAbd al-Malik b. Yazīd, Abū ʿAwn, governed Egypt; ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Manṣūr governed the Jazīrah. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī governed Mosul, Ṣāliḥ b. Ṣubayḥ governed Armenia, and Mujāshiʿ b. Yazīd was governor of Adharbayjān.

Khālid b. Barmak headed the Landtax Bureau.

450. An ʿirḍ is an Arabian wādī with villages and palms. The ʿIrḍ was a district contiguous to ʿUmān, part of Yamāmah in East Arabia. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam s.v. ʿIrḍ.

THE EVENTS OF THE YEAR

134

(JULY 30, 751–JULY 17, 752)

The Rebellion of Bassām b. Ibrāhīm

In this year Bassām b. Ibrāhīm b. Bassām rebelled and threw off his allegiance.[451] According to what has been mentioned, he was a leading cavalryman of Khurāsān. He left the army of Abū al-ʿAbbās the Commander of the Faithful with a group of sympathizers who sought to keep their departure secret.[452] The Caliph made close inquiries to their purpose and where they were heading, until it was found that they were at Madāʾin. Abū al-ʿAbbās then sent Khāzim b. [76] Khuzaymah after them. When he found Bassām, they came out to fight him. Bassām and his followers were put to flight, and most of them were slain. His camp was destroyed, and Khāzim and his followers went on to pursue them in the district of Jūkhā[453] until he came to Māh. Khāzim slew all of them he encountered, whether they fled or stood to fight. Then Khāzim turned back and passed by Dhāt al-Maṭāmīr, or a village resembling it, where were some of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Kaʿb, of the Banū ʿAbd al-Madān—they were the 451. See Azdī, 140, sub anno 133, who says that Bassām revolted in Tadmur, among the Kalb, and called for an ʿAlid caliphate.

452. The text is mustabshirīn, corrected by the Cairo edition to mustasirrīn.

453. A district along what was then the dried-up eastern bed of the Tigris, stretching northwest to Kaskar. See LeStrange, Lands, 42.

less prestigious maternal kindred of Abū al-ʿAbbās. He passed by them while they were holding a gathering. They were thirty-five men, eighteen being from their own clan and others, and seventeen from their mawlās. Khāzim did not salute them, and as he passed they reviled him.[454] He held a grudge against them already because of what he had heard that they had done regarding al-Mughīrah b. al-Faẓʿ, one of Bassām b. Ibrāhīm's followers who had taken refuge with them. Khāzim wheeled around and went back, and he asked them about al-Mughīrah's stay among them. They replied, "A man passed through here. We did not know him. He stayed in our village one night and left." Then Khāzim said, "You are the maternal relatives of the Commander of the Faithful and his enemy comes to you and finds shelter in your village! Why didn't you get together and seize him?" They gave him a rough answer, whereupon he ordered that all of them be beheaded. Their houses were demolished, and their property plundered. Then he went back to Abū al-ʿAbbās.

Word of what Khāzim had done came to the Yamanī tribesmen, who dwelt on the magnitude of it in full accord. Then Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī went to see Abū al-ʿAbbās with ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ al-Ḥārithī, ʿUthmān b. Nahīk and ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-
[77] Raḥmān, who at that time was chief of security for Abū al-ʿAbbās. They said, "Commander of the Faithful, a servant of yours[455] has dared to do something which the nearest and dearest of your father's sons would not venture to do against you. That is, he has made light of your justice and has slain your maternal relatives. They had left their home and come to you to glory in you, seeking your benevolence—then, when they had come to your abode and sought protection in your vicinity, Khāzim pounced on them and cut off their heads, destroyed their homes, carried off their possessions and ruined their estates, without their having done anything against him!" At this, Abū al-ʿAbbās proposed killing Khāzim, and word of it came to Mūsā b. Kaʿb and Abū al-Jahm b. ʿAṭīyyah. They went to Abū al-ʿAbbās and said, "Word has reached us, Commander of the Faithful, of what these people have said to you against Khāzim, how they have advised you to kill him, and what you have proposed to do

454. Khāzim was a Northern Tamīmī, and they were from the once Christian Yamanī tribe of Najrān and its vicinity, which may have predisposed them to hostility. Khāzim offered offense by not saying "peace" as he rode by.

455. The text is khāzim; read khādim with the Cairo edition.

about this. We invoke God's protection upon you against that. He has a record of obedience and long service. May he be forgiven for what he has done. Your Shī'ah among the people of Khurāsān have preferred you to their closest sons and fathers and brothers, and they killed all those who opposed you. You are the one whom their wrongdoing has strengthened most. If you are absolutely determined on his death, then do not undertake that yourself. Rather, put him among those who are sent where, if he is slain, you will have attained what you desire, and if he is victorious, then his victory will be yours." They advised him to send Khāzim against those of the (Ibāḍī) Khārijites who were in 'Umān, i.e., against al-Julandā and his followers, and against the (Ṣufrī) Khārijites who were on the island of Ibn Kāwān with Shaybān b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Yashkurī. Thus Abū al-'Abbās commanded that he be sent with seven hundred men and wrote to Sulaymān b. 'Alī at Baṣrah to transport them in vessels to the island of Ibn Kāwān and 'Umān. Khāzim then set out.

In this year, Khāzim b. Khuzaymah set out for 'Umān, and attacked the Khārijites situated there. He conquered it and the neighboring lands and slew Shaybān the Khārijite. [78]

The Account of What Occurred in 'Umān

It is mentioned that Khāzim b. Khuzaymah set out at the head of seven hundred men whom Abū al-'Abbās had given him. He also chose men of his house as well as cousins of his and his mawlās and men of Marwarrūdh whom he knew and could depend upon. They went to Baṣrah, where Sulaymān b. 'Alī supplied them with ships, and where a number of the Banū Tamīm at Baṣrah joined him. They sailed until they landed at the island of Ibn Kāwān, and Khāzim sent Naḍalah b. Nu'aym al-Nahshalī with five hundred of his men against Shaybān. They met and fought a violent battle. Shaybān and his followers then took to boats and crossed over to 'Umān. They were Ṣufrīs, and when they came to 'Umān, al-Julandā and his followers, who were Ibāḍīs, stood ready to do combat with them. They fought a pitched battle, and Shaybān and those accompanying him were killed. Then Khāzim set sail with his following until they reached the coast of 'Umān, and there went into the desert. Al-Julandā and his followers encountered them, and they fought a sharp engagement. Many of Khāzim's followers were killed that day. At the time they were on a stretch along the sea. Among those slain was a brother of Khāzim by the same mother, called Ismāʿīl, along with ninety men of the Marwarrūdh contingent. They clashed again on the following day and fought a sharp battle. Commanding Khāzim's right wing was a man from Marwarrūdh called Ḥumayd al-[79] Wartakānī, on his left was a man of Marwarrūdh called Muslim al-Arghadī, and Naḍalah b. Nuʿaym al-Nahshalī was in command of the vanguard. On this day, nine hundred of the Khārijites were killed, and some ninety of them were burned. Seven days later, Khāzim's chief men agreed on an expedient suggested to him by a man of al-Ṣughd who happened to be in that country. He advised him to command his followers to fix tow on the ends of their spears and soak this in naptha and set fire to it, and then go with these and set fire to the dwellings of al-Julandā's followers, which were made of wood and withes. They did this and set fire to the houses. While the Khārijites were busy saving them and their children and families who were in them, Khāzim and his men pressed the attack and laid on with their swords, meeting little resistance from them. Al-Julandā was one of those who were slain, and the number came to ten thousand. Khāzim sent their heads to Baṣrah where they remained some days before being sent to Abū al-ʿAbbās. Khāzim stayed (in ʿUmān) some months until a letter from Abū al-ʿAbbās arrived bidding him to come back, and they returned.

This year Abū Dāwud Khālid b. Ibrāhīm raided the people of Kashsh[456] and killed its ruler, al-Ikhrīd. He was a loyal vassal who had come before this to Abū Dāwud at Balkh. Then he met him at Kandak,[457] near Kashsh. When he slew them Abū Dāwud took from al-Ikhrīd and his followers some ornamented and gilded Chinese vessels, the likes of which had not been seen. He also took Chinese saddles and furnishings, all of brocade and other stuffs, and [80] many rare things of China. He transported all of this to Abū Muslim, who was at Samarqand. Abū Dāwud slew the dihqān of Kashsh along with a number of other dihqāns, but he spared Ṭārān, the brother of al-Ikhrīd, and made him ruler of Kashsh. He took Ibn al-Najāh and returned him to his own country, and Abū Muslim de-

456. Also known as Kash, later as Shahr-i Sabz. It was a town situated in the province of Ṣughd. See LeStrange, Lands, 441–43, 465, 470, 472; EI^{2} s.v. Kash.

457. See LeStrange, Lands, 472.

parted for Marw after slaying some of the people of Ṣughd and Bukhārā. He ordered a wall to be built around Samarqand. He appointed Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ over Ṣughd and Bukhārā, and then Abū Dāwud went back to Balkh.

In this year Abū al-'Abbās sent Mūsā b. Ka'b to India to fight Manṣūr b. Jumhūr.[458] He assigned him monies for three thousand men, Arabs and mawlās of Baṣrah, and a thousand men specifically chosen from the Banū Tamīm. He then set out, and al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr replaced him as chief of security for Abū al-'Abbās, subject to his arrival from Sind. Mūsā met Manṣūr b. Jumhūr at the head of twelve thousand men and put him and his followers to flight. Manṣūr kept going, and died of thirst in the sands.

It has been said that a member of Manṣūr's clan killed him. Manṣūr's lieutenant learned of his defeat at Manṣūrah[459] and set off with Manṣūr's family and treasures. Leaving with them a number of trusted men, he entered the land of the Khazars.[460]

This year Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh died while he was governor of the Yaman, so Abū al-'Abbās wrote to 'Alī b. al-Rabī' b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Ḥārithī, the functionary of Ziyād b. 'Ubaydallāh for Mecca, appointing him as governor of the Yaman. 'Alī then went there.

This same year Abū al-'Abbās moved from Ḥīrah to Anbār.[461] This, according to al-Wāqidī and other authorities, was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 19–July 13, 752).

In this year Ṣāliḥ b. Ṣubayḥ was removed from Armenia, and [81]
Yazīd b. Asīd[462] was appointed in his place. In this year Mujāshi' b. Yazīd was removed from Adharbayjān, and Muḥammad b. Ṣul was appointed for that province.

In this year the beacon system and milestones were set up from

458. Al-Balādhurī states that Abū Muslim appointed another governor for Sind, whom the old Kalbite warrior then slew. At this, Abū Muslim sent Mūsā b. Ka'b. Ṭabarī says the Caliph sent Mūsā and does not say why. See al-Balādhurī, Futuḥ III, p. 343.

459. The capital of Sind. See LeStrange, Lands, 331.

460. The kingdom of Turks and Huns in the south Russian steppes which later converted to Judaism. See EI[2] s.v. Khazar. It is a very long way from Sind to the land of the Khazars.

461. For the 'Abbāsid capital at Anbār known as Hāshimiyyah, see Lassner, 'Abbāsid Rule, 153–57.

462. The text is Usayd. The Cairo edition gives Asīd, a rare name, but here probable. See n. 150 above.

Kūfah to Mecca. The leader of the Pilgrimage was ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, who was governor of Kūfah and its territories.

In charge of the judiciary at Kūfah was Ibn Abī Laylā, and Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh was governor of Mecca, Madīnah, Ṭāʾif and Yamāmah. ʿAlī b. al-Rabīʿ al-Ḥārithī governed the Yaman. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAlī was governor of Baṣrah and the Tigris districts, Baḥrayn, ʿUmān, ʿIrḍ and Mihrijānqadhaq. ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr was in charge of its judiciary. Mūsā b. Kaʿb was governor of Sind; Abū Muslim was governor of Khurāsān and Jibāl; Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī governed Palestine; Abū ʿAwn governed Egypt; Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī governed Mosul; Yazīd b. Asīd governed Armenia; and Muḥammad b. Ṣūl governed Ādharbayjān. The Landtax Bureau was headed by Khālid b. Barmak. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad (Abū Jaʿfar) governed the Jazīrah, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī governed Qinnasrīn, Ḥimṣ, the districts of Damascus and the Jordan.

THE EVENTS OF THE YEAR

135

(JULY 18, 752–JULY 7, 753)

The Rebellion of Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ in Transoxania

Among the events of this year was the rebellion of Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ, beyond the river of Balkh (the Oxus).[463] Abū Muslim set out from [82]
Marw, prepared to encounter him, while Abū Dāwud Khālid b. Ibrāhīm sent Naṣr b. Rāshid to Tirmidh[464] and ordered him to establish himself at the town, to prevent Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ from sending men and gaining possession of the fortress and the boats there. This Naṣr did. He stayed there for some days, and then some of the people of the Rāwandiyyah[465] from Ṭālaqān,[466] led by a man with the pat-

463. For this revolt see Daniel, Khurāsān Under 'Abbāsid Rule, 111–12.

464. The major town of the Ṣaghāniyān district north of the Oxus at its junction with the Zamīl river. It was a great entrepot for trade coming from the north to Khurāsān. See LeStrange, Lands, 240.

465. Named after the village of Rāwand near Naysābūr (Nishāpūr) the Rāwandiyyah were apparently identical with the Hāshimiyyah Shī'ah, who believed that Abū Hāshim b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī had passed the Imāmate to the 'Abbāsids. The Rāwandiyyah included many Iranian converts. See Baghdadī, Farq, trans. by Halkin, 74–75; also Lassner, 'Abbāsid Rule, 109ff.

466. A great city between Balkh and Marwarrūdh. See LeStrange, Lands, 423–24 (Ṭāliqān). Ṭālaqān was the scene of the first great victory won by Abū Muslim. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 129–30 s.v. Junduwayh.

ronymic of Abū Isḥāq,[467] rebelled against him and slew him. When Abū Dāwud learned this, he sent ʿĪsā b. Mahān in pursuit of Naṣr's murderers, and ʿĪsā tracked them down and killed them.

Abū Muslim marched quickly, until he arrived at Āmul.[468] With him was Sibāʿ b. al-Nuʿmān. This was the man who had brought the appointment of Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ on behalf of Abū al-ʿAbbās[469] and ordered him, if he found an opportunity, to fall upon Abū Muslim and slay him. Abū Muslim was informed of that, so he gave Sibāʿ b. Nuʿmān over to al-Ḥasan b. Junayd, his governor at Āmul, and ordered al-Ḥasan to confine him there. Then Abū Muslim crossed over to Bukhārā, and when he halted there, Abū Shākir and Abū Saʿd al-Sharawī came to him with officers who had deserted Ziyād. Abū Muslim questioned them about Ziyād's affair and who had corrupted him. They told him, "It was Sibāʿ b. al-Nuʿmān." At this he wrote to his governor at Āmul to give Sibāʿ a hundred lashes and then behead him. This he did.

When Ziyād's officers betrayed him and went over to Abū Muslim, he fled to the dihqān of Bārkath,[470] but the dihqān pounced on him, cut off his head and brought it to Abū Muslim.

---

467. Ṭabarī is reticent here. This man is Abū Isḥāq Khālid b. ʿUthmān, ʿAbbasīd dāʿī and mawlā of Khuzāʿah, who had once been chief of Abū Muslim's guard. The slaying is linked with rebellion against Abū Muslim among the ʿAbbāsid Shīʿah, possibly fomented by the Caliph and his brother.

468. That is, the Āmul on the Oxus about 120 miles northeast of Marw. See Le-Strange, Lands, 404.

469. Here Ṭabarī lets out the secret. Abū Muslim had appointed Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ, a mawlā of Khuzāʿah and ʿAbbāsid dāʿī, governor of Ṣughd. The Caliph however had sent him a deed of appointment of his own behalf, with instructions to kill Abū Muslim. A key to this covert struggle between the Caliph and the governor of Khurāsān was the control of appointments of governors in the eastern provinces, as we have seen in Fārs and Sind. Balādhurī indicates that the Caliph had appointed Ziyād governor of Khurāsān; no doubt in the event that he could rid him of Abū Muslim. See Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 159–60, quoting Ansāb al-Ashrāf, Paris manuscript, fol. 800b. Abū Muslim apparently intended to appoint the governors of the eastern provinces and wage jihād in Central Asia (and India?) at his own discretion, as the Umayyad viceroys of Iraq and the East had once done. The ʿAbbāsids however planned a more centralized regime. The man the Caliph chose as his messenger to Ziyād b. Ṣāliḥ, Sibāʿ b. Nuʿman al-Azdī, had been a follower of Juday' al-Kirmānī, and then had been appointed by Abū Muslim as his governor for Samarqand (Ṭabarī, II, 2001). Abū al-ʿAbbās had now acquired his services. When Abū Muslim took his revenge on Ziyād, and later on ʿĪsā b. Māhān, however, the Caliph feigned innocence and congratulated Abū Muslim on dealing with them. See Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 161, quoting Balādhurī in the unpublished portion of the Ansāb.

470. Bārkath was the major town of the Būzmajān district one day's journey north-

Abū Dāwud delayed in presenting himself before Abū Muslim, due to the affair of the Rāwandiyyah who had rebelled. At this, Abū Muslim wrote him as follows, "Let your dread be eased and your heart be at peace, for God has slain Ziyād; so come." Abū Dāwud then went to Kashsh and sent ʿĪsā b. Mahān to Bassām.[471] He sent [83] al-Najāḥ to the Ispahbadh at Shāwaghar,[472] and Ibn al-Najāḥ besieged the fortress there. As for the people of Shāwaghar, they asked for peace, and it was granted. As for Bassām, ʿĪsā b. Māhān could get nowhere with him. Then Abū Muslim uncovered sixteen letters from ʿĪsā b. Māhān to Kāmil b. Muẓaffar, the friend of Abū Muslim, in which he blamed Abū Dāwud, accusing him of tribalism (ʿaṣabiyyah), and of preferring Arabs and his own tribe to all people of the ʿAbbāsid movement. ʿĪsā also accused him of having thirty-six tents in his camp for those to whom he had guaranteed protection. These letters Abū Muslim sent to Abū Dāwud, and wrote to him, "These are the letters of a barbarian (ʿilj) whom you rendered even as yourself; do with him as you will." At this, Abū Dāwud wrote ʿĪsā b. Māhān to come back to him from Bassām. When he arrived, he arrested him and handed him over to ʿUmar al-Naghm, at whose hands he remained in confinement. Then after two or three days he sent for ʿĪsā and reminded him of all that he had done for him and how he had preferred him even above his own sons, and he acknowledged all of that. Abū Dāwud then said, "Then the reward for all that I did for you was that you slandered me and desired my death?" This ʿĪsā denied, whereupon Abū Dāwud produced his letters, and he confessed that they were his. Abū Dāwud inflicted two legal punishments on him at that time, one of them on account of al-Ḥasan b. Ḥamdān.[473] Abū Dāwud then said, "As for me, I have left you in east of Samarqand. See LeStrange, Lands, 466. The dihqāns of Central Asia were, for the most part, loyal to Abū Muslim out of fear or self-interest, or both.

---

471. Bassām b. Ibrāhīm was still at large, after leading a pro-ʿAlid revolt against the ʿAbbāsids in 133 (749–750), though where he was is not clear.

472. "Isbahbadh" was a title used by a number of Persian and even Turkish princes. See EI^{2} s.v. Ispahbadh. Shāwaghar was a city in the land of the Turks, probably the one later called Yasi. See LeStrange, Lands, 435. We are not told why Ibn al-Najāḥ was sent there, but as the ʿAbbāsids expanded to the east and the Chinese to the west, the Turkish principalities were being asked to take sides.

473. Ṭabarī mentions this man only here and gives no reason for ʿĪsā's culpability. Narshakhī however mentions one Ḥamzah al-Ḥamdānī, a supporter of Sharīk b. Shaykh at Bukhārā, who was ambushed with his men. See Narshakhī, Frye translation, 63.

your sins, but the army has the final word. Depart in your chains." When he was sent out from the tents, Ḥarb b. Ziyād and Ḥafṣ b. Dīnār, the mawlā of Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn, fell upon him striking him with clubs and battleaxes, and he fell to the ground. Some men of [84] Ṭālaqān[474] and others ran to him, put him in a sack, and struck him with clubs until he died. Abū Muslim then returned to Marw.

Other Events

Sulaymān b. ʿAlī led the Pilgrimage for this year, and he was governor for Baṣrah and its dependencies. ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr was in charge of the judiciary. The governor of Mecca was al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Maʿbad b. ʿAbbās, and the governor of Madīnah was Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī. The governor of Kūfah and its territory was ʿIsā b. Mūsā, and Ibn Abī Laylā was in charge of the judiciary. Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr was governor of the Jazīrah, and Abū ʿAwn was governor of Egypt. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī governed Ḥimṣ, Qinnasrīn, Baʿalbakk, the Ghūṭah, Ḥawrān, the Jawlān, and the Jordan. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī was governor of the Balqāʾ and Palestine, and Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī governed Mosul. Muḥammad b. Ṣūl was governor for Ādharbayjān, and Khālid b. Barmak headed the Landtax Bureau.

474. Ibn Māhān may have slain relatives of theirs in fighting the Rāwandiyyah of Ṭalaqān. Wrapping him in a sack and beating him to death in concert would have avoided any specific guilt for killing him for which revenge could be exacted from an individual.

THE EVENTS OF THE YEAR 136

(JULY 7, 753–JUNE 26, 754)

In this year Abū Muslim came to Iraq from Khurāsān to visit Abū al-ʿAbbās the Commander of the Faithful.

What Happened When Abū Muslim Came to the Caliph

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—al-Haytham b. ʿAdī, also al-Walīd b. Hishām—his father: Abū Muslim stayed on in Khurāsān until finally he wrote to Abū al-ʿAbbās requesting permission to present himself. The Caliph assented to this, and Abū Muslim came to Abū al-ʿAbbās at Anbār with an enormous contingent of the Khurāsān [85] army, as well as others who followed him. Abū al-ʿAbbās ordered the important people to go and meet him, and they did. Then he went to where Abū al-ʿAbbās was, and went in to meet him. Abū al-ʿAbbās made much of him and showed him favor. Then he requested Abū al-ʿAbbās's permission to go on the Pilgrimage, and he told him, "If only Abū Jaʿfar were not making the Pilgrimage this year, I would have made you my appointee for the Pilgrimage season." He lodged Abū Muslim close by, and each day the latter would present himself and offer his respects. There was however a coolness between Abū Jaʿfar and Abū Muslim, because Abū al-ʿAbbās had sent Abū Jaʿfar to Abū Muslim when he was at Naysābūr, after matters regarding Abū Muslim's rule in Khurāsān were described to him, to exact his allegiance to Abū al-ʿAbbās and to Abū Jaʿfar as his heir. Abū Muslim and the army of Khurāsān had given the oath of allegiance to him, and Abū Jaʿfar stayed there for some days until he was finished with the matter of the oath. He then left, but Abū Muslim had slighted Abū Jaʿfar upon his arrival, and when he came back to Abū al-ʿAbbās he told him how he had been slighted.

According to ʿAlī—al-Walīd—his father: When Abū Muslim came to Abū al-ʿAbbās, Abū Jaʿfar told the Caliph, "Commander of the Faithful, tell me and I will kill Abū Muslim, for by God, his head is full of treachery." However, Abū al-ʿAbbās said "My brother, you know the tests he has come through and what has happened because of him." Abū Jaʿfar replied, "Commander of the Faithful, that was only because of our revolution. By God, if you had sent a cat, it would have taken his place and done what he has done for this revolution." Then Abū al-ʿAbbās said, "How could we slay him?" Abū Jaʿfar replied, "When he has come in to see you and you are engaging him in conversation, while he is in front of you, I could come in and take him unawares and strike him a blow from behind that would take his life." Abū al-ʿAbbās said, "And what of his followers who hold him above their religion and all the world?" He replied, "All [86] will result as you would desire. If they know he is already slain they will split up and be tractable." Abū al-ʿAbbās told him, "I beseech you not to carry this out." Abū Jaʿfar replied, "By God, I fear that if you do not breakfast on him today, he will dine on you tomorrow." The Caliph replied, "Then it is up to you. You know best [how to handle it]."

Abū Jaʿfar left his presence determined to carry it out, but Abū al-ʿAbbās had regrets and sent word to him, "Do not do that thing."

It is said that when Abū al-ʿAbbās had given Abū Jaʿfar permission to kill Abū Muslim, the latter came in to see the Caliph. Abū al-ʿAbbās sent a eunuch of his, saying, "Go see what Abū Jaʿfar is doing." He came to Abū Jaʿfar and found him sitting on his heels propped up by his sword. He asked the eunuch, "Is the Commander of the Faithful sitting in audience?" He replied, "He is just ready to sit." Then the eunuch went back to Abū al-ʿAbbās and told him what he had seen. At this, Abū al-ʿAbbās sent him back to Abū Jaʿfar, saying, "Tell him, 'Do not carry out the matter you have determined upon.'" At this Abū Jaʿfar desisted.

It was in this year that Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr led the Pilgrimage, and Abū Muslim went on the Pilgrimage with him.

Their Journey and a Description of Their Return to Abū al-'Abbās

As for Abū Muslim, according to what is mentioned, when he wished to present himself before Abū al-'Abbās, he also wrote asking for permission to go on the pilgrimage. This was granted. Abū al-'Abbās told him to come with five hundred soldiers, and Abū Muslim wrote, "I have irritated important people and am not sure that my life would be safe." Abū al-'Abbās then wrote him, "Come with a thousand. After all, you will be within the sovereignty of your own family and your own revolution. The road to Mecca will not bear any army." He set off at the head of eight thousand, and thinned them out between Naysābūr and Rayy. He brought with him great [87] wealth and treasures, and left these at Rayy. He also gathered together the money of Jibāl,[475] and then left Rayy with a thousand men and came on. When he was ready to enter (the capital), the officers and various important people went to meet him. He then sought Abū al-'Abbās's permission to make the pilgrimage, and he granted it to him, saying, "If only Abū Ja'far were not making the pilgrimage I should appoint you to lead it this season."

As for Abū Ja'far, he was the governor of the Jazīrah. According to al-Wāqidī, besides the Jazīrah, Abū Ja'far had Armenia and Ādharbayjān. He chose Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-'Akkī as his deputy, and he came to Abū al-'Abbās and asked his permission to make the pilgrimage.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Walīd b. Ḥishām—his father: Abū Ja'far went to Mecca as a pilgrim and Abū Muslim made the pilgrimage with him in the year 136 (753–754). When the season of the pilgrimage was at an end, Abū Ja'far and Abū Muslim started back. When they were between Bustān and Dhāt 'Irq,[476] a letter 475. The text is al-Jabal. The province of Jibāl must be intended, and the textual apparatus supports such a reading.

476. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 651 for Dhāt 'Irq. The reference to Bustān is to Bustān b. 'Amīr, also known as Bustān b. Ma'mar. See Yāqūt, I, 611. The letter arrived when Abū Ja'far and Abū Muslim were still in the pilgrimage territory.

came for Abū Jaʿfar that Abū al-ʿAbbās had died. Abū Jaʿfar who had preceded Abū Muslim by one stage, wrote to him, "Something has happened. Come quickly, quickly." The messenger arrived and informed Abū Muslim, who came on and joined Abū Jaʿfar, and together they came on to Kūfah.

In this year Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī had had the oath taken to his brother, Abū Jaʿfar, to have the caliphate after him. He made him the heir-apparent of the Muslims, with ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī as his successor. The Caliph recorded the deed of these appointments in a document, placed it in a container, sealed it with his own seal and the seals of his family, and entrusted it to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā.[477]

This year Abū al-ʿAbbās the Commander of the Faithful died at Anbār on Sunday, the thirteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 136 (June 10, 754). His death is said to have been due to smallpox.

[88] According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: He died on the twelfth night of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 9, 754). There is a difference as to his age when he died; some have said he was thirty-three. Hishām b. Muḥammad says he was thirty-six years old, while others say he was twenty-eight.

His reign, from the time that Marwān b. Muḥammad was slain, lasted four years. From the time that he was acclaimed Caliph until he died, he ruled four years and eight months; some say nine. According to al-Wāqidī, he ruled four years and eight months, of which he spent eight months and four days fighting Marwān. He then reigned four years after the death of Marwān.

According to what is mentioned, he had curly hair, and was tall and white-skinned, with a hooked nose and a handsome face and beard. His mother was Rayṭah bt. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Madān b. al-Dayyān al-Ḥārithī. His wazīr was Abū al-Jahm b. ʿAṭiyyah.

His paternal uncle ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī prayed over him and buried him in his palace in the old city of Anbār. According to what is mentioned in the sources, he left behind nine full-sleeved gowns, four long gowns, five pairs of trousers, four cloaks, and three silk gowns.

477. The significance of Abū Jaʿfar's appointment is discussed in Lassner, ʿAbbāsid Rule, 19–38.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXVIII

ʿAbbāsid Authority Affirmed

TRANSLATED BY JANE DAMMEN McAULIFFE

The Events of the Year

136 (cont'd)[1]

(July 7, 753–June 26, 754)

In this year the oath of allegiance[2] was given to Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr[3] on the day that his brother Abū al-ʿAbbās[4] died. Abū

1. Other sources for this part of the year 136: Fragmenta historicorum, I, 215–17; Khalīfah b. Khayyāt, Taʾrīkh, II, 437–41; Ibn Qutaybah, al-Maʿārif, 377; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 375–76; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 436–37; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 158–64; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 156–57; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 461–63; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 159–61; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 61; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 384–85; Suyūṭī, Khulafāʾ, 259–60.

2. The bayʿah is defined by Ibn Khaldūn as "a contract to render obedience." Muqaddimah, I, 428; EI^{2}, s.v. (E. Tyan).

3. Abū Jaʿfar ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī was the second ʿAbbāsid caliph, his twenty-one-year reign following that of his brother, al-Saffāḥ; EI^{2}, s.v. (H. Kennedy). On his regnal titles "al-Manṣūr," see Lewis, "Regnal Titles"; Sharon, Black Banners, 176–77; Omar, ʿAbbāsiyyāt, 142–44; Hassuri, "Epithets."

4. Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Saffāḥ, the great-great-grandson of the Prophet's uncle, was hailed as caliph by the revolutionary generals in al-Kūfah on 12 Rabīʿ II 132 (November 28, 749). After a reign of less than five years, he died at about the age of thirty years on 13 Dhū al-Ḥijjah/June 10. EI^{1}, s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); EI^{2}, s.v. (S. Moscati); Ṭabarī, III, 87–88; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 46–56; Amedroz, "Laqab ʿal-Saffāḥ'."

Jaʿfar being at the time in Mecca, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā[5] was the one who received the oath of allegiance in Iraq on behalf of Abū Jaʿfar after the death of Abū al-ʿAbbās. ʿĪsā then wrote to inform him of the [89] fact that his brother Abū al-ʿAbbās had died and that the oath of allegiance had been rendered to him [as caliph].

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad[6]—al-Haytham[7]—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAyyāsh:[8] When Abū al-ʿAbbās was near death, he ordered the people to render the oath of allegiance to Abū Jaʿfar ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad. Accordingly, the people gave the oath of allegiance to him in al-Anbār[9] on the day that Abū al-ʿAbbās died. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā assumed executive authority and sent Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn al-ʿAbdī[10] to Abū Jaʿfar (who was then in Mecca) to report to him on the death of Abū al-ʿAbbās and on the oath of allegiance. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn met Abū Jaʿfar at a place on the road called Zakiyyah. When the letter was delivered to him, Abū Jaʿfar called the people together, and they gave their oath of alle-

---

5. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, the nephew and heir-designate of al-Saffāḥ, served as governor of al-Kūfah under both al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr. According to Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 76, his was the "second longest tenure of any governor during the early Abbasid period," EI², s.v. (D. Sourdel); Zambaur, Manuel, 43.

6. Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī (d. 225?/840) was a prominent early historian who was born in al-Baṣrah and died in Baghdad, and the titles, of whose books may, for the most part, be culled only from the quotes and citations of later authors. EI², s.v. (U. Sezgin); GAS, I, 314–15; GAL, I, 140–41; Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, VII, 211; Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung"; Dūrī, Historical Writing, 48–50 and passim; Petersen, ʿAlī and Muʿâwiya, 92–99 and passim.

7. Al-Haytham b. ʿAdī al-Ṭāʾī (d. 206?/821) was a frequently quoted historian, genealogist (although his reliability as both did not go unquestioned), and attendant at the early ʿAbbāsid courts, including that of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr. EI², s.v. (C. Pellat); GAS, I, 272; GAL, I, 140; Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, XIII, 156; Dūrī, Historical Writing, 53–54 and passim; Goldziher, Muslim Studies, I, 177–80.

8. Abū al-Jarrāḥ ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAyyāsh al-Mantūf al-Hamdānī was an akhbārī, genealogist, transmitter of poetry, and frequenter of al-Manṣūr's court. The genesis of his laqab, "the one whose beard was plucked," is recounted by Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 393–94. Although Ṣafadī gives a death date of 158, the year in which al-Manṣūr died, Caetani, Cronographia generale, 97, places him in the necrology of 136. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, X, 14–16.

9. Al-Anbār, "the Storehouses," was a city on the Euphrates, some fifty-five kilometers west of Baghdad, that served as the ʿAbbāsid capital under Abū al-ʿAbbās and remained so for Abū Jaʿfar until the development of Baghdad. EI², s.v. (M. Streck and A. A. Duri); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 257–58; Cornu, Répertoires, 45; Le Strange, Lands, 31–32, 65–66.

10. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn al-ʿAbdī is recorded as the governor of Ahwāz (Khūzistān) in 145. Ṭabarī, III, 301.

giance to him. Abū Muslim[11] also rendered the oath of allegiance to him. Abū Jaʿfar asked, "Where are we?" When he was told that the place was called "Zakiyyah," he [punned upon the place name and] said, "Things will go well for us,[12] God willing!" Some sources have said that after finishing the Pilgrimage Abū Jaʿfar received his oath of allegiance at a stage on the Mecca highway called Ṣufayyah.[13] He thought the name auspicious, and [playing upon the word] he exclaimed, "It [the caliphate] has become ours alone,[14] God willing!"[15]

To return to the account of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—al-Walīd[16]— his father: When the news of Abū al-ʿAbbās' death reached Abū Jaʿfar, he wrote to Abū Muslim, who was then encamped at a watering place, whereas Abū Jaʿfar had already gone on ahead of him. Abū Muslim then moved forward until he reached Abū Jaʿfar. [90]

Additionally, other sources have said that Abū Muslim was the one who had advanced beyond Abū Jaʿfar and had, therefore, discovered the news of the caliph's death before him, so it was he who wrote to Abū Jaʿfar:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. May God keep you in good estate and give you enjoyment. I have heard something that has upset me deeply and has effected me as nothing before. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥuṣayn met me as he was carrying a letter to you from ʿĪsā b. Mūsā about the death of Abū al-ʿAbbās, the Commander of the Faithful, may God have mercy upon him. We ask God to magnify greatly your future recompense,

---

11. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim was a revolutionary leader of the ʿAbbāsid movement in Khurāsān and governor of that province. His name is later associated with both religious heterodoxies and literary romances. EI[1], s.v. (W. Barthold); EI[2], s.v. (S. Moscati); Moscati, "Abū Muslim"; Mélikoff, Abū Muslim; Daniel, Khurasan, 100–24; Lassner, "Origins."

12. Amr yazkā lanā.

13. Yāqūt (via al-Aṣmaʿī) identifies this as a watering place for the Banū Asad, lying near a hill and a stony tract. Buldān, III, 415.

14. Ṣafat lanā.

15. As Moscati notes, the radicals of both place-names permit the expression of a propitious signification. "Abū Muslim. III," 92, n3.

16. Ṭabarī, Indices, identifies him as al-Walīd b. Hishām b. Qaḥdham or al-Qaḥdhamī.

> to give you a good caliphate, and to bless you in whatever you do. Truly among your people there is no one who asserts your claim more vigorously, who counsels you with a purer heart, and who is more desirous of what would please you than I.

Abū Muslim dispatched the letter to Abū Jaʿfar but waited out that day, and only on the next did he send his oath of allegiance to him, intending thus to intimidate Abū Jaʿfar.

To return to the account of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: After Abū Muslim had sat down with him, Abū Jaʿfar tossed the letter announcing Abū al-ʿAbbās's death to him. He read it and wept, then piously invoked the formula "To God we belong and to Him is our return."[17] Abū Muslim looked at Abū Jaʿfar, who appeared to be very uneasy, and said to him, "Why this alarm when the caliphate is already yours?" Abū Jaʿfar replied, "I fear the malice of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī[18] and those loyal to (shīʿah) ʿAlī."[19] Abū Muslim responded, "Do not be afraid of him; God willing, I will deal with the problem of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī for you. The rank and file of his army and associates are Khurāsānī[20] troops, and they will surely not disobey me!" At this Abū Jaʿfar felt his anxiety relieved. Abū Muslim rendered him the oath of allegiance, as did all the other people present, and the two of them continued on until they reach al-Kūfah.[21]

---

17. Qurʾān, 2:156. According to Lane, Lexicon, III, 1040, the verb istarjaʿa signifies the repetition of this Qurʾānic formula in moments of affliction. Lings, Sufi Saint, 41, attests to this "much loved and often repeated verse which the Qoran recommends especially for recitation in time of adversity."

18. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, the uncle of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, was commander of the ʿAbbāsid forces in the critical battle against the last Umayyad caliph, Marwān II. EI^{2}, s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen and S. Moscati). Historical sources record his large-scale exterminations, and Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 321, dubs him "one of the most cunning men." Tuqan, "ʿAbdallāh ibn ʿAlī."

19. The shīʿah of ʿAlī (b. Abī Ṭālib) represented a rival claim to valid dynastic succession from the Prophet Muḥammad. While in this period the connotation of the term shīʿah was still somewhat loose, the competing claims associated with the ʿAbbāsid and the Ḥasanids are represented in the exchange of letters between Abū Jaʿfar and the ʿAlid pretender, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh in the year 145.

20. Khurāsān was a large easterly region, comprising parts of what are now Iran, Afghanistan, and Soviet Central Asia, that was the center of ʿAbbāsid revolutionary activity. EI^{2}, s.v. (C. E. Bosworth).

21. Al-Kūfah, a military establishment on the Euphrates, became one of the principal political and cultural centers of the early Islamic world. EI^{2}, s.v. (H. Djaït).

Abū Jaʿfar sent Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh[22] back to Mecca, Ziyād having previously been governor both of it and of Medina under Abū al-ʿAbbās. Some sources recount that before he died Abū al-ʿAbbās had removed Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī as governor of Mecca and appointed al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Maʿbad b. al-ʿAbbās[23] in his stead. [91]

In this year ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī came to Abū al-ʿAbbās at al-Anbār, where the caliph entrusted him with responsibility for the summer campaign[24] at the head of forces drawn from Khurāsān, Syria, the Jazīrah,[25] and al-Mawṣil.[26] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī marched forth and got as far as Dulūk,[27] but he had not advanced into enemy territory at the time when news of Abū al-ʿAbbās's death came to him.[28]

In this year ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and Abū al-Jahm[29] sent Abū Ghassān Yazīd b. Ziyād[30] to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī to receive his oath of alle-

22. Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbd al-Madān al-Ḥārithī, maternal uncle of the first ʿAbbāsid caliph, was appointed governor of Mecca and Medina in 133, keeping this position until 141, except for the year 136 when the post was assigned to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh. Zambaur, Manuel, 20, 24. Ziyād's rise as a young army recruit under the tutelage of the Baṣran governor and general, Khālid al-Qasrī, is sketched in Crone, Slaves, 55.

23. Zambaur, Manuel, 20. Ṭabarī, III, 121, records his death in 137. See Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 439.

24. The summer raids (ṣawāʾif, sing. ṣāʾifah) against the Byzantine border positions were regular features of Umayyad and ʿAbbāsid military policy.

25. The Jazīrah was the northern province between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. *EI*², s.v. al-Djazīra (M. Canard); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 134–36.

26. Al-Mawṣil was a principal city in the Jazīrah; it lay across the Tigris from the site of ancient Nineveh. *EI*², s.v. (E. Honigmann and C. E. Bosworth); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 223–25.

27. Dulūk was a frontier fortress town on the Anatolian-Syrian border almost due north of Aleppo (Ḥalab). *EI*², s.v. (D. Sourdel); Cornu, Répertoires, 17; Dussaud, Topographie, 472, 478–79; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 461.

28. See Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 437, who contradicts this statement, and Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 159. Azdī later (p. 163) cites ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's location as Dābiq, also a city near Aleppo.

29. Abū Jahm b. ʿAṭīyah, a mawlā of the Bāhilah, is listed by Ṭabarī, III, 88, as al-Saffāḥ's vizier. Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 71, questions the significance of this when contrasted with other mentions in both Ṭabarī and Jahshiyārī. Goitein, Studies, 173; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 112, 136; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 165; Caetani, Cronografia generale, 82; Zambaur, Manuel, 6.

30. Abū Ghassān Yazīd b. Ziyād was a chamberlain of Abū al-ʿAbbās and son of the governor of Mecca and Medina, Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh. See note 22, above; Crone, Slaves, 149; Fragmenta historicorum, I, 217; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 437.

giance to al-Manṣūr. But ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī proceeded to Ḥarrān[31] with his accompanying forces, who had already sworn the oath of allegiance to ʿAbdallāh.

Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr led the Pilgrimage in this year. We have already mentioned his governorship and the one to whom he delegated it while he was away as a pilgrim.[32]

The governor of al-Kūfah was ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, while the head of its judiciary was Ibn Abī Laylā.[33] Sulaymān b. ʿAlī[34] was governor of al-Baṣrah and its subdistricts, while ʿAbbād b. al-Manṣūr[35] headed its judiciary. The governor of Medina was Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī; of Mecca, al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Maʿbad; and of Egypt, Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī.[36]

---

31. Ḥarrān, an ancient city in the Jazīrah, served as capital for the last Umayyad caliph, Marwān II. EI^{2}, s.v. (G. Fehérvári); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 235–36; Cornu, Répertoires, 18; Dussaud, Topographie, 481–82, 489, 495; Le Strange, Lands, 103, 124.

32. Abū Jaʿfar was governor of the Jazīrah and, according to al-Wāqidī, of Armenia and Ādharbayjān as well. His deputy during the Pilgrimage period was Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-ʿAkkī. Ṭabarī, III, 87, 93.

33. Abū ʿĪsā Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā (d. 148/765), a prominent judge (serving as that of al-Kūfah for thirty-three years), jurisprudent (faqīh), and teacher of Qurʾānic recitation (muqriʾ). EI^{2}, s.v. (J. Schacht); Ṣafadī, Wāfī, III, 221–23; Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 310–16; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 268–69; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, IV, 179–81.

34. Abū Ayyūb Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās (d. 142/759) was an uncle of Abū al-ʿAbbās and Abū Jaʿfar and governor of al-Baṣrah under both of them. As one charged with responsibility for the Pilgrimage season during the caliphate of al-Saffāḥ, he is remembered for marking that event by the annual manumission of 100 slaves. Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 162–63; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 406; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 185; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 20, 34; Zambaur, Manuel, 40.

35. Abū Salamah ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr al-Nājī (d. 152/769), whose reliability as a muḥaddith was questioned, served five appointments as the chief justice of al-Baṣrah. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 270; Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 105–6; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 612–13; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 90–91; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 174.

36. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās (d. circa 151/768) was an uncle of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr who commanded the expedition that pursued Marwān II to his death in Egypt. He was successively the governor of Egypt and of Syria. EI^{1}, s.v. (A. Grohmann); Kindī, Wulāh, 97–101; Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 18–19; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 100–1; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 264–65; Zambaur, Manuel, 26, 28. Balog, "Pious Invocations," 63–65, notes the use of specific formulas associated with his name to be found on early Egyptian glass.

The Events of the Year 137

(JUNE 27, 754–JUNE 15, 755)

[92]

Among the events of this year were the arrival of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr from Mecca and his encampment at al-Ḥīrah.[37] He found that ʿĪsā b. Mūsā had already left for al-Anbār, having appointed Ṭalḥah b. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath[38] to take his place in al-Kūfah. Abū Jaʿfar entered al-Kūfah and led its people in the Friday prayer.[39] He preached to them and told them that he would be

37. Al-Ḥīrah was a town just south of al-Kūfah that served as capital of the pre-Islamic Lakhmid domain. EI[1], s.v. (F. Buhl); EI[2], s.v. (A. F. L. Beeston and I. Shahid); Cornu, Répertoires, 29; Le Strange, Lands, 75; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 328–31; Lassner, Shaping, 143–51. On the signification of this toponym, see Lammens, "La «bādia» et la «ḥīra» sous les Omayyades: Le problème de Mśattā," in his Études, 325–50.

38. Ṭalḥah b. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath al-Kindī was the son of an Umayyad general and one of several descendants of Ashʿath b. Qays al-Kindī, who played a "modest role in the local politics of Kufa." More lasting prestige has accrued to their ninth-century kinsman, the philosopher Abū Yūsuf Yaʿqūb b. Isḥāq al-Kindī. Crone, Slaves, 111; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 313; Bligh-Abramski, "Evolution versus Revolution," 232.

39. The Friday ṣalāt is an occasion of mandated communal worship. Its leadership constituted one of the symbolic acts by which caliphal legitimacy was recognized in the early Islamic period. Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, II, 70–73.

leaving them.[40] Abū Muslim appeared before him in al-Ḥīrah. Then Abū Jaʿfar left for al-Anbār and took up residence there, collecting his men about him.[41]

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—al-Walīd—his father: ʿĪsā b. Mūsā had put a guard on the treasuries, storehouses, and government offices by the time Abū Jaʿfar reached him at al-Anbār. The people gave the oath of allegiance to Abū Jaʿfar as caliph, then to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā as his successor. Then ʿĪsā b. Mūsā turned over authority to Abū Jaʿfar. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā had already sent Abū Ghassān, whose name was Yazīd b. Ziyād and who was the chamberlain of Abū al-ʿAbbās, to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī to receive his oath of allegiance to Abū Jaʿfar. That was done by order of Abū al-ʿAbbās, who before he died had commanded the people to give the oath of allegiance to Abū Jaʿfar after him [i.e., as his successor].

Abū Ghassān reached ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī at the entrance to the mountain passes when the latter was starting out on his campaign against the Byzantines. He was encamped at a place called Dulūk at the time when Abū Ghassān came to him with news of Abū al-ʿAbbās's death. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī ordered a herald to announce a general gathering for the ritual prayer. The army commanders and troops gathered around him, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī read to them the death announcement for Abū al-ʿAbbās, but then called upon the people to support his own claim to the caliphate.[42] He told them that, at the time when Abū al-ʿAbbās wanted to send forces against Marwān b. Muḥammad,[43] he had [93] summoned his paternal brothers and urged them to move out against Marwān b. Muḥammad. He had said, "Whoever of you rises up and proceeds against him will be my heir apparent."[44]

---

40. Abū Jaʿfar's action echoes that of Abū al-ʿAbbās, who less than five years earlier also gave his coronation speech from the minbar in al-Kūfah. Ṭabarī, III, 29–30.

41. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ṭarafa.

42. Fragmenta historicorum, I, 216–17; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 375; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 437–38; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 159, 163; Agapius, Kitāb al-ʿunwān, 373–74.

43. Marwān II, known as Marwān the Onager, or Wild Ass (al-ḥimār), or Marwān the Tight-fisted (al-jaʿdī), was the Umayyad caliph whose defeat ushered in the ʿAbbāsid era. EI[1], s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 74–77.

44. When presented in the account of the battle at the river Zāb, the dialogue between Abū al-ʿAbbās and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī does not include this promise. Ṭabarī, III, 38. On the institution of walī al-ʿahd, see Kennedy, "Succession Disputes," 29–30.

[ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī continued,] "No one but me declared for him. It was thus that I left Abū al-ʿAbbās and killed those whom I killed."

Abū Ghānim al-Ṭāʾī[45] and Khufāf[46] al-Marwarrūdhī[47] stood up with a number of the Khurāsānī commanders and testified to the truth of what ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī had said. Therefore Abū Ghānim, Khufāf, Abū al-Aṣbagh, and all of the army commanders who were present rendered the oath of allegiance to him. Among them were Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah,[48] Khufāf al-Jurjānī, Ḥayyāsh b. Ḥabīb,[49] Mukhāriq b. Ghifār,[50] and Turārkhudā,[51] as well as others from Khurāsān, Syria, and the Jazīrah.

At this point ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī was encamped at Tall Muḥammad.[52] When he had finished receiving the oath of allegiance, he set out to make camp at Ḥarrān, where Muqātil al-ʿAkkī,[53] whom Abū Jaʿfar had appointed as his deputy when he

---

45. Abū Ghānim ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Ribʿī al-Ṭāʾī, one of the seventy duʿāt (sing. dāʿī, the chief proselytes of the ʿAbbāsid movement), served under Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, fought in the battle of the Zāb, and numbered among those who swore allegiance to Abū al-ʿAbbās in the council that proclaimed him caliph. Ṭabarī, II, 2001, III, 15, 28; *EI*², s.v. Dāʿī (M. G. S. Hodgson); Akhbār al-dawlah, 221; Crone, Slaves, 174–75. Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 163, records him as Abū Ghānim al-Kindī.

46. Khufāf b. Manṣūr al-Jurjānī, whose attempt to organize an attack against the caliph is recounted in Ṭabarī, III, 127, is listed only as Khufāf in Fragmenta historicorum, I, 217.

47. Marw al-Rūdh is a city in Khurāsān known to the classical geographers as "upper Marw" or "little Marw." *EI*², s.v. (C. E. Bosworth); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 112; Cornu, Répertoires, 152; Le Strange, Lands, 404–5.

48. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb al-Ṭāʾī (d. 159/775–76) was a son of the prominent revolutionary general Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb (*EI*², s.v. Ḳaḥṭaba b. Shabīb [M. Sharon]). Under al-Manṣūr he was governor of the Jazīrah, of Egypt, and of Khurāsān. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIII, 199; Kindī, Wulāh, 110–11. For use of the formula aṣlaḥahu allāh in association with him, see Balog, "Pious Invocations," 64.

49. See Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVI, for a citation from Balādhurī's Ansāb al-ashrāf as Jannāsh and Ḥabbāsh. At the battle of the Zāb he was charged with ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's police force (shurṭah). Ṭabarī, III, 38.

50. Presumbably a genealogical affiliation with the Banū Ghifār (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 42, II, 275), but textual variants include al-ʿIqān and al-ʿAffār. For the incident in which Mukhāriq tricked the Umayyad caliph Marwān II, see Ṭabarī, III, 39–40.

51. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 330.

52. A tall is a hill or mound. There is no mention of this site in the standard geographical sources.

53. Muqātil b. Ḥakīm al-ʿAkkī is listed by some sources as one of the alternates (nuẓarāʾ al-nuqabāʾ) to the twelve chiefs (nuqabāʾ, sing. naqīb) who were selected to direct the ʿAbbāsid movement. He fought for the ʿAbbāsid cause under went out to meet Abū al-ʿAbbās, was in residence. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī urged Muqātil to offer him the oath of allegiance as caliph. Muqātil, however, refused to oblige him and fortified himself against ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī. The latter took action against him, besieging Muqātil until he had forced him to leave his stronghold. Then he killed him.[54]

Abū Jaʿfar then sent Abū Muslim to fight ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī.[55] When word of Abū Muslim's approach reached ʿAbdallāh, he decided to halt at Ḥarrān. Abū Jaʿfar had said to Abū Muslim, "Either you or I must go [and deal with it]," so Abū Muslim marched toward ʿAbdallāh at Ḥarrān.[56] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī had already gathered troops and weapons to himself, had dug trenches and collected food, fodder, and whatever else he would need. Abū Muslim thus left al-Anbār in company with every last one of the army commanders, and dispatched Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzāʾī[57] to lead his vanguard. With him were al-Ḥasan[58] and

---

Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb and in 136 was appointed Abū Jaʿfar's deputy when the latter served as governor of the Jazīrah. Ṭabarī, III, 4–5, 87; Akhbār al-dawlah, 220; Crone, Slaves, 185–86. Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 438, gives Mūsā b. Kaʿb as governor of Ḥarrān at the time of ʿAbdallāh's arrival. Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, I, 46, cites Muqātil's death at the hand of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī in connection with that of one of the duʿāt, Abū ʿAmmārah Muḥammad b. Ṣūl.

54. Fragmenta historicorum, I, 217, mentions the seige but not the murder of Muqātil.

55. For the encounter between ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and Abū Muslim, see Fragmenta historicorum, I, 217–19; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 441; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 375; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 438–9; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 103; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 164; Theophanes, Chronicle, 117–18; Agapius, Kitāb al-ʿunwān, 374–75.

56. Cahen, "Points de vue," 332, suggests that Abū Muslim's willingness to accept this commission from the caliph, despite the latter's growing animosity, may lie in their having "quelques secrets de trop en commun."

57. Abū Naṣr Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzāʾī was a leading figure in the ʿAbbāsid revolution, head of Abū Muslim's security forces, and one of his trusted advisers. Although Abū Jaʿfar chastised him for his association with Abū Muslim (Ṭabarī, III, 117), five years later he appointed Mālik governor of al-Mawṣil. Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 177–78; Daniel, Khurasan, 115–16; Crone, Slaves, 181; Sharon, Black Banners, 192.

58. Al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb al-Ṭāʾī (d. 181/797), brother of al-Ḥumayd (see note 48) and eventually governor of Armenia, occupied al-Kūfah in the early months of 132, clearing the way for the proclamation there of Abū al-ʿAbbās as caliph on 12 Rabīʿ II (or Rabīʿ I). Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XII, 208 (where he is identified as one of the important generals during the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd); Ṭabarī, III, 23; Caetania, Cronografia generale, 112; Crone, Slaves, 188; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 354.

Ḥumayd, the sons of Qaḥṭabah.[59] Ḥumayd had already withdrawn his allegiance from ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, so ʿAbdallāh wanted [94] to kill him. Abū Isḥāq[60] and his brother and Abū Ḥumayd[61] and his brother, as well as a contingent of the Khurāsānī troops, joined him in this campaign. At the time that he left the province, Abū Muslim had appointed Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm[62] as his deputy in Khurāsān.

Al-Haytham said: ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's siege of Muqātil al-ʿAkkī lasted forty nights [and forty days]. When news of Abū Muslim's approach reached ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, he, not having yet defeated Muqātil and fearing that Abū Muslim would attack him, offered al-ʿAkkī a pledge of safe-conduct (amān).[63] Muqātil at the head of his confederates came out to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's camp and stayed there for a few days. Then ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī sent Muqātil, together with his two sons, to ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Surāqah al-Azdī[64] at al-Raqqah.[65] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī wrote a letter to ʿUthmān

59. Abū ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb b. Khālid b. Maʿdān al-Ṭāʾī (d. 132/749), one of the twelve chiefs (nuqabāʾ) of the ʿAbbāsid revolution, died in the final days of battle before the occupation of al-Kūfah. Akhbār al-dawlah, 216; *EI*², s.v. (M. Sharon); Crone, Slaves, 188; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 191. Shacklady explores his father's connections with the ʿAbbāsid family in "ʿAbbāsid Movement in Khurāsan," 103–4.

60. Abū Isḥāq Khālid b. ʿUthmān al-Mikhrāsh was from the Khurāsānī village of al-Mākhwān, a site that Abū Muslim used as a fortified encampment during the period of revolt. As commander of the guard (ḥaras), Abū Isḥāq served as a member of the military government Abū Muslim established before the occupation of Marw in 130. Ṭabarī, II, 1967, 1989.

61. Abū Ḥumayd al-Marwarrūdhī was an officer who served under Qaḥṭabah during the ʿAbbāsid revolt. In 132 he was appointed governor of Manbij in the Jazīrah by ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī during the latter's pursuit of Marwān II. Ṭabarī, II, 2001; III, 47; Crone, Slaves, 175.

62. Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm, a naqīb from the Banū ʿAmr b. Shaybān, became governor of Khurāsān after Abū Muslim's death. The peculiar circumstances of his death are related in the chapter on year 140. Ṭabari, II, 1988; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 104–5; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 72; Zambaur, Manuel, 47.

63. For amān, see *EI*² s.v. (J. Schacht). For the symbolic use of four, forty, four hundred, etc., to express notions of magnitude or perfection, see L. Conrad, "Abraha and Muḥammad"; Rescher, "Einige nachträgliche Bemerkungen."

64. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā, a general under Marwān II, in 132 led a rebellion against ʿAbdāllah b. ʿAlī in Damascus. Ṭabari, III, 53; Ṣafadī, Umarāʾ Dimashq, 76; Crone, Slaves, 129. Compare this passage with Yaqūbī, Historiae, II, 439, and Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 164, where there is no mention of the murder of Muqātil.

65. Al-Raqqah, "the Marshland," was the principal town of the Diyār Muḍar district in the Jazīrah. It lay on the left bank of the Euphrates about 100 kilometers and handed it to al-ʿAkkī. After the party reached ʿUthmān, he killed al-ʿAkkī and imprisoned his two sons. When he [later] heard about the defeat of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and the Syrians at Naṣībīn,[66] ʿUthmān took Muqātil's two sons from prison and beheaded them.

Fearing that the Khurāsānī forces would not remain faithful to him, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī had about 17,000[67] of them killed by way of an order to his prefect of police. He dispatched Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah to Aleppo,[68] which at that time was governed by Zufar b. ʿĀṣim,[69] with a letter that he had written about him. The letter read, "When Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah reaches you, behead him."[70] Partway through the journey Ḥumayd began to think about the letter he carried. Saying to himself, "My carrying a letter and not knowing what is in it is a dangerous business," he undid the scroll and read it. When he saw what was in the letter, he summoned some of his close comrades and told them the situation, revealing to them his predicament and seeking their counsel. He said, "Any of you who want to make for safe ground and get out of here should come with me; I am going to head for Iraq." He told them [again] what ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī had written about him and said to them, "Anyone who cannot bring himself to make the trip [95] should not on any account reveal my secret purpose but may go wherever he wishes."

Al-Haytham continued: Some of his men decided to stay with Ḥumayd in his flight. Ḥumayd commanded his horses to be shod, south of Ḥarrān. EI[1], s.v. [E. Honigmann]; Cornu, Répertoires, 22; Le Strange, Lands, 101–2; Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 58–60.

---

66. Naṣībīn was an ancient city (classical Nisibis) lying on the river Hirmās in the Diyār Rabīʿah district of the Jazīrah. This is where ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī was defeated by Abū Muslim's forces. Ṭabarī, III, 95–8; EI[1], s.v. [E. Honigmann]; Cornu, Répertoires, 21; Le Strange, Lands, 94–95; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 288–89.

67. This figure is repeated in EI[2], s.v. ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAlī [K. V. Zetterstéen and S. Moscati], and Tuqan, "ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī," 20, but questioned by Lassner, Shaping, 258, no. 30.

68. Ḥalab was the principal city of northern Syria. EI[2], s.v. [J. Sauvaget]; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 282–90.

69. Zufar b. ʿĀṣim al-Hilālī, although involved in ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's revolt, was later al-Manṣūr's appointed governor of Medina and then of the Jazīrah. Crone, Slaves, 166; Zambaur, Manuel, 24, 36; Kenney, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 70 n. 13.

70. The treacherous letter is a familiar topos in Arabic literature. A prominent early example is the letter said to have been given to the Jāhilī poet Ṭarafah b. ʿAbd al-Bakrī by the king of al-Ḥīrah, ʿAmr b. Hind. EI[1], s.v. Ṭarafa [F. Krenkow].

and his companions did the same for their own mounts as they prepared themselves to go with him. He then took off with them into the desert, shunning the beaten path[71] and heading for al-Ruṣāfah, i.e., al-Ruṣāfah of [the Umayyad caliph] Hishām in Syria.[72] There lived in al-Ruṣāfah at that time a mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī named Saʿīd al-Barbarī. When he heard that Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah had set himself in opposition to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and taken to the desert, he set off in search of him with the cavalry under his command. Somewhere on the road Saʿīd overtook Ḥumayd. When Ḥumayd caught sight of him, he doubled back his horse to meet Saʿīd and said to him, "Look here! Surely you know who I am! In God's name, what good would it do you to fight me? Go back! Do not massacre my comrades and yours. That's your best course." When Saʿīd heard Ḥumayd hold forth, he recognized the truth of what he had said to him. Thereupon he returned to his place at al-Ruṣāfah, and Ḥumayd and his men continued on. The commander of his guard, Mūsā b. Maymūn, said to Ḥumayd, "I have a slave girl in al-Ruṣāfah. If you are of a mind to permit me, I shall go there and charge her with various commissions. Then I will catch up with you." Ḥumayd gave him permission, and Mūsā went and stayed with her. He then left al-Ruṣāfah to return to Ḥumayd, but Saʿīd al-Barbarī, the mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, happened upon Mūsā, seized him, and killed him.

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī marched forward until he encamped at Naṣībīn and dug a trench to thwart his opponent. Abū Muslim, too, drew near. Abū Jaʿfar wrote to al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah, who was his deputy in Armenia,[73] to join forces with Abū Muslim. Al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah reached Abū Muslim when the latter was at al-Mawṣil. Abū Muslim, however, moved forward, stopping by himself and paying him no attention, then taking the road to Syria. Abū Muslim wrote to ʿAbdallāh, "I have not been ordered 71. Bahraja al-ṭarīq; see Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. bahraja.

72. Al-Ruṣāfah was a desert city some forty kilometers southwest of al-Raqqah that had been the residence of the tenth Umayyad caliph, Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik (105–25/724–43). s.v. (E. Honigmann) EI[1]; Cornu, Répertoires, 11; Le Strange, Lands, 106; Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 47–48.

73. Armenia was a mountainous West Asian region under Muslim hegemony from which the headwaters of the Tigris and Euphrates derive. EI[2], s.v. Armīniya (M. Canard).

to fight you or sent to do so. The Commander of the Faithful has, however, put me in charge of Syria, and I simply intend to proceed thither." The Syrians who accompanied ʿAbdallāh said to him, "How can we stay with you when this man is coming to our homeland, where dwell our womenfolk, to kill those of our men whom he can and to take our children captive! We must leave for our own country, so that we can keep him away from our women and children and can fight him if he fights us." ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī said to them, "I swear, he is not making for Syria; the only reason he has been sent is to fight you. If you stay here, then he will surely come to you." The Syrian troops, however, were not persuaded and refused to do anything but strike out for Syria.

Abū Muslim moved forward and set up camp near them, just as ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī set out with his troops heading for Syria. Abū Muslim moved on to occupy ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's encampment in his stead and spoil the surrounding water sources by throwing decaying carcasses into them.[74]

News of Abū Muslim's stop at his encampment reached ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, who said to his Syrian confederates, "Did I not tell you!" So he moved back again but discovered that Abū Muslim had already forestalled him in his own encampment. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī therefore occupied the camp position that Abū Muslim had just vacated. They engaged each other for five or six months. The Syrians had more cavalry and were better equipped, having Bakkār b. Muslim al-ʿUqaylī[75] on ʿAbdallāh's right flank, Ḥabīb b. Suwayd al-Asadī on his left, and ʿAbd al-Samad b. ʿAlī[76] leading the cavalry. On Abu Muslim's right flank was al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah, while on the left was Abū Naṣr Khāzim b. Khuzaymah.[77] They fought each other for several months.

---

74. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 477 n. 1, offers radama al-ʿuyūn, i.e., "fill up the wells," as an equivalent of ʿawwara al-miyāh.

75. Despite his involvement with ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, Abū Jaʿfar named Bakkār b. Muslim al-ʿUqaylī governor of Armenia in 152. Crone, Slaves, 106; Zambaur, Manuel, 178. Bligh-Abramski, "Evolution versus Revolution," 231–32.

76. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī al-ʿAbbāsī was ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's youngest brother and the only one to support his claim to the caliphate. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 466; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 59–60; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 103.

77. Khāzim b. Khuzaymah al-Tamīmī was an important Khurāsānī general who fought for Abū Jaʿfar against ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, against Mulabbid b. Ḥarmalah in the Jazīrah, ʿAbd al-Jabbār al-Azdī in Khurāsān, the Ispahbādh of Ṭabaristān and Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh in al-Baṣrah. Crone, Slaves, 180; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 354; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 81–82.

According to ʿAlī—Hishām b. ʿAmr al-Taghlibī:[78] I was in Abū Muslim's camp when one day those present were talking and the question of what people are strongest was raised. Abū Muslim said, "Speak up so that I may hear." One man said that it was the Khurāsānīs, while another said it was the Syrians. Abū Muslim said, "Every group is strongest in its own turn (dawlah)."[79] We met in combat, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's forces attacked us, sweeping us from our positions with the blow they struck and then retiring. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad assaulted us with cavalry alone and killed [97] eighteen of our men, only to draw back with his troops. Then they all assembled and flung themselves upon us, scattering our ranks so that we moved around in disorder. I said to Abū Muslim, "What if I were to prod my mount up to the top of that hill so I could shout to the troops, for they are in flight?" Abū Muslim told me to do so. I said, "You, too, could spur your horse." "Shrewd people would never turn their horses aside in such a way," Abū Muslim retorted, "but, by all means, call out: 'O men of Khurāsān, come back; surely the outcome favors the one who is on his guard.' "[80] I did so, and the troops came back. On that day Abū Muslim declaimed in rajaz meter this line:

The one who deserts his comrades and does not return runs away from dying but into death will fall.

A shelter had been made for Abū Msulim in which he would sit when the troops engaged each other in order to watch the battle.[81] If he saw a gap on the right or the left flank, he would send word to its commander, saying, "There is disorder in your

78. Hishām b. ʿAmr al-Taghlibī was a governor of al-Mawṣil for Marwān II but eventually switched his allegiance to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī. In 151 Abū Jaʿfar appointed him governor of Sind. Hishām's refusal to recognize and admit Marwān II after his defeat by the ʿAbbāsids is recounted by Ṭabarī, III, 47, and Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 133. Zambaur, Manuel, 279 (for Sind; he does not list him among the governors of al-Mawṣil); Crone, Slaves, 167–68.

79. For the use of dawlah to denote "the motion of history and changes of political fortune," see Sharon, Black Banners, 19–27. Similarly, Mottahedeh, Loyalty and Leadership, 185, defines the term as "the divinely granted turn in power."

80. Cf. Qurʾān 7:128, "the outcome is to the godfearing (wa-al-ʿāqibah lil-muttaqīn)."

81. In Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 387, Abū Muslim watches "the thick of the fight (al-ḥawmah)."

sector. Watch out lest your sector be the point where they break through our line![82] Do thus and so; advance your cavalry here, or move it back there to such and such a place." His runners carried his counsel back and forth to the commanders at such a pace that they were at each other's heels.

Hishām said: On Tuesday or Wednesday, the 7th of Jumādā II in the year 136 or 137, the armies came together and fought fiercely.[83] When Abū Muslim saw what was happening, he tricked the Syrians. He sent word to al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah, commander of the right flank, "Strip the right flank; combine most of it with the left, but let your elite defense forces and bravest fighters stay on the right." When the Syrians saw that maneuver, they stripped their left flank, joining its forces to their right flank, which stood face-to-face with the left flank of Abū Muslim. Abū Muslim then [98] sent word to al-Ḥasan, "Order the center forces, together with those who remain on the right flank, to attack the left flank of the Syrians." The Khurāsānīs did so and shattered the Syrian left flank, leaving the Syrian central and right flanks in disarray.

The Khurāsānīs bore down upon the Syrians with such force that it was a complete rout.[84] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī said to Ibn Surāqah al-Azdī, who was with him, "Well what do you think, Ibn Surāqah?" He answered, "By God, I think that you must stand fast and fight to the death. To flee would be abhorrent to one such as you. Earlier you denounced Marwān for it, saying, 'God shame Marwān! He was so fearful of dying that he fled.' " ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī then said, "I will go to Iraq," while Ibn Surāqah replied, "I will be with you." Thus were ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and his close associates put to flight. They abandoned their camp, and Abū Muslim took control of it.[85] He wrote to Abū Jaʿfar to tell 82. Following Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 478, fa-ittaqi allā nu'tā min qibalika. Cf. the Leiden edition, allā tu'tā min qibalika.

83. Thursday, November 28, 137. Wüstenfeld and Mahler, Vergleichungs-Tabellen, 4; Caetani, Cronographia generale, 106. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 467, who gives both Tuesday and Wednesday of 136, and Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 387, who gives only Wednesday of 137.

84. For the effect of this victory upon the status of the Khurāsānī army, see Sharon, "Military Reforms," 132. According to Chronicon Anonymum, 168, the Syrian defeat was marked by a falling star.

85. According to Sourdel, "Syrie," 170, Abū Muslim seized ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's treasure at al-Raqqah and al-Ruṣāfah, not Naṣībīn.

him that. Abū Jaʿfar sent Abū al-Khaṣīb,[86] his mawlā, to calculate what they had acquired with the camp of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī.[87] This made Abū Muslim furious.

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī proceeded on their way. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad got to al-Kūfah, where ʿĪsā b. Mūsā requested a guarantee of safe-conduct for him, which Abū Jaʿfar ratified. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī went to Sulaymān b. ʿAlī in al-Baṣrah and stayed with him. Abū Muslim granted a general amnesty to the Syrian army without killing anyone and commanded that they be left alone.

Another source states that it was Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī[88] who requested indemnity for ʿAbd al-Ṣamad. One report is that, when ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī was defeated, he and his brother ʿAbd al-Ṣamad fled to al-Ruṣāfah of Hishām. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad stayed there until the cavalry of al-Manṣūr, under the command of Jahwar b. Marrār al-ʿIjlī,[89] reached him. He seized ʿAbd al-Ṣamad and sent him, bound, to al-Manṣūr in the custody of Abū al-Khaṣīb, the caliph's mawlā. When ʿAbd al-Ṣamad came before al-Manṣūr, the caliph ordered him to be turned over to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. ʿĪsā, however, granted him indemnity and released him. He treated him most generously, presenting him with gifts and fine clothes. ʿAbdallāh 86. Abū al-Khaṣīb Marzūq was a chamberlain (ḥajīb) for Abū Jaʿfar and his appointee as governor of Ṭabaristān. Ṭabarī, III, 112; Crone, Slaves, 190; Rabino di Borgomale, "Préfets du Calīfat," 247–48.

87. Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 439, mentions as auditors, in addition to Abū al-Khaṣīb, the names of Isḥāq b. Muslim al-ʿUqaylī, Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā, and Muḥammad b. ʿAmr al-Naṣībī al-Taghlibī. Fragmenta historicorum, I, 219, and Azdī's Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 164, mention Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā.

88. Abū al-Ḥasan Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās (d. 147/764), another brother of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and thus also a paternal uncle to Abū al-ʿAbbās and Abū Jaʿfar, was appointed governor of al-Mawṣil in 133 and charged with responsibility for the Pilgrimage season in 137. Ṭabarī, III, 73, 75, 121. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, IX, 156, refers to him as governor of al-Baṣrah, perhaps drawing upon Ṭabarī's mention in the events of the year 143. While Abū al-Ḥasan was governor of Wāsiṭ, al-Manṣūr convinced him to change his allegiance from ʿĪsā b. Mūsā as caliph-designate to al-Manṣūr's son, Muḥammad al-Mahdī. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 256.

89. Jahwar b. Marrār al-ʿIjlī, from an Arab tribe to which Abū Muslim is thought to have been attached as a slave, served as Abū Jaʿfar's chief of police during the battle for Wāsiṭ in 132 but is most noted for his campaign against Sunbadh, which will be detailed in the closing pages of this chapter. Ṭabarī, III, 64–65; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 64; *EI*², s.v. Abū Muslim (S. Moscati) and s.v. ʿIdjl (W. Montgomery Watt).

b. ʿAlī, however, stayed but one night in al-Ruṣāfah. At nightfall [99] on the following day he set off with his officers and mawlās to go to Sulaymān b. ʿAlī in al-Baṣrah. At that time Sulaymān was the governor of al-Baṣrah. He gave lodging to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and his confederates and treated them generously.[90] They stayed with him in hiding for a while.[91]

In this year Abū Muslim was killed.

An Account of Abū Muslim's Murder and the Reason for It

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr[92]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Salamah b. Muḥārib,[93] also Muslim b. al-Mughīrah,[94] Saʿīd b. Aws,[95] Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī,[96] al-Nuʿmān Abū al-Sarī,[97] Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm,[98]

---

90. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's eventual arrest and detention are detailed under the year 139.

91. For other accounts, see Fragmenta historicorum, I, 219; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 441; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 439; and Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 137.

92. Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. Abī Khaythamah Zuhayr b. Ḥarb al-Nasāʾī (d. 279/892), one of al-Ṭabarī's teachers, was a traditionist (muḥaddith), historian, and jurist, and himself a student of Abū Zakariyyāʾ Yaḥyā b. Maʿīn, Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, and Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, VI, 376–77; Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, I, 227; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, I, 128; GAL, S I, 272; GAS, I, 319–20; Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 1134, where his death date is listed as 848–49; Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung," 110.

93. See Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVII, where the name is emended to Maslamah. Maslamah b. Muḥārib b. Salm b. Ziyād (d. between 148/765 and 168/785), a great-grandson of Ziyād b. Abīhi, the noted governor of Iraq under Muʿāwiyah, was a Baṣran historian and source for al-Madāʾinī whom Petersen, ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya, 92, 128, lists as "pro-Umayyad." Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung," 117.

94. In Ṭabarī his reports are always transmitted through Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī.

95. Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī Saʿīd b. Aws b. Thābit (d. 215/830–31) was a Baṣran historian, grammarian, and littérateur. His grandfather, Abū Zayd Thābit b. Zayd b. al-Nuʿmān, was one of those charged with the collection of the Qurʾān during the lifetime of the Prophet. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 200–2; Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, I, 62; Dhahabī, Siyar, IX, 494–96; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 378–80; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 4–5; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography, 504 (listed with the historians in al-Sakhāwī's Iʿlān).

96. He has previously, in Ṭabarī, II, 1996, and III, 24, served as a source for information about Abū Muslim, and later, in Ṭabarī, III, 102, appears as a guard for the treasure that Abū Muslim captured from ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī.

97. Cited by Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung", 130, as al-Nuʿmān Abū Sarī al-Marwadhī al-Khurāsānī.

98. Abū al-Qāsim Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm al-Jūbānī was one of the ʿAbbāsid duʿāt from Marw. Ṭabarī, III, 1955; Akhbār al-dawlah, 218.

and others: In the year 136 Abū Muslim wrote to Abū al-ʿAbbās, asking his permission to perform the Pilgrimage. As he was simply intending to perform the prayer ritual with the people, Abū al-ʿAbbās granted his request. Subsequently, Abū al-ʿAbbās wrote to Abū Jaʿfar, who was then governor of the Jazīrah, Armenia, and Ādharbayjān:[99] "Abū Muslim has written to me seeking my permission to make the Pilgrimage. I have given him my consent, but the thought has occurred to me that when he arrives he may ask me to appoint him the leader of the Pilgrimage. Write to me and ask my permission to perform the Pilgrimage, because when you are in Mecca he could not expect to take precedence over you." Accordingly, Abū Jaʿfar wrote to Abū al-ʿAbbās, seeking his consent to perform the Pilgrimage, which the latter granted, and Abū Jaʿfar went to al-Anbār. At this Abū Muslim came before the caliph and said, "Could Abū Jaʿfar find no other year to make the Pilgrimage than this one?" and he carried a grudge against Abū Jaʿfar in his heart.

According to ʿAlī—Muslim b. al-Mughīrah: In this year Abū Jaʿfar appointed al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah as his deputy in Armenia. (Another source said that he installed his foster brother Yaḥyā b. Muslim b. ʿUrwah,[100] who was a black mawlā of the ʿAbbāsids.) Abū Jaʿfar and Abū Muslim left for Mecca, but wherever he stopped, Abū Muslim would fill the needs of supplicants,[101] giving garments to the desert Arabs and bestowing largesse upon whoever petitioned him. He outfitted them with head wraps (butūt) and cloaks (malāḥif);[102] he dug wells and leveled road surfaces. He became celebrated, with the desert Arabs exclaiming, "This man has been lied about!" Eventually he reached Mecca and, upon seeing the Yemenite[103] forces there, Abū Muslim [100]

99. Ādharbayjān was a mountainous northern province bordering the Caspian Sea that currently lies substantially in Iran. *EI*², s.v. (V. Minorsky); Le Strange, Lands, 159–71.

100. According to Goitein, Studies, 180, Yaḥyā and Abū Jaʿfar had been suckled by the same woman, thus creating a "milk relationship" between them. See also his "Origin of the Vizierate."

101. Translation follows the Leiden variant reading, al-ʿufāt.

102. A batt is a head wrapping made of coarse cloth, while a milḥafah is a rough bedouin cloak. Dozy, Vêtements, 54, 401; *EI*², s.v. Libās (Y. K. Stillman et al.)

103. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 468. The Yemen was a province in the southwestern segment of the Arabian peninsula with coastlines along both the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden. *EI*¹, s.v. al-Yaman (A. Grohmann). For an analysis of the slapped his thigh and exclaimed to Nayzak,[104] "O Nayzak, what an army this could be were a sharp-tongued man—but one quick to tears[105]—to take them in hand!"

To return to the account of the primary authorities: When the people emerged from the observance of the Pilgrimage, Abū Muslim hurried off ahead of Abū Jaʿfar. When word of Abū al-ʿAbbās's death and Abū Jaʿfar's appointment as his successor reached him, Abū Muslim wrote to Abū Jaʿfar, condoling with him for the death of the Commander of the Faithful but not congratulating him on his becoming caliph. He neither stayed put so that Abū Jaʿfar could catch up with him nor did he go back. Enraged, Abū Jaʿfar said to Abū Ayyūb,[106] "Write Abū Muslim a harsh letter." When Abū Muslim received Abū Jaʿfar's letter, he responded with congratulations on his accession to the caliphate. Yazīd b. Usayd al-Sulamī[107] said to Abū Jaʿfar, "I dislike the thought that you might join up with Abū Muslim on the way. The people are his men, completely obedient to him, and they hold him in the highest awe, while no one is aligned with you." Abū Jaʿfar took Yazīd's advice and lagged behind while Abū Muslim went ahead. Abū Jaʿfar then commanded his forces to advance and gather all together. Their weapons were collected [i.e., for a tally], but there were only six coats of mail in his whole force. Abū Muslim went on to al-Anbār and invited ʿĪsā b. Mūsā religious and messianic connotations of "yamānī," see Bashear, "Yemen in Early Islam."

---

104. Persian for "javelin" or "spear." Ṭabarī, Indices, lists him simply as one of Abū Muslim's army commanders. Fragmenta historicorum, I, 221 n. a, cites him as a leader (ṣāḥib) in Rayy, while Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 61, 64, identifies him as "a leading eastern Iranian noble" and one of Abū Muslim's closest advisers. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 229, offers a kunyah of Abū Naṣr.

105. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 468, for ghazīr al-damʿah.

106. Abū Ayyūb Sulaymān b. Abī Sulaymān Makhlad al-Mūriyānī al-Khūzī (d. 154/770–71) was secretary-vizier under al-Manṣūr after Khālid b. Barmak. He fell out of favor for various misdeeds and died in prison. Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 78–87; Goitein, Studies, 175–77; *EI*², s.v. al-Mūriyānī (C. E. Bosworth); Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 97–102; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 410–14; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 375–76; Goitein, "Origin of the Vizierate," 260–62.

107. Yazīd b. Usayd b. Ẓāfir al-Sulamī served as governor of Armenia, of al-Mawṣil, and of the Jazīrah. Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 217; Fragmenta historicorum, I, 265; Zambaur, Manuel, 178. Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, VI, 322, notes the spelling of his name as "Usayd," but Crone, Slaves, 165, refers to him as Yazīd b. Asīd.

so that he might render his oath of allegiance to him, but ʿĪsā refused.[108] Abū Jaʿfar arrived and encamped at al-Kūfah, where he learned that ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī had renounced his fealty. He returned therefore to al-Anbār, summoned Abū Muslim, commissioned him, and said, "Set out for Ibn ʿAlī." Abū Muslim, however, responded, "Arrest ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[109] and Ṣāliḥ b. al-Haytham,[110] for they have been denouncing me." Abū Jaʿfar retorted, "ʿAbd al-Jabbār commands my police units, the same responsibility he had formerly discharged for Abū al- [101] ʿAbbās. Ṣāliḥ b. al-Haytham is the Commander of the Faithful's [i.e., Abū al-ʿAbbās] foster brother. I am not about to arrest them merely because of your suspicion of them." Abū Muslim then said, "I see that those two have greater favor with you than I." Abū Jaʿfar became angry, so Abū Muslim apologized, saying, "I didn't mean all this."

According to ʿAlī—Muslim b. al-Mughīrah: I was with al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah in Armenia. When Abū Muslim was dispatched to Syria, Abū Jaʿfar wrote to al-Ḥasan that he should join Abū Muslim and march with him. We reached Abū Muslim at al-Mawṣil, where he stayed for a few days. When Abū Muslim was about to move on, I said to al-Ḥasan, "You and your forces are moving into battle;[111] you have no need of me. What if you were to allow me to go on to Iraq and stay there until, God willing, you turn up?" Al-Ḥasan said, "All right, but inform me when you are about to leave," to which I agreed. When I had finished my preparations, I informed him and said, "I have come to bid you farewell." Al-Ḥasan replied, "Wait for me by the gate until I come out to you." I went out and stopped there until he came out and said, 108. This translation follows Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVII, which corrects the text's fa-atā to fa-abā. See Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 167, 175; Moscati, "Abū Muslim. III," 94.

109. ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī was an ʿAbbāsid dāʿī and revolutionary general who served as head of the shurṭah for al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr. The latter named him governor of Khurāsān in 140/757–58. For the caliph's treatment of his defection, see under the year 141 below. Ṭabarī, III, 76, 100; *EI*², s.v. [S. Moscati]; Crone, Slaves, 173.

110. Abū Ghassān Ṣāliḥ b. al-Haytham was a mawlā of Abū al-ʿAbbās and, according to Fragmenta historicorum, I, 215, his chamberlain. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf; Crone, Slaves, 194. Ṭabarī, II, 840, gives him as the mawlā of Rayṭah bt. Abī al-ʿAbbās, the caliph's niece.

111. See Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVII.

"I want to pass something on to you so that you can report it to Abū Ayyūb. Were it not for my confidence in you, again I would not give you this information. Moreover, were it not for your standing with Abū Ayyūb, I would not tell you this. Inform Abū Ayyūb that, since my arrival here, I have developed grave doubts about Abū Muslim. When he receives a letter from the Commander of the Faithful and reads it, he turns down the corner of his mouth and tosses the letter to Abū Naṣr.[112] The latter reads it, and the two of them laugh derisively." I said, "Yes, I understand." Subsequently I met with Abū Ayyūb, thinking that I had brought him news of some consequence. He just laughed and said, "We are more suspicious of Abū Muslim than of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, but we place our hope in one thing. We know that the Khurāsānī troops do not like ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī because he killed some of them." (At the time when he renounced his fealty, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī feared the Khurāsānīs. Thus he killed 17,000 of them by an [102] order to his prefect of police, Ḥayyāsh b. Ḥabīb.)

According to ʿAlī—Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī: Abū Muslim fought ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, put him to flight, and gathered up everything he had in his camp into an enclosed compound. Abū Muslim acquired various assets, household goods, and many jewels, all of it scattered at random in this confine. He put one of his commanders in charge of the compound and its safekeeping. I was in this man's unit, and he set us to guard it in shifts.[113] When anyone left the enclosure, he would search him. One day some of my colleagues came out of the compound, but I stayed behind. The commander asked them, "What's Abū Ḥafṣ doing?" They responded that he was in the enclosure. He then came and looked over the gate. I sensed his presence and slipped off my shoes while he was looking. I then shook out my shoes, and, while he was still looking, I shook out my trousers (sarāwīl) and sleeves. As he continued to watch, I put on my shoes [again]. Then he went to sit down in his [usual] seat, and I came out. He asked me what had kept me, but I told him that everything was all right, so he left me alone but said, "I saw what you did, but why did you do it?" I answered, "Pearls and dirham coins are scattered in the compound, and we were slipping and sliding all over them. I was afraid that some of them had gotten into my shoes, so I pulled off my shoes and socks." That pleased him, and he told me to go on my way. So I continued to enter the compound together with the guard, taking some of those dirhams and fine fabrics, and putting some in my shoes and binding some around my middle. My colleagues would go out and be searched, but not me. I kept doing this until I had collected a fair-sized hoard, but I never touched the pearls.

112. Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzāʿī.
113. Fa-jaʿalahā nawāʾiba baynanā; see Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. nāba.

To return to the account of those on whose authority ʿAlī related the story of Abū Muslim in the first place: After ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī had been put to flight, Abū Jaʿfar sent Abū al-Khaṣīb to record for the caliph[114] what Abū Muslim had acquired in the way of booty. Abū Muslim reproached[115] Abū al-Khaṣīb and [103] planned to kill him. But there was intercession on his behalf, and people said, "He's only a messenger; let him go." Accordingly, Abū al-Khaṣīb went back to Abū Jaʿfar. The officers then approached Abū Muslim to say: "We have dealt with the matter of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and pillaged his camp. Why is there interrogation about what's in our hands? The Commander of the Faithful is only entitled to his fifth of the booty."[116] When Abū al-Khaṣīb reached Abū Jaʿfar, he told the caliph that Abū Muslim had intended to kill him. Abū Jaʿfar feared that Abū Muslim would go back to Khurāsān, so via Yaqṭīn[117] he wrote him a letter stating, "I have placed you in charge of Egypt and Syria, which is better for you than Khurāsān. Send to Egypt whomever you like and take up residence in Syria. You will then be close to the Commander of the Faithful. If he wants a meeting with you, you can come to him from nearby." When he received the letter, Abū Muslim became angry and said, "He is appointing me governor of

114. The Leiden editor notes that for the next several pages the Algiers manuscript lacks folios.

115. Iftarā; see Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. farā.

116. The text follows the Qurʾānic orthography with al-khumus. Qurʾān, 8:41, is the textual locus for division of the spoils of battle into five parts, four for the combatants and one for the sovereign. For Ṭabarī's exegesis of this verse, see Jāmiʿ al-bayān, XIII, 545–63.

117. Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā al-Abzārī (d. 186/802) had been one of the leaders of the ʿAbbāsid duʿāt in al-Kūfah. For his avoidance of the abortive revolt of Zayd b. ʿAlī in 122/740, see Akhbār al-dawlah, 231. Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 164 n. 4; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 166; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VIII, 207; Dodge, Fihrist of Ibn Nadīm, II, 1126 (where the name is given as Yāqṭīn). For his connection with Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq, see Elad, "Siege of al-Wāsiṭ," 83 n. 109.

Syria and Egypt, but Khurāsān is mine." He was determined to go back there, so Yaqṭīn wrote to Abū Jaʿfar about that.[118]

Other accounts say that when Abū Muslim seized possession of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's camp, al-Manṣūr sent Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā (whom Abū Muslim was wont to call "Yak Dīn")[119] with the order to calculate what the camp contained. At this, Abū Muslim exclaimed, "O Yaqṭīn, am I [thought] trustworthy in matters of bloodshed but unreliable in matters of property!"[120] He vilified Abū Jaʿfar, which Yaqṭīn reported to him. Abū Muslim had come from the Jazīrah resolved to defy [the caliph's command] and in resistance turned off the route [to al-Anbār], promptly making for Khurāsān. Abū Jaʿfar left al-Anbār for al-Madāʾin[121] and wrote to Abū Muslim to come to him. From his encampment at the river Zāb[122] on the return route by way of Ḥulwān,[123] Abū Muslim wrote:[124]

> For the Commander of the Faithful, may God be gracious to him, there remains no foe of whom God has not given him the better. We would recount the saying of the Sāsānid kings, "Viziers are most fearful when the mob is > [104] quiet."[125] We shy away from being near you, yet want to fulfill our obligations to you, so long as you reciprocate,

118. Wa-iʿtazama bi-al-muḍīy. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVII, and Glossarium, s.v. ʿazama.

119. As a Persian expression, this can mean "one religion" or "one debt," but the significance remains ambiguous.

120. The translation follows Ibn al-Athīr's wording, Kāmil, V, 469: ana amīnun ʿalā dimāʾ. See also Fragmenta historicorum, I, 219, and Yaqūbī, Historiae, II, 439.

121. Al-Madāʾin, "the cities," including Ctesiphon, Aspānbur, and al-Rūmiyyah (see note 130), lay on both sides of the Tigris about thirty kilometers southeast of Baghdad. EI^{2}, s.v. (M. Streck and M. Morony); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 74–75; Cornu, Répertoires, 30; Le Strange, Lands, 33–35.

122. The Zāb was a tributary of the Tigris and site of the decisive ʿAbbāsid battle against Marwān II. EI^{1}, s.v. (E. Honigmann); Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 123–24; Cornu, Répertoires, 24; Le Strange, Lands, 90–91.

123. Ḥulwān lay in the foothills of the Zagros mountains about 180 kilometers northeast of Sāmarrāʾ on the main road to Khurāsān. EI^{2}, s.v. (L. Lockhart); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 290–93; Cornu, Répertoires, 29; Le Strange, Lands, 191–92; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 198, 201.

124. See also Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 111.

125. Frye, "ʿAbbāsid Revolt," 29, cites this statement as an indication that Abū Muslim was conversant with Middle Persian literature.

> apt to heed and obey, though from afar, where safety is yoked to that obedience. If that satisfies you, I shall be like the finest of your servants, but if you insist that your own will prevail, then I must renounce my pledged loyalty to you in due consideration of myself.

When the letter reached al-Manṣūr, he wrote to Abū Muslim:

> I have understood your letter, but your character is not that of those viziers who connived against their kings, wishing to disturb the bonds of authority because of the multitude of their misdeeds. Their comfort lay only in disruption of the social order. Why do you equate yourself with them when you are as you are, in your obedience, in your faithful counsel, and in your assumption of the burdens of this affair [of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī], which you have borne so well? In the obligation that you are [now] taking upon yourself, however, there is neither heeding nor obeying. The Commander of the Faithful has charged ʿĪsā b. Mūsā with a letter for you, by which you may be reassured, if you pay heed to it. I beg God to intervene between you and Satan with his evil promptings, for he has judged he could find no more certain way by which to corrupt your right intention, or one more accessible to his sorcery (ṭibb),[126] than the door that he has opened to you.

Abū Jaʿfar [now] sent to Abū Muslim Jarīr b. Yazīd b. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī,[127] a man unique among his contemporaries,[128] and he inveigled him into coming back. Abū Muslim used to remark, "By God, I will most certainly be killed in Rūm

---

126. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 483 n. 3, offers siḥr as a synonym for ṭibb, which ordinarily connotes "medicine." The line between medicine and magic is frequently blurred in such classical sources as ḥadīth collections, e.g., the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim and that of Bukhārī.

127. In 126 he was appointed Manṣūr b. Jumhūr's deputy governor for al-Baṣrah. Ṭabarī, II, 1837 (where his name is given as Jarīr b. Yazīd b. Yazīd b. Jarīr); Zambaur, Manuel, 40; Crone, Slaves, 115. Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 376, describes him as "charming and successful."

128. Al-Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 179, adds that he was "one of the shrewdest men of his era and a long-time acquaintance of Abū Muslim's."

(Byzantium)." (The astrologers repeatedly predicted that, too.)[129] In fact, he approached while al-Manṣūr was living in pavilions at al-Rūmiyyah.[130] The populace received him, and al-Manṣūr gave him hospitality, according him gracious treatment for several days.

[105] To return to the account of ʿAlī and his previously mentioned authorities: Abū Muslim wrote to Abū Jaʿfar:[131]

> I took as imām[132] and guide in what God has enjoined upon His creatures a man who lived in learning's quarter and to the Messenger of God was closely related.[133] However, he thought me ignorant of the Qurʾān and distorted its significations,[134] avid for what little God may relinquish to His creatures,[135] like one enticed by illusion. He commanded me to unsheathe the sword, to excise compassion, to accept no excuse, to overlook no mistake. Thus did I act to reinforce your authority until God made you known to those who had been ignorant of you. Then God rescued me by repentance. If He forgives me, that will be in accordance with His well-known and attributed practice as in former days, but if He punishes me for what 129. For further on this prediction, see ibid., VI, 180; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 153; Moscati, "Abū Muslim. III," 100; Mélikoff, Abū Muslim, 54.

130. Al-Rūmiyyah was one of the cities constituting al-Madāʾin (see note 121). Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 100–4; Le Strange, Lands, 34–35.

131. For an Italian translation of this letter, see Moscati, "Abū Muslim. III," 97.

132. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās (d. 132/749), known as Ibrāhīm al-Imām, was the half-brother of Abū Jaʿfar and patron of Abū Muslim. He succeeded his father, Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, as titular head of the ʿAbbāsid revolutionary movement. EI^{2}, s.v. (F. Omar). While the term imām carries the technical signification of leader of the ritual prayer (ṣalāt), it acquired far greater theological import within developed Shīʿī thought.

133. The "Messenger" is the most frequent Qurʾānic title for Muḥammad. Ibrāhīm the Imām's great-great-grandfather was Muḥammad's uncle. For a succint explanation of the ʿAbbāsid claim of qarābah with Muḥammad, see Bosworth, "Al-Maqrīzī's Epistle," 44.

134. Wa-ḥarrafahu ʿan mawāḍiʿihi, which echoes the Qurʾānic accusation in of 4:46, 5:13, 41. Abū Muslim is here accusing his former imām of the charge of scriptural distortion (taḥrīf), an accusation that is normally laid against Jews and Christians.

135. Fī qalīlin qad taʿāfahu allāhu ilā khalqihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. afā; Lane, Lexicon, V, 2095.

my hands have done, God is not unjust to His servants [i.e., even that would be an instance of God's justice].[136]

Abū Muslim marched out, heading for Khurāsān and feeling hostility and opposition. When he entered Iraqī territory, al-Manṣūr left al-Anbār and moved forward, settling at al-Madā'in. Thereupon Abū Muslim took the road to Ḥulwān, saying, "There's many a matter for God this side of Ḥulwān!" Abū Ja'far told 'Īsā b. 'Alī,[137] 'Īsā b. Mūsā, and those of the Banū Hāshim[138] who accompanied him to write to Abū Muslim. They did so, extolling his accomplishments, thanking him for all he had done, asking him to continue in his course, enjoining him to obedience, and warning him of the punishment for perfidy. They further ordered him to return to the Commander of the Faithful and to seek his good will. Abū Ja'far sent the letter with Abū Ḥumayd al-Marwarrūdhī and said to him, "Speak to Abū Muslim with the utmost courtesy you would show anyone. Awaken hope in him, and let him know that I shall exalt his station and treat him as no one else has ever done if he mends his ways and respects my wishes once more. If he refuses to return, then say to him, 'The [106] commander of the Faithful says to you, "I am not of al-'Abbās, and I have nothing to do with Muḥammad if, after your having left in a state of opposition and not come back to me, I should hand over your affair to someone else and not make every effort to seek you out and fight you myself. Were you to plunge into the sea, I would dive in too. Were you to rush into fire, I would charge in too, until I had killed you or died trying." ' But by no means make this statement to him until you despair of his returning and cannot hope for anything better from him."

136. The authenticity of this letter has been the subject of considerable debate. Moscati, "Abū Muslim. III," 97–98, cites the principal lines of argumentation.

137. 'Īsā b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās (d. 164/780), an uncle of the first two 'Abbāsid caliphs, twice served as governor of Fārs and is remembered as a scholar and an ascetic. His name was given to the deep canal, Nahr 'Īsā, which marked the southern limits of Baghdad. Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 409–10; Ziriklī, A'lām, V, 105; *EI*², s.v. 'Īsā, Nahr (J. Lassner); Lassner, Topography, 144–45; Zambaur, Manuel, 46.

138. An 'Abbāsid form of self-reference denoting a lineage relation with the prophet Muḥammad, either remotely through his great-grandfather Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf, or proximately through his cousin's grandson Abū Hāshim b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah.

Accordingly, Abū Ḥumayd set forth at the head of his most trustworthy associates, and they eventually reached Abū Muslim at Ḥulwān. Abū Ḥumayd, Abū Mālik, and others entered and presented the letter to him. Abū Ḥumayd said to Abū Muslim, "Out of envy and spite, people are misrepresenting to you what the Commander of the Faithful says and thinks of you, with the intent to disrupt and deflect the good will he has toward you. Do not spoil what you have; talk to him." Then he went on to say, "O Abū Muslim, surely you remain a trusted agent of the family of Muḥammad,[139] as the people recognize. The heavenly recompense God has stored away to reward you for that is greater than all your earthly gain. Do not nullify your reward. Let Satan never tempt you!" Abū Muslim said to him, "Since when do you presume to speak to me like this?" He answered, "You are the one who summoned us to this cause and to obedience to the family of the house of the Prophet, the Banū al-ʿAbbās. You commanded us to fight those who opposed that. You called us from various lands and from diverse circumstances. God has drawn us together in obedience to them, united our hearts in love for them, and fortified us in our support for them. Among them we have never encountered anyone except with these God-given sentiments in our hearts, and so we have now come to them in their land with our sights rendered sharp and our obedience unclouded. Do you really intend, at the time when we have reached the culmination of our wishes and the consummation of our hope, to destroy our situation and to dissipate our authority? You were the one who said to [107] us, 'Kill whoever opposes you. If I oppose you then kill me!' " Abū Muslim then turned to Abū Naṣr [Mālik b. Haytham] and said, "O Mālik, do you not hear what this fellow is saying to me? This is not his own utterance, Mālik [i.e., he speaks for the caliph]." Abū Naṣr replied, "Don't listen to what he is saying; such talk from him should certainly not alarm you. Upon my life, you rightly said that this is not his speech, but what may follow will be worse. Carry on with your own affair and do not return. By God, if you go to Abū Jaʿfar, he will most certainly kill you. Something has entered his mind such that he will never trust you."[140] Abū Muslim told his confederates to rise up, which they did. Then he sent for Nayzak and said, "By God, Nayzak, it's been a long time since I've seen anyone more sensible than you.[141] What do you think now that these letters have come and people have had their say?" Nayzak replied, "I don't think you should go to him. I think that you should go to al-Rayy[142] and stay there. The whole region between Khurāsān and al-Rayy falls to you. They are your forces, not one of whom opposes you. If he is being straight with you, then you can be straight with him. But if he refuses, then you are with your own army, Khurāsān is behind you, and you can follow your own judgment."[143] So Abū Muslim summoned Abū Ḥumayd and said, "Go back to your master; I have decided not to come to him." Abū Ḥumayd asked, "Have you really resolved to go against him?" to which Abū Muslim said, "Yes." "Don't do it," replied Abū Ḥumayd, but Abū Muslim answered, "I do not want to meet with him." Having abandoned all hope that Abū Muslim would return, Abū Ḥumayd said to him what Abū Jaʿfar had ordered him to say. Abū Muslim was silent for a long time. Then he said, "Rise up and go," but that speech had disturbed and frightened him.

139. For amīn āl Muḥammad as a title accorded to Abū Muslim, see Sharon, Black Banners, 199.

Now at the time when he began to have doubts about Abū Muslim, Abū Jaʿfar had written to Abū Dāwūd, Abū Muslim's deputy in Khurāsān, to the effect that "You shall have control of Khurāsān for as long as you live."[144] Abū Dāwūd then wrote to Abū Muslim, "We did not revolt [i.e., against the Umayyads] in order to disobey God's caliphs and the family of the house of His Prophet. Do not oppose your imām; return [to Khurāsān] only with his permission." Abū Dāwūd's letter reached Abū Muslim at this juncture, making him yet more alarmed and concerned.

---

140. Masʿūdi, Murūj, VI, 180 credits Mālik with the exclamation: "I have been tempted by Iblīs but never by the like of this!"

141. Mā raʾaytu ṭawīlan aʿqala minka. Ṭabari, Glossarium, s.v. ṭāla.

142. Al-Rayy was a city that lay in the northeastern corner of the province of Jibāl, whose remains now fall within the southern suburbs of Tehran. EI[1], s.v. (V. Minorsky); Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 119–22; Cornu, Répertoires, 43; Le Strange, Lands, 214–18; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 121–26.

143. This speech is repeated in Fragmenta historicorum, I, 221, with a slight rearrangement of clauses. See also Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 169; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 440; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 61–62; Daniel, Khurasan, 115.

144. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 485, vocalizes this as "for as long as I live (mā baqītu)."

Thus Abū Muslim sent word to Abū Ḥumayd and Abū Mālik: "I had made up my mind to go on to Khurāsān, but then I decided to send Abū Isḥāq, in whom I have confidence, to the Commander of the Faithful, so that he can bring me his assessment [of the situation]." Abū Muslim dispatched Abū Isḥāq, and, when the latter [108] arrived, the Banū Hāshim received him with everything he could wish. Abū Jaʿfar said to him, "Make Abū Muslim change his mind and you shall have the governorship of Khurāsān," and he dismissed him. Abū Isḥāq returned to Abū Muslim and said to him, "I could not find fault with anything; I am of the opinion that they respect your rights highly, thinking as much of you as they do of themselves." He advised Abū Muslim to return to the Commander of the Faithful and apologize to him for what he had done. Abū Muslim made up his mind to do so, and Nayzak asked him, "Are you fully of a mind to return?" "Yes," said Abū Muslim and quoted:[145]

Men can do nothing against fate.
Fate makes away with people's scheming.

Nayzak said, "Since you have made up your mind to do this, may God prosper you. But keep in mind this one thing I tell you: When you enter the presence of Abū Jaʿfar, kill him. Then give the oath of allegiance to whomever you wish, for the troops will not oppose you." Abū Muslim then wrote to Abū Jaʿfar to inform him that he would be coming to meet him.

According to some sources—Abū Ayyūb: One day I came into the presence of Abū Jaʿfar, who was then residing in a hair tent[146] at al-Rūmiyyah, while he was seated on a prayer carpet following the afternoon prayer. Abū Muslim's letter lay before him. He tossed it to me, and I read it. Then he said, "By God, if I lay eyes on him, I will surely kill him." I said to myself, " 'To God we belong and to Him is our return' [i.e., that's as may be, but I hope not!]. I have pursued the scribal career, and now, when I have reached its pinnacle and become the caliph's scribe, this had to happen among the people![147] By God, if he were killed, I do not 145. Fragmenta historicorum, I, 220; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 473.

146. Sourdel, "Questions," 132, specifies this as "camel's hair."
147. Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 111, reads: "This mix-up (takhlīṭ) had to happen among the people."

think his confederates would accept his killing and would let this man here, and anyone associated with him, remain alive. So I was not able to sleep." Then I said to myself, "Maybe the man will arrive in a confident frame of mind. If so, perhaps he will achieve his wish. But if he arrives behaving warily, the caliph will have no possible recourse but to deal with him harshly. If only I could put my finger on a clever scheme!"[148] I sent for Salamah b. Saʿīd b. Jābir[149] and said to him. "Do you have a sense of gratitude?" He said that he did. I continued, "If I got you appointed governor of a place from which you would garner what the governor of Iraq gets, would you let my brother Ḥātim b. Abī Sulaymān[150] go in [109] with you?" He agreed to that. "Would you give him half the proceeds?" I asked, wanting him to remain avid and not refuse. He still agreed. I then said, "Last year Kaskar[151] yielded such and such, but this year will be many times more than last year's yield. If I turn it over to you for the same impost as last year or with the right of stewardship, you will gain wealth beyond your wildest dreams."[152] "How can such wealth be mine?" Salamah asked. "You should go to Abū Muslim, meet with him, and talk to him tomorrow," I replied. "Ask him to include, among the petitions he will present, one to the effect that you be appointed there with what it yielded last year. When he arrives, the Commander of the Faithful intends to make him responsible for matters lying beyond his own sphere,[153] so he should feel at ease and put his mind to rest." Salamah asked, "How can I get the Commander of the Faithful to give me permission to meet Abū Muslim?" I told him

148. For the vizier's stratagem, see ibid., 112, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 474.

149. Ṭabarī, III, 141, cites him as governor of the Euphrates district and al-Ubullah in 142.

150. Some sources say that Abū Sulaymān, the father of both Abū Ayyūb and Ḥātim, was the mawlā of the Umayyad caliph ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (99–101/717–20). Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 375. While Ṭabarī, III, 370, notes that a brother was arrested in 153 along with Abū Ayyūb, his name is not given.

151. Kaskar was a fertile district centered around the Tigris city of Wāsiṭ. *EI*², s.v. (M. Streck and J. Lassner); Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 461; Le Strange, Lands, 38–43; Cornu, Répertoires, 29.

152. Fa-in dafaʿtuhā ilayka bi-qabālatihā ʿaman awwala aw bi-al-amānati. The qabālah contract was a form of tax farming whereby an individual assured the central treasury of a particular sum and could then pocket the difference between that and the amount actually collected. *EI*², s.v. Ḳabāla (C. Cahen); Cahen, "Fiscalité," 136–52; Donner, "Islamic State," 292. For this meaning of amānah, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 39.

153. Mā warāʾa bābihi. Dozy, Supplément, I, 124.

that I would ask permission for him, and then I went to Abū Jaʿfar and told him the whole story. The caliph told me to call for Salamah, which I did. He said, "Abū Ayyūb has requested permission on your behalf; do you want to go and meet Abū Muslim?" "Yes," said Salamah. The caliph replied, "Then I grant you permission. Declare to Abū Muslim our salutation and inform him of our longing to see him." Salamah set off. He met Abū Muslim and said, "The Commander of the Faithful has the highest possible opinion of you." This cheered Abū Muslim, who had been in very low spirits before then. What Salamah said when he reached Abū Muslim made him overjoyed. He believed him and continued to be happy until he arrived.

Abū Ayyūb: When Abū Muslim drew near to al-Madāʾin, the Commander of the Faithful ordered the populace to go out and meet him.[154] He arrived in the evening. I entered the presence of the Commander of the Faithful while he was on a prayer mat in his tent and said, "This man is arriving later this evening; what do you intend to do?" Abū Jaʿfar said, "I intend to kill him as soon as I set eyes on him." "I adjure you by God," I said, "that his forces are entering [the city] along with him and they know what he has done. If he enters your presence but does not come out, I shall not feel safe from calamity. Rather, when he enters, give [110] him permission to leave. When he comes to you tomorrow, you will have made your decision." I wanted only to defer the event with that speech, simply because of my fear, for him and for us all, of retaliation from Abū Muslim's comrades. Thus in the evening Abū Muslim came to Abū Jaʿfar and made salutation but remained standing before him. Abū Jaʿfar said, "Go away, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān,[155] and make yourself comfortable. Go and bathe, for travel is a dirty business. Then come to me in the morning." Abū Muslim departed and everybody dispersed. When he had gone, the Commander of the Faithful reproached me unfairly, "When

154. The events immediately surrounding Abū Muslim's death are recounted in Fragmenta historicorum, II, 222–24; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 441–42; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 376–79, 440–41; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 111–12; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 165–66. See also Lassner, ʿAbbasid Rule, 63–67; Moscati, "Abū Muslim. III," 101–3; Daniel, Khurasan, 115–17.

155. Abū Muslim's given name (ism) is recorded as either ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim or ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUthmān. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, VI, 48; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 145.

will I ever get a chance with him like this—standing on his two feet right before my eyes! I don't know what could happen tonight!" I left and returned in the morning. When he saw me, the caliph said, "You whoreson fellow,[156] no welcome for you! Yesterday you restrained me from him. By God, I did not sleep a wink all night." He reviled me so much that I feared that he would order me killed. Then he told me to summon ʿUthmān b. Nahīk,[157] which I did. Abū Jaʿfar said, "ʿUthmān, what do you think of the Commander of the Faithful's troubles?" "Commander of the Faithful," he replied, "I am merely your servant. By God, were you to order me to lean on my sword until it came out of my back, I would do so." Abū Jaʿfar said, "How would you take it if I were to command you to kill Abū Muslim?" For a while ʿUthmān was silent, not saying a word. Abū Ayyūb asked, "What's the matter; why aren't you saying anything?" His voice weak, ʿUthmān answered, "I would kill him."

Abū Jaʿfar said, "Hurry off and bring back four of the toughest officers of the guards." ʿUthmān set off, but when he got near the tent flap Abū Jaʿfar called out to him, "ʿUthmān, ʿUthmān, come back here." When he had come back in, the caliph said, "Sit down and send for the guards you trust; have four of them present themselves." ʿUthmān said to one of his servants, "Run and call Shabīb b. Wāj,[158] Abū Ḥanīfah,[159] and two others." They came in [111] and the Commander of the Faithful repeated to them more or less 156. More specifically, ibn al-lakhnāʾ means "son of the uncircumcised woman" but carries the connotation of sexual promiscuity in the absence of clitoral excision. *EI*², s.v. Khafḍ (Ed.).

157. ʿUthmān b. Nahīk al-ʿAkkī, one of the seven duʿāt in the Khurāsānī city of Abīward and reckoned among the naqīb alternates (nuẓarāʾ al-nuqabāʾ), commanded Abū Jaʿfar's guard (ḥaras). Akhbār al-dawlah, 218, 220; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 73–74 (transliterated as "Nuhayk"); Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 377; Crone, Slaves, 189; Daniels, Khurasan, 48, 115.

158. Shabīb b. Wāj al-Marwarrūdhī served under the Khurāsānī general Khāzim b. Khuzaymah before entering the caliph's service. Daniel, drawing upon Ibn Nadīm, equates him with the Shabīb b. Rawāḥ, whom Abū Muslim sent to convert the Magian priest Bihāfarīd/Bihʾāfrīd. Ṭabarī, II, 1960; Daniel, Khurāsān, 91; Dodge, Fihrist of Ibn Nadīm, II, 822.

159. Abū Ḥanīfah Ḥarb b. Qays was appointed head of the guard for Mūsā b. al-Mahdī shortly after al-Mahdī's accession to the caliphate. In 171 he acted as Hārūn al-Rashīd's agent in the assassination of Abū Hurayrah Muḥammad b. Furrūkh. Ṭabarī, III, 456, 606. For the symbolic use of four, see Rescher, "Zahl what he had said to ʿUthmān, and they agreed to kill Abū Muslim. He said, "Station yourselves behind the tent flap; when I clap my hands, come out and kill him."

He sent one messenger after another to Abū Muslim. They returned to say that he had already mounted. A servant came to the caliph to say that he had gone to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. I said, "Commander of the Faithful, should I go out and make the rounds in the camp to see what people are saying, whether anyone has any suspicions or has said anything?" He agreed, so I left, but Abū Muslim ran into me as he was coming in. He smiled and I greeted him and he then went inside. I came back only to see him sprawled out before me; there had been no waiting for my return. Abū al-Jahm[160] came in and when he saw him slain said, "To God we belong and to Him is our return." I went up to Abū al-Jahm and said to him, "You ordered his murder as soon as he revolted, yet when he is killed you have this to say?" By speaking so I brought a distracted man back to alertness. He said something to make up for what had come from his mouth and then asked, "Commander of the Faithful, should I not keep people away?" "Most certainly!" said Abū Jaʿfar, and Abū al-Jahm added, "Order fittings to be taken to another one of these pavilions of yours." He commanded carpets brought out as though he intended to prepare another pavilion for Abū Muslim. Abū al-Jahm then went out and said to the crowd, "Go away now; the Amīr wants to take his repose with the Commander of the Faithful." They saw the furnishings being transported and, assuming Abū al-Jahm to be telling the truth, they turned away. Then in the evening they came, and Abū Jaʿfar ordered rewards paid to them [i.e. Abū Muslim's army commanders]. He gave Abū Isḥāq 100,000 [dirhams].

Abū Ayyūb: The Commander of the Faithful said to me, "Abū Muslim came in, and I reproved and even reviled him. ʿUthmān struck him but it did nothing. Shabīb b. Wāj and his comrades came out and beat him, and he fell down. While they were beat-Vierzig." More recently, Conrad, "Conquest of Arwād," 355, has discussed "the notion of a graded élite of righteous warriors for the cause of God, as symbolized in the number four and its multiples by ten."

---

160. Abū Jahm b. ʿAṭīyah. See Jahshiyārī, Wuzarā', 112.

ing him, he yelled "Pardon!" "Son of a whore," I said, "Pardon? When swords have finally beaten you by turns!" Then I said, "Butcher him" and they did so.[161]

According to ʿAlī—Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī: I was with Abū Muslim when Abū Isḥāq came to him from Abū Jaʿfar with letters from [112] the Banū Hāshim and said, "I disagree with you about the people's attitude. They all think of you as due just what the caliph is due, and they recognize how mindful God has been of them by giving you [to them as a leader]." Abū Muslim went on to al-Madāʾin but left Abū Naṣr in charge of his baggage train, saying, "Stay here until a letter from me reaches you." "Arrange a sign between us," said Abū Naṣr, "by which I can recognize that the letter is from you." He replied, "If my letter reaches you sealed with half an impression, then I have written it. But if it reaches you with the whole signet, then I have neither written nor sealed it." When Abū Muslim drew near al-Madāʾin, one of his army commanders met him, greeted him, and said to him, "Do what I say and go back; if the caliph lays eyes on you, he is going to kill you!" Abū Muslim replied, "I have now drawn near the people, and I am reluctant to turn back." He arrived in al-Madāʾin at the head of 3,000 men but left the bulk of his host behind in Ḥulwān. He presented himself before Abū Jaʿfar, and the caliph ordered him to withdraw for that day. He tried to see him in the morning, but Abū al-Khaṣīb met him and said, "The Commander of the Faithful is busy, be patient for a bit until you can enter alone." He went to where ʿĪsā b. Mūsā was lodged—he was fond of ʿĪsā—and ʿĪsā invited him to break his fast with him. The Commander of the Faithful told Rabīʿ,[162] who at that time was a servant in the employ of Abū al-Khaṣīb, "Go and see Abū Muslim but don't let anyone know. Say to him, 'Marzūq [Abū al-Khaṣīb] says if you want to see the Commander of the Faithful in private, then hurry.' " Abū Muslim stood and mounted up. ʿĪsā said to him, 161. Cf. Theophanes, Chronicle, 118, where the caliph is asserted to have "killed him with his own hands."

162. Abū Faḍl al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Farwah (d. 170/786–87), who served each of the first four ʿAbbāsid caliphs, was first chamberlain and then vizier under Abū Jaʿfar. *EI*², s.v. (A. S. Atiya); Zambaur, Manuel, 6; Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, 87–90; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 123–24; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIV, 84–85; Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 335–36; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 294–99.

"Don't be in a hurry to enter until I can be there to go in with you." ʿĪsā, however, lingered over his ablutions,[163] and Abū Muslim went ahead and entered. Thus he was killed before ʿĪsā arrived. ʿĪsā came after Abū Muslim was wrapped in a cloak[164] and said, "Where is Abū Muslim?" When Abū Jaʿfar responded that he was wrapped in the cloak,[165] ʿĪsā exclaimed, "To God we belong—" but the Caliph said, "Be silent! Your authority and status were achieved only today." Then he had Abū Muslim thrown into the Tigris.

According to ʿAlī—Abū Ḥafṣ: The Commander of the Faithful
[113] summoned ʿUthmān b. Nahīk and four of the guards and said to them, "When I clap my hands, one against the other, then strike the enemy of God." Abū Muslim came into his presence, and Abū Jaʿfar said to him, "Tell me about two blades that you acquired with the goods of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī." Abū Muslim responded, "This is one of the two, which I'm wearing." "Show it to me," said Abū Jaʿfar, so Abū Muslim unsheathed and handed it over. Abū Jaʿfar brandished the sword and then laid it under his cushion. He began to reprimand Abū Muslim, saying, "Tell me about your letter to Abū al-ʿAbbās where you forbid him to take unoccupied land (mawāt).[166] Did you want to teach us our religious duty!" Abū Muslim said, "I thought taking it was illicit, but he wrote to me and when his letter reached me I recognized that the Commander of the Faithful and his lineage are the mother lode of knowledge." Abū Jaʿfar said, "Tell me why you went ahead of me on the road [from Mecca]." Abū Muslim replied, "I didn't think it would be good for our people to all be together at the same watering place, so I went on ahead in order to seek comfort [for all

163. The term used, al-wuḍūʾ, is that which acquired the technical connotation of the prescribed washings for minor impurities done immediately before the ritual prayer.

164. The ʿabāʾah, a common bedouin garment, was a short, sleeveless cloak. Ahsan, Social Life, 44–45; Dozy, Vêtements, 292–97.

165. The kisāʾ was a large outer garment that doubled as a wrap or blanket. Ahsan, Social Life, 44; Dozy, Vêtements, 383–86.

166. Mawāt connotes "dead land," i.e., land that has never been cultivated or that has been allowed to lie fallow. The schools of Islamic jurisprudence disagree about how the reclamation of such land can constitute a legitimate claim to ownership. *EI*², s.v. (A. -M. Delcambre). For the broader issue of the acquisition of landed property in the conquered territories, see Kister, "Land Property and Jihād."

without crowding]." Abū Jaʿfar said, "At the time you learned of Abū al-ʿAbbās's death, what about your remark to the one who suggested that you should return to me: 'We will move forward and see whomever we see.' You went on, neither staying put so that we could catch up with you nor returning to us." Abū Muslim responded, "I was prevented from doing so because, as I have told you, I had to look out for the necessary comforts of my people. I said we should go ahead to al-Kūfah; that could not be considered opposition on my part." Abū Jaʿfar said, "As for the slave girl of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, did you intend to take her as your own?" Abū Muslim replied, "No, but I feared she would get lost, so I transported her in an enclosed litter, entrusting her care to someone who could protect her." Abū Jaʿfar asked, "What about your defiance of orders and your heading back to Khurāsān?" Abū Muslim responded, "I was afraid that I might in some way have offended you, so I told myself that I would return to Khurāsān and write to you with my apologies, to await that time when what was in your mind against me had departed." Abū Jaʿfar said, "By God, I have never seen a day like today. I swear you do nothing but increase my anger." He clapped his hands, and ʿUthmān came [114] out of concealment with his comrades to attack Abū Muslim and struck him until they had killed him.

According to ʿAlī—Yazīd b. Usayd: The Commander of the Faithful said, "I reproached ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, saying, 'What about the booty that you collected in Ḥarrān?' He said, 'I disbursed it and gave it to the army for their seed and land reclamation,'[167] I said, 'What about your recalcitrant return to Khurāsān?' Abū Muslim said, 'Stop this interrogation! I am not about to fear anyone but God.' I became angry and heaped abuse upon him. Then the guards came in and killed him."

Other sources than those I have already cited report as follows on the matter of Abū Muslim: On the day he was killed, having been summoned, Abū Muslim went and asked ʿĪsā b. Mūsā to ride along with him. ʿĪsā, however, said to him, "Go on ahead, as you are under my protection." Abū Muslim entered Abū Jaʿfar's pavilion when the latter had already ordered ʿUthmān b. Nahīk, the captain of his guards, to prepare Shabīb b. Wāj al-Marwar-

167. Wa-aʿṭaytuhu al-junda taqwiyatan lahum wa-istiṣlāḥan.

rūdhī, one of the guards, and Abū Ḥanīfah Ḥarb b. Qays for the deed. "When I clap my hands," Abū Jaʿfar told them, "go to it." He then gave permission for Abū Muslim to enter. When Abū Muslim asked Muḥammad, the Bukhārī gatekeeper,[168] how things stood, Muḥammad replied, "Everything's fine, but the Amīr should give me his sword." "This is not the way I'm used to being treated," Abū Muslim retorted, to which Muḥammad replied, "What are you worried about?" Abū Muslim then complained about it to Abū Jaʿfar, who responded, "May God rebuke whoever did that to you!" But then Abū Jaʿfar began to upbraid Abū Muslim, saying, "Were you not the one who wrote to me, putting your own name first, and were you not also the one who wrote to me asking for Amīnah bt. ʿAlī in marriage, claiming to be the son of Salīṭ b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās?[169] Furthermore, what induced you to kill Sulaymān b. Kathīr[170] despite his importance for our mission, he being one of our chiefs (nuqabāʾ) well before we included you in any part of this affair?" Abū Muslim replied, "He had insubordination in mind and disobeyed me, so I killed him." "But in our view his situation was as it should be," al-Manṣūr said, "yet you killed him and you disobeyed me, thus putting yourself in conflict with me. May God kill me if I do not

168. Following Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVII, and Indices, 507; the Leiden text reads Najjārī. Bukhārā, a city that now lies in the Uzbekistān region of the former U.S.S.R., was formerly a principal city of Transoxania. *EI*², s.v. (W. Barthold and R. N. Frye); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 353–56; Cornu, Répertoires, 160; Le Strange, Lands, 460–63.

169. Amīnah bt. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh was Abū Jaʿfar's paternal aunt, as the mention in Dīnawarī's al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 378, makes explicit. She is cited in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 154, in the biography of Abū Muslim, as Āsīyah. Had Abū Muslim's lineage claim been ratified, this alliance would have followed the common pattern of first-cousin marriage. The paternity of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās's son, Salīṭ, was itself contested. Akhbār al-dawlah, 149–50, 256; Lassner, "Abū Muslim"; Lassner, "Origins"; Sharon, Black Banners, 123, 203; Daniel, Khurasan, 100–4.

170. Abū Muḥammad Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzāʿī, the third naqīb listed in the document Akhbār al-dawlah, 216, which M. Sharon has dubbed the "Convention of the Daʿwah of Khurāsān," was replaced by Abū Muslim as head of the revolutionary effort in Khurāsān. Sharon, Black Banners, 192, 214–24; Ṭabarī, II, 1937, 1988; Caskel, Ǧamarat an-nasab, I, 200, II, 518. For the rivalry between Sulaymān and Abū Muslim, see Ṭabarī, II, 1962; Moscati, "Abū Muslim. I," 326; Hawting, First Dynasty, 113–15; and the epic account in Mélikoff, Abū Muslim, 119.

kill you!" Then he struck Abū Muslim with a staff, and Shabīb and Ḥarb came forth and killed him. That was on the 24th of Shaʿbān in the year 137.[171] Al-Manṣūr recited: [115]

You thought that the debt would not be paid.
Pay now in full measure, Abū Mujrim (criminal).
You are given to drink a cup which you once passed round
More bitter to the throat than the wild gourd.[172]

The allusion is to the fact that in his time of authority and his battles Abū Muslim had killed about 600,000 in cold blood.

Another source: When Abū Jaʿfar chastized him, saying, "You did such and such and you did thus and so," Abū Muslim rejoined, "Such things should not be said to me after the trials I have undergone and the prowess I have displayed!" "Son of an impure woman," exclaimed Abū Jaʿfar, "by God, were a slave girl in your stead, she could have performed as well. You did what you did only within the ambit of our power and by our pleasure. Left to yourself, you could not trim a wick. Were you not the one who wrote to me, putting your own name first, and were you not also the one who wrote to me asking for Amīnah bt. ʿAlī in marriage, claiming to be the son of Salīṭ b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās? For a motherless wretch, you've made quite a difficult ascent!" Abū Muslim took the caliph's hand, stroked and kissed it, and apologized to him.

Another source: ʿUthmān b. Nahīk struck the first blow against Abū Muslim, hitting him lightly with his sword and doing no more than sever his sword straps. Yet Abū Muslim turned his attention to the severed straps,[173] so Shabīb b. Wāj struck at his foot, while the rest of Shabīb's cohort fell on him in turn until they had killed him.[174] All the while al-Manṣūr shouted at the slayers, "Keep hitting! May God cut your hands off [if you don't]!"

---

171. Wednesday, February 12, 755. Wüstenfeld and Mahler, Vergleichungs-Tabellen, 4; Caetani, Cronografia generale, 107; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 154; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 476.

172. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVIII, gives the author of these lines as Abū ʿAṭāʾ al-Sindī (d. 158/774), a poet who was apparently out of favor during al-Manṣūr's reign. *EI*², s.v. (A. Schaade); GAL, I, 63, S I, 98; GAS, II, 471–72.

173. Fa-iʿtaqala bihā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿaqala.

174. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 492, omits fa-qaṭaʿa.

One source recounts that as the first blow struck him, Abū Muslim cried, "Commander of the Faithful, spare me for your enemy's sword." "May God not spare me if I do," retorted Abū Jaʿfar, "for what enemy have I more treacherous than you?"

[116] Another source: ʿĪsā b. Mūsā arrived after Abū Muslim had been killed and asked, "Where is Abū Muslim, Commander of the Faithful?" "He was here just now," replied Abū Jaʿfar. ʿĪsā continued, "Commander of the Faithful, well you recognize his obedience, his sincere counsel, and the good opinion Imām Ibrāhīm had of him."[175] "What a fool you are!" retorted Abū Jaʿfar. "By God, I know on this earth no foe more hostile to you than he [was]. Look, there he is, over there in the rug," at which ʿĪsā intoned, "To God we belong and to Him is our return." Now as ʿĪsā had such an opinion of Abū Muslim, al-Manṣūr said to him, "May God cast him from your heart. Did you have authority or sovereignty or the power to command and prohibit in conjunction with Abū Muslim?"

Abū Jaʿfar then sent for Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah.[176] Jaʿfar entered, and the caliph said to him, "What have you to say about Abū Muslim?" "Commander of the Faithful," Jaʿfar responded, "if you have taken a single hair from his head, then kill, kill, kill." "God prosper you!" said al-Manṣūr and ordered him to stand up and look at Abū Muslim's corpse. Jaʿfar said, "From this day, Commander of the Faithful, will your caliphate be reckoned." Then permission was asked for Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī to enter, and he said, "Commander of the Faithful, last night I dreamt that you slaughtered a ram, and that I trampled it with my feet." "Abū al-Ḥasan, your eye was then asleep," said Abū Jaʿfar; "now stand up and verify your dream; God has indeed slain the sinner." Ismāʿīl went over to where Abū Muslim lay and stamped on him.

Al-Manṣūr was then of a mind to kill Abū Isḥāq, the captain of Abū Muslim's guards, and Abū Naṣr Mālik, prefect of police under Abū Muslim, but Abū al-Jahm spoke with him, saying,

---

175. Wa-raʾya al-imām Ibrāhīm kāna fihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. raʾā.

176. Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah al-Baḥrānī was a Syrian commander who fought for the Umayyads but later achieved prominence as one of the close associates (ṣaḥābah) of al-Manṣūr. His strategic advice was sought in the actions taken against Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and his brother, Ibrāhīm. Ṭabarī, III, 223–24; Crone, Slaves, 67, 249; Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, II, 253.

"Commander of the Faithful, Abū Muslim's army is your army; it is you who commanded them to obey him, and they did so." Al-Manṣūr therefore summoned Abū Isḥāq. When he entered the caliph's presence but had not yet seen Abū Muslim, Abū Jaʿfar said to him, "You have always been in close agreement with the enemy of God, Abū Muslim, whatever he decided to do, [haven't you?]." At this Abū Isḥāq recoiled and began to twist both right [117] and left in fear of Abū Muslim." "Say what you have in mind," continued al-Manṣūr, "for God has slain the sinner"; and he ordered Abū Muslim's badly hacked body to be brought forth. Seeing it, Abū Isḥāq sank to the ground in a prolonged prostration. Al-Manṣūr told him to raise his head and speak, which he did, saying, "Praise God, who today has placed me in your safekeeping. By God, from the time I became his associate, there was never a single day when I felt safe from him. On no day did I ever come to him without having made my will, and without being dressed for the grave and embalmed." He then lifted his outer garments and beneath them he actually wore new linen garments impregnated with embalming aromatics. When Abū Jaʿfar saw this, he felt sorry for him and said, "Assume, now, the duty of obedience to your caliph and praise God who has delivered you from that evil-doer." Finally, Abū Jaʿfar told him to send away[177] all the people who were around him.

The caliph then summoned Mālik b. al-Haytham[178] and spoke to him in similar fashion. Mālik apologized to him with the defense that the caliph had ordered him to obey Abū Muslim, that people had served Abū Muslim and had been quick to satisfy him[179] only with the caliph's approval and, further, that he had been in the faithful service of the ʿAbbāsids [long] before he knew Abū Muslim. Abū Jaʿfar accepted Mālik's apology and laid upon him the same injunction that he had given Abū Isḥāq about sending Abū Muslim's army on their way.

Abū Jaʿfar sent splendid rewards to a number of Abū Muslim's army commanders and gave his entire army enough to win them over. But Abū Muslim's close associates had second thoughts, 177. Farriq ʿannī hādhā al-jamāʿata. Dozy, Supplément, II, 259; Moscati, "Abū Muslim. III," 103.

178. I.e., Abū Naṣr.

179. Wa-khaffa lahu al-nāsu bi-marḍātihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. khaffa.

saying, "We sold our master for dirhams."[180] Abū Jaʿfar, therefore, called for Abū Isḥāq and said, "I swear by God, if they sever but a single one of my tent ropes, I shall have your neck and then wage all-out war against them." Abū Isḥāq thus went out to the malcontents and cried, "Get out of here, you dogs!"

According to ʿAlī—Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī: After Abū Muslim was killed, Abū Jaʿfar wrote a letter to Abū Naṣr, ostensibly coming from Abū Muslim, commanding him to load up his baggage and [118] whatever he had left behind in his charge and to come on ahead. He sealed the letter with Abū Muslim's seal; but when Abū Naṣr saw that the impress of the seal was whole, he knew that Abū Muslim had not written the letter. Saying to himself, "So you've done it, then," he went back down to Hamadhān[181] with the idea of making for Khurāsān. Abū Jaʿfar then wrote to Abū Naṣr appointing him to Shahrazūr[182] and dispatched a messenger to him with the charge. After the messenger had left with the commission, news reached the caliph that Abū Naṣr had already set off for Khurāsān. Abū Jaʿfar, therefore, wrote to Zuhayr b. al-Turkī, then the governor of Hamadhān, saying, "If Abū Naṣr passes your way, arrest him." The letter reached Zuhayr quickly [i.e., ahead of the earlier one], while Abū Naṣr was still in Hamadhān, so Zuhayr seized him and imprisoned him in the castle. Now Zuhayr was a mawlā of the Khuzāʿah[183] tribe [i.e., Abū Naṣr's tribe], and Abū Naṣr had a nephew on his mother's side, Ibrāhīm b. ʿArīf,[184] to whom he now appealed, asking him, "Ibrāhīm, would you kill your own uncle?" "Never, by God!" answered Ibrāhīm. Zuhayr

180. Crone, Slaves, 56, sees the relation of Abū Muslim and his men as an instance where "companionship and clientage almost converged." Abū al-ʿAbbās states that Abū Muslim's followers "prize him above their religious (dīnihim) and worldly (dunyāhum) concerns." Ṭabarī, III, 85.

181. Hamadhān, a city in central Iran in the province of al-Jibāl, was the site of a long siege in the fight between the caliphs Maʾmūn and Amīn. Ṭabarī, III, 829; *EI*², s.v. (R. N. Frye); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 410–17; Cornu, Répertoires, 41; Le Strange, Lands, 194–96, 227–30; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 128–32.

182. Also in the province of al-Jibāl, the ruins of Shahrazūr are found not far from the present-day border between Iran and Turkey. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 375–76; Cornu, Répertoires, 44; Le Strange, Lands, 190; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 207–8.

183. Khuzāʿah b. Rabīʿah was an ancient Arabian tribe with multiple connections to Mecca, whose claims to Muḍarī descent have been contested. *EI*², s.v. (M. J. Kister); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 196, II, 35.

184. This is his only mention in Ṭabarī, and he is not cited in the standard biographical sources.

then made his placatory appeal to Ibrāhīm and confided, "I am under orders, and by God, though he is one of the dearest people in the world to me, there's no way I can refuse to do what the Commander of the Faithful orders. So, by God, if one of you so much as shoots an arrow [in his defense], I'll throw his head at you." Abū Ja'far then wrote another letter to Zuhayr: "If you have already taken Abū Naṣr into custody, then kill him." At this point the one charged with the caliph's commission to Abū Naṣr arrived with it, so out of his affection for him Zuhayr released him and Abū Naṣr left. One day later the letter about killing Abū Naṣr reached Zuhayr, who responded, "I received a letter with his commission, so I released him."

Abū Naṣr then came to Abū Ja'far, who said, "Did you advise Abū Muslim to go on to Khurāsān?" "Yes, Commander of the Faithful," Abū Naṣr replied. "I owed him both benefits and favors; he sought my counsel, and I gave him my best advice. If you treat me kindly, Commander of the Faithful, I would give counsel to you and gratitude." Thus Abū Ja'far forgave him. Later, on the day the Rāwandiyyah[185] attacked, Abū Naṣr took charge of the castle gate, declaring, "Today I am the gatekeeper. No one shall enter the castle while I am alive." When Abū Ja'far asked the whereabouts of [Abū Naṣr] Mālik b. al-Haytham and was told about [119] what he had done, the caliph saw that Abū Naṣr had indeed been sincere in his service.

Another source: When Abū Naṣr Mālik b. al-Haytham went on to Hamadhān, Abū Ja'far wrote to Zuhayr b. al-Turkī, saying, "God shall have your life blood if Mālik escapes you." Zuhayr, therefore, went to Mālik and said to him, "I have prepared a meal for you; would you not honor me by entering my house?" Mālik agreed to come. Zuhayr then armed forty men, whom he had handpicked, and placed them in the two rooms that opened on to the reception area that he had prepared. When Mālik entered, Zuhayr cried out, "Eat quickly, you blackguard!" Those forty men then burst in upon Mālik and bound him with fetters. Chains were put on his feet, and he sent him to al-Manṣūr. The latter treated him graciously, pardoned him, and installed him over al-Mawṣil.

185. The account of this is given in year 141.

In this year Sunbādh rebelled[186] in Khurāsān, seeking to avenge Abū Muslim.

The Episode of Sunbādh

It is said that this Sunbādh[187] was a Zoroastrian,[188] an inhabitant of a village called Ahan[189] in the district of Naysābūr,[190] and that at the time of his coming on the scene his followers were of a considerable number. It is said he rebelled in anger at the killing of Abū Muslim, seeking to avenge him because he was one of Abū Muslim's toadies. During his revolt, Sunbādh conquered Naysābūr, Qūmis,[191] and al-Rayy and was dubbed "Fayrūz the Iṣbahbadh."[192] Upon reaching al-Rayy, he took possession of Abū Muslim's storehouses, the latter having left his treasuries there when he departed to go to Abū [Jaʿfar] al-ʿAbbās. People from al-Jibāl[193] formed the greater part of Sunbādh's associates. Abū

186. For other accounts, consult Fragmenta historicorum, I, 224; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 246–48; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 441–42; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 188–89; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 171–72. See also Gholam Hossein Sadighi, Les Mouvements religieux iraniens au ii^e et iii^e siècle de l'hégire (Paris, 1938), 132–49; Mélikoff, Abū Muslim, 55–56; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 63–65; Sharon, Black Banners, 183 n. 89; Lassner, Topography, 129–30.

187. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 314–16.

188. Al-Shahrastānī, al-Milal wa-al-niḥal, I, 174, associates him with the Ghāliyyah, the "extremist" Shīʿī sects who were given different appelations: "In Iṣbahān they were called al-Khurramiyyah and al-Kūdhiyyah, in Rayy they were called al-Muzdikiyyah [sic, but better, Mazdakiyyah] and al-Sunbādhiyyah." For an earlier identification with al-Khurramiyyah, see Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 188. Laoust, Schismes, 62–63, includes Sunbādh in his category "les abû muslimîya."

189. Given as "Ahrawānah" in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 481, which may be Ahar/Ahr. See Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 283–84; Cornu, Répertoires, 133; Le Strange, Lands, 169

190. The city of Nīshāpūr was a major site in the province of Khurāsān. EI[1], s.v. (E. Honigmann); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 331–33; Cornu, Répertoires, 132; Le Strange, Lands, 382–88.

191. Qūmis was a small province that lay between the Alburz chain and the Great Desert. EI[2], s.v. Ḳūmis (C. E. Bosworth); Cornu, Répertoires, 142; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 414–15; Le Strange, Lands, 364–68.

192. Ispahbadh is a Sāsānid military title that survived well into Islamic period. Morony, Iraq, 28 and passim, translates it as "military governor." EI[2], s.v. (C. E. Bosworth).

193. Al-Jibāl was the mountainous province that came to be called ʿIrāq ʿAjamī. EI[2], s.v. (L. Lockhart); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 99; Le Strange, Lands, 185–231.

Ja'far sent Jahwar b. Marrār al-'Ijlī[194] against them with 10,000 troops.[195] The opposing forces met between Hamadhān and al-Rayy on the edge of the desert (mafāzah).[196] They fought, and Jahwar put Sunbādh to flight,[197] killing about 60,000 of his followers in the rout and taking their children and women prisoner. Subsequently, Sunbādh was killed between Ṭabaristān and Qūmis by Lūnān al-Ṭabarī.[198] Al-Manṣūr then made Wandāhurmuz b. al-Farrukhān[199] Iṣbahbadh of Ṭabaristān and crowned[200] him. Seventy nights elapsed between Sunbādh's revolt and his murder. [120]

In this year Mulabbid b. Ḥarmalah al-Shaybānī[201] came out in revolt.[202] He mounted a Khārijī insurrection[203] in the Jazīrah region, at which point the frontier troops in the Jazīrah, said to number 1,000,[204] advanced against him. Mulabbid fought and routed them, killing an unknown number. Then the frontier army stationed at al-Mawṣil moved against him, and he routed them. Next it was the turn of Yazīd b. Ḥātim al-Muhallabī,[205] but after a fierce battle between them, Mulabbid defeated him.

---

194. For coinage associated with Jahwar, see George C. Miles, The Numismatic History of Rayy (New York, 1938), 22–23.

195. Shaban, Islamic History, II, 13, suggests that so large a force was necessary because this revolt "threatened to cut off the vital northern route between Khurāsān and the west." For use of the figure 10,000 as a topos of magnitude, see Conrad, "Conquest of Arwād," 354.

196. Some sources identify the site as a village called Jarjānbān. Rekaya, "Khurram-Dīn," 27.

197. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 495: "Sunbādh was put to flight."

198. Daniel, Khurasan, 128, reads this as Lūzān. According to Ibn Isfandiyār, Sunbādh was killed by the Iṣbahbādh's cousin for responding to him discourteously. Ibn Isfandiyār, History of Ṭabaristān, 117.

199. Daniel, Khurasan, 129, gives this as Hurmuzd.

200. See Madelung, "Minor Dynasties," 199–200.

201. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVIII, for this vocalization.

202. For other accounts, see Azdī, Ta'rīkh al-Mawṣil, 166; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 248–50; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 482; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 73; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 149, II, 427.

203. The verb used here, ḥakkama, denotes the Khārijī assertion that judgment is reserved to God alone. According to the heresiographical literature, the earliest Khawārij were known as the Muḥakkimah. Shahrastānī, al-Milal wa-al-niḥal, I, 115–18; Baghdādī, al-Farq bayna al-firaq, 51–55.

204. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 482, specifies this as 1,000 cavalry.

205. Yazīd b. Ḥātim b. Qabīṣah b. al-Muhallab (d. 170/786–87) served as governor of Ādharbayjān, of Egypt, and of North Africa (Ifrīqiyah). Dhahabī, Siyar, VIII, 233–35; Ya'qūbī, Historiae, II, 446; Kindī, Wulāh, 111; Zambaur, Manuel, 11, 26, 63.

Mulabbid seized one of Yazīd's slave girls, who had become his concubine, and one of his army commanders was killed. Then Abū Jaʿfar dispatched against Mulabbid his mawlā, al-Muhalhil b. Ṣafwān,[206] with 2,000 of his best soldiers, but Mulabbid put them to flight and plundered their camp. The caliph next sent Nizār, one of the Khurāsānī commanders, against him, but Mulabbid killed him as well and put his comrades to flight. Then the caliph dispatched against him Ziyād b. Mushkān[207] with a large number of men. Mulabbid confronted and routed them as well. Trying again, the caliph sent Ṣāliḥ b. Ṣubayḥ[208] off with a dense host of an army and numerous cavalry and equipment, yet Mulabbid sent them fleeing. Next Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, then the governor of the Jazīrah, set out against him, but Mulabbid confronted and confounded him. Ḥumayd took refuge from Mulabbid in a fortified position and gave him 100,000 dirhams on condition that he leave him alone.[209]

Al-Wāqidī[210] claimed that Mulabbid's emergence and Khārijī proclamation occurred in the year 138.

[121] In this year the troops had no summer campaign, because the reigning power was occupied with the war against Sunbādh.[211]

As al-Wāqidī and others concur, Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, then governor of al-Mawṣil, led the Pilgrimage in this year.

Governing Medina was Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh, while al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Maʿbad was governor of Mecca. Al-ʿAbbās died at 206. According to Ṭabarī, III, 494, 501, al-Muhalhil b. Ṣafwān eventually served as governor of Jurjān, a post from which he was dismissed in 163. A street (sikkah) on the west side of Baghdad was named after him. Lassner, Topography, 70, 256.

207. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 248, places this battle in Bājarmā. In 132/749–50 Ziyād b. Mushkān fought Ibn Hubayrah at Wāsiṭ under al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah's command. Ṭabarī, III, 20.

208. Identified as a mawlā of the Kindah tribe, Ṣāliḥ b. Ṣubayḥ was governor of Armenia from 133 to 134. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 248; Ṭabarī, III, 75, 81; Zambaur, Manuel, 178.

209. The eventual defeat and death of Mulabbid is described under year 138.

210. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī (d. 207/823), author of the Kitāb al-maghāzī, was a celebrated historian, biographer of the Prophet, and qāḍī. EI[1], s.v. (J. Horovitz); GAS, I, 294–97; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, IV, 238–40; Dhahabī, Siyar, IX, 454–69; DMA, s.v. (L. Conrad); Petersen, ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya, 83–99; Crone, Meccan Trade, 223–26.

211. See Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs", 732.

the conclusion of the Pilgrimage ceremonies, so Ismāʿīl combined al-ʿAbbās's governorate with that of Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh, and Abū Jaʿfar confirmed the latter's jurisdiction over Mecca. In this year the governor of al-Kūfah was ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; and of al-Baṣrah and its subdistricts, Sulaymān b. ʿAlī, while ʿUmar b. ʿĀmir al-Sulamī was in charge of its judiciary. Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm was governor of Khurāsān, and Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah of the Jazīrah. The governor of Egypt was Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās.[212]

212. Although he was also governor of Syria, Sourdel, "Syrie," 158–59, notes that in this earlier period Ṭabarī does not include Syrian governors in his listings.

The Events of the Year 138

(JUNE 16, 755–JUNE 4, 756)

Among the events of this year was the violent entry,[213] by Constantine[214] the tyrant of Byzantium, into Malaṭyah,[215] overwhelming its populace and razing its walls but granting amnesty to its inhabitants, both combatants and children.[216]

Among the events was also the raid[217]—al-Wāqidī calls it a "summer campaign"—that al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b.

213. For other accounts, see Fragmenta historicorum, I, 224–25; Agapius, Kitāb al-ʿunwān, 376; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 486; and Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 73. Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 435, records on attack against Malaṭya by Constantine in 133, as does Theophanes, Chronicle, 116, while Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 171, sets the event in 139.

214. Caetani, Cronographia generale, 143, gives the name as Constantine Copronymus.

215. Also Malaṭīn or Malaṭiyah, this was a town in eastern Anatolia, near the western Euphrates, which became one of the frontier fortresses during the Umayyad period. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 192–93; Cornu, Répertoires, 19; EI[2], s.v. (E. Honigmann); Le Strange, Lands, 120–21; EI[1], s.v. al-Thughūr (E. Honigmann).

216. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 199, the Muslim inhabitants were expelled.

217. For other accounts, see Fragmenta historicorum, I, 225; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 444; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 470; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 171 (under the year 139); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 486; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, X, 73.

ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās[218] made with Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh. Ṣāliḥ rewarded him with 40,000 dīnārs. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh went out with them, so Ṣāliḥ gave him 40,000 dīnārs too. Ṣāliḥ b. [122] ʿAlī rebuilt what the leader of the Byzantines had destroyed in Malaṭyah.

Some sources say that the raiding expedition against Malaṭyah made by Ṣāliḥ and al-ʿAbbās occurred in the year 139.

In this year ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, who was then residing in al-Baṣrah with his brother Sulaymān b. ʿAlī, rendered the oath of allegiance to Abū Jaʿfar.[219]

In this year Jahwar b. Marrār al-ʿIjlī renounced his allegiance to al-Manṣūr.[220]

The Reason Jahwar Turned against al-Manṣūr

The reason for that mentioned in the sources is as follows: When Jahwar put Sunbādh to flight, he took possession of the contents of his camp, including the stored treasures that Abū Muslim had left behind in al-Rayy. Then Jahwar failed to forward these things to Abū Jaʿfar and, fearing the consequences, he turned [outright] renegade. Abū Jaʿfar then sent Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath al-Khuzāʿī[221] against him with a huge force. Muḥammad engaged Jahwar, and they waged a hard-fought battle. With Jahwar were

---

218. Al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās was a brother of the caliph al-Manṣūr (d. 186/802) who led other noted campaigns against the Byzantines and who served as governor of Syria for al-Manṣūr and as governor of the Jazīrah for the caliph al-Rashīd. *EI*², s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Dhahabī, Siyar, VIII, 534–35; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 638.

219. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 486. The account of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī's contestation of Abū Jaʿfar's claim to the caliphate may be found in the chapter on year 137.

220. For other accounts see Fragmenta historicorum, I, 225; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 247–48; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 73–74; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 393–94; Agapius, Kitāb al-ʿunwān, 375.

221. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath (d. 149/766), one of Abū Muslim's governors in Khurāsān, was governor of Damascus for al-Manṣūr and later appointed to Egypt. In 144/761 he took al-Qayrawān back from the Ibāḍiyyah and subsequently built its fortification walls. Ṭabarī, II, 2001, III, 353; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, II, 228; Kindī, Wulāh, 108–9; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 76–77, 190; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳayrawān (M. Talbi).

the elite of the Persian cavalry, Ziyād and al-Ishtākhanj,[222] yet Jahwar and his confederates were routed, with many of them being killed. Ziyād and al-Ishtākhanj were taken prisoner, but Jahwar escaped and managed to get to Ādharbayjān. Some time later he was arrested in Isbādhrū[223] and killed.[224]

In this year the Khārijite, al-Mulabbid, was slain.[225]

How al-Mulabbid Came to Be Killed

It is said that when al-Mulabbid[226] had bested Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, and Ḥumayd, in turn, had taken refuge from al-Mulabbid, Abū Jaʿfar sent against him ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān,[227] the brother of ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān,[228] in conjunction with Ziyād b. Mushkān. Al-Mulabbid waylaid him [123] with 100 cavalry in such a way that when ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz met up with him, those lying in ambush came forth and routed him, killing the greater part of his confederates. At this Abū Jaʿfar dispatched against him Khāzim b. Khuzaymah[229] with about 8,000 men from Marw al-Rūdh. Khāzim marched forth as far as al-Mawṣil, where he encamped; from there he sent some of his associates forward toward Balad[230] along with the pioneer units.

222. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVIII. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 196, cites an Ashtākhawst near Marw and an Ishtīkhan in Samarqand. For the latter, see Le Strange, Lands, 466.

223. Isbīdhrūdh or Sabīdhrūdh, more commonly Safīd-Rūd, was the name of a river in southeastern Ādharbayjān. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 172–73; Cornu, Répertoires, 141; Le Strange, Lands, 169–70.

224. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 247–48, the governor of Ādharbayjān, Yazīd b. Ḥātim, gave a guarantee of safe-conduct to Jahwar, but the guarantee was transgressed and Jahwar was killed. Yazīd then sent Jahwar's head and the heads of his assassins to al-Manṣūr.

225. For other accounts see Fragmenta historicorum, I, 225; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 248–50; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 485–86; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 74; Agapius, Kitāb al-ʿunwān, 376.

226. This continues the account begun by Ṭabarī at III, 120.

227. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī was a governor of al-Baṣrah under al-Manṣūr and brother of the renegade Khurāsānī governor whose defeat is described under the year 141. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 230, 257; Crone, Slaves, 173.

228. See note 109.

229. See note 77.

230. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXIX. Balad (Balaṭ) was a city on the Tigris northwest of al-Mawṣil. Cornu, Répertoires, 16; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 484–85; Le Strange, Lands, 99, 125; Dussaud, Topographie, 482, 484, 500.

This advance party went on to Balad, where they dug trenches and set up booths (aswāq)[231] for him. News of that reached al-Mulabbid, so he came forth and encamped at Balad in the trench that Khāzim's diggers had prepared. When Khāzim learned of that, he went out to a heavily fortified spot on the outskirts of al-Mawṣil and set up camp there. Hearing of this, al-Mulabbid crossed the Tigris from Balad and headed for Khāzim on the other side going toward al-Mawṣil. When news of that reached Khāzim as well as Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī, the governor of al-Mawṣil, the latter ordered Khāzim to come back from his encampment [on the outskirts] so that he could cross by the bridge in al-Mawṣil. Khāzim, however, forebore doing so, preferring to make a bridge from his camp site and thereby cross [i.e., over the ditch; see below] to al-Mulabbid.

Naḍalah b. Nuʿaym b. Khāzim b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nahshalī[232] was in command of Khāzim's vanguard and scouts, while the right flank was headed by Zuhayr b. Muḥammad al-ʿĀmirī[233] and the left by Abū Ḥammād al-Abraṣ,[234] the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym.[235] Khāzim himself marched with the center. He kept up with al-Mulabbid and his confederates until evening fell, whereupon they took opposing positions for the night.[236] On Wednesday morning, al-Mulabbid and his men decamped, heading for the district of Ḥazzah.[237] Khāzim and his troops continued to keep level with them until night fell, and they resumed once more on Thursday. Al-Mulabbid and his men kept moving as if intend-231. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. sūq.

232. Naḍalah b. Nuʿaym had previously commanded Khāzim b. Khuzaymah's vanguard in a battle against the Khārijīs in 134/751. Ṭabarī, III, 78–80. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 485, gives the name as Faḍalah b. Nuʿaym.

233. For earlier military services by Zuhayr b. Muḥammad, see Ṭabarī, III, 4, 21.

234. Some seven years later [see under the year 145] Abū Ḥammad al-Marwazī would fight for al-Manṣūr against another insurgent, Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh.

235. Sulaym b. Manṣūr were a tribe of Qays-ʿAylān whose traditional territory lay in the Ḥijāz between Mecca and Medina. EI[1], s.v. [H. Lammens]; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, 122; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 261–64; Lecker, Banū Sulaym.

236. Following Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 498, reading tawāqafū rather than the Leiden text's one of tawāfaqū.

237. Arḍ Ḥazzah, the Sāsānid district of Adiabene, lay southeast of al-Mawṣil. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 256; Morony, Iraq, 126, 127 (map), 204; EI[2], s.v. al-Mawṣil [E. Honigmann and C. E. Bosworth]; Caetani, Cronographia generale 141; Ṭabarī, I, 820.

ing to escape from Khāzim. At this, Khāzim and his confederates marched out in their tracks, leaving behind the trench equipped with caltrops, which Khāzim had dug against al-Mulabbid and his men. When Khāzim's force abandoned their trench, al-Mulabbid and his troops whirled around to attack them. Seeing [124] that, Khāzim threw down the caltrops in front of al-Mulabbid and his confederates, who then attacked Khāzim, rolled up his right flank, and did the same to the left. Finally, they reached the center, commanded by Khāzim himself. As he realized that, Khāzim shouted to his men, "To the ground, to the ground!"[238] The troops dismounted, as did al-Mulabbid and his forces. The latter hamstrung their mounts, and then the opposing forces flailed away with their swords until the swords were broken. At this point Khāzim commanded Naḍalah b. Nuʿaym, "When the dust rises and we can no longer see each other, you and your men return to your horses and remount. Then start shooting arrows." Ibn Nuʿaym did as he was ordered, while Khāzim's troops fell back from the right all the way to the left flank. They then rained arrows on al-Mulabbid and his confederates, killing al-Mulabbid along with 800 of the men who had dismounted. (About 300 had been killed before they dismounted.) The rest fled, but Naḍalah pursued them and killed another 150 men.

In this year the Pilgrimage was led by al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās,[239] as both al-Wāqidī and others have reported. It is also said that Ibn Ṣāliḥ left his father in Syria as a simple pilgrim, but while he was on the road, his commissioned responsibility for the Pilgrimage ceremonies and for leading the Pilgrimage reached him, so he went on through Medina and entered the state of consecration (iḥrām)[240] from there on.[241]

---

238. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 499, omits the second al-arḍ without textual citation.

239. Ṭabarī, II, 1716, III, 466, 470, 484, 491, dates the birth of this cousin of al-Manṣūr to 122/739–40 and notes that he became governor of the Jazīrah in 159/775–76 and was removed from that position in 161/777–78. Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 67, 75; Lassner, Shaping, appendix E; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 149.

240. In this ritual state the requisite garb for male pilgrims consists of two large pieces of unstitched cloth.

241. Ṭabarī later, at III, 147, explains Abū Jaʿfar's expectations of al-Faḍl in the search for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and his brother Ibrāhīm.

Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh[242] was governor of Medina, Mecca, and al-Ṭāʾif.[243] The governor of al-Kūfah and its Sawād was ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; of al-Baṣrah and its subdistricts, Sulaymān b. ʿAlī,[244] while its judiciary was headed by Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh.[245] Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm was governor of Khurāsān, and Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī[246] was governor of Egypt.

---

242. Cf. Caetani, Cronographia generale, 147; Zambaur, Manuel, 20, 24.

243. Al-Ṭāʾif is a town in the Sarāṭ mountains southeast of Mecca. EI[1], s.v. (H. Lammens); Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 8–12.

244. Cf. Caetani, Cronographia generale, 148; Zambaur, Manuel, 40, as ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī.

245. Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh (d. 157/773–74) was the grandfather of the famous Baghdādī judge and traditionist Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh al-Tamīmi (d. 245/859–60). It is reported that, before pronouncing judgment, he raised his head heavenward and let tears well up in his eyes. Ibn Saʿd, al-Ṭabaqāt al-kubrā, VII, 260–61; Ṭabarī, III, 380; Dhahabī, Siyar, XI, 544; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 37.

246. Cf. Caetani, Cronographia generale, 149; Kindī, Wulāh, 105, 106. Zambaur, Manuel, 26, has Abū ʿAwn.

The Events of the Year

139

(June 5, 756–May 24, 757)

[125] Among the events of this year was the fact that Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī and al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad stayed on in Malaṭyah until they had completed its rebuilding.[247] Then these two waged the summer campaign through Darb al-Ḥadath,[248] penetrating deeply in Byzantine territory. Campaigning with Ṣāliḥ were his two sisters, Umm ʿĪsā[249] and Lubābah,[250] both the daughters of ʿAlī,[251] for they had vowed that if the Umayyad reign came to an end, they

247. Other sources include Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 444–45; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 171; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 74; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 488; Chronicon Anonymum, 173.

248. A narrow pass northwest of al-Ḥadath, a frontier town between Marʿash and Malaṭyah, whose name the "Arabs changed to darb al-salāma in an attempt to exorcise the evil fate which seemed to be attached to it." *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadath (S. Ory); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 227–29; Cornu, Répertoires, 18; Le Strange, Lands, 121–22.

249. Umm ʿĪsā bt. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, who was married to Ibn Ḥasan b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 72.

250. Lubābah bt. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās, who was married to Ibn Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās. Ibid.

251. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās (d. 117 or 118/735–37) was the grandfather of the first two ʿAbbāsid caliphs. *EI*², s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 71–80; Ṭabarī, II, 1592.

would fight "in the path of God."[252] Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī[253] mounted a raid through the Malaṭyah pass.

In this year al-Manṣūr and the Byzantine ruler worked out a ransom agreement by which the caliph recovered the Muslim prisoners from them.[254] After that, the sources report, the Muslims had no summer campaign until 146,[255] because Abū Jaʿfar was occupied with matters involving the two sons of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan.[256] Some sources say, however, that al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah conducted a summer campaign in the year 140 along with ʿAbd al-Wahhāb,[257] the son of Ibrāhīm the Imām. They say that the Byzantine leader, Constantine, along with 100,000 troops, came forward and encamped at the Jayḥān.[258] When, however, news of the magnitude of the Muslim force reached him, he pulled back. Following that incident there was no summer campaign until 146.

In this year ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muʿāwiyah b. Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān[259] went to Spain, where the populace accepted his hegemony and where his descendants rule to this day.

In this year Abū Jaʿfar enlarged the Mosque in Mecca.[260] Sources report that it was a very fertile year and was accordingly named "the Year of Abundance".[261]

---

252. A Qur'ānic expression first encountered in sūrat al-baqarah, 2, 154: "And do not say of those who are killed [fighting] in the path of God 'they are dead.' "

253. According to Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 171, Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah also planted crops and used lime (kils) in rebuilding the city.

254. Kennedy, "Arab Settlement," 23, notes that at this point the city was garrisoned with 4,000 troops.

255. See also Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 74; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 488.

256. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan ("al-Muthannā") b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. See note 402. Also EI[2], s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, Ṣāḥib Fakhkh (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

257. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm al-Imām b. Muḥammad (d. 157/774), a nephew of Abū Jaʿfar, led the Pilgrimage in 146 and waged summer campaigns in 151 and 152. He married a daughter of his great-uncle Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 94, 127; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 179.

258. The Jayḥān, or Ceyhan, River flows southwest from Elbistan to the Mediterranean. EI[2], s.v. Djayḥān (M. Canard); Le Strange, Lands, 120, 122, 129–31; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 202; Cornu, Répertoires, 6.

259. He died in 172/788, after consolidating Umayyad power from his capital in Cordova. EI[2], s.v. (E. Lévi-Provençal); Dhahabī, Siyar, VIII, 244–53; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 489–96.

260. Fragmenta historicorum, I, 227, calls this masjid al-kaʿbah.

261. Other sources include Fragmenta historicorum, I, 227; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 74–75.

In this year Sulaymān b. ʿAlī was dismissed from the governor-[126] ship of al-Baṣrah and from jurisdiction over its subdistricts. Some sources record this for the year 140.

In this year al-Manṣūr appointed Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah[262] to the governorship of al-Baṣrah previously held by Sulaymān b. ʿAlī. Sources date that to Wednesday in the middle of Ramaḍān.[263] When Sulaymān was dismissed and Sufyān appointed, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and his confederates went into hiding, fearing for their own safety. Abū Jaʿfar heard about that and forwarded a letter to Sulaymān and ʿĪsā, the sons of ʿAlī, about sending ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī on to him. He adjured them to do so without delay, giving a sufficiently satisfactory pledge of security for ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī to secure their trust.[264] The caliph then wrote to Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah informing him of this and instructing him to pester and prod the two brothers into bringing forth ʿAbdallāh and his entourage. This Sulaymān and ʿĪsā did, bringing ʿAbdallāh, the mass of his army commanders, his closest associates, and his mawlās to reach Abū Jaʿfar on Thursday, the 17th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.[265]

In this year Abū Jaʿfar ordered the detention of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and his entourage and the execution of some of them.[266]

---

262. Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab remained governor of al-Baṣrah until 145, when he was replaced by Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī, who was dismissed by Abū Jaʿfar within the year. In 132 Sufyān had unsuccessfully attempted to displace this same Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī as the last Umayyad governor of al-Baṣrah. Ṭabarī, III, 21–23, 319, 327; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 74–78; Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 280.

263. 15 Ramaḍān 139 would be February 10, 757, which was actually a Thursday. Wüstenfeld and Mahler, Vergleichungs-Tabellen, 4; Caetani, Cronographia generale, 161.

264. According to Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 442, this amān was composed by the celebrated literary figure Ibn al-Muqaffaʿ (Sourdel, "Ibn al-Muqaffaʿ"), who was then in the service of ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī. The constraints against caliphal transgression of the agreement that he included in the document led to his dismissal and eventual execution. The text of this amān is reproduced in Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 168–70, while Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 104–5, details the grievances against Ibn al-Muqaffaʿ for which Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah exacted mortal vegeance.

265. Thursday, May 12, 757.

266. For other accounts, see Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 442–43; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 170 (given for the year 138); Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 75; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 496–97.

The Arrest of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī

When Sulaymān and ʿĪsā, the sons of ʿAlī, reached Abū Jaʿfar, he gave them leave to enter his presence. They informed him that ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī was there and asked Abū Jaʿfar's permission for him to enter. The caliph acceded to their request and engaged them in conversation, having already prepared a place of confinement in his palace for ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and given orders that ʿAbdallāh be taken off there after ʿĪsā and Sulaymān had entered his presence. That having been done, Abū Jaʿfar rose from his seat and said to Sulaymān and ʿĪsā, "Hurry off with ʿAbdallāh." When they went out without finding ʿAbdallāh in the antechamber [127] where he had been waiting, they realized he had been arrested. Attempting to return to Abū Jaʿfar, however, their way was barred. At the same time those confederates of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī who were present were divested of their swords and imprisoned. Khufāf b. Manṣūr had forewarned them of that and now rued the fact that he had come himself, saying to them, "You should do what I say. We could make a concerted attack on Abū Jaʿfar and, by God, no one could get in our way before we'd done away with him! Then we'd rush these doors with our swords drawn and no one would dare try and stop us without our taking his life.[267] And so, eventually, we'd get out of here and escape." But they refused to obey him, so when their swords were seized and Abū Jaʿfar ordered their imprisonment, Khufāf began to make rude sounds in his beard[268] and spit in his comrades' faces. Abū Jaʿfar then ordered that some of them be killed in his presence and sent those remaining to Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm in Khurāsān, where the latter killed them. Other sources state that Abū Jaʿfar's imprisonment of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī occurred in 140.[269]

In this year al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās led the Pilgrimage.

---

267. Afatnāhu nafsahu, following Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXIX.

268. Yaḍriṭu fī liḥyatihi as an expression of derision or impatience. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ḍaraṭa.

269. For an account of the death of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī in 147/764–65, see Ṭabarī, III, 328–31; Lassner, "Did the Caliph?" and Shaping, 39–57.

The governor of Mecca, Medina, and al-Ṭāʾif was Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī, while ʿĪsā b. Mūsā was in charge of al-Kūfah and its administrative territory. Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah headed al-Baṣrah and its subdistricts, with Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh in charge of its judiciary. Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm was governor of Khurāsān.

The Events of the Year 140

(MAY 25, 757–MAY 13, 758)

The Death of the Governor of Khurāsān and What Brought It About

It is related that one night some members of the army became so stirred up against Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm, then Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr's governor in Khurāsān, that they converged on the house where he lived near the Kushmāhan[270] gate in the city of Marw.[271] Perched on the edge of a protruding brick, Abū Dāwūd looked down from the parapet and began to shout out to his confederates so that they would recognize his voice. Near daybreak, however, the brick broke, and Abū Dāwūd fell onto the overhang (sutrah)[272] of a portico at the forward section of the terrace, breaking his back. He died about the time of the afternoon prayer.

---

270. Also Kushmayhan, this was a village northeast of Marw on the road to Bukhārā. Barthold, Geography of Iran, 43; Cornu, Répertoires, 151; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 463. Le Strange, Lands, 400, gives this as the Dār Mashkān gate.

271. Other sources include Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 498; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 226–27; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 75.

272. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. satara.

ʿIṣām,[273] Abū Dāwūd's prefect of police, acted as his successor until ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī arrived.

In this year Abū Jaʿfar appointed ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān governor of Khurāsān.[274] He arrived and there arrested some of the army commanders whom he is said to have suspected of promoting the cause of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib's descendants. Among them were Mujāshiʿ b. Ḥurayth al-Anṣārī, commander (ṣāḥib) of Bukhārā; Abū al-Mughīrah, a mawlā of the Banū Tamīm[275] (also known as Khālid b. Kathīr),[276] who was commander of Qūhistān;[277] and al-Ḥarīsh b. Muḥammad al-Dhuhlī, Abū Dāwūd's paternal first cousin. These he killed, while al-Junayd b. Khālid b. Huraym al-Taghlibī and Maʿbad b. al-Khalīl al-Muzanī[278] were imprisoned after a severe beating. ʿAbd al-Jabbār confined a number of the most prominent Khurāsānī army commanders and insisted on extracting the remaining revenues due from Abū Dāwūd's agents.

[129] In this year Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr went on the Pilgrimage, entering the state of consecration at al-Ḥīrah.[279] Upon completion of the Pilgrimage he returned to Medina and from there proceeded to Jerusalem.[280]

---

273. Abū ʿIṣām ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym, a mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Kurayz. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXIX. According to al-Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 226, al-Manṣūr promised Abū ʿIṣām that he would be the "amīr of Khurāsān" if he killed Abū Dāwūd.

274. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 227–30; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 445; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 498; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 75; Moscati, "La Rivolta," 613–15.

275. Tamīm b. Murr was a major tribal group of central and east Arabia. EI^{2}, s.v. (G. Levi della Vida); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 59, II, 544.

276. Caetani, Cronographia generale, 184, 202, lists these two as governors of Bukhārā and Qūhistān, respectively. See also Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 277, II, 298.

277. Qūhistān was the region of eastern Khurāsān centered around the town of Qāyin. EI^{2}, s.v. (J. H. Kramers); Cornu, Répertoires, 153; Le Strange, Lands, 352–63; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 416.

278. Maʿbad b. al-Khalīl al-Muzanī was appointed governor of Sind in 157/773 and died in 159/775–76. Ṭabarī, III, 380, 461.

279. To do so at such an early stage was presumably intended as a gesture of particular piety, because entering on the state of iḥrām carried various abstentions with it.

280. Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 379–80, speaks of Abū Jaʿfar's generosity to the people of Medina. See also Fragmenta historicorum, I, 227; Ibn Qutaybah, al-Maʿārif, 378; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 444, 469; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 173; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 75.

For this year, the governors of the major cities were the same as the year before except for Khurāsān, its governor being ʿAbd al-Jabbār. When Abū Jaʿfar reached Jerusalem he prayed at the mosque there and then took the road for Syria,[281] continuing on to sojourn at al-Raqqah. There he was brought Manṣūr b. Jaʿwanah b. al-Ḥārith al-ʿĀmirī[282] of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah,[283] whom he had executed. Leaving there, Abū Jaʿfar took the Euphrates as far as al-Hāshimiyyah, i.e., the Hāshimiyyah of al-Kūfah.[284]

281. Sourdel, "Syrie," 166, marks this as one of two visits that al-Manṣūr made to Syria during his reign.

282. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 192, places this execution in 141. As a former official for ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, he is among those who went into hiding when ʿAbdallāh fled to al-Baṣrah in 137.

283. ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah were a large tribal group in western central Arabia. EI^{2}, s.v. (W. Caskel); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, II, 163–64.

284. Al-Hāshimiyyah was the early ʿAbbāsid administrative center near Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah. EI^{2}, s.v. (J. Lassner); Lassner, Shaping, 151–62; Le Strange, Lands, 70–71; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 389.

The Events of the Year

141

(MAY 14, 758–MAY 3, 759)

Among the events of this year was the revolt of the Rāwandiyyah.[285] Some of the sources state that the episode involving the Rāwandiyyah and Abū Jaʿfar, which I am going to relate, took place in 137 or 136.[286]

The Rāwandiyyah Affair and How Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr Dealt with Them

According to the account given on the authority of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, the Rāwandiyyah were a Khurāsānī group who fol-

285. The Rāwandiyyah were a largely Khurāsānī group of proto-Shīʿī Hāshimīs, linked to the eponymous ʿAbdallāh al-Rāwandī, who acknowledged Muḥammad b. ʿAlī's succession from Abū Hāshim b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafīyah and who through a belief in metempsychosis (tanāsukh al-arwāḥ) elevated Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr to divine status. Cahen, "Points de vue"; Laoust, Schismes, 62; Hodgson, "Early Shīʿa."

286. Other sources include Fragmenta historicorum, I, 227–28; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 380; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 235–37; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 173; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 502–4; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 160–61; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 75–77; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 395–96.

lowed Abū Muslim,[287] leader of the Banū Hāshim cause.[288] They are said to have believed in the transmigration of souls,[289] claiming that the spirit (rūḥ) of Adam dwelt in ʿUthmān b. Nahīk;[290] that their Lord, who gave them food and drink, was Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr;[291] and that al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah[292] was Gabriel.

They arrived at al-Manṣūr's castle and began to circumambulate it, saying, "This is the castle of our Lord." Consequently al- [130]
Manṣūr sent for their leaders and imprisoned 200 of them. At this their comrades grew angry and asked, "Why were they imprisoned?" Al-Manṣūr forbade them to congregate, but they prepared a bier and, carrying the coffin[293] empty with no one in it, they crossed through the city as far as the gate of the prison, threw down the bier, attacked the people, and entered the prison. After extricating their confederates, the Rāwandiyyah, then 600 strong, started to make their way back to al-Manṣūr. The populace, however, sounded the alarm, and the city gates were fastened shut so that no one could enter. There being no riding horse stabled in the castle, al-Manṣūr left there on foot. (From that day on, he began to keep one of the caliphal palace horses tethered close by in the castle compound.)

When al-Manṣūr left the castle, a mount was brought for him. Bestriding it, he was himself heading for the Rāwandiyyah mob when Maʿn b. Zāʾidah[294] came to a halt before Abū Jaʿfar and

287. According to al-Nawbakhtī, they claimed that Abū Muslim was a prophet sent by Abū Jaʿfar and that he had the power to cause death and revivification. Nawbakhtī, Firaq al-shīʿah, 52.

288. For the connection of the Rāwandiyyah with Abū Muslim and the larger ʿAbbāsid cause, see Cahen, "Points de vue," 324–32.

289. See Baghdādī, al-Farq bayna al-firaq, 254.

290. See note 157. See also Laoust, Schismes, 62, who gives the name as Ibn Nuhayk [Nuhaik].

291. The imāmah lineage from Muḥammad to Abū Jaʿfar is given by Ashʿarī, Maqālāt al-islamiyyīn, I, 94.

292. Al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah al-ʿAtakī was the governor of Mecca 141–43/758–61. In 155/771–72 al-Manṣūr appointed him to al-Baṣrah. A year later he died in Baghdad during intercourse with a slave girl, and at his burial rites the caliph prayed over his body. Ṭabarī, III, 138, 373, 378; Akhbār al-dawlah, 218, as al-ʿAkkī; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VIII, 105; Zambaur, Manuel, 20.

293. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 235, the coffin ostensibly held the body of a dead woman but was actually filled with weapons.

294. Abū al-Walīd Maʿn b. Zāʾidah al-Shaybānī (d. 152/769–70) was an Umayyad commander who defended Wāsiṭ against the ʿAbbāsids and allegedly killed Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb. His rescue of al-Manṣūr won him forgiveness and ad-threw himself into action.[295] Hastily dismounting and tucking the lower part of this tunic (birkat al-qabāʾ)[296] into his belt, he grabbed the rein of al-Manṣūr's horse and said, "By God I implore you, Commander of the Faithful, to go back,[297] for you are safe [if you do this]."[298] Abū Naṣr Mālik b. al-Haytham then arrived and stationed himself at the castle door, saying, "Today I shall be a gatekeeper."[299] The market folk were called out, and they hurled missiles upon the Rāwandiyyah, fighting until they had exhausted them. At this point the city gate was opened so that the people could enter. Khāzim b. Khuzaymah, arriving on a gelding, asked the Commander of the Faithful whether he should massacre the Rāwandiyyah. "Yes," Abū Jaʿfar replied, so Khāzim assaulted them, forcing them back against a wall. They then turned on Khāzim and laid the commander and his forces bare to attack. But Khāzim retaliated and again forced them back to the city wall. To al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah[300] he said, "When they wheel round against us, get behind them to the wall and kill them as they go back once more." The Rāwandiyyah attacked Khāzim, [131] but he pretended to flee before them[301] and, with al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah coming up from behind them, they were all killed.

At that time ʿUthmān b. Nahīk went out and spoke to the Rāwandiyyah.[302] As he withdrew, they shot him in the back with an arrow, from which he died after a few days of illness. Standing at his grave until burial, Abū Jaʿfar prayed for ʿUthmān, saying, "May God have mercy on you, Abū Yazīd." In ʿUthmān's place as ministrative appointments in the Yemen and Sīstān. He was killed at Bust in a surprise attack by local Khārijīs. EI[2], s.v. (H. Kennedy); Ṭabarī, III, 15–16, 394–96; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 401–2; Crone, Slaves, 169; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, V, 244–54.

---

295. Fa-ramā bi-nafsihi.

296. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXVIX, and Glossarium, s.v. baraka.

297. Allā rajaʿta, following Wright, Grammar, II, 305.

298. This scene is presented in greater detail on p. 68, below.

299. For a somewhat expanded version of this pledge, see p. 43.

300. Al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah b. Zuhayr al-Tamīmī (d. 156/772–73) was a mawlā of al-Manṣūr who served under both Khāzim b. Khuzaymah and Khuzaymah b. Khāzim. Ṭabarī, III, 356–57, 856; Lassner, Topography, 70 (translating al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī's Taʾrīkh Baghdād).

301. Fa-iṭṭarada lahum. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ṭarada.

302. See p. 63, where the Rāwandiyyah esteem him as the embodiment of the prophet Adam's spirit.

head of his guard, the caliph then appointed ʿĪsā b. Nahīk,[303] who held that position until he died, whereupon Abū Jaʿfar named Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Ṭūsi[304] to the post.

On that day, after the gates had been bolted, Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī arrived and said to the gatekeeper, "Open up and you shall have 1,000 dirhams," but the gatekeeper refused. That was also the same day that al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Ḍirār,[305] prefect of police for ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, was in the city and gave proof of his courage. All of this occurred in the city of al-Hāshimiyyah near al-Kūfah.

When al-Rabīʿ came forward to seize al-Manṣūr's bridle that day, Maʿn said to him, "This is not one of your days!" Abarwīz,[306] son of the Maṣmughān,[307] the ruler of Dunbāwand,[308] also made a gallant showing. Having quarreled with his brother, he had come to Abū Jaʿfar, who treated him graciously, providing a subsidy for him. On this day, therefore, he again came before the caliph, made obeisance to him, and asked whether he should fight the Rāwandiyyah. With the caliph's approval, he proceeded to the task. As soon as he had struck and felled one, he would withdraw [to fight another].

When the Rāwandiyyah had been slain and al-Manṣūr had prayed the noon prayer, he called for dinner but said, "Bring Maʿn b. Zāʾidah here,"[309] not touching his food until Maʿn arrived. The 303. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk al-ʿAkkī, like his brother ʿUthmān, was one of the seven duʿāt in the Khurāsānī town of Abīward. After his death Abū Jaʿfar proved extraordinarily generous to his family. Akhbār al-dawlah, 218; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 73; Ṭabarī, III, 400; Crone, Slaves, 189.

304. Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭāʾī al-Ṭūsī was also a dāʿī in Abīward and a revolutionary commander who fought against Ibn Hubayrah at Wāsiṭ. He later served in administrative positions under the caliphs al-Manṣūr, al-Mahdī, and Hārūn al-Rashīd. Akhbār al-dawlah, 218; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 24; Ṭabarī, II, 1950, 1963, III, 20, 324, 517, 521; Crone, Slaves, 174.

305. For the year 147, Ṭabarī, III, 347, reports him as being in command of the police force (shurṭah) of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 60, II, 465; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 233.

306. In Fragmenta historicorum, I, 228, Abarwīz's full title is give as "al-Maṣmughān Mālik b. Dīnār, malik of Dunbāwand."

307. A Zoroastrian dynasty whose name means "great one of the Magians." EI^{2}, s.v. (V. Minorsky).

308. Now Damāwand, the district and town, took their names from the highest peak in Ṭabaristān, a volcanic mountain mass visible from Tehran and well beyond. EI^{2}, s.v. Damāwand (M. Streck): Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 462, 475–77; Le Strange, Lands, 371; Cornu, Répertoires, 40; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 123.

309. Aṭliʿū. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ṭalaʿ.

caliph asked Qutham[310] to change places and had Maʿn sit in his place. When they finished the meal, al-Manṣūr said to ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī, "Abū al-ʿAbbās, have you heard [of the phrase] "the lions[311] among men?" " With ʿĪsā's affirmative response Abū Jaʿfar continued, "Had you seen Maʿn today you would realize that he is one of those lions." "By God, Commander of the Faithful," interjected Maʿn, "indeed I came before you with a coward's heart. But when I saw how you disdained them and dauntlessly advanced [132] against them, I saw something in warfare that I had hitherto never seen among men. That emboldened me and prompted the deeds you witnessed."

Ibn Khuzaymah said, "Commander of the Faithful, some of the Rāwandiyyah group are still alive." To this Abū Jaʿfar replied, "As I have charged you with authority in the matter, go ahead and kill them." Then I shall kill Rizām,[312] as he is one of them," said Ibn Khuzaymah. At this Rizām took refuge with Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar;[313] as his son had made an appeal on Rizām's behalf,[314] the caliph had granted him a guarantee of safe-conduct.

According to ʿAlī—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī:[315] I was standing at the gate of the Commander of the Faithful when he made an appearance, and a man next to me said, "This is the Lord of Power!

---

310. Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās (d. 159/775–76) was governor of al-Yamāmah from 143 until the time of his death, having died before al-Mahdī's letter of deposition reached him. Ṭabarī, III, 142, 466; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 74; Ziriklī, Aʿlām V, 190. Under the year 151, Ṭarbarī, III, 365–67, offers an account of the stratagem by which Qutham split Abū Jaʿfar's army into tribal and regional groupings for strategic reasons.

311. Bi-usudi al-rijāl. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXIX; cf. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 506–7: bi-ashadda al-rijāl.

312. The mawlā of Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Qasrī, the governor of Medina who was displaced in 144 by Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī. Rizām remained steadfastly loyal to his master despite savage beatings. Ṭabarī, III, 164–65.

313. Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar, the elder of two sons of the caliph who carried this name, was appointed governor of al-Mawṣil in 145 but predeceased his father, dying in 150/767 in Baghdad. He was buried in the cemetery of Quraysh, and al-Manṣūr wept at his interment. Ṭabarī, III, 353, 358, 442; Le Strange, Bagdad, 109, 160; Zambaur, Manuel, 36; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 266–67.

314. Fa-ṭalaba fīhi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ṭalaba.

315. Salamah b. ʿAbdallāh Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī (d. 159/775–6), a Baṣran muḥaddith, was numbered among the close associates (ṣaḥābah) of al-Manṣūr. A noted raconteur, he was once embarrassed by the caliph when reminded that he had repeated the same story. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 325; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography, 52.

This is the one who gives us food and drink." Upon the Commander of the Faithful's return, while people were being admitted to his presence, I entered when he was alone and exclaimed, "Today I heard something amazing!" I then repeated what the man had said. Poking at the ground he remarked, "O Hudhalī, when He raises them up I'd rather God send them to Hell while obedient to us, dragging them down, than send them to heaven while disobedient."[316]

According to Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh[317]—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ[318]—his father:[319] I heard al-Manṣūr say, "I have made three mistakes from whose evil consequences God has protected me: I had Abū Muslim killed in a cloth tent (khiraq)[320] while surrounded by those who gave preference and precedence to obeying him. Had the cloth been rent asunder, I would have perished. I went forth on the day of the Rāwandiyyah revolt. Had a stray arrow struck me, I would have perished. I went off to Syria; had but two swords clashed in Iraq, the caliphate would have perished."

It has been said that Maʿn b. Zāʾidah was in hiding from Abū Jaʿfar because of the blame he bore for the repeated battles he fought, together with Ibn Hubayrah,[321] against the ʿAbbāsid partisans. Marzūq Abū al-Khaṣīb helped Maʿn to go into hiding and tried to seek protection for him. At the time of the Rāwandiyyah insurrection, Maʿn came to the caliph's gate and took a stand there. When al-Manṣūr asked Abū al-Khaṣīb, then the caliph's [133] chamberlain, who was at the gate, he replied, "Maʿn b. Zāʾidah." At this al-Manṣūr exclaimed, "A man of the Arabs, strong-hearted, well-versed in warfare, and of able pedigree—show him 316. Cf. Qurʾān 44:47: fa-iʿtilūhu ilā sawāʾ al-jaḥīm.

317. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Rukānah, whom Ṭabarī cites only one other time, when recounting the events of the year 145.

318. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, the son of al-Manṣūr's chamberlain al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus, succeeded Yaḥyā al-Barmakī as Hārūn al-Rashīd's vizier and retained that position during the reign of al-Amīn. He died in 207/822–23 or 208/823–24. *EI*², s.v. (D. Sourdel); Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 183–94; Chejne, "Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ," 237–44.

319. Al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus. See note 162.

320. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. kharaqa.

321. Abū Khālid Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah al-Fazārī (d. 132/750) was the last Umayyad governor of Iraq. He was killed after the battle of Wāsiṭ by order of Abū Jaʿfar. Ṭabarī, II, 1984, III, 68–71; *EI*¹, s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); *EI*², s.v. (J. -C. Vadet), where the name is given as Yūsuf b. ʿUmar; Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 207–8.

in!" When he entered al-Manṣūr said, "Tell me now, Maʿn, what ought we to do?" "I think that you should summon the people to arms," replied Maʿn, "and order them to be paid." Al-Manṣūr retorted, "Where would we get the people and the resources? Who would willingly venture to lay himself open to these infidels! You should not do anything [at all], Maʿn. It would be better if I were to go out and take a stand. When the people see me they will fight and prove valiant, rallying to me and pulling themselves together. If, however, I stay inside here they will become slack and careless." Taking his hand Maʿn said, "By God, Commander of the Faithful, if you do, you could be killed immediately. In God's name I implore you to think of yourself." Abū al-Khaṣīb came forward and said much the same thing to the caliph. Snatching his cloak from their grasp, Abū Jaʿfar called for his horse and leapt astride without using the stirrup. Then he adjusted his garments and headed out with Maʿn holding his bridle and Abū al-Khaṣīb at his stirrup. The caliph took his stand, and immediately a man came at him, at which the caliph said, "O Maʿn, look to that ruffian!" Maʿn fought him strenuously to the death and then did the same to four more, one right after another. The people rallied back to Abū Jaʿfar and braced themselves for the fray, and in not more than an hour annihilated the Rāwandiyyah. After that Maʿn disappeared. At this Abū Jaʿfar said to Abū al-Khaṣīb, "You'd better tell me where Maʿn is!" "God's truth," he answered, "I have no idea where on earth he is." Continued Abū Jaʿfar, "Does he suppose that the Commander of the Faithful will not forgive his offense after his bravery [today]? Give him a guarantee of safe-conduct and have him come to me." Abū al-Khaṣīb did so, and the caliph commanded that Maʿn be given 10,000 dirhams and [subsequently] made him governor of the Yemen.[322] [At that time] Abū al-Khaṣīb said to him, "Maʿn has already divided up what you gave him and won't have the means to do anything." "Were he to propose your [own] worth's equivalence a thousand times," retorted the caliph, "he could accomplish it."

322. More detail on the conditions of this appointment is provided in Ṭabarī, III, 393–95.

In this year Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr sent his son, Muḥammad,[323] who was then heir apparent,[324] to Khurāsān in command of the troops. He ordered him to settle at al-Rayy, which Muḥammad did. [134]

In this year Abū Jaʿfar's governor of Khurāsān, ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, renounced his allegiance.[325]

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—someone (unspecified) who told him—Abū Ayyūb al-Khūzī: When al-Manṣūr heard that ʿAbd al-Jabbār was killing the Khurāsānī leaders, and received a letter from one of them declaring that the situation was ripe for insurrection,[326] he said to Abū Ayyūb al-Khūzī, "ʿAbd al-Jabbār has destroyed our base of support (shīʿatanā), doing so only because he intends to withdraw his allegiance." In response Abū Ayyūb said to the caliph, "How petty is his trickery! Write and tell him that you intend to make a raid against Byzantium so that he should send you the Khurāsānī forces together with their cavalry and commanders. When they have left Khurāsān, then send whomever you wish against the rebels. He will be unable to refuse this." Abū Jaʿfar agreed and wrote accordingly. In answer ʿAbd al-Jabbār wrote, "The Turks have been stirred up. If you disperse the troops, Khurāsān will be lost." Tossing the letter at Abū Ayyūb, Abū Jaʿfar asked what he advised now and was told, "He's played into your hands! Write and tell him: 'As Khurāsān is more important to me than anything else, I am sending on to you my own forces.' Then dispatch the troops to him so that they will be in Khurāsān and, if he is at the point of renouncing allegiance, they can grab him by the neck." Upon receipt of that letter ʿAbd

323. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad, whose regnal title was al-Mahdī, was the third ʿAbbāsid caliph. *EI*², s.v. al-Mahdī (H. Kennedy); S. Moscati, "Studi storici"; Omar, "Observations."

324. Wa-huwa yawmaʾidhin waliyyu ʿahdin. At the time of his death al-Saffāḥ had designated ʿĪsā b. Mūsā to succeed Abū Jaʿfar. The latter's successful efforts to dislodge ʿĪsā in favor his own son Muḥammad are placed by Ṭabarī among the events of year 147. See also Kennedy, "Succession Disputes," 29–33.

325. Other sources include Fragmenta historicorum, I, 228–29; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 227–30; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 445–46; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 505–6; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 76; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 396–97; Agapius, Kitāb al-ʿunwān, 376; Moscati, "La Rivolta," 613–15; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 203–8.

326. Qad naghila al-adīmu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. naghila.

al-Jabbār wrote to Abū Jaʿfar, "The situation in Khurāsān has never been worse than this year. The troops will die if they come to Khurāsān, because of the shortages and high prices they will encounter here." When the letter reached Abū Jaʿfar, he threw it at Abū Ayyūb, saying, "Now he has really shown his hand and renounced his allegiance; debate with him no more."

Abū Jaʿfar then sent Muḥammad b. al-Manṣūr against ʿAbd al-Jabbār with orders to encamp at al-Rayy. Al-Mahdī[327] went there [135] and sent Khāzim b. Khuzaymah ahead to fight as his vanguard[328] while he himself moved on to an encampment at Naysābūr. When the people of Marw al-Rūdh heard that Khāzim b. Khuzaymah had advanced against ʿAbd al-Jabbār, they moved [also] against him from their own district. Declaring war on him, they fought a fierce battle that ended in the rebel's defeat. He fled as a fugitive, finding refuge in a cotton plantation (maʿṭabah)[329] where he went into hiding. One of the people of Marw al-Rūdh, al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim,[330] came across him there and took him prisoner. When Khāzim arrived, al-Mujashshir brought ʿAbd al-Jabbār to him. Khāzim, in turn, dressed him in a woolen shift[331] and mounted him on a camel, with his face to the camel's rump,[332] all the way to al-Manṣūr. With him were his sons and confederates, who were extensively tortured. They were then beaten with whips until the caliph had extracted from them what moneys he could, at which point he commanded al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr[333]

---

327. The contention that Abū Jaʿfar gave this title to his son in order to counter its application to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh (Ṭabarī, III, 209) remains a subject of debate. See Zaman, "Revolutionary Charisma," 257–64; Bacharach, "Laqab for a Future Caliph."

328. According to Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 446, he sent ʿUsayd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī.

329. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXX, for maqṭanah; Glossarium, s.v. ʿaṭiba.

330. Al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim Abū al-ʿAddabas al-Sulamī was a Khurāsānī military commander who first appears in Ṭabarī as suggesting Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī's siege against the Soghdians. Ṭabarī, II, 1241, and Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCLXXXIV, for this amended form of the name.

331. A midraʿah was a coarsely woven tunic normally worn by slaves. Dozy, Vêtements, 177–82, and Supplément, I, 434.

332. A well-practiced form of humiliation; cf. Sharon, Black Banners, 123 n. 83; Moscati, "La Rivolta," 615.

333. Musayyab b. Zuhayr b. ʿAmr al-Ḍabbī (d. 175/791), an ʿAbbāsid nazīr al-nuqabāʾ who served under Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, was head of the shurṭah for alto chop ʿAbd al-Jabbār's hands and feet off and then to behead him. Al-Musayyab did so. Al-Manṣūr further commanded that ʿAbd al-Jabbār's sons be sent to Dahlak,[334] an island just off the coast of the Yemen, where they remained until attacked by raiders from al-Hind and taken prisoner as part of a larger group. Eventually they [i.e., members of the group] were ransomed, with some being saved. The son of ʿAbd al-Jabbār was among those rescued. He was registered on the dīwān [i.e., for a stipend]. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd al-Jabbār became the companion of caliphs, and remained thus until he died in Egypt during the caliphate of Hārūn [al-Rashīd][335] in 170.

In this year the [re]building of al-Maṣṣīṣah[336] was brought to completion by Jibraʾīl b. Yaḥyā al-Khurāsānī,[337] and Muḥammad, the son of Ibrāhīm the Imām,[338] took up a frontier posting in Malaṭyah.

The sources offer differing accounts of the affair involving ʿAbd al-Jabbār. Al-Wāqidī said that the episode occurred in 142, while others have said it was in 141.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: ʿAbd al-Jabbār arrived in [136] Khurāsān on the tenth of Rabīʿ I in 141[339]—some sources say that

---

Saffāḥ, al-Manṣūr, and Hārūn al-Rashīd and governor of Khurāsān and the Jazīrah for al-Mahdī. He died at Minā and was buried at al-ʿAqabah. Akhbār al-dawlah, 219; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 687, 697; Crone, Slaves, 186–87; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VII, 225.

334. Dahlak is an island archipelago that actually lies closer to the coast of Ethiopia. EI², s.v. [S. H. Longrigg]; Cornu, Répertoires, 72; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 492.

335. Hārūn al-Rashīd, the grandson of al-Manṣūr, was the fifth ʿAbbāsid caliph, ruling 170–93/786–809. EI², s.v. [F. Omar].

336. Classical Mopsuestis and present-day Misis, al-Maṣṣīṣah was a town on the west bank of the Jayḥān about twenty-five kilometers north of the Mediterranean coast. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 166, al-Manṣūr built a great mosque there and called the city al-Maʿmūrah. EI², s.v. [E. Honigmann]; Cornu, Répertoires, 9; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 144–45; Dussaud, Topographie, 306.

337. Jibraʾīl b. Yaḥyā al-Bajalī, a Khurāsānī officer, in 147/764–75 led an unsuccessful attempt to repel a Turkish attack on Armenia and later served as governor of Samarqand. Ṭabarī, III, 328, 459; Caetani, Cronographia generale, 222; Crone, Slaves, 179.

338. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās (d. 185/801–2), son of the ʿAbbāsid family leader who was executed by order of Marwān II in 132/748, served various terms as governor of Mecca and Medina. Ṭabarī, II, 1716, III, 385; Zambaur, Manuel, 20; Dhahabī, Siyar, IX, 88–89.

339. Friday, July 21, 758.

it was on the fourteenth[340]—and was put to flight on Saturday, the sixth of Rabīʿ I in 142.[341]

According to Aḥmad b. al-Ḥārith[342]—Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ:[343] When al-Manṣūr sent al-Mahdī to al-Rayy—this occurred before the building of Bagdad—he sent him to fight ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. Al-Mahdī, however, took care of the situation through others who actually did the fighting and defeated ʿAbd al-Jabbār. Abū Jaʿfar was unwilling that the expenses provided for al-Mahdī should be wasted, so he wrote telling him to raid Ṭabaristān, to encamp at al-Rayy, and to dispatch Abū al-Khaṣīb and Khāzim b. Khuzaymah with troops against the Iṣbahbadh.[344] At that time the Iṣbahbadh was feuding with the Maṣmughān, the king of Dunbāwand, and was encamped opposite him. Word reached the Iṣbahbadh that the caliph's troops had entered his territory and that Abū al-Khaṣīb had moved into Sāriyah.[345] That news, in turn, greatly troubled the Maṣmughān, who said to the Iṣbahbadh: "When they come against you, they come against me." With this they agreed to wage war against the Muslims. The Iṣbahbadh went off to his home territory and fought lengthy battles against the Muslims.

Abū Jaʿfar dispatched ʿUmar b. al-ʿAlāʾ,[346] of whom Bashshār [b. Burd][347] says:

---

340. Tuesday, July 25, 758.

341. Sunday, July 7, 759.

342. Abū Jaʿfar Aḥmad al-Ḥārith b. al-Mubārak al-Khazzāz or al-Kharrāz (d. 258/872) was a student of al-Madāʾinī and a prominent Baghdādī poet, littérateur, and historian. Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, I, 186; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, I, 109; GAS, I, 318–19; Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 947.

343. Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ al-ʿUṣfurī (d. 240/854), known as Shabāb, was a Baṣran historian and the third generation of a line of distinguished muḥaddithūn. *EI*², s.v. (S. Zakkar); GAS, I, 110; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 143–44.

344. For other accounts, see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 506–7; Fragmenta historicorum, I, 229; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 338–39; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 447; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 77; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 397.

345. Sāriyah is a town (now Sārī) in Ṭabaristān about sixty-five kilometers east of Āmul. Le Strange, Lands, 370; Cornu, Répertoires, 143; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 232; Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 170–71.

346. ʿUmar b. al-ʿAlāʾ, originally a butcher from al-Rayy, fought with Jahwar b. Marrār al-ʿIjlī against Sunbādh and later served as governor of Ṭabaristān for al-Mahdī. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 246; Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 247; Ṭabarī, III, 500, 520; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 54; Rabino di Borgomale, "Préfets du Calīfat," 252–53.

347. Abū Muʿādh was a blind Baṣran poet who was active in the literary life of Baghdad from its founding until his violent death in 169/785–86. *EI*², s.v. (R. Blachère); Ṭabarī, III, 538–39.

If you come to him as counselor—a useless task for the misquided—say to the caliph:
When enemy wars awaken you,
rouse ʿUmar for them and rest again,
A fine young man who does not easily forget a grudge and drinks no water unmixed with blood.

The caliph sent ʿUmar at the suggestion of the Maṣmughān's brother, Abarwīz,[348] who said to him, "O Commander of the [137] Faithful, ʿUmar knows the land of Ṭabaristān better than anyone, so send him." Abarwīz had come to know ʿUmar during the period of Sunbādh's revolt and that of the Rāwandiyyah. Abū Jaʿfar, therefore, sent Khāzim b. Khuzaymah to join ʿUmar, who entered and conquered al-Rūyān.[349] He then took the citadel of al-Ṭāq,[350] as well as its contents, in a protracted battle. Waging a relentless war, Khāzim conquered Ṭabaristān and killed many of its inhabitants. Subsequently the Iṣbahbadh entered his citadel and appealed for clemency on the condition that he surrender the stronghold with all his treasures. Al-Mahdī wrote Abū Jaʿfar to that effect, so the caliph dispatched Ṣāliḥ, the ṣāḥib al-muṣallā,[351] with a team who inventoried the fortress contents and then left. Accepting this, the Iṣbahbadh went on to the district of Jīlān[352] in the province of Daylam,[353] where he eventually 348. He is cited as son of the Maṣmughān on p. 65.

349. Al-Rūyān is the name of a town and a mountainous region immediately north of al-Rayy. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 104–5; Cornu, Répertoires, 142; Le Strange, Lands, 373–74; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 233.

350. A. D. H. Bivar (EI^{2}, s.v. Ḥiṣn. ii. Iran) cites Yāqūt, describing this fortress as "surrounded by unscaleable mountains and entered only by a long tunnel. The entrance was closed by a stone so large that 500 men were required to move it. Inside the fortress was a stream of water." Bivar cites Awliyāʾ Allāh Āmulī's Taʾrīkh-i Rūyān in locating al-Ṭāq "to the south of Sārī, beyond the gorge of Kūlā." Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 6.

351. According to Sourdel, "Questions," 131–32, 146, the muṣallā was the prayer carpet used to cover the caliph's seat and thus one of the royal insignia; the ṣāḥib al-muṣallā was the palace official charged with its care and placement. Ṣāliḥ served from the reign of al-Manṣūr to that of al-Amīn. Ṭabarī, III, 367, 576; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XI, 439–40; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 100; Lassner, Shaping, 217.

352. Jīlān was the region of Persia that lay south of the Caspian Sea and north of the Alburz range. EI^{2}, s.v. Gīlān (B. Spuler); Le Strange, Lands, 172–75; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 201–2.

353. Daylam was the mountainous region behind the Jīlān coastal area. At various times both terms Jīlān and Daylam were used to designate the province at died.[354] The Iṣbahbadh's daughter was taken captive, later becoming the mother of Ibrāhīm b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad.[355] The force then turned their attention to the Maṣmughān. Finally, they seized him along with al-Baḥtariyyah,[356] who became the mother of Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī,[357] and ṢM?R/Ṣ?MR,[358] [also] the daughter of the Maṣmughān, who became ʿAlī b. Rayṭah's[359] concubine. This was the first conquest of Ṭabaristān.

When the Maṣmughān died, the inhabitants of that mountainous region became wild men (ḥūziyyah),[360] reverting to a savage state like the asses of the wilderness.

In this year Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī was dismissed as governor of Medina, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī[361] was put in charge of Medina, arriving there the southwest corner of the Caspian Sea. The tenth-century geographer al-Muqaddasī designated the entire southern rim of the Caspian, including Ṭabaristān, as Daylam. *EI*², s.v. (V. Minorsky); Le Strange, Lands, 173; Cornu, Répertoires, 140; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 544.

---

354. An alternative account of his subsequent activities and eventual suicide is provided in year 142.

355. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī (d. 224/839) held power in Baghdad as an anticaliph for about two years during the reign of his nephew, al-Ma'mūn. After a period in hiding, he was eventually discovered, imprisoned, and then pardoned. *EI*², s.v. (D. Sourdel), where his mother's name is give as Shiklah; but see Ṭabarī, III, 140.

356. The name is offered tentatively as Bakhtariyyah by Minorsky, *EI*², s.v. al-Maṣmughān. She is later identified in Ṭabarī, III, 140, as the niece of the Iṣbahbadh. See also Vasmer, "Die Eroberung Ṭabaristāns," 87, 100; Le Strange, Lands, 371–72.

357. Manṣūr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī (d. 236/850), son of the third ʿAbbāsid caliph, accepted the military command (imrah) of Baghdad in 201/816 but refused to compromise the caliphate of his uncle, al-Ma'mūn, by acting as anticaliph. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 278; Ṭabarī, III, 1001; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VII, 303.

358. This name is offered tentatively as Ṣmyr by Minorsky, *EI*², s.v. al-Maṣmughān; Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 511, gives the radicals ṢYMR.

359. Rayṭah was the daughter of Abū al-ʿAbbās and bore two sons to al-Mahdī, whose names were ʿAlī and ʿAbdallāh. The former led the Pilgrimage in 164 and 168. Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 180; Ṭabarī, III, 501, 522; *EI*², s.v. al-Mahdī (H. Kennedy).

360. Or ḥawziyyah. Cf. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXX, and Glossarium, s.v. ḥāza.

361. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī, son of an Umayyad governor of Mecca and Iraq, rebelled in al-Kūfah in favor of the ʿAbbāsid cause after Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb's death in 132/749–50. *EI*², s.v. Khālid b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Ḳasrī (G. R. Hawting); Ṭabarī, III, 18–20; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 138, 143.

in the month of Rajab. The Khurāsānī, al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah al-ʿAtakī, was made governor of al-Ṭāʾif and Mecca.

In this year Mūsā b. Kaʿb[362] died. He had been al-Manṣūr's pre- [138] fect of police, governor of Egypt, and governor of al-Hind.[363] He was succeeded there by his son, ʿUyaynah.[364]

In this year Mūsā b. Kaʿb was dismissed as governor of Egypt.[365] Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath was then appointed governor, but he, in turn, was dismissed from the post, and Nawfal b. al-Furāt was named governor.[366]

Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, the governor of Qinnasrīn,[367] Ḥimṣ,[368] and Damascus, led the Prilgrimage in this year.

The governor of Medina was Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī; of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah; of al-Kūfah and its administrative territory, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; of al-Baṣrah and its subdistricts, Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah; in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah was Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh. The governor of 362. Mūsā b. Kaʿb al-Tamīmī, a leading member of the ʿAbbāsid revolution as naqīb and officer, served as head of the shurṭah for both al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr and as governor of Egypt for the latter. Akhbār al-dawlah, 216; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 445; Crone, Slaves, 186.

363. More properly, of the province of al-Sind; al-Hind generally referred to that part of India that lay beyond the Muslim conquests. EI^{2}, s.v. al-Hind. i (S. Maqbul Ahmad).

364. ʿUyaynah b. Mūsā was an ʿAbbāsid dāʿī; he served as deputy governor of India until the appearance of ʿUmar b. Ḥafs b. ʿUthmān b. Abī Ṣufrah. For the circumstances of this transfer of power, see under year 142 below. Akhbār al-dawlah, 221; Zambaur, Manuel, 279.

365. For a recently discovered letter dated to this last year of his administration, see Hinds and Sakkout, "Letter from the Governor of Egypt."

366. Nawfal b. al-Furāt was actually charged with fiscal administration as ṣāḥib al-kharāj and made directly responsible to the caliph. Kindī, Wulāh, 108–9; Kennedy, "Central Government and Provincial Élites," 33.

367. Known in ancient times as Chalkis and mentioned in the Babylonian Talmud as Kannishrayyā, its ruins lie about twenty kilometers southwest of Aleppo. EI^{2}, s.v. (N. Elisséeff); Cornu, Répertoires, 11; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 403–4; Dussaud, Topographie, 450–77. For a recent study of its significance in the Muslim conquest of northern Syria, see Kaegi, Byzantium, 159–71.

368. Present-day Homs, this Syrian city lies about 140 kilometers north of Damascus. As Emesa, it was an ecclesiastical center in the patristic Christian period. EI^{2}, s.v. (N. Elisséeff); Cornu, Répertoires, 7; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 302–5; Dussaud, Topographie, 110–15.

Khurāsān was al-Mahdī, whose successor there was al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh,[369] while the governor of Egypt was Nawfal b. al-Furāt.

369. Al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbbās was removed as governor of Mecca in 146/763–64. Ṭabarī, III, 328. For his defense of Mecca during Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's rebellion, see under year 145.

The Events of the Year 142

(May 4, 759–April 21, 760)

Among the events of this year was ʿUyaynah b. Mūsā b. Kaʿb's renunciation of allegiance in al-Sind.[370]

Why ʿUyaynah b. Mūsā b. Kaʿb Renounced His Allegiance

It has been said that the reason for his renunciation of allegiance was as follows:[371] Al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr was the deputy to Mūsā b. Kaʿb as prefect of police, and when Mūsā died,[372] al-Musayyab took over the full office of his duties with the police forces. Fearing that al-Manṣūr would write to ʿUyaynah about

370. Al-Sind was the province surrounding the lower reaches of the Indus River; it covers roughly the same area as the modern Pakistani province of Sind. EI[1], s.v. (T. W. Haig).

371. Other sources include Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 448; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 509; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 77–78; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 398.

372. Cf. p. 75.

assuming these responsibilities and would appoint him rather than al-Musayyab, the latter wrote anonymously to ʿUyaynah a line of poetry:

[139] Your territory shall be your [final] plot of earth should you come to us, so sleep a sleep that holds no dreams.

When Abū Jaʿfar heard about ʿUyaynah's renunciation, he set out for an encampment with his army near the large embankment in al-Baṣrah[373] and dispatched ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. Abī Ṣufrah al-ʿAtakī[374] to take over al-Sind and al-Hind and to fight ʿUyaynah b. Mūsā. Consequently, ʿUmar went off to al-Sind and al-Hind, where he took forcible control.[375]

In this year the Iṣbahbadh of Ṭabaristān abrogated the pact between the Muslims and himself, killing the Muslims who lived in his country.[376]

The Affair of the Iṣbahbadh and the Muslims

It is related that when Abū Jaʿfar heard the news about the Iṣbahbadh and what he had done to the Muslims, he sent Khāzim b. Khuzaymah and Rawḥ b. Ḥātim[377] against him, together with 373. Perhaps the site of what came to be known as ʿAskar Abī Jaʿfar. Ṭabarī, III, 1843; Le Strange, Lands, 47; Cornu, Répertoires, 25; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 122–23.

374. ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. Abī Ṣufrah al-ʿAtakī, known also as Hazārmard, (Persian, "thousand men") was part of the noted Muhallabī family and served as an ʿAbbāsid governor in al-Baṣrah, Baḥrayn, and Sind. He is especially remembered for his battles against the Khārijī rebel forces in Ifrīqiyah and died there in 154/771. In the section on year 151, Ṭabarī describes the ploy used by Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh to seek his allegiance. EI[1], s.v. ʿOmar b. Ḥafṣ (G. Marçais); Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 230; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 190–91; Crone, Slaves, 134; Ṭabarī, III, 359–64.

375. For al-Manṣūr's relations with his governors in al-Sind, see Friedmann, "Early History of Islam in India," 316.

376. For other sources, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 338–39; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 509–10; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 77–78; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 398; EI[2], s.v. Dābūya (B. Spuler); Madelung "Minor Dynasties."

377. Rawḥ b. Ḥātim b. Qabīṣah al-Muhallabī (d. 174/791) fought for the ʿAbbāsids at Wāsiṭ and served various governorships for the first five ʿAbbāsid caliphs. According to Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIV, 149, the only other person with such a record was Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī, who held appointments under the Prophet and Marzūq (i.e., Abū al-Khaṣīb, the mawlā of Abū Ja'far). They besieged the Iṣbahbadh's fortress, blockading him and those who were there with him until the stalemate became too prolonged. So Abū al-Khaṣīb resorted to a stratagem to solve the matter. He first told his confederates to beat him and shave his head and beard, which they did, and then he made his way to the Iṣbahbadh, the commander of the fortress. Abū Khaṣīb said to him, "I have been treated atrociously; I was beaten and my head and beard were shaved." "My confederates did that," he continued, "on the mere suspicion that my sympathies lie with you." Abū al-Khaṣīb went on to tell the Iṣbahbadh that he was on his side and would point out the weak spot in the Muslim campsite.

The Iṣbahbadh accepted Abū Kaṣīb's proposal, making him one of his close circle and showing him special favor. Now the gate of their city consisted of a single rock, counterweighted, which men raised and lowered when the gate was opened or closed. The Iṣbahbadh had charged his most trusted associates with this task, rotating the duty among them. Abū al-Khaṣīb therefore said to him, "It seems to me that you neither trust me nor accept my [140] sincerity!" "What gives you that idea?" asked the Iṣbahbadh. "The reason is," replied Abū al-Khaṣīb, "that you neither ask me to help with what concerns you most nor do you authorize me to do what you entrust only to your most reliable men." After that the Iṣbahbadh began to seek Abū al-Khaṣīb's help and was sufficiently pleased with what he saw to trust him enough to place him among those who took turns in opening and closing the gate of his city. Abū Khaṣīb carried out that duty for the Iṣbahbadh, winning the latter's full confidence. At this point Abū al-Khaṣīb wrote a letter to Rawḥ b. Ḥātim and Khāzim b. Khuzaymah, placed it in an arrow, and shot it to them. He informed them that this trickery had been successful and gave them a designated night when he would open the gate. In the course of the appointed night, the gate was opened for the caliph's forces, and they killed the warriors inside the city, taking the the children captive. Al-Baḥtariyyah, who became the mother of Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, was the four Rāshidūn. In Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 249, Rawḥ b. Ḥātim is mentioned as one of those whom Abū Ja'far sent against Mulabbad b. Ḥarmalah. See the section on year 138.

---

seized. Her mother was Bākand,[378] daughter of the Iṣbahbadh known as al-Aṣamm ["the Deaf"], not the Iṣbahbadh who was king; that title was held by Bākand's brother. Shaklah,[379] who became the mother of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, was also taken. She was the daughter of Kharnābān,[380] al-Maṣmughān's steward. The Iṣbahbadh killed himself by licking a seal he possessed that contained poison.

Some sources say that Rawḥ b. Ḥātim and Khāzim b. Khuzaymah entered Ṭabaristān in 143.

In this year al-Manṣūr had the qiblah built in al-Ḥimmān[381] for the people of al-Baṣrah, i.e., the prayer orientation for their feast day.[382] He charged Salamah b. Saʿīd b. Jābir with its construction;
[141] at that time Salamah was Abū Jaʿfar's representative for the Euphrates district and al-Ubullah.[383] After fasting for the month of Ramaḍān, Abū Jaʿfar said the ritual prayer at the qiblah of al-Ḥimmān on the day of [ʿĪd] al-Fiṭr.[384]

In this year on Friday night, 21 Jumādā II,[385] Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh died in al-Baṣrah at the age of fifty-nine.[386] ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī said the prayers of the dead for him.

---

378. A Persian word meaning "ruby." Steingass, Persian-English Dictionary, 149.

379. Sourdel, EI^{2}, s.v. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, gives the name as Shiklah. Minorsky, EI^{2}, s.v. al-Maṣmughān, follows the Leiden text's spelling but suggests the identification of this woman with the daughter of al-Maṣmughān mentioned on p. 74.

380. In the Leiden text the fourth consonant is unmarked. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 513, reads "Khūnādān."

381. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 300, identifies this as a place near al-Baṣrah that takes it name from the Banū Ḥimmān b. Saʿd b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 75, II, 324. Ibn Kathīr Bidāyah, X, 78, gives the place name as al-Jabbān.

382. See also Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 78.

383. Al-Ubullah, originally a town east of al-Baṣrah on the right bank of the Tigris, is now part of the present-day city of al-Baṣrah. The Nahr al-Ubullah was the main canal connecting al-Baṣrah to the Tigris. EI^{1}, s.v. al-Obolla (J. H. Kramers); EI^{2}, s.v. al-Baṣra (C. Pellat); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 76–78; Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 12–13.

384. The feast of 1 Shawwāl, which celebrates completion of the fast of Ramaḍān. EI^{2}, s.v. (E. Mittwoch).

385. October 19, 759; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 446, cites his death as in the year 141. Caetani, Cronographia generale, 248–49, gives "quando rimanevano sette giorni di [22] Gumāda II = 20 ottobre 759."

386. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 421, for the year 158, where Sulaymān is listed as one of the paternal uncles to whom al-Manṣūr gave a million dirhams.

In this year Nawfal b. al-Furāt was dismissed as governor of Egypt and Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath was given that position. Then Muḥammad was dismissed from the post, and Nawfal b. al-Furāt was reappointed. Finally, Nawfal was dismissed, and Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah was charged with the governorship.

Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās led the Pilgrimage this year. The governor of Medina was Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh, and of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah. The governor of al-Kūfah and its administrative territory was ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, and of al-Baṣrah and its subdistricts, Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah; of its judiciary, Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh. The governor of Egypt was Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah.

In this year, according to al-Wāqidī, Abū Jaʿfar appointed his brother, al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad, governor of the Jazīrah and the Byzantine frontiers (al-thughūr)[387] and placed a number of the army commanders under his jurisdiction. He stayed there for some time.

---

387. The thughūr were the fortresses guarding the frontier zone in Syria and Mesopotamia. EI[1], s.v. (E. Honigmann); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 79–81.

The Events of the Year 143

(April 22, 760–April 10, 761)

In this year al-Manṣūr authorized the people to raid the territory of Daylam.[388]

The Raid on al-Daylam

It is said that when Abū Jaʿfar had news from al-Daylam that the [142] Daylamites were assaulting and killing Muslims in a large-scale massacre, he dispatched Ḥabīb b. ʿAbdallāh b. Rughbān to al-Baṣrah. At that time Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī was the governor of al-Baṣrah.[389] The caliph ordered Ismāʿīl to to make a list of all those in al-Baṣrah who had 10,000 dirhams or more and to enjoin each of those who possessed that sum to go forth personally to wage

388. For other accounts see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 512; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 80.

389. Ṭabarī, III, 124, records Sulaymān b. ʿAlī as the predecessor to Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah, while Zambaur, Manuel, 24, gives ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī.

war (jihād)[390] against al-Daylam. Abū Jaʿfar sent someone else to al-Kūfah for the same purpose.

In this year al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah was dismissed as governor of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, and al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was appointed in his stead. His commission for that post reached al-Sarī while he was in al-Yamāmah.[391] He went to Mecca, therefore, and Abū Jaʿfar sent to al-Yamāmah Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿUbaydallāh[392] b. ʿAbbās.

In this year Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah was dismissed as governor of Egypt, and Nawfal b. al-Furāt was appointed. Then Nawfal was dismissed, and Yazīd b. Ḥātim appointed.

ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh[393] b. ʿAbbās, who was then governor of al-Kūfah and its Sawād, led the Pilgrimage in this year. The governor of Mecca was al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith. Al-Baṣrah and its subdistricts were under the jursidiction of Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah, while its judiciary was administered by Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh. Yazīd b. Ḥātim governed Egypt.

---

390. While this term has acquired spiritual connotations within developed Islamic thought, it retains the signification of military action for the expansion and defense of Muslim territory. EI[2], s.v. (E. Tynan).

391. Al-Yamāmah is a distrct in central Arabia that now includes the region around Riyāḍ. EI[1], s.v. (A. Grohmann); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 441–48.

392. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXX.

393. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 516, gives ʿUbaydallāh.

The Events of the Year

144

(April 11, 761–March 31, 762)

Among the events of this year was the raid against Daylam, which Muḥammad, the son of Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, i.e., the son of the [former] Commander of the Faithful,[394] made against Daylam with troops drawn from al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, Wāsiṭ,[395] al-Mawṣil, and the Jazīrah.

[143] In this year Muḥammad b. Abī Jaʿfar, al-Mahdī, left Khurāsān for Iraq. Abū Jaʿfar went to Qarmāsīn,[396] where his son Muḥam-

394. According to the Leiden text: Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Amīr al-Muʾminīn. According to Ṣafadī, Wāfī, III, 314, he was known as Abū al-Dibs ("syrup") because he put so much perfume on his beard that it dripped. In 147/764–65 he was poisoned at the instigation of al-Manṣūr, and he died in Baghdad, mourned by his wife al-Baghūm b. ʿAlī b. al-Rabīʿ. Ṭabarī, III, 352, 422–23; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 180–81, which offers a variant explanation for his nickname.

395. Wāsiṭ was the Umayyad stronghold in Iraq created by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. EI[1], s.v. (M. Streck); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 347–53.

396. Qarmāsīn, present-day Kirmānshāh, is an Iranian town that lies southwest of Hamadhān. EI[2], s.v. Kirmānshāh (A. K. S. Lambton); Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 330; Le Strange, Lands, 186–87.

mad met him on the way from Khurāsān. Together they departed for the Jazīrah.

In this year, on his arrival in Khurāsān, Muḥammad b. Abī Jaʿfar consummated his marriage with Rayṭah bt. Abī al-ʿAbbās,[397] his paternal first cousin.

Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr led the Pilgrimage in this year, having appointed Khāzim b. Khuzaymah as deputy commander of his army camp and of his storehouse.

In this year Abū Jaʿfar appointed Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān al-Murrī[398] governor of Medina and relieved Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī of that post.[399]

The Reason Abū Jaʿfar Dismissed Muḥammad b. Khālid and Appointed Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān, Having Removed Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī at the Instance of Muḥammad b. Khālid

The reason why the caliph dismissed Ziyād as governor of Medina is as follows: Abū Jaʿfar was preoccupied with the problem of Muḥammad[400] and Ibrāhīm,[401] the sons of ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib,[402] and with their absence from his au-

397. She bore two sons to Muḥammad and is described by Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 180, as a person of strength and power. Ṭabarī, III, 445–46, relates a macabre incident involving Rayṭah and her husband at the time of Abū Jaʿfar's death.

398. Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī was formerly charged with Damascus under Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī as governor of Syria. Further details of Riyāḥ's appointment to the post in Medina are related below, text III, 161–63. Zambaur, Manuel, 24; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIV, 157; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 219–20.

399. Additional sources for the events antecedent to the Ḥasanid rebellions are: Fragmenta historicorum, I, 230–37; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 450–52; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 123–24; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 180–81; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 198–202; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 513–28; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 164–65; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 80–82; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 398–404.

400. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan, known as "the Pure Soul" (al-nafs al-zakiyyah), was the great-great-grandson of ʿAlī and Fāṭimah through their son Ḥasan. EI[1], s.v. (F. Buhl).

401. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan was the full brother of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh through their mother Hind b. Abī ʿUbaydah and was a corevolutionary with him. EI[2], s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri), and EI[1], s.v. (F. Buhl).

402. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib was the acknowledged elder of the Ḥasanids. During the reign of the Umayyad Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik, he was praised and accorded favor by the caliph, while during the cadience with the rest of the Banū Hāshim who had paid their allegiance to him during the life of his brother Abū al-ʿAbbās, in the year when he had made the Pilgrimage in company with Abū Muslim.

It has been recounted that Muḥammad used to say that Abū Jaʿfar was among those who rendered the oath of allegiance to him on the night when the Banū Hāshim, together with the rest of the Muʿtazilah[403] who were there with them, deliberated in Mecca about whom they should choose as caliph.[404] [This was at the time when the situation of the Marwānids was unstable.] Abū Jaʿfar asked about Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, and Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh said to him, "How worried you are about them! I will bring them to you." At that time Ziyād was together with Abū Jaʿfar during the latter's arrival in Mecca in the year 136. Abū [144] Jaʿfar reinstalled Ziyād as governor [of Medina] and made him responsible for Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm.

According to Abū Zayd ʿUmar b. Shabbah[405]—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl[406]—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿImrān[407]—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī ʿUbaydah liphate of Hishām he was permitted to argue his claim to the endowments of his great-grandfather, ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, against his cousin Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn. He was known as al-Maḥḍ ("the Pureblooded") because of his unblemished Ḥasanid and Ḥusaynid descent. (His mother was Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn). This claim to lineage purity was to become a contentious issue between ʿAbdallāh and Abū Jaʿfar. Ṭabarī, II, 1338, 1671; *EI*², s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 179–84; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 78.

---

403. The Muʿtazilah were a religio-political movement that was the official theological school in the first half of the ninth century. The origin of the name is a matter of conjecture, and the group's history in this early period can only be reconstructed from sources of a later date. ER, s.v. (Josef van Ess). For the putative (but dubious) ʿAbbāsid-Muʿtazilah connection, see Cahen, "Points de vue," 321–22; H. S. Nyberg (*EI*¹, s.v. Muʿtazila); and Omar, ʿAbbāsiyyāt, 127–34.

404. See Van Arendonk, Debuts, 46–52=Opkomst, 41–47, which includes a discussion of Muʿtazilī involvements in the rebellions of both Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm; and Omar, "Aspects," 171.

405. Abū Zayd ʿUmar b. Shabbah b. ʿAbīdah b. Rayṭah (or ʿAbdah b. Rāʾiṭah) al-Numayrī was a Baṣran poet, traditionist, and historian who died in Sāmarrāʾ in 264/877. He serves as Ṭabarī's principal source for the events of the ʿAlid uprising. GAL, S I, 209; GAS, I, 345–46; Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 1117; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 47–48; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography, 462; Nagel, "Bericht", 230–33. For other variants of his name, see Dhahabī, Siyar, XII, 369 n. 2.

406. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar al-Jaʿfarī was a grandson of Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh, brother to Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm. Nagel, "Bericht," 244; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 237.

407. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿImrān b. al-Madanī al-Aʿraj was known as Ibn Abī Thābit al-Zuhrī. His death date is given as 197/812–13 or, more vaguely, as in the late

b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār b. Yāsir:[408] When Abū Jaʿfar was appointed caliph, his sole concern was searching for Muḥammad, making inquiries about him and about his intentions. He summoned the entire Banū Hāshim, man by man, speaking to each of them privately and asking about Muḥammad. "Commander of the Faithful," they kept saying, "he well knows that you are aware of the fact that he sought this position before today.[409] While he fears you for his own sake, he neither intends conflict with you nor wishes to be disobedient to you." Each made a similar speech, except Ḥasan b. Zayd,[410] who gave the caliph his own account, saying, "By God, I don't feel secure against the possibility of his making an assault against you, for he is certainly someone who does not sleep for thought of you, so take prudent care." Ibn Abī ʿUbaydah's account goes: "Be on guard against one who never sleeps."

According to Muḥammad: I heard my grandfather, Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh[411] say, "O God, seek out Ḥasan b. Zayd for our bloodshed." Mūsā himself said, "By God, I heard my father say 'I testify to the fact that Abū Jaʿfar informed me of something that only Ḥasan b. Zayd had heard from me.' "

According to Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān:[412] Muḥammad b. Wahb al-Sulamī told me that my father said, "Abū Jaʿfar told me something that only my brother, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, and 160s or 170s. As a muḥaddith he was judged weak or untrustworthy by most authorities. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 537; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, X, 440–42; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 312–13.

---

408. During the reign of al-Mahdī, he was brought before the caliph as a suspected Qadarī. Ṭabarī, III, 534.

409. Bi-ṭalabi hādhā al-shaʾni qabla al-yawm. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXX.

410. Ḥasan b. Zayd b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib (d. 168/784) was appointed governor of Medina in 150/767–68, a post that he held for five years. He subsequently lost favor with the caliph, who imprisoned him in Baghdad. Ṭabarī, III, 358, 377; EI[1], s.v. (F. Buhl); al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, VII, 309–13; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 243–44; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, II, 191.

411. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh, brother of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, lived until the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 390–97; Nagel, "Bericht," 243–44; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VII, 324.

412. Al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān was a nephew of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm whose sister was Ibrāhīm's wife. For his father, whose sobriquet was "the Brocade," see note 592. Ṭabarī, III, 173–79.

Ḥasan b. Zayd heard from me. I testify that ʿAbdallāh did not [145] tell it to the caliph, nor does the latter have knowledge of the hidden."[413]

According to Muḥammad: In the year when he made the Pilgrimage, Abū Jaʿfar asked ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan about Muḥammad's whereabouts, but ʿAbdallāh gave him the standard Hāshimī speech. The caliph told him that he would not be satisfied until ʿAbdallāh brought Muḥammad to him.

According to Muḥammad—his mother[414]—her father[415]—his father:[416] I said to Sulaymān b. ʿAlī, "O my brother, you know that I am related to you by marriage and kinship, so what do you think?" Sulaymān said, "By God, it is as though I could look at ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī[417] at the time when the veil has passed between us and he is signaling to us, 'This is what you have done to me. If he [Abū Jaʿfar] were a forgiving person, surely he would forgive his uncle.' " Sulaymān accepted ʿAbdallāh's opinion. Muḥammad continued: The family of ʿAbdallāh [b. Ḥasan] came to see this as establishing a close connection for them with Sulaymān.

According to Abū Zayd—Saʿīd b. Huraym[418]—Kulthūm al-Marāʾī—Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak:[419] Abū Jaʿfar bought some slaves held by the bedouins. He gave one of them a camel, another two camels, and a third several camels. Then he sent them in different directions to search for Muḥammad in the hinterlands of Medina. Any one of them would appear at some watering place as though a passerby or one lost, and they would seek information about him and spy about.

---

413. A further account of Ḥasan b. Zayd's mode of operation is given in text, III, 149–50.

414. Ruqayyah bt. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 237.

415. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh.

416. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan.

417. For the account of his revolt against Abū Jaʿfar, see pp. 8–18.

418. Saʿīd b. Huraym al-Kātib was affiliated with the Bayt al-Ḥikmah during the caliphate of al-Maʾmūn and renowned for his eloquence. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 269.

419. Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak, a governor of Ādharbayjān for al-Manṣūr, is most noted as the powerful vizier of Hārūn al-Rashīd who eventually fell from favor and died in prison in 190/805. EI[1], s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Zambaur, Manuel, 177; Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 127–82.

According to Abū Zayd—Muḥammad b. ʿAbbād b. Ḥabīb al-Muhallabī:[420] Al-Sindī,[421] the Commander of the Faithful's mawlā, said to me, "Do you know what elevated ʿUqbah b. Salm[422] in the opinion of the Commander of the Faithful?" When I expressed ignorance, he went on to explain: "My uncle, ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ, sent a delegation from al-Sind led by ʿUqbah. They entered Abū Jaʿfar's presence, and when they had concluded their petitions they got up to go. The caliph, however, asked ʿUqbah to stay behind and told him to sit down. Then the caliph said to him, 'Who are you?' 'A member of the Commander of the Faithful's army and his following,' ʿUqbah replied: 'I am an associate of ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ.' 'What's your name?' asked the caliph. "ʿUqbah b. [146]
Salm b. Nāfiʿ,' he replied. 'Who are your people?' inquired the caliph. 'I am an Azdī of the Banū Hunāʾah.'[423] The caliph continued, 'I find you to be of prepossessing appearance and good standing. In fact, I want you for an affair that preoccupies me and for which I continue to seek a man. Perhaps you are just the person. If you can settle it for me, I shall elevate your rank.' ʿUqbah said, 'I hope that I can confirm the Commander of the Faithful's estimate of me.' 'Keep yourself hidden and keep quiet about your mission,' said the caliph; 'come back to me on a day and at a time I will designate.' ʿUqbah returned at the appointed time and the caliph said to him, 'These cousins of ours have insisted upon assailing our regnal authority and seizing it.[424] In Khurāsān they have a faction (shīʿatun) in such and such a village who corre-

420. Muḥammad b. ʿAbbād b. Ḥabīb al-Muhallabī was governor of al-Baṣrah for al-Maʾmūn, who, according to Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 190, reimbursed him for the debt incurred by his extreme generosity there. He died in al-Baṣrah in 216/831. Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VI, 181; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, III, 183.

421. Ibrāhīm al-Sindī b. Shāhak was an ʿAbbāsid governor in Syria and later the member of Hārūn al-Rashīd's shurṭah responsible for multilating and displaying Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī's corpse in Baghdad. Ṭabarī, III, 680; *EI*², s.v. Ibrāhīm b. al-Sindī (C. Pellat); Zambaur, Manuel, 28; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 236–37.

422. ʿUqbah b. Salm b. Nāfiʿ al-Hunāʾī later supported al-Manṣūr's successful efforts to change the succession from his nephew ʿĪsā b. Mūsā to his own son al-Mahdī and is mentioned as governor of al-Baṣrah in 150/767–68. Ṭabarī, III, 344, 359; Zambaur, Manuel, 40.

423. For Hunāʾah b. Mālik as a clan of Azd, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 211, II, 286; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 379.

424. Kaydan li-mulkinā wa-ightiyālan lahu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. kāda.

spond with them and send contributions (ṣadaqāt)[425] to them of their wealth and fine local products. So leave here with some good fabrics, as well as various delicacies and specie, proceeding, in disguise and carrying a letter that you've written [as if] from the people of this village, until you reach them [i.e., ʿAbdallāh and those with him]. Then conduct an inspection of their area. If they really have broken away from their former way of thinking, then by all means show them affection and sheathe your sword. But if they maintain their posture, I shall know that and shall be cautious and wary.[426] Venture forth, then, until you make contact with ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, doing so with every appearance of being a homespun and humble fellow. If he rebuffs you—as well he might—then be patient and return to him again. If he does it again, remain patient until he becomes friendly with you and his attitude toward you softens. When you clearly see what is in his heart, hurry back to me.'

Al-Sindī continued: ʿUqbah journeyed until he reached ʿAbdallāh and met with him, letter in hand. ʿAbdallāh, however, refused to have anything to do with ʿUqbah and drove him away, saying, 'I don't know those people.' ʿUqbah kept going away and coming back to him until ʿAbdallāh finally accepted his letter and his fine things and grew friendly toward him. ʿUqbah asked him for the reply, but ʿAbdallāh said, 'I am not going to write a letter to anyone; you can be my letter to them. Greet them from me and tell them that my sons will come out in open opposition
[147] at such and such a time.' ʿUqbah then journeyed back to Abū Jaʿfar and gave him the report."[427]

According to Abū Zayd—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar[428]—Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf: In the year 138 Abū Jaʿfar charged al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī with responsibility for the Pilgrimage celebrations, saying to him, "If your eye lights upon Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, make

425. Ṣadaqāt is a term that carries the technical sense of voluntary alms offered for pious motives. EI[1], s.v. Sadaḳa (T. H. Weir).

426. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 520, adds minhum.

427. The account is continued on p. 96, below.

428. Ayyūb b. ʿUmar b. Abī ʿAmr b. Nuʿaym b. Māhān's father was asked to identify Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's severed head but pleaded confusion and was later released by ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. See Ṭabarī, III, 249; Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 580, for this vocalization.

sure they do not get away from you. If you don't see them, however, don't ask about them." Al-Faḍl arrived in Medina, and its entire populace came to meet him, including ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan and the rest of the Ḥasanids, save Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan. Al-Faḍl said nothing until he had completed the Pilgrimage ritual. He then went on to al-Sayyālah,[429] where he said to ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, "What kept your two sons from coming to meet me in company with their family?" "By God," rejoined ʿAbdallāh, "neither misgivings nor evil intentions prevented them. Rather, avid for the hunt and in pursuit of it, they were not present with their families for good reasons, not wicked ones." Al-Faḍl did not answer him but sat down on a bench that had been set up for him in al-Sayyālah. ʿAbdallāh ordered his herdsmen to pasture his camels for him, and he commanded one of them to draw milk over honey in a big tumbler and then to go up to the bench with it. ʿAbdallāh beckoned him to give the drink to al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ, so the man went straight to him. When he drew close to him, al-Faḍl bawled at him angrily, saying, "Away with you, you sucker at your mother's clitoris."[430] At this the herdsman turned tail, and ʿAbdallāh, who was a very mild-mannered sort, jumped to his feet, reached for the cup and began to walk with it over to al-Faḍl. When the latter saw him walking toward him, he felt embarrassed before him, so he accepted the cup and drank.

According to Abū Zayd—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā[431]—his father—his father: Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh had a Kūfan secretary named Ḥafṣ b. ʿUmar. He had Shīʿī sympathies and frustrated Ziyād's efforts to look for Muḥammad. ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd[432] wrote to Abū Jaʿfar about him and had him brought down to the caliph.[433] [148]

429. Al-Sayyālah was a stage on the route between Mecca and Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 292; Cornu, Répertoires, 85.

430. Yā māṣṣa baẓrah ummihi, which is repeated, in abbreviated form, by Abū Jaʿfar on III, 150.

431. Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī al-Kinānī (Abū Ghassān) was one of a family of Medinese kātibs and a respected muḥaddith. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 456–57; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, V, 187; Nagel, "Bericht," 236–38.

432. ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd (following Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXI) was a confidential agent for Abū Jaʿfar and custodian of the voluntary alms. Ṭabarī, III, 169.

433. Fa-ḥaddarahu ilayhi. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXI.

Ziyād, however, wrote to ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ al-Ḥārithī[434] about his secretary, and the two of them freed him to return to Ziyād.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: Muḥammad reached al-Baṣrah covertly with forty men. They went to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, who said to him, "You have destroyed me and publicly exposed me. Stay with me but send your confederates away." Muḥammad, however, refused, so ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said, "You may not stay with me; go stay with the Banū Rāsib."[435] This Muḥammad did.

According to ʿUmar—Sulaymān b. Muḥammad al-Sārī—Abū Habbār al-Muzanī:[436] We stayed in al-Baṣrah with Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, who summoned the people to his cause.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh:[437] Abū Jaʿfar said, "I crave absolutely nothing for myself when I remember the place of the Banū Rāsib in al-Baṣrah."

According to ʿUmar—Abū ʿĀṣim al-Nabīl[438]—Ibn Jashīb al-Lihbī:[439] I stayed with the Banū Rāsib in the days of Ibn Muʿāwiyah,[440] and one day a young man from there asked me my name. One of their elders slapped him, saying, "What business is

---

434. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī al-Madānī became governor of Medina in 145/762–63. Ṭabarī, III, 265, 319; Zambaur, Manuel, 24.

435. According to Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 202, the Banū Rāsib had "connections with previous pretenders, notably Ibn Hanafiya and ʿAbd Allah b. Muʿawiya." Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 327, II, 485.

436. Abū Habbār al-Muzanī was sent to warn Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh about a spy sent over by Abū Jaʿfar but escaped caliphal punishment because of confusion about his name. Ṭabarī, III, 157–58.

437. ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib was known as al-Mubārak. His mother was Umm al-Ḥasan bt. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Bāqir. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 458; Ṭabarī, III, 25; Nagel, "Bericht," 242–43.

438. Abū ʿĀṣim al-Nabīl al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Makhlad (d. 212/828) was a Baṣran muḥaddith whose transmissions were regarded as trustworthy. EI^{2}, Suppl., s.v. (C. Pellat); Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 395–97; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 359–60.

439. Lihb b. Aḥjān were a clan of the Banū Azd. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 210, II, 378.

440. ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah was Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib's great-grandson. He asserted his claim to the imāmate in al-Kūfah in 127/744 and eventually attracted a sufficient following to win control of Fārs, Ḥulwān, Iṣfahān, and al-Rayy. He was probably executed by Abū Muslim, although other traditions mention his death by poisoning in Harāt. EI^{2}, s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 67–68; Laoust, Schismes, 35–36.

it of yours?" Then he looked at an old man who was sitting in front of him and said, "Do you see this old man? His father settled with us in the days of al-Ḥajjāj[441] and remained until this son of his was born. That young man has now matured and reached this age and, by God, to this day we know neither his name, nor his father's name, nor who his people are!"

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Hudhayl[442]—al-Zaʿfarānī:[443] Muḥammad arrived and stayed with ʿAbdallāh b. Shaybān, one of the Banū Murrah b. ʿUbayd. He remained for six days and then left. News of his arrival at al-Baṣrah having reached [149] Abū Jaʿfar, the caliph advanced in great haste but halted at the Great Bridge. We urged ʿAmr[444] to go and meet him, but he refused until we became angry with him. At this he went and met with him. "O Abū ʿUthmān," said the caliph, "is there anyone in al-Baṣrah whom we should fear in respect of our dominion?" "No," replied ʿAmr. The caliph continued, "Should I be content with your word alone and leave?" ʿAmr responded affirmatively, so the caliph left. Muḥammad had, in fact, already left before the arrival of Abū Jaʿfar.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—ʿĀmir b. Abī Muḥammad:[445] Abū Jaʿfar asked ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd, "Have you given an oath of allegiance to Muḥammad?" "By God," he replied, "were the people to give me authority over their affairs, I would not acknowledge any place for those two [i.e., Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm]."

---

441. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf (d. 95/714), the famous Umayyad governor of Iraq. *EI*², s.v. (A. Dietrich).

442. Abū al-Hudhayl al-ʿAllāf (d. 226/840–41) was a prominent Muʿtazilī theologian and among the first systematicians of this school of thought. *EI*², s.v. (H. S. Nyberg); GAS, I, 617–18.

443. Abū ʿAlī (Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 1130, gives Abū Abdallāh) al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. al-Ṣabbāh al-Zaʿfarānī (d. 260/874) was a Baghdādī muḥaddith and jurisprudent (faqīh), having studied with, among others, the jurisprudent al-Shāfiʿī. Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, III, 284, Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XII, 235; GAS, I, 491–92.

444. ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd b. Bāb (d. 144/761), an early Muʿtazilī, was a teacher of Muḥammad b. al-Hudhayl; see note 442, above. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 208–12, recounts some of his conversations with al-Manṣūr at the caliph's court. *EI*², s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt).

445. Abū al-Yaqẓān ʿĀmir b. Abī Muḥammad (d. 190/805–6), also known by other names such as Suḥaym and ʿĀmir b. Ḥafṣ, was a noted historian and genealogist. GAS, I, 266–67; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography, 381; Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, V, 53.

According to ʿAlī—Ayyūb al-Qazzāz: I said to ʿAmr, "What would you say about a man who was content to endure the loss of his claim?" "I am that man," he said. "How can that be?" I responded. "Were you to issue a summons [to the cause], thirty thousand would answer you!" "By God," he said, "I don't know where there are even three who, having spoken, do what they promise. Were I to know them, I would be a fourth for them."

According to Abū Zayd—ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ[446]—his father: In dread of Abū Jaʿfar, Muḥammad and ʿIbrāhīm went to ʿAdan[447] and then to al-Sind, to al-Kūfah, and finally to Medina.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Ziyād guaranteed the Commander of the Faithful that he would produce for him the two sons of ʿAbdallāh. The caliph therefore installed him as governor of Medina. When Ḥasan b. Zayd found out anything about Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm's situation, he kept quiet about it until they had left wherever they [150] were. Then he would inform Abū Jaʿfar, and whatever traces he had mentioned would be found. The caliph accepted the truth of what Ziyād reported to him until the year 140. At that time Abū Jaʿfar made the Pilgrimage and distributed gifts (qusūm),[448] in which he especially favored the family of Abū Ṭālib. As the sons of ʿAbdallāh did not present themselves to him, he sent for ʿAbdallāh and asked about them. ʿAbdallāh expressed ignorance of their whereabouts, to the point that he and the caliph spoke rudely to each other and Abū Jaʿfar told him to "Go suck!" "O Abū Jaʿfar," ʿAbdallāh replied, "by which of my mothers would you have me suck? By Fāṭimah,[449] daughter of the Messenger of God? Or by Fāṭimah bt. Asad?[450] Or by Fāṭimah bt.

---

446. ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ b. Maʿmar al-Taymī (d. 228/843), also Ibn ʿĀ'ishah or al-ʿAyshī, was a Baṣran historian and muḥaddith who traced his lineage from ʿĀ'ishah bt. Ṭalḥah, niece of the Prophet Muḥammad's wife and granddaughter of Abū Bakr. Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 564–67; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 196; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography, 505.

447. ʿAdan, i.e., Aden, is a peninsular seaport in the Yemen. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 89–90; *EI*², s.v. (O. Löfgren).

448. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. qasama.

449. Fāṭimah was the most famous of the Prophet's daughters. She was the wife of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, mother of al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn and thus great-great-grandmother of ʿAbdallāh. *EI*², s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

450. Fāṭimah bt. Asad b. Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf, the mother of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, II, 118; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 130.

Ḥusayn?[451] Or Umm Isḥāq bt. Ṭalḥah?[452] Or Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid?"[453] Abū Jaʿfar answered, "Not by a single one of them, but by al-Jarbāʾ bt. Qasāmah b. Zuhayr,[454] a woman of Ṭayyiʾ."[455]

Al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr jumped up and said, "Call upon me, Commander of the Faithful, to behead the son of a bitch!" Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh stood up and threw his mantle (ridāʾ)[456] over ʿAbdallāh, saying, "Give him to me, Commander of the Faithful. I will produce his two sons for you." Thus did he get ʿAbdallāh away from Abū Jaʿfar.[457]

According to ʿUmar—al-Walīd b. Hishām b. Qaḥdham: Al-Ḥazīn al-Dīlī[458] said to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan, reproaching him for the birth of al-Jarbāʾ:

Would you [with the likes of] al-Jarbāʾ or Ḥukākah[459] vie against Umm al-Faḍl[460] and the daughter of Mishraḥ?[461]

---

451. Fāṭimah bt. Ḥusayn, granddaughter of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, was married first to al-Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī and then to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān. She died in 110/728. Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 130; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 179.

452. Umm Isḥāq bt. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh was the mother of Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn. Ibn Saʿd, al-Ṭabaqāt al-kubrā, V, 319; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 179.

453. Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid was the first wife of the Prophet and mother of Fāṭimah. EI[2], s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt); Dhahabī, Siyar, II, 109–17.

454. Al-Jarbāʾ bt. Qasāmah b. Zuhayr, the mother of Umm Isḥāq bt. Ṭalḥah, was thus named because of her beauty, a beauty so extraordinary that other women would shun her to avoid comparison. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 179; Lane, Lexicon, II, 404.

455. The Banū Ṭayyiʾ were an ancient Yamanī tribal group who migrated to the northern part of the peninsula. EI[1], s.v. Ṭaiy (H. H. Bräu); Caskel, Ǧamharat annasab, I, 176, II, 555.

456. Ahsan, Social Life, 36; Dozy, Vêtements, 59–60.

457. Fa-takhallaṣahu minhu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. khalaṣa.

458. Al-Ḥazīn al-Dīlī al-Kinānī, ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd b. Wuhayb, was an Umayyad poet who lived in Medina and died about 90/709. GAS, II, 426; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, II, 175.

459. According to Lane, Lexicon, II, 404, an additional meaning of al-jarbāʾ is "the sky, . . . its stars being likened to the marks of jarab (mange or scab)," while ḥukākah is defined (ibid., 615) as the residue from anything scraped or scratched.

460. Lubābah bt. al-Ḥārith b. Ḥazn b. Bujayr (also Lubābah al-Kubrā) was the wife of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim, the Prophet's uncle and the man from whom the dynasty took its name. Ṭabarī, III, 2335; Dhahabī, Siyar, II, 314–15; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 20.

461. Zarʿah b. Mishraḥ b. Maʿdī was the wife of ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim, i.e., Ibn ʿAbbās, the famous Qurʾānic exegete (mufassir) and muḥaddith. Ṭabarī, III, 2335.

From them descends but one chaste woman of noble lineage, held by her people in highest esteem.

[151] According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. ʿAbbād: Al-Sindī, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, told me that when ʿUqbah b. Salm had made his report to Abū Jaʿfar, the caliph decided to make the Pilgrimage and said to ʿUqbah, "When I reach such and such a place, the Ḥasanids, led by ʿAbdallāh, will come to meet me. I shall treat him with deference, seat him in the place of honor, and call for the morning repast. After we have finished our meal, I will catch your eye, and you go stand right in front of him. He will avert his glance from you, so go round behind him until you can touch his back with your big toe, doing so until he is forced to look at you. That's all you need to do, but beware lest he sees you while he is eating."

Abū Jaʿfar then set off, pressing on through to the region where the Ḥasanids came to meet him. He seated ʿAbdallāh beside him and called for the meal. When they had eaten it, Abū Jaʿfar called for its removal. He then turned to ʿAbdallāh and said, "Abū Muḥammad, surely, recognizing the covenants and compacts you've given me, you wish me no evil nor conspire against me as ruler."[462] "That is so, Commander of the Faithful," he replied. At this Abū Jaʿfar glanced at ʿUqbah, who circled around until he stood in front of ʿAbdallāh, but the latter turned away from him. ʿUqbah then went around[463] until he stood behind ʿAbdallāh's back, and touched him with his toe, at which ʿAbdallāh lifted up his head and looked at him. Realizing the situation, ʿAbdallāh rushed over to kneel before Abū Jaʿfar and said, "Forgive me, Commander of the Faithful, and may God forgive you." The caliph retorted, "May God not forgive me if I forgive you." Then he ordered him to be confined.

According to ʿUmar—Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀṣim, the mawlā of Quraybah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq[464]—ʿAlī b.

462. Wa-lā takīda lī sulṭānan. Cf. note 424.

463. Fa-istadāra, following Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 517, rather than Leiden's rafaʿa raʾsahu.

464. Quraybah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq was the daughter of the first caliph's eldest son, and niece of Muḥammad's wife ʿĀʾishah. Dhahabī, Siyar, II, 471–73.

Rabāḥ b. Shabīb,[465] the brother of Ibrāhīm—Ṣāliḥ, the ṣāḥib al-muṣallā: I was standing in attendance on Abū Jaʿfar while he was having breakfast in Awṭās[466] on his way to Mecca. With him at [152] table were ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, Abū al-Karrām al-Jaʿfarī,[467] and a group of the Banū al-ʿAbbās. He turned to ʿAbdallāh and said, "O Abū Muḥammad, I see that Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm feel an aversion to my company. I am most desirous that they be my friends,[468] that they come to me so that I can establish close contact and be on personal terms with them." ʿAbdallāh bowed his head in silence for a long time. Then he raised his head and said, "By your right [to know the truth], Commander of the Faithful, I have no knowledge of them or of what land they're in. They have entirely left my control." Abū Jaʿfar continued, "Don't say this,[469] Abū Muḥammad; write to them and to someone who will convey your letter to them."

On this day Abū Jaʿfar ignored the greater part of his morning repast, turning instead toward ʿAbdallāh. While ʿAbdallāh swore that he had no idea where Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm were, Abū Jaʿfar kept repeating, "Don't say this, Abū Muḥammad, don't say this, Abū Muḥammad, don't say this, Abū Muḥammad." The reason why Muḥammad was so strenuously avoiding[470] Abū Jaʿfar was because in Mecca, with certain of the Muʿtazilah, Abū Jaʿfar had contracted to support his claim.[471]

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar, i.e., Ibn Abī ʿAmr—Muḥammad b. Khālid b. Ismāʿīl b. Ayyūb b. Salamah al-Makhzūmī—his father—al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās: When Abū Jaʿfar made the Pilgrimage in the year 140, ʿAbdallāh and Ḥasan,[472] the sons of Ḥasan, came to him. Both 465. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 213, gives the name as ʿAlī b. Riyāḥ.

---

466. Awṭās was a stop on the route from al-Baṣrah to Mecca. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 281; Cornu, Répertoires, 71.

467. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXI, for the addition of "al-Jaʿfarī"; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 213, omits.

468. Yaʾnisā bī with Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXI.

469. Lā taf'al. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. faʿala.

470. Wa-kāna shiddatu harabi Muḥammadin min Abī Jaʿfar. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. haraba.

471. See the account on p. 86. Sources cited by Elad, "Siege of al-Wāsiṭ," 84, specify the location of this meeting as a village near Medina called al-Abwāʾ.

472. Al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 185–86; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 418–19.

they and I were in his presence while he was busy looking at a letter. At this point al-Mahdī [the caliph-designate] began to speak, but his Arabic was full of mistakes. ʿAbdallāh said, "Commander of the Faithful, will you put this fellow in the hands of someone who could correct his speech? He speaks as carelessly as the slave girl!"[473] The caliph didn't catch on, so I winked at ʿAbdallāh, but he didn't notice[474] and took up the subject again with Abū Jaʿfar. But the caliph would not rise to it and said, "Where is your son?" "I don't know," replied ʿAbdallāh. The caliph said, "You must bring him to me," to which ʿAbdallāh responded, "If he were right under my feet, I would not raise them [153] from him." At this Abū Jaʿfar said, "O Rabīʿ, take him into custody."

According to ʿUmar—Mūsā b. Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Jumaḥī:[475] Abū Jaʿfar felt continuing resentment against ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan for having taken Abū al-ʿAbbās for use in a pastiche:

Haven't you seen Ḥawshab about to build dwellings for use of the Banū Nutaylah?[476]

In fact, when he ordered ʿAbdallāh's imprisonment, the caliph said, "Were you not the one who said of Abū al-ʿAbbās:

Haven't you seen Ḥawshab about to build dwellings for use of the Banū Nutaylah?

even though he had great trust in you and treated you most kindly?"

---

473. Yaʿfiku ʿafk al-amah. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXI, and Glossarium, s.v. ghafala.

474. Fa-lam yantabih lahā, following Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 524, and Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXI.

475. He is also cited on p. 152.

476. Variants of this name include "Buqaylah" [Leiden text] and "Nufaylah" (Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXI; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 175). Nutaylah bt. Janāb b. Kulayb b. Mālik b. ʿAmr is mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 2311, as the mother of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 525, and Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 175, complete the quatrain, quoting from the latter's Kitāb al-aghānī: "He hopes to live the span of Noah/but God's command comes to pass each night." Ṭabarī, III, 2507, also offers a variant: "Haven't you seen Ḥawshab recently building/palaces for the Banū Nutaylah?/He hopes to live the span of Noah/but God's command befalls (yaṭruqu) each night."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq—Abū Ḥunayn: I came to see ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan when he was in prison. He asked, "Did anything of note happen today?" "Yes," I said, "the caliph commanded that your household goods and slaves be sold, but I didn't see anyone offering a bid." ʿAbdallāh exclaimed, "And yet, you know, Abū Ḥunayn, I swear, had my daughters and I been brought forth as slaves, we would have been bought!"

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Abū Jaʿfar left while ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan was imprisoned. He remained in confinement for three years.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Isḥāq b. al-Qāsim b. Isḥāq b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib—Abū Ḥarmalah Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān, the mawlā of the family of ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān—Abū Habbār al-Muzanī: When Abū Jaʿfar made the Pilgrimage in 140, Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of ʿAbdallāh who were in hiding, made the Pilgrimage in that year, too. [Those who suported their cause] met, therefore, in Mecca, intending treachery against Abū Jaʿfar. Al-Ashtar ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh[477] said to them, "I will deal with him for you." Muḥammad declared, "No, by God, I will not assassinate him before I have summoned him to our cause." This wrecked their plans and what they had agreed upon. Incidentally, one of Abū Jaʿfar's Khurāsānī army commanders had collaborated with them in this.[478] Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad al-Aʿraj[479] presented himself to Abū Jaʿfar and reported their scheme to him. Consequently, the caliph sent in search of the army officer, but without success. He did, however, succeed in seizing a group of his associates. The man himself got away, together with a slave with whom he had entrusted the sum of roughly 2,000 dīnārs, which the slave had brought to [154]

477. Al-Ashtar ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh was sent by his father to solicit the support of ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ during the time when he was governor of Sind. He was killed in 151/768–69 by ʿUmar's replacement as governor, Hishām b. ʿAmr al-Taghlibī. Ṭabarī, III, 360–64; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 310–14.

478. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 518, identifies him as Khālid b. Ḥassān who was known as Abū al-ʿAsākir. See the account on p. 102.

479. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad al-Aʿraj was the eldest son of Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq and eponymous origin of the Ismāʿīliyyah. Ṭabarī, III, 2509; *EI*², s.v. Ismāʿīliyya (W. Madelung); Omar, "Aspects", 176–77.

him when he was with Muḥammad. The latter, in turn, divided it up among his associates.[480]

According to Abū Habbār: Muḥammad ordered me to buy camels for the man, to outfit him, and to transport him in a domed litter (qubbah).[481] Accordingly, I placed him in a camel train and set off with him in the direction of Medina until I had conveyed him there. Then Muḥammad arrived and brought the man to his father, ʿAbdallāh. ʿAbdallāh dispatched both the officer and his slave to a certain district in Khurāsān. Abū Jaʿfar began to kill the associates of this army officer whose situation we have just mentioned.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad—his father—his father: I came to Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh one morning when Abū Jaʿfar was in Medina. He said, "Let me tell you about a remarkable experience I had last night. The messengers of the Commander of the Faithful roused me at midnight. (Now Ziyād had moved because of the Commander of the Faithful's arrival at his house in al-Balāṭ.)[482] His messengers banged on the door, and I emerged [from my bed chamber] wearing nothing but my waist wrapper (izār).[483] I awoke my slaves and eunuchs in the gallery of the house, telling them, "Even if they tear down the house, none of you must say anything to them." Ziyād continued, [155] "They knocked for a long time and then went away. They stayed away for a while and then showed up again with a battering ram, which made it seem like[484] they had with them again as many men or twice that number. They banged on the gate with iron clubs and shouted out, but still no one spoke to them. At this they went back and stayed away for another while. Then they brought something that there was no resisting. I thought, "By God, they are pulling down the house around me," so I ordered [the gate] to be opened, and I went out to them. They started to

480. The pronouns here do not allow a definite assignment of the action.

481. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. qabba.

482. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCXXX, notes this as the site of al-Zawrāʾ, ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān's house in Medina. Ṭabarī, I, 2827.

483. Ahsan, Social Life, 34–35; Dozy, Vêtements, 24–38.

484. Shabīh an. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. shabbaha.

rush at me, intending to carry me off. I now began to hear one of them express condolences all the way to their handing me over to the Dār Marwān.[485] Two men grabbed me by the upper arms and made me quick-step over the ground [like an ostrich][486] or some such until they brought me to the antechamber of the great dome. There I saw al-Rabīʿ standing, who said, "Alas, Ziyād, what have you done to us and to yourself during this night?" He led me forward and drew back the curtain covering the door of the domed room. He then made me enter, standing behind me between the two doors. At the sides of the domed room there were glowing candles and a servant standing beside each. On a carpet, sitting back on his heels supported only by his sword straps, with neither cushion nor prayer rug under him, was Abū Jaʿfar. He had his head bowed and was scratching at his hand with a mace. Al-Rabīʿ informed me that he had been like this from the time of the dusk prayer until this hour. I stood there for so long that I expected the dawn would be called, affording me some relief. He spoke not a single word to me. Finally, he raised his head to me and said, "You son of a bitch, where are Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm?" He then bowed his head again, scratching even longer than before. Raising his head for a second time, he repeated, "Where are Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, you son of a bitch? May God kill me if I do not kill you." I said to him, "Hear me; let me [156] speak to you." "Speak," he said. I then said to him, "You scared them away; you sent a messenger with the money you ordered divided among the Banū Hāshim. Stopping in al-Qādisiyyah,[487] he drew forth a knife, sharpened it, and announced, 'The Commander of the Faithful sent me to slaughter Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm.' The two of them heard about that and fled." "Leave me," he said, so I went away.

485. The governor's residence, its name deriving from the Umayyad caliph, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, who served twice as governor of Medina, i.e., 41–48/661–68 and 54–57/674–77. *EI*², s.v. Marwān I b. al-Ḥakam (C. E. Bosworth).

486. ʿAlā ḥāl al-zafīf ʿalā al-arḍ. Lane, Lexicon, III, 1235. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 526, amends this to ʿalā ḥāl al-dafīf.

487. Al-Qādisiyyah was the first stage southwest of al-Kūfah on the road to Mecca and site of the Muslim victory against the army of Yazdajird III. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 291–93; Le Strange, Lands, 76; *EI*², s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Rāshid b. Yazīd, who was nicknamed "al-Akkār" [the ploughman], a man from Fayd[488]—Naṣr b. Qādim, the mawlā of the Banū Maḥūl, the wheat dealers: ʿAbdawayh[489] and certain associates of his were in Mecca in the year that Abū Jaʿfar made the Pilgrimage. ʿAbdawayh said to his confederates, "Between [the hills of] al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah[490] I intend to run this lance (ḥarbah)[491] through Abū Jaʿfar's mouth." ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan heard about that and forbade him to do so, saying, "You are in an exalted place[492] [i.e., holy ground], and I don't think you should do that." Abū Jaʿfar had an army officer by the name of Khālid b. Ḥassān, also called "Abū ʿAsākir" [Master of the Troops], who commanded 1,000 men and who had supported ʿAbdawayh and his confederates. Abū Jaʿfar said to him, "Tell me about yourself and about ʿAbdawayh and al-ʿUṭāridī.[493] What did you intend to do in Mecca?" When Khālid had described his plans, the caliph asked, "What held you back?" To this Khālid responded, "ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan." The caliph then made away with him, and he has not been seen up to the present.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Once ʿAbdallāh had been arrested, Abū Jaʿfar intensified the search for his two sons. He sent one of his spies along with a letter he had written as if it were addressed to Muḥammad from his supporters (al-shīʿah), in which they reminded Muḥammad of their obedience to him and their eagerness for action. He also sent money and fine things with the spy. The man arrived in Medina and, having presented himself to ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, asked him where Muḥammad was. ʿAbdallāh told him that Muḥammad

488. Fayd was a settlement in the north-central area of the Arabian peninsula that lay about halfway along the pilgrimage route from al-Kūfah to Mecca and Medina. *EI*², Suppl., s.v. (C. E. Bosworth); Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 282–83; Cornu, Répertoires, 91.

489. Kardām al-Khurāsānī. Vocalization following Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLV, and III, 302.

490. Al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah are two little hills in Mecca that form the site of part of the mandated Pilgrimage rituals. *EI*¹, s.v. al-Ṣafā (B. Joel), and Saʿy (M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes).

491. The ḥarbah, or ʿanazah, was a symbol of sovereign authority. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ḥariba; *EI*², s.v. ʿAnaza (G. C. Miles).

492. Fī mawḍiʿin ʿaẓīmin. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿaẓuma.

493. ʿUṭārid b. ʿAwf were a subgroup of the Banū Tamīm. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 77, II, 580.

was on the mountain of Juhaynah[494] and said, "Make your way to [157] ʿAlī b. Ḥasan, the pious man known as "al-Agharr"[495] [the illustrious, the noble] who is at Dhū al-Abar.[496] He will guide you." The spy went to al-Agharr, and the latter guided him. Now Abū Jaʿfar had a confidential scribe who was sympathetic to the cause of the shīʿah. He wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, telling him about that spy and [the true nature of] what had been sent to him. When the letter reached ʿAbdallāh, they were frightened and sent Abū Habbār to ʿAlī b. Ḥasan and to Muḥammad to warn them about the man. Abū Habbār got as far as ʿAlī b. Ḥasan, who, upon questioning, informed Abū Habbār that he had guided the spy to Muḥammad. Abū Habbār said, "Then I came to where Muḥammad was and found him sitting in a cave together with ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Aslamī,[497] the two sons of Shujāʿ, and others. The man [i.e., the spy] was with them, speaking the loudest and acting the jolliest. When he saw me, a certain air of distrust appeared on him,[498] but I sat down with the group and conversed for a time. Then I leaned over to Muḥammad and said that I needed something. He got up, as did I, and I told him about the man. Reciting the formula "We are God's and to Him is our return,"[499] he asked my opinion. I said, "You can do one of three things, as you wish." "What are they?" he asked. I said, "You could let me kill the man." To this he replied, "I must not let myself shed blood except under compulsion. What else?" I said, "You could clap him in irons and carry him with you wherever you roam." To this Muḥammad responded, "Are we to be concerned about him in addition to our fear and haste? What else?" I said, "You could

494. The territory belonging to the tribe so named, a division of the Quḍāʿah, lay along the northwestern littoral of the Arabian peninsula. Mount Raḍwā (see Ṭabarī, III, 166, below) lies within this region. EI[1], s.v. Djuhaina (C. H. Becker); EI[2], s.v. Ḳuḍāʿa (M. J. Kister); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 194–95.

495. This is ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan ("al-Muthallath") b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, who was also known as ʿAlī b. ʿĀbid and ʿAlī al-Khayr. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 190–95; EI[2], s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, Ṣāḥib Fakhkh (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

496. Conjectural vocalization. There is no reference to this place in the standard geographical literature.

497. Abū ʿĀmir al-Madanī (d. 150/767) was a traditionist characterized variously as weak and as trusthworthy. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 241; Van Arendonk, Débuts, 313=Opkomst, 286–87.

498. Ẓahara ʿalayhi al-nakaratu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. nakira.

499. Qurʾān 2:156.

bind and fetter him and leave him with someone you trust here on Juhaynah." "That's what I'll do," he said. We returned [to the group]. The man, however, had taken alarm and fled. I asked where he was, and they said, "He stood up with his water bag and poured some water from it. Then he went behind that projecting rock as if to perform his ablution." We went all over the mountain and its environs, but it was if the earth had closed over him.

The spy proceeded on foot until he got onto the road. There some desert Arabs passed him, carrying a load to Medina. He said [158] to one of them, "Empty this grain sack and put me in it; I will deal equitably with its owner, and your reward will be such and such." The man agreed and emptied the sack and transported the spy as far as Medina. The latter then went to Abū Jaʿfar and gave him a complete report. Having forgotten both Abū Habbār's name and patronymic,[500] he [gratuitously] gave it as "Wabr". Abū Jaʿfar therefore wrote in search of Wabr [instead of Abū Habbār] al-Muzanī. A certain man by that name was brought to the caliph, who questioned him regarding the story of Muḥammad and what the spy had told him. The man swore that he knew nothing about this, but at the caliph's command he was given 700 lashes and confined until Abū Jaʿfar died.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Abū Jaʿfar remained intent on searching for Muḥammad, so he wrote urging Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī to redeem the pledges he had given. Now Muḥammad actually came to Medina,[501] and Ziyād heard of this. Ziyād acted graciously toward him, giving him a guarantee of safety so that he could show his face to the people in company with Ziyād. Muḥammad promised to do so. Ziyād then mounted before dawn, having made an appointment [to meet] Muḥammad at the camel market.[502] The two met there, and Muḥammad showed himself quite openly with no attempt at concealment. Ziyād stood right beside him

500. Wa-ʿamiya ʿan ismi Abī Ḥabbār wa-kunyatihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿamiya.

501. Fa-qadima Muḥammadun al-madīnata qadmatan. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. qadima.

502. For the identification with sūq al-ghanam see Lecker, "Markets of Medina," 144; but compare with ʿAlī, "Topography of Medina," 88, as sūq al-ẓuhr, or "afternoon market."

and declared, "This man, O people, is Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan." Then he turned to him and said, "Take yourself to any place you wish in God's lands." Muḥammad went into hiding, and repeated reports of that incident continued to Abū Jaʿfar.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—someone whom he trusted: Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh entered Ziyād's presence wearing a mail shirt under his clothing. Ziyād touched it and said, "Abū Isḥāq, it's as if you suspect me of something that will never befall you from me!"

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Ziyād rode in company with Muḥammad and brought him to the market. The people of [159]
Medina kept shouting out "the Mahdī, the Mahdī," so Muḥammad went into hiding, not to reappear until he came out in open revolt.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: When successive reports of what Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh had done reached Abū Jaʿfar, he dispatched Abū al-Azhar,[503] a man from Khurāsān, to Medina. The caliph wrote a letter for Abū al-Azhar to take with him and handed over some other documents, commanding Abū al-Azhar not to read the letter he was being given until he stopped at al-Aʿwaṣ[504] at one post station's (barīd)[505] distance from Medina. Upon arrival there, Abū al-Azhar read the letter and discovered therein the appointment of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh,[506] a judge for Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh, as governor of Medina. Further, it contained orders that Ziyād be bound in irons, that his wealth be confiscated, that everything he possessed be seized, that his agents and associates be arrested, and that both he and they be sent on to Abū Jaʿfar. Abū al-Azhar reached Medina on the 22d of Jumādā II in 141[507] and found Ziyād [had gone out] at the head of his retinue. Upon 503. Al-Muhallab b. al-ʿUbaythir al-Mahrī, as the name is given by Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 190. See also Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 328, II, 421.

504. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 223, identifies al-Aʿwaṣ as a ravine (shiʿb) belonging to the Banū Hudhayl in the Tihāmah region.

505. In the western part of the ʿAbbāsid lands, postal stages were normally situated about twenty-four kilometers apart and about half that distance in the eastern lands. EI^{2}, s.v. Barīd (D. Sourdel); Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī," 141–42; Sauvaget, La Poste aux chevaux.

506. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥanẓab al-Makhzūmī, who died in the late 170s. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 563.

507. Monday, October 30, 758.

asking "Where is the Amīr?" he was told that Ziyād had ridden forth. Then the messengers conveyed news of his arrival to Ziyād. Abū al-Azhar moved quickly ahead to enter the Dār Marwān. He gained admittance to Ziyād and presented him with a letter from Abū Jaʿfar, written on a thuluth,[508] which commanded him to hear and obey. When Ziyād had read it, he said, "I am ready to hear and obey; command what you wish, Abū al-Azhar." "Send for ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Muṭṭalib," Abū al-Azhar replied. Ziyād did so, and Abū al-Azhar [or Ziyād, who is still amīr] presented ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz with a letter ordering him to pay heed to Abū al-Azhar. When he read it, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz said, "I am ready to hear and obey." Then Abū al-Azhar presented to Ziyād a letter ordering him to surrender the governorship to Ibn al-Muṭṭalib, while to Ibn al-Muṭṭalib he handed a letter of appointment. Next Abū al-Azhar said to Ibn al-Muṭṭalib, "Send me four fetters and a blacksmith." When both had been brought, he demanded, "Shackle Abū Yaḥyā." Ziyād, therefore, was shackled and his [160] wealth confiscated. [In the treasury there were 85,000 dīnārs.] Every single one of his agents was arrested. Abū al-Azhar departed with Ziyād and these others. When they were in Ṭaraf al-Madīnah,[509] his agents stood before Ziyād and paid their respects to him. Impressed with their bearing and valor, Ziyād exclaimed: "You are as dear to me as my father! By God, when Abū Jaʿfar sees you, I don't care what he does to me!"

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq—his maternal uncle, ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd:[510] We went to see Ziyād on his way, and one night, as I marched below his litter, he turned to me. "By God," declared Ziyād, "I don't feel that I've done anything wrong against the Commander of the Faithful, but I suppose he is angry with me about the sons of ʿAbdallāh and resents the fact that, for me, the blood of the sons [i.e., descendants] of Fāṭimah is precious." They then proceeded as far as al-

508. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. thallatha, defines this as "a large piece of paper, the third part of an entire sheet" and provides the fuller term, thuluth qirṭāsin, from Iṣfahānī's Kitāb al-aghānī.

509. Ṭaraf al-Madīnah was the last station before Medina on the way from al-Kūfah. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 31; Cornu, Répertoires, 87.

510. Or ʿAbd al-Ḥumayd.

Shuqrah.[511] Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz[512] escaped from them and returned to Medina. Abū Jaʿfar imprisoned the others but eventually released them.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—a trusthworthy individual: When Abū Jaʿfar dispatched Mabhūt and Ibn Abī ʿĀṣiyah in search of Muḥammad, Mabhūt was the one who seized Ziyād, so Ziyād said:

I bear the offense of a people not my own, but the left hand does not sin against the right.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh— ʿAbdallāh b. ʿImrān b. Abī Farwah: Al-Shaʿbānī, one of Abū Jaʿfar's army commanders, and I, together with Ziyād b. ʿUbaydallāh, frequently visited Abū al-Azhar in the days when Abū Jaʿfar had sent him in search of the Ḥasanids. In fact, one day I was traveling with Abū al-Azhar when someone came right up next to him and said, "I have some well-intentioned advice about Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm." Abū al-Azhar told him to go away, but the man persisted, "It is sincere advice for the Commander of the Faithful." "Leave us," said Abū al-Azhar, "and watch out; people have been killed for such." But [161] the man refused to go away, and Abū al-Azhar ignored him until the coast was clear. Then with his sword he made a gash in the man's belly and threw him to the side.

After Ziyād, Abū Jaʿfar installed Muḥammad b. Khālid as governor of Medina.[513]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Abū Jaʿfar installed Muḥammad b. Khālid as governor of Medina after Ziyād, commanding him to press on with the search for Muḥammad and to spend freely in the effort. Muḥammad b. Khālid traveled in haste and arrived in Medina at the new 511. Al-Shuqrah is later cited in Ṭabarī, III, 161, as lying between al-Aʿwaṣ and al-Ṭaraf. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 530, gives this as al-Shaqrāʾ. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 355.

512. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī, who has appeared earlier in Ṭabarī as a transmitter, was descended from ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf, an important Meccan convert from the Banū Zuhrah. *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf (W. Montgomery Watt).

513. This would indicate that ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Muṭṭalib (see p. 105, above) was an interim appointment.

moon[514] of Rajab 141. The people of Medina knew nothing of his appointment until his messenger arrived from al-Shuqrah, which lies between al-Aʿwaṣ and al-Ṭaraf, two nights' journey from Medina. In the treasury he found 70,000 dīnārs and 1 million dirhams. He used that entire sum, as well as many other monies that he raised in his audit, expending them on the search for Muḥammad. However, Abū Jaʿfar judged him to be sluggish and began to have suspicions about him, so he wrote ordering him to make a thorough search of Medina and its environs. Muḥammad b. Khālid gave orders to the treasury officials to pay wages to anyone who participated in the search. Thus they paid wages, but al-Ghāḍirī al-Muḍḥik[515] sold[516] [his share], incurring a debt with the people of 1,000 dīnārs, but this too was depleted and wiped out. They also went out to the surrounding areas in search of Muḥammad. Al-Qasrī [i.e., Muḥammad b. Khālid] ordered the people of Medina to remain in their houses for seven days. His messengers and soldiers made the rounds of the people's houses in order to search, but they did not come up with anything. [Al-Qasrī had written documents for his assistants, giving them supreme authority so that no one could reproach them.] But because Abū Jaʿfar found Muḥammad b. Khālid sluggish and saw what funds he had used up, he dismissed him.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—Ḥusayn b. Yazīd—Ibn [162] Ḍabbah: The problem of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm weighed heavily upon Abū Jaʿfar, so he sent someone to summon Abū al-Siʿlāʾ,[517] a man of Qays b. ʿAylān,[518] and said, "Come now, advise me in the matter of these two men. The business with them has really given me grief." Abū al-Siʿlāʾ replied, "I think that you

514. Although actual observation of the new moon can be problematic, this term usually connotes the first day of the lunar month, i.e., 1 Rajab 141 (Tuesday, November 7, 758). *EI*², s.v. Hilāl (J. Schacht).

515. For his later confrontation with Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh see p. 194.

516. Wa-bāʿa, following Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXII.

517. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXII. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 519, gives the name as Abī al-ʿAlāʾ.

518. Qays ʿAylān was a principal subdivision of the Muḍar, one of two major tribal groupings in ancient northern Arabia. *EI*², s.v. Ḳays ʿAylān (G. Baer and M. Hoexter); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, II, 456.

should appoint as governor one of the descendants of al-Zubayr[519] or Ṭalḥah,[520] for those people would conduct a truly vengeful search for the two of them.[521] I swear they would not let Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm rest until they ferreted them out for you!" "May God confound you!" said the caliph; "what excellent advice you've brought! I had, of course, thought of that, but I vow to God that I will not take vengeance against the people of my house by the hands of my enemy or theirs. Yet I could send some poor Arab of no consequence,[522] and he could do just what you said." Abū Jaʿfar thus sent Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā[523]—Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz: One day, after Abū Jaʿfar had decided to dismiss Muḥammad b. Khālid from the governorship of Medina, he went out riding and, upon leaving his house, was met by Yazīd b. Usayd al-Sulamī.[524] The caliph called to him, and so Yazīd came alongside him. Abū Jaʿfar asked, "Could you put me on to some poor [but promising] Qaysī youth whom I could enrich and ennoble, empowering him over the Lord of the Yemen, who will lead him a dance, i.e., Ibn al-Qasrī?"[525] "Yes, Commander of the Faithful," replied Yazīd, "I know just the one." "Who is he?" the caliph asked. Yazīd replied, "Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī." The caliph cautioned, "Be sure not to men-

519. Al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām b. Khuwaylid b. Asad al-Ḥawārī was an early convert of whom the Prophet Muḥammad said, "Every prophet has an apostle (ḥawārī), and my apostle is al-Zubayr." Dhahabī, Siyar, I, 41–67; EI[1], s.v. (A. J. Wensinck).

520. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh was a Companion of the Prophet who shielded the latter in his retreat at the Battle of Uḥud. EI[1], s.v. (G. Levi della Vida).

521. Both Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr were central figures in the Battle of the Camel, an attempt to avenge ʿUthmān and to wrest power from ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, and lost their lives in that episode. Their descendants would thus not have any great affection for the ʿAlids.

522. Ṣuʿaylīkan min al-ʿarab. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ṣaʿlaka.

523. Perhaps the brother of Abū Ghassān Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad.

524. Yazīd b. Usayd b. Zāfir b. Asmāʾ al-Sulamī (d. after 162/779), son of a Christian mother, was a prominent army commander during the Umayyad caliphate and served as governor of Armenia for al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr. Ṭabarī, III, 81, 374, 493; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 209–10; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VIII, 179; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 57–58.

525. I.e., Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī.

tion this to anyone." Then he left and ordered fine mounts, clothing, and baggage to be prepared for the journey. When the caliph came away from the final night prayer, he summoned Riyāḥ, told him what an affliction Ziyād and Ibn al-Qasrī's deception in the matter of the sons of ʿAbdallāh had been to him, and appointed him the governor of Medina. He demanded that Riyāḥ set off immediately, without even going back to his house, and he commanded him to exert every effort in the search for Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm. Riyāḥ left in such a hurry that he arrived in Medina
[163] on Friday, 23 Ramaḍān 144.[526]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf[527]—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ—his father:[528] When Abū Jaʿfar's problem with Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm had worn him down, I went out one day from his presence—or from my house on the way to him—and suddenly found a man who approached me. He said, "I am Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān's messenger to you. Riyāḥ says to you, 'I have heard about the problem of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm and about the duplicity of the governors in their affair. If the Commander of the Faithful appoints me governor of Medina, I give him my guarantee that I will seize them and bring them forth.' " I conveyed that to the Commander of the Faithful, and he wrote to him with his commission without witness.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā—Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz: When Riyāḥ entered the Dār Marwān and went into the gallery, he turned to one (some) of those with him and asked, "Is this the Dār Marwān?" They said it was, and he announced, "This is a place where people come and people go, unable to remain at rest;[529] we, then, shall be the first to leave it [and do something]."

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar—al-Zubayr b. al-Mundhir, the mawlā of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-ʿAwwām: Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān arrived accompanied by his chamberlain, known as Abū al-Bakhtarī, who had been a friend of my father's in the days

526. December 25, 761.
527. Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf b. Suwayd.
528. I.e., al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus, the caliph's mawlā.
529. Hādhihi al-miḥlāl al-miẓʿān, with Lane, Lexicon, II, 622, for miḥlāl, and Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ẓaʿana, for miẓʿān.

of al-Walīd b. Yazīd.[530] Because of his friendship for my father, I used to visit him. One day he said to me, "Zubayr, when Riyāḥ entered the Dār Marwān, he said to me, 'Is this the Dār Marwān? By God, it is certainly a place where people come and people go, unable to remain at rest.' When the people parted from him[531]—ʿAbdallāh being confined in the domed structure of the Dār leading to the [caliph's] enclosure where Ziyād b.ʿUbaydallāh had imprisoned him—Riyāḥ said to me, 'Take my hand, Abū al-Bakhtarī. We shall go see this old man.' He advanced, leaning on me, until he came to a stop before ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan and said, 'By God, old man, the Commander of the Faithful did not make me governor because of close kinship or for any favor that my [164] forebears did for him. You had better not lead me on as you did Ziyād and Ibn al-Qasrī. By God, I shall give you a bad time unless you bring me your sons, Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm.' ʿAbdallāh lifted up his head to him and said, 'Yes; and, of course, you, by God, will be the Qaysī dripping red,[532] slaughtered for it [my soul] like a butchered sheep'. Abū al-Bakhtarī remarked, 'Riyāḥ left then, holding on to my hand. I could feel the chill of his hand and that he was shuffling on his feet because of what ʿAbdallāh had said to him. I said, 'By God, this man is not apprised of the unknown!' 'Alas,' replied Riyāḥ, 'God knows he only said what he has heard.' Abū al-Bakhtarī concluded, 'By God, he was in fact slaughtered for it like a sheep.' "

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Riyāḥ arrived in Medina and summoned [Muḥammad b. Khālid] al-Qasrī to ask him about the [public] funds. Muḥammad b. Khālid said, "This is my secretary; he is more knowledgeable about such matters than I." "I am asking you," Riyāḥ retorted, "and you are relegating me to your secretary!" He commanded that he be stabbed in the neck and that he be lashed about the head with whips. Then he arrested Rizām, Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Qasrī's secretary and mawlā, and punished him at length. He had him beaten fifteen lashes every other day, and, with his hand 530. Walīd II, an Umayyad caliph who reigned for little more than a year (from 125/743 to 126/744) before being killed by agents of his successor, Yazīd b. al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. EI[1], s.v. (H. Lammens); Hawting, First Dynasty, 90–94.

531. Fa-lammā takashshafa al-nāsu ʿanhu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. kashafa.

532. Innaka la azbarqu Qaysin. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXII.

manacled to his neck from morning to night, he was made to follow Riyāḥ around the courtyard of the mosque and the open square. Secretly, Riyāḥ tried to get him to make accusations against Ibn Khālid, but he did not find Rizām amenable. One day during that time ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh al-Judhāmī, deputy to the chief of police, took him out, intending to beat him, but from feet to head he was one suppurating ulcer. ʿUmar asked, "This is the [165] day for your lashing[533] [again], so where do you want us to whip you?" "By God," Rizām replied, "there is no place left on my body to beat! But if you wish, then the palms of my hands." He then held out his hands and was beaten fifteen lashes on the palms.

Riyāḥ's messengers kept coming to Rizām, ordering him to make accusations against Ibn Khālid so that he could be set free. He sent back to Riyāḥ, "Tell them to leave me alone so that I can write a letter." Riyāḥ did so, but then he kept after him and sent word to him "to come with the letter that evening in front of the people and hand it over to me." When evening came, Riyāḥ sent for him. Rizām arrived to find Riyāḥ with a group of people, so he said, "Hear me, all of you, the Amīr ordered me to write a letter making accusations against Ibn Khālid. I have indeed written such a letter to escape harm.[534] I swear to you that everything in it is false." At Riyāḥ's orders he was given one hundred lashes and sent back to prison.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—his paternal uncle, ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī: When God cast Adam down from the Garden, he set him up on [Mt.] Abū Qubays[535] and raised up for him the entire earth so that he could view it, saying, "All of this is yours." Adam asked, "How, O Lord, will I know what is in it?" God then made for him the stars and said, "When you see the star such and such, it is [to be called] this, and when you see the star such and such it is [to be called] that." Therefore Adam came to know this from the stars. Then 533. Hadhā yawmu ghibbika. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ghibb.

534. Kitāban atanajjā bihi. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIII, and Glossarium, s.v. najā.

535. Abū Qubays is the name of a hill overlooking the Great Mosque in Mecca, where Adam is said to be buried. EI^{2}, s.v. Abū Ḳubays (G. Rentz); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 80–81.

that became too hard for him, so God sent from heaven a mirror in which Adam could see what was on earth, until, when Adam died, a satan called Faqṭas[536] went to get it. He then broke it and built upon the pieces a city in the east called Jābirat.[537] When Sulaymān b. Dāwūd[538] asked about the mirror, he was told that Faqṭas had taken it. Sulaymān summoned Faqṭas and asked him about it. Faqṭas said, "It is under the foundations of Jābirat." [166]
"Bring it to me," said Sulaymān. "Who will tear down the city?" asked Faqṭas. Now they told[539] Sulaymān to tell him, "You," which he did. So Faqṭas brought the mirror to Sulaymān, and Sulaymān put the parts of it back together. Then he bound its circumference with a strap and kept looking into it until his death. At this the satans pounced on it and carried it off, but a bit of it remained. The Banū Isrā'īl passed this bit down from one generation to the next until it came to the Exilarch (ra's al-jālūt).[540] He brought it to Marwān b. Muḥammad,[541] who kept polishing it and affixed it to another mirror. In it he saw something that he found repulsive, so he threw down the mirror, beheaded the Exilarch, and handed it over to one of his slave girls. She put it into a wad of cotton and then placed it in a stone. When Abū Ja'far became caliph, he asked about it and was told that a certain woman had the mirror. He searched until he had found her, she being [already] in his household.[542] He, too, kept polishing it and put it into another mirror. Looking into it, he could see Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, so he wrote to Riyāḥ b. 'Uthmān telling him that Muḥammad was in some country where there were citrons and grapes and that he should look for him there. Now one of Abū Ja'far's associates had written to Muḥammad, "Do not

536. For Faqṭas and Faqṭasah as the twin offspring of Iblīs, see al-Kisā'ī, Tales of the Prophets, 19.

537. This vocalization is conjectural.

538. I.e., the Biblical and Qur'ānic prophet Solomon. According to a later account in Ṭabarī, III, 321, the gates that Abū Ja'far used in building Baghdad came originally from the prophet Sulaymān via al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf's city of Wāsiṭ.

539. The identity of these advisors is left indefinite.

540. The Resh Galuta was the lay leader of the Jewish community in Iraq. According to Eliezer Bashan, EJ, s.v. Exilarch, Solomon b. Ḥisdai served as Exilarch from 115–43/733–59. The caliph Marwān b. Muḥammad, however, died in 750.

541. Marwān II was the last caliph of the Umayyad dynasty. He reigned 127–32/744–50. EI^{2}, s.v. (G.R. Hawting).

542. Or the pronouns could refer to the mirror itself.

stay in any place for longer than it takes the courier to go from Iraq to Medina." Muḥammad, therefore, stayed on the move, and Abū Jaʿfar saw him in al-Bayḍāʾ,[543] which is about twenty miles beyond al-Ghābah,[544] belonging to Ashjaʿ.[545] So he wrote to Riyāḥ that Muḥammad was in a country where there were mountains and tarns.[546] Riyāḥ searched but did not find him. Abū Jaʿfar then wrote to him that now Muḥammad was on a mountain where there were terebinth berries[547] and pitch. Riyāḥ said to himself, "This must be Raḍwā,[548] so again he looked for Muḥammad but did not find him.

According to Abū Zayd[549]—Abū Ṣafwān Naṣr b. Qudayd b. Naṣr b. Sayyār:[550] I heard that Abū Jaʿfar owned a mirror in which he could distinguish his enemy from his friend.

[167] According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Riyāḥ intensified the search for Muḥammad and was informed that he was in one of the mountain gorges of Raḍwā, a mountain of Juhaynah in the administrative district of Yanbuʿ.[551] Riyāḥ thus appointed ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. Mālik al-Juhanī,[552] one

---

543. Al-Bayḍāʾ was the stage before Wādī al-Qurā on the northwestern route into Mecca. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 529–30; Cornu, Répertoires, 72.

544. Yāqūt, Buldān IV, 182, identifies al-Ghābah simply as a place near Medina on the way from Syria. The word itself connotes either a depression in the earth or a thicket of wood or reeds. Groom, Arabic Topography, 90.

545. The Banū Ashjaʿ were one of the tribal subdivions of Qays who affiliated with the Prophet during his years in Medina and subsequently fought in the wars of riddah and the further conquest of Arabia. Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 71, 88; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, II, 201; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 249–50.

546. The Leiden vocalization is qillāt, but see Dozy, Supplément, II, 395, for de Goeje's references to the alternative qullāt.

547. Al-ḥabb al-akhḍar. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ḥabb.

548. Raḍwā is a mountain group in the territory of Juhaynah (see note 494, above) where Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah is believed to have gone into occultation. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 51; Farmayan and Daniel, Shiʿite Pilgrimage to Mecca, 284, 288.

549. I.e., ʿUmar b. Shabbah b. ʿAbīdah.

550. Presumably a descendant of the noted Umayyad governor of Khurāsān, Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Laythī (d. 131/748). *EI*², s.v. (C. E. Bosworth).

551. Yanbuʿ is now a seaport on the west coast of the Arabian peninsula almost on the same latitude as Medina; the name also applies to an inland oasis that lies northeast of the port. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 449–50, identifies it as the site of a wuqūf belonging to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. *EI*¹, s.v. (A. Grohmann); Cornu, Répertoires, 89.

552. Caetani, Cronographia generale, 308.

of the Banū Jusham,[553] as governor of Yanbuʿ and ordered him to search for Muḥammad, which he did. ʿAmr was told that Muḥammad was in a mountain gorge of Raḍwā, so he went there with cavalry and infantry. This frightened Muḥammad. ʿAmr appeared in force, but Muḥammad escaped. He had a little son,[554] however, who was born during this fearful period and was in the care of one of his slave girls, and the child fell from the mountain and was dashed to pieces. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān then went away.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ḥakīm al-Ṭāʾī: When Muḥammad's son fell to his death and he suffered what he suffered, he spoke these lines:

In tattered clothes he suffers sore feet.[555]
Sharp-edged flints afflict him.
Fear banished and disgraced him.
Thus it is with one who hates the heat of battle.
In death he'll have rest.
Death is a decree imposed on men's necks.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—his paternal uncle, ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad: Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh said, "While I was in Raḍwā together with a slave girl who was my concubine (and who had with her a little son of mine whom she was nursing), suddenly Ibn Sanūṭī, a mawlā of the people of Medina, pounced on me in the mountain area where he had been looking for me. I left in flight, and the slave girl fled, but the little boy fell from her [grasp] and was dashed to pieces." ʿUbaydallāh continued, "Ibn Sanūṭī was brought to Muḥammad after the time [168] when he came out in open revolt. 'Ibn Sanūṭī,' Muḥammad said, 'do you know what happened to the little boy?' 'Yes, by God, I do indeed,' he responded. Muḥammad, therefore, ordered him to be imprisoned, and he remained confined until Muḥammad was killed."

553. Jusham b. Muʿāwiyah was a subdivision of the Hawāzin tribal group. EI[2], s.v. Hawāzin (W. Montgomery Watt); Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 81, 99–100; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, II, 268–69.

554. His name is unknown (Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 230–31), but Iṣfahānī gives his mother's name as Rakhayyah.

555. Ṭabarī quotes these lines again at III, 194, with slight variation.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Ziyād—his father: Muḥammad said, "I was going hither and thither in al-Ḥarrah[556] when suddenly I saw Riyāḥ and the horsemen. Quickly I turned away toward a well and stood between its two supporting posts. I had begun to draw water when Riyāḥ met me flat on. "God confound him," he said; "he's a true desert Arab with a good, strong arm!"

According to ʿUmar—Ibn Zabālah[557]—ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Juhanī—ʿUthmān b. Mālik: With his searching Riyāḥ made Muḥammad feel quite uneasy. Muḥammad said to me, "In the morning, come with us to the Mosque of Victory;[558] there we will pray to God." ʿUthmān continued, "I said the morning prayer, then went to him, and we set off together in the early morning. Muḥammad was wearing a rough shirt and a cloak of fine white linen.[559] We left the place where he had been, but drawing near the Mosque, he suddenly turned aside, for there was Riyāḥ with a group of his associates on horseback. I said to Muḥammad, "There's Riyāḥ! To God we belong and to Him is our return [i.e., the game is up!]." He said, paying him no heed: "Keep moving." So I moved on, though my feet would scarcely carry me. Muḥammad himself turned off the road and sat down, settling his back against something beside the road. He let the fringes of his cloak fall over his face. Now he was a well-built man, but when Riyāḥ stood opposite him, he turned to his companions and said, "A woman has seen us and she is embarrassed." ʿUthmān continued: I kept moving until the sun ascended, at

556. Broadly conceived, al-Ḥarrah connotes the mountainous, lava-strewn region that stretches from the Yemen to Wādī al-Qurā; more specifically, it applies to an area on the northeastern side of Medina that was the site of bloody revolt against the Umayyad caliph Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah in 63/683. Cornu, Répertoires, 76; *EI*², s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri); Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 245; Kister, "Battle of the Ḥarra."

557. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah al-Makhzūmī (d. after 179/795) was a historian and traditionist of Medina and an associate of Mālik b. Anas. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 101–2; GAS, I, 343–44; Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, IX, 191.

558. Masjid al-Fatḥ was a mosque in Medina associated with Muḥammad's victory over the Meccans. *EI*², s.v. Masdjid (J. Pedersen et al.).

559. Wa-ʿalā Muḥammadin qamīṣun ghalīzun wa-ridāʾun furqubiyyun. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIII, and Glossarium, s.v. fatala and furqub for qurqub.

which time Riyāḥ came, went up and prayed two parts of the prayer cycle, and then left in the direction of Buṭḥān.[560] At this point Muḥammad approached and entered the Mosque, where he said both the ritual prayer and a private prayer. [169]

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh continued to move about from place to place until his open rebellion. When the matter of Muḥammad had begun to prove wearisome for al-Manṣūr and he had not been able to lay hands on him, even though ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan remained imprisoned, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Saʿīd said to Abū Jaʿfar (in what is mentioned on the authority of ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh from ʿAbdallāh b. ʿImrān b. Abī Farwah): "Commander of the Faithful, do you want Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm to be brought before you while the Ḥasanids are allowed to go free? The people hold any one of them in more awe than a lion!" ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz said that it was this that induced Abū Jaʿfar to imprison the Ḥasanids. Then the caliph summoned him and asked, "Who suggested this idea to you?" "Fulayḥ b. Sulaymān,"[561] he replied. When ʿAbd al-Azīz b. Saʿīd, who was a confidential agent for Abū Jaʿfar and custodian of the voluntary alms, died, the caliph put Fulayḥ b. Sulaymān in his position and ordered seizure of the Ḥasanids.

According to ʿĪsā—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿImrān b. Abī Farwah: Abū Jaʿfar commanded Riyāḥ to arrest the Ḥasanids, sending Abū al-Azhar al-Mahrī to him with that order. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan had already been imprisoned, his confinement lasting for three years. Out of mourning for ʿAbdallāh, Ḥasan b. Ḥasan had even neglected to dye his beard,[562] prompting Abū Jaʿfar to ask [tauntingly], "How are things with the woman in ʿiddah!"[563] Riyāḥ

560. Buṭḥān was a wādī that lay in the western part of the city and supplied water to it. It is now the site of a recently constructed dam. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 446–47; *EI*², s.v. al-Madīna (R. B. Winder); ʿAlī "Topography of Medina," 68.

561. Fulayḥ b. Sulaymān b. Abī al-Mughīrah (d. 168/784) was appointed co-governor of Medina by al-Manṣūr in 155/771–72. Ṭabarī, III, 377; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 272–74; GAS, I, 93.

562. Qad naṣala khiḍābahu tasalluban ʿalā ʿAbdallāh. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCXXXIII, and Glossarium, s.v. naṣala and salaba.

563. Although here said ironically of a man, ʿiddah is the period of sexual abstention mandated for a widowed or divorced woman. During this stage of her mourning, a widow would neither wear jewelry nor use cosmetics. *EI*², s.v. (Y. Linant de Bellefonds).

arrested Ḥasan and Ibrāhīm,[564] the sons of Ḥasan b. Ḥasan;[565] and [170] Ḥasan b. Jaʿfar b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan and Sulaymān and ʿAbdallāh, the sons of Dāwūd b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan; and Muḥammad,[566] Ismāʿīl,[567] and Isḥāq, the sons of Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan.[568] They seized ʿAbbās b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib[569] at his gate. Although his mother, ʿĀʾishah bt. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar, pleaded, "Just let me smell him,"[570] they told her, "No, by God, not while you are living in this world." [They also seized] ʿAlī b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan al-ʿĀbid.[571]

According to ʿUmar—Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Ibrāhīm: With them Abū Jaʿfar imprisoned ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan, the brother of ʿAlī.[572]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Riyāḥ publicly reviled Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons

---

564. Ibrāhīm's mother was Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn. He perished in prison at the age of sixty-seven, the first of the imprisoned Ḥasanids to die. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 187–88; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, V, 342.

565. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, al-Ḥasan al-Muthannā (d. circa 97/715–16). Ibn Saʿd, al-Ṭabaqāt al-kubrā, V, 319–20; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 416–18; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, II, 187.

566. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan was best remembered for his sobriquet "the Golden Brocade" (al-dībāj al-aṣfar), a verbal tribute to his beauty. In fact, Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 200, reports that people used to go and visit this fellow simply for the delight of looking at him. Later, in Ṭabarī, p. 133, the name is rendered as "the Younger Brocade."

567. Ismāʿīl b. Ibāhīm b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan was particularly remembered for his forebearance in tribulation. An account in Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 199, compares him to gold bullion that is purified by fire. He was given the name Ṭabāṭabā—some sources say that it was his son Ibrāhīm's name—because of a mispronunciation. In Persian the name Ṭabāṭabāʾī has come to designate an individual who claims both maternal and paternal descent from the Prophet Muḥammad. EI[2], s.v. Ibn Ṭabāṭabā (B. Scarcia Amoretti); Haïm, New Persian-English, II, 299.

568. According to Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 188–89, Jaʿfar b. al-Ḥasan, his son al-Ḥasan b. Jaʿfar, Dāwūd b. al-Ḥasan, and his sons Sulaymān and ʿAbdallāh, were among the Ḥasanids who were spared by Abū Jaʿfar after the deaths of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm. Iṣfahānī cites competing reports about Isḥāq and Ismāʿīl, the sons of Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥasan, with one saying they were spared and another saying they were slain.

569. According to Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 198, he was thirty-five years old when he died in al-Manṣūr's prison.

570. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 198, expands her plea to "just let me take a sniff of him and give him a hug."

571. See note 495, above.

572. For both ʿAbdallāh and ʿAlī, see Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 196.

of ʿAbdallāh, and heaped abuse upon the people of Medina. Moreover, one day in the pulpit he made mention of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, calling them "vicious, morally depraved, and brigands." Then he referred to their mother, the daughter of Abū ʿUbaydah,[573] speaking of her in obscene terms. The people exclaimed, "God be praised,"[574] and regarded his words as monstrous. At this Riyāḥ turned on them and said, "As for you people, we have not wearied[575] of heaping abuse on them. May God paste your faces over with shame and ignominy, for, by God, I shall certainly write to your caliph and inform him of your deceit and of your lack of sincerity." The people said, "We are not going to listen to you, O Son of the Unlawful."[576] They went for him with pebbles, so he took off and rushed into the Dār Marwān and bolted the door behind him. At this the people went out and lined up facing him. They shot at him and called him names. Finally, they gave up and desisted.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—someone he considered trustworthy: Imprisoned with them were Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī, as well as ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan[577] as soon as he arrived from Egypt.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Ḥabīb: Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh sent his son, ʿAlī, to Egypt. Someone reported him to the governor of Egypt when he had an impetuous attack in mind. The governor tied him up and sent him on to Abū Jaʿfar. ʿAlī confessed to caliph, naming his father's associates. Among those whom he named were ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Mawālī[578] and Abū Ḥunayn. Abū Jaʿfar ordered the two of them imprisoned where Abū Ḥunayn was given 100 lashes. [171]

573. Hind bt. Abī ʿUbaydah b. ʿAbdallāh. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 232.
574. The sense here is shocked surprise, certainly not approval.
575. Reading it as lā kalalnā.
576. Ibn al-Maḥdūd.
577. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 201.
578. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān reportedly knew the whereabouts of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, was in frequent personal contact with them, and called himself their dāʿī. Ṭabarī later, III, 187, includes a long account of the arrest and transporting of the Ḥasanids on the authority of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 284, gives his death date as 173/789–90. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 288.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan passed Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan when the latter was feeding some camels of his. Ḥasan asked, "How can you go on feeding your camels when ʿAbdallāh is imprisoned! Untether them, boy!" Ibrāhīm did so, giving a [parting] shout behind them, and not a one of them was ever found [again].

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī:[579] We were present at Riyāḥ's door into the reserved section (maqṣūrah) of the mosque. The muezzin called out: "Let any of the Ḥusaynids who are here now enter." My uncle, ʿUmar b. Muḥammad,[580] said to me, "Watch what the people do." They entered by the door to the reserved section and left by the Marwān door.[581] Then the muezzin called out, "Let any of the Banū Ḥasan who are here now enter." They entered by the door to the ruler's section as blacksmiths entered by the Marwān door and fetters were called for.[582]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: When Riyāḥ had completed the morning prayer, he would send for me and for Qudāmah b. Mūsā and converse with us for a while. One day when I was with him, as we left there suddenly appeared a man who had muffled himself up in a head sash. Riyāḥ said to him, "Welcome and greetings! What do you wish?" The man replied, "I have come so that you can arrest me together with my people," [172] for, in fact, it was ʿAlī b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan. "The Commander of the Faithful will certainly recognize what is due you!" exclaimed Riyāḥ. He then imprisoned ʿAlī together with [other members of the] the Banū Ḥasan.

According to ʿUmar—Yaʿqūb b. al-Qāsim—Saʿīd b. Nāshirah, the mawlā of Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān: Muḥammad sent his son ʿAlī away, but he was arrested in Egypt and died in Abū Jaʿfar's prison.

According to ʿUmar—Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh

---

579. The only mention of him in Ṭabarī.

580. ʿUmar b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī.

581. Bāb Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, was named for the Umayyad caliph (64–65/684–85) who served two terms as governor of Medina. For the maqṣūrah, a compartment for the ruler built near the miḥrāb, see *EI*², s.v. Masd̲jid (J. Pedersen et al.).

582. Hodgson "Early Shīʿa," 10, notes this episode as one in which "certainly al-Manṣūr set the Ḥusaynids off visibly from them [i.e. the Ḥasanids]."

b. Ḥasan[583]—his father—his father, Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh: When we were jailed, the prison was too cramped for us. My father therefore asked Riyāḥ to allow him to buy a house that he could convert into our place of arrest. Riyāḥ granted permission, so my father bought a house, to which we were moved. When our imprisonment had gone on for a long time, Muḥammad came to his mother, Hind, and said, "I have laid upon my father and my uncles something that they find an impossible ordeal. I have it in mind to put my hand in theirs so that perhaps they may be freed." Disguising herself and dressed in rags, Hind came to the prison in the guise of a messenger. She was given permission to enter, and when my father saw her, he made sure it was she and rose up to meet her. She told him what Muḥammad had said, but he replied, "On no account [should he do that]; we can endure it. But, by God, I do hope that God confers something good on him. My advice to him would be that he should continue to summon supporters to his cause and to press it intensely, for our relief is in God's hands." Hind then left, but Muḥammad fulfilled his purpose.

In this year the descendants of Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī were transported from Medina to Iraq.

The Reason [the Descendants of Ḥasan] Were Transported to Iraq and How Matters Stood for Them at That Time

According to ʿUmar—Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh—his father—his father: When Abū Jaʿfar made the Pilgrimage, he sent Muḥammad b. ʿImrān b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah[584] and Mālik b. Anas[585] to our associates [in prison], asking them to urge [173]

583. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan was a Baghdādī traditionist whose grandfather was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's brother. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XIII, 39–40; Nagel, "Bericht," 244.

584. Muḥammad b. ʿImrān b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah, known as Abū Sulaymān, was a judge in Medina for the Umayyads and for al-Manṣūr. On the occasion of his death in 154, Abū Jaʿfar reportedly said, "Today Quraysh has been leveled." Ṣafadī, Wāfī, IV, 235.

585. Mālik b. Anas (d. 179/796) was a renowned traditionist and jurist and eponymous founder of the Mālikī madhdhab. EI^{2}, s.v. (J. Schacht). For Abū Jaʿfar's connection with Mālik's Muwaṭṭaʾ, see Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, 86–88.

Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of ʿAbdallāh, to come to him. The two messengers entered our presence while my father [ʿAbdallāh] was standing in the ritual prayer and announced the caliph's message to those who were there. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan said, "This is all the doing of those two sons of an inauspicious mother. By God, this does not represent our view nor accord with our way of thinking.[586] I'm telling you frankly." Ibrāhīm approached him and said, "Why would you harm your brother through his two sons and harm your brother's son through his mother?" My father concluded his ritual prayer,[587] so Muḥammad and Mālik b. Anas gave him the message. "No, by God," he answered, "I shall not give you a word in response. If he wishes to give me permission to meet him, then let him do so." The two men went away and gave their report to the caliph. Abū Jaʿfar commented, "He simply wants to bewitch me,[588] but, by God, his eye will not see mine until he brings me his two sons."

According to ʿUmar—Ibn Zabālah: I heard one of our learned men say that ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan never spoke privately to anyone without cajoling him away from the judgment he had already made.

According to ʿUmar—Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh—his father—his grandfather: The Commander of the Faithful, Abū Jaʿfar, continued on toward his destination as a pilgrim,[589] but then started back without entering Medina, rather passing on to al-Rabadhah[590] until he came to the stream in its valley.[591]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: The Ḥasanids remained imprisoned within Riyāḥ's juris-

586. Mā hādhā ʿan mulāʾamatinā. Ṭabarī, Addendda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIII, and Glossarium, s.v. laʾuma.

587. Or abandoned it [as being vitiated by the interruption].

588. Arāda an yasḥaranī. The Leiden edition records the alternative reading, yaskhara bī, "to make fun of me" [see also Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 539, with yusakhkhiranī], but notes confirmation of the selected reading in the account from Ibn Zabālah that follows.

589. Sāra li-wajhihi ḥājjan. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. wajuha.

590. Al-Rabadhah was a stage on the route from al-Kūfah to Mecca; its remains are situated about 200 kilometers to the southeast of Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 24–25; Cornu, Répertoires, 82. Recent excavations at this site have been described and lavishly illustrated in Rāshid, Al-Rabadhah.

591. Thinā rahwatihā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. thanā; Groom, Arabic Topography, 237.

diction until Abū Jaʿfar made the Pilgrimage in 144. At that time Riyāḥ met with the caliph in al-Rabadhah, and the latter sent him back to Medina with orders to dispatch the Ḥasanids to him, together with Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān,[592] who was the brother of the Ḥasanids on their mother's side. (The mother of them all was Fāṭimah bt. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbī Ṭālib.) [174] Riyāḥ, therefore, sent for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr when he was with his goods and property in Badr,[593] and had him brought down to Medina. Then Riyāḥ left with the Ḥasanids and Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr for al-Rabadhah. When he came to Qaṣr Nafīs,[594] about three miles (amyāl, sing. mīl)[595] from Medina, he called for the blacksmiths, shackles, and fetters and threw every man of them into a foot shackle and neck iron. The two fettering rings on ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan's shackle were too tight. They cut into him, causing him to moan. His brother, ʿAlī b. Ḥasan, swore at him, saying that they should transfer his rings to ʿAbdallāh if they were more commodious. So the rings were transferred to ʿAbdallāh and Riyāḥ proceeded to al-Rabadhah with them.

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Khālid, the son of Saʿīd b. ʿĀmir's[596] sister—Juwayriyyah b. Asmāʾ,[597] the maternal uncle of his mother: When the Ḥasanids were transported to Abū Jaʿfar, shackles with which to fetter them were brought forth. At the time, ʿAlī b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan was standing in the ritual prayer.

592. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān, the great-grandson of the third caliph ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, was known as "the Brocade" (al-dībāj) because of his physical beauty. As a half-brother of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan, he was a maternal uncle of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, and his own mother was Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn. Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 224–25.

593. Also known as Badr Ḥunayn, it is a town southwest of Medina chiefly remembered for the victory the Prophet Muḥammad secured there in 2/624 against Meccan forces. *EI*², s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 357–58.

594. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 14, this citadel stood in the Ḥarrah area of Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 364, marks its connection to Nafīs b. Muḥammad, a mawlā of the Anṣār of Medina.

595. A mīl is the equivalent of about two kilometers. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 63.

596. Saʿīd b. ʿĀmir b. Ḥusayn b. Qays, who died in the first part of the third/ninth century, was secretary to the vizier Khālid b. Barmak. Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 1089.

597. Juwayriyyah b. Asmāʾ b. ʿUbayd b. Mukhāriq was a Baṣran traditionist who died in 173/789. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 107; GAS, I, 94.

Now among the shackles there was a particularly heavy one. Each time it was brought near to any of them, the man would shrink back from it and ask to be exempted. But ʿAlī, turning from his prayer, said, "Because you are so manifestly anxious, this obvious display of pain suffices him."[598] He then stretched forth his feet and was shackled with it.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿImrān: The one who brought them down to al-Rabadhah was Abū al-Azhar.

According to ʿUmar—Ibn Zabālah—Ḥusayn b. Zayd b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn:[599] Early one morning I went to the mosque. There I saw the Ḥasanids being led out of the Dār Marwān on their way to al-Rabadhah in the company of Abū al-Azhar. I then left and, Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad[600] having sent for me, I went to him. "What's on your mind?" he asked." I replied that I had seen the [175] Ḥasanids being taken out in litters. He asked me to sit down, which I did, and then summoned one of his servants. Next he made many supplications to his Lord and then said to his servant, "Go on out, and when they have been carried off, come back and tell me." Eventually the messenger came to him and said, "Abū al-Azhar is approaching with them." Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad stood up and stepped behind a hair screen from which he could look out without being seen. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan came into view riding in a litter with one of the ʿAbbāsid partisans[601] seated on the other side as a counterbalance. His entire family was being treated likewise. When Jaʿfar looked upon them, his eyes overflowed until his tears ran down his beard. Then he came up to me, saying, "By

598. Sharʿuhu hādhā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. sharaʿa.

599. Ḥusayn b. Zayd b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, whose patronymic was Abū ʿAbdallāh, was also known as Dhū al-Damʿah ("the Tearful") because he wept so much. Ṭabarī, III, 2557; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 387–89; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XII, 367.

600. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Abī ʿAbdallāh (d. 148/765), known as al-Imām al-Ṣādiq ("the Trustworthy Imām"), refined the foundational doctrines of Ithnā-ʿasharī Shīʿism. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 387, notes that Ḥusayn b. Zayd lived with Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq for a period and was instructed by him. Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 255–70; *EI*², s.v. Djaʿfar al-Ṣādiḳ (M. G. S. Hodgson); Omar, "Aspects," 171–76.

601. Musawwid, i.e., "Wearer of the Black," because the ʿAbbāsids used this as a representational color. Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, II, 50–51; ʿAthamina, "Black Banners."

God, Abū ʿAbdallāh, when these are gone, God will no longer be honored!"[602]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah—Muṣʿab b. ʿUthmān:[603] At the time when the Ḥasanids were taken away, al-Ḥārith b. ʿĀmir b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām encountered them in al-Rabadhah and exclaimed, "Praise God who has expelled you from our country." Ḥasan b. Ḥasan stuck out his neck in defiance of al-Ḥārith, but ʿAbdallāh adjured him to remain silent.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Ibn Abrūd, the chamberlain of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh: During the time when the Ḥasanids were being transported, Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm used to come alongside disguised as desert Arabs. They would walk next to their father, questioning him and requesting his permission to come forth in open revolt. He, however, kept saying, "Don't be in a hurry until you are in a position to do so [successfully]." He also said to them, "If Abū Jaʿfar prohibits you from living nobly, he does not prevent you from dying nobly."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: When the Ḥasanids reached al-Rabadhah, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān came into Abū Jaʿfar's presence wearing only a shirt, a headwrap (sāj), and waist wrapper (izār) under his shirt.[604] As he came to a standstill before the caliph, [176]
Abū Jaʿfar said, "You there, what a pimp you are!" "Praise be to God," replied Muḥammad, "you have certainly known me to be

602. Compare Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 524: lā yaḥfaẓu allāhu ḥaramayhi baʿda hāʾulāʾi, "when these are gone, God will no longer protect the two sacred places (i.e., Mecca and Medina)."

603. Muṣʿab b. ʿUthmān b. Muṣʿab b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr (as given in Ṭabarī, Indices, 552, but this is corrected by Nagel, "Bericht," 235, to Muṣʿab b. ʿUthmān b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr) was descended from al-Zubayr al-Ḥawārī (see note 519), the Prophet Muḥammad's apostle, whose son Muṣʿab was governor of al-Baṣrah during the anticaliphate of his brother ʿAbdallāh. Muṣʿab b. ʿUthmān's grandfather, ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr (d. 93/712), was a renowned jurisprudent and traditionist in Medina. EI[1], s.v. Muṣʿab b. al-Zubair (H. Lammens) and ʿUrwah b. Zubair (V. Vacca); EI[2] Suppl., s.v. Fuḳahāʾ al-Madīna al-Sabʿa (C. Pellat); Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 226; GAS, I, 278–79.

604. According to Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1459–60, sāj designates a dark or ash-colored or black ṭaylasān. See also Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 541 n. 2. For the izār, see Ahsan, Social Life, 34–35, and Dozy, Vêtements, 24–38.

otherwise, both as a child and as an adult." "Then how did your daughter[605] get pregnant?" asked Abū Jaʿfar. "She was still wed to Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan even though you swore to me that, by her being divorced and set free, you would not intrigue against me or join forces with an enemy [of mine]. You then come upon your daughter and find her with henna-dyed hands[606] and wearing perfume. Subsequently you see that she is pregnant, and yet her pregnancy does not alarm you. Certainly you are either a perjurer or a pimp! I swear by God that I'm of a mind to have her stoned." Muḥammad said, "As to the solemn oath I gave you, it remains incumbent upon me. If I had entered into any sort of deceit against you, I would certainly be aware of it. As for the aspersions that you have cast upon this poor girl, God has placed her above that by descent from the Messenger of God. When her pregnancy became visible, I assumed that her husband had cohabited with her at some time when we were not watching her carefully." Abū Jaʿfar was deeply angered by what he said and commanded that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's clothes be ripped off. His shirt was torn away from his waist wrapper and his private parts exposed. The caliph then commanded that he be given 150 lashes. The blows robbed him of all resistance while Abū Jaʿfar rebuked him, not confining himself to insinuations.[607] After one of the lashes struck his face, Muḥammad said to the caliph, "Woe betide you, stay away from my face; the Messenger of God has made it inviolable." At this Abū Jaʿfar urged on the whipper, saying, "[Go far] the head, the head." Muḥammad was thus beaten about the head some thirty blows. The caliph then called for a wooden yoke as long as Muḥammad was tall—Muḥammad was a tall man—and had it secured to his neck, with his hand being fastened to it as well. Then he sent him off thus trussed up. When he was brought forth from Abū Jaʿfar's chamber, one of his mawlās rushed up to him, saying, "You are as dear [177] to me as my father and my mother, should I not wrap you in my

605. Ṭabarī later, III, 178, gives her name as Ruqayyah.

606. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. khaḍaba. For women to have the backs of their hands dyed with henna is still a common festive practice throughout the Muslim world, particularly in anticipation of marriage.

607. Yaftarā ʿalayhi wa-lā yaknī. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV; Glossarium, s.v. kanā.

cloak?" "O yes," Muḥammad said, "you will be well recompensed. By God, the slits in my waist wrapper are harder for me to bear[608] than the beating that I sustained." The mawlā put his cloak around Muḥammad and took him to his imprisoned associates.

According to ʿUmar—al-Walīd b. Hishām—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUthmān—Muḥammad b. Hāshim b. al-Barīd, the mawlā of Muʿāwiyah: I was in al-Rabadhah at the time when the Ḥasanids were brought there bound in chains. With them was al-ʿUthmānī, looking as if he were fashioned of silver.[609] They were made to sit down, but it was not long before a man came out from Abū Jaʿfar's presence and said, "Where is Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿUthmānī?" Muḥammad stood up and went in. Within a short time we heard the crack of whips. At this Ayyūb b. Salamah al-Makhzūmī[610] said to his sons, "My sons, I see a man who has no mercy in his heart for anyone. Watch out for yourselves. Don't let a word escape you."[611]

Muḥammad was brought forth looking like a black (zanjī); the blows had changed the color of his complexion and made his blood run down. One of the lashes had struck an eye so that blood flowed from it. He was made to sit beside his brother, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan. Being thirsty, Muḥammad asked for a drink of water. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan thus said, "O my brethren, who will give a drink of water to the offspring of the Messenger of God?" But the people held back from him and would not give him a drink until finally a Khurāsānī came forward with water. He slipped it to Muḥammad, and Muḥammad drank. We waited for a little while longer until Abū Jaʿfar emerged riding in one side of a litter on a light-colored mule with al-Rabīʿ counterbalancing him in the litter on the right. ʿAbdallāh called out to him, "By God,

608. La-shuqūqu izarī ashaddu ʿalayya. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV.

609. I.e. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, who was known as "the Brocade." See note 592.

610. Ayyūb b. Salamah b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī was witness to the dismissal of ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān as governor of Medina during the caliphate of Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik and appears as a defendant in the financial allegations made against the Prophet's great-great-grandson Zayd b. ʿAlī by Khālid b. ʿAdballāh al-Qasrī (or by his son Yazīd), an Umayyad governor of Iraq. Ṭabarī, II, 1282, 1668–69.

611. Lā tusqiṭū bi-shayʾin. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. saqaṭa.

Abū Jaʿfar, we didn't treat your captives like this on the Day of Badr!" Abū Jaʿfar shooed him away, spitting at him[612] and passing on without stopping.

It is said that when Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿUthmānī en-[178] tered the presence of Abū Jaʿfar, the caliph questioned him about Ibrāhīm. "I know nothing of him," replied Muḥammad. At this Abū Jaʿfar hit him in the face with the mace (jurz).[613]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥarb: Abū Jaʿfar continued to have a good opinion of Muḥammad until Riyāḥ said to him, "Commander of the Faithful, the people of Khurāsān are your party and your supporters, whereas the people of Iraq are adherents of the family of Abū Ṭālib. As for the people of Syria, by God, in their eyes ʿAlī is nothing but an infidel, and they reckon nothing of any of his progeny. Yet Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr [b. ʿUthmān] is their brother; were he to call out the people of Syria, not a man of them would let him down." These words made a deep impression on Abū Jaʿfar. When he made the Pilgrimage, Muḥammad came to him and the caliph said, "Muḥammad, is your daughter not the wife of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan?" He said, "Yes, but I've had no dealings with him except at Minā[614] in the year such and such." The caliph asked, "Did you see your daughter when she had her hair dyed and dressed?" Muḥammad said that he had. "So she's an adulteress!" exclaimed the caliph. "Hold it, Commander of the Faithful!" said Muḥammad; "would you say such a thing about the daughter of your paternal uncle?" "You son of an uncircumcised woman!" retorted Abū Jaʿfar. "Which of my mothers was uncircumcised?" inquired Muḥammad. "You son of a whore!" exclaimed the caliph. Then he struck Muḥammad full face with the mace and knocked him out.[615] Ruqayyah, the daughter of

612. Wa-tafala ʿalayhi. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV; Glossarium, s.v. tafala.

613. Presumably a small ceremonial mace; a large one could kill, and was considered a most effective close-quarters weapon.

614. Minā is a site on the way from Mecca to ʿArafāt where the pilgrims gather to perform the rites of stoning and sacrifice. EI[1], s.v. (F. Buhl); EI[2], s.v. Ḥadjdj (B. Lewis).

615. Wa-ḥaddadahu. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV, and Glossarium, s.v. ḥadda. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 543 n. 1. interprets this emendation as shaqqa jildahu, i.e., "and broke his skin."

Muḥammad, was the wife of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan. Of her he says:

My friends of Qays, refrain from rebuke and sit down.
Does it gladden you that I sleep not but you can slumber?
I pass the night as if on fire with memories of Ruqayyah, like a live coal of ghaḍā wood flaming forth.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad—Sulaymān b. Dāwūd b. Ḥasan: On only one day did I see ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan truly distressed from any of the afflictions he sustained. That was because Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān's [179] camel started off while he was inattentive and unprepared. There was a chain on his feet and a yoke on his neck. He fell over, and the yoke became entangled in the litter. I saw him suspended by his neck, thrashing about, and at this I saw ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan weep bitterly.

According to Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mūsā—my father—his father:[616] When we reached al-Rabadhah, Abū Jaʿfar sent word to my father, saying, "Send me one of your family, knowing that he will never return to you." His brothers' sons rushed to him, offering themselves to him. My father praised their good intentions but said, "I would hate to afflict my brothers with the loss of you; Mūsā, you go." So I went, at that time being still young. When the caliph caught sight of me, he said, "May God make no eye refreshed by sight of you;[617] scourge him, slave." By God, I was beaten until I lost consciousness and was no longer aware of the beating. Finally, they stopped flogging me. The caliph asked for me to be brought near him. He came still closer and said, "Do you know what's happening to you? This is a deluge flowing from me. I have now emptied one unreturnable bucket of it. On its heels is death—or you can ransom yourself from it." "O Commander of the Faithful," I implored, "by God, I'm not to blame; truly I am on the sidelines of this affair." "Go away, then," he said, "and bring me your two brothers." I replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, you are going to send me to Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān, who will put spies and observers on to me. I won't be able to take any road without one of his messengers following me. Being well aware of that, my two brothers will flee from me!" The caliph therefore wrote to Riyāḥ informing him that he had no authority over Mūsā.

616. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan, a brother of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm.
617. Lā anʿama allāhu bika ʿaynan. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 230.

Mūsā continued: With me the caliph sent an armed escort with orders to keep him informed of my activities by letter. I reached Medina and stayed for several months at Dār Ibn Hishām[618] in al-Balāṭ. Riyāḥ, therefore, wrote to the caliph to say [180] that Mūsā was staying at Dār Ibn Hishām eagerly watching for the Commander of the Faithful's fortunes to change. His letter continued, "When you read this letter of mine, send Mūsā [directly] down to me,"[619] and the caliph did so.

According to Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Mūsā: My father sent word to Abū Jaʿfar, saying, "I am writing to Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, so send Mūsā, who may be able to effect a meeting with them." Their father then wrote to Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, telling them to come to him, while to me he said [privately]: "Tell them from me that on no account should they come." His sole purpose was to get me out of the caliph's power. He had a soft spot for me even though I was but the youngest of Hind's[620] offspring. This is what he sent to Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm:

O sons of Umayyah, I can do without you both.
What good is wealth now that I am trembling and exhausted?
O sons of Umayyah, if you two have no pity for my old age;
you and bereavement are but two of a kind.

I stayed in Medina with Abū Jaʿfar's messengers until Riyāḥ grew tired of my procrastination. He then wrote to Abū Jaʿfar about that, so the caliph had me sent down to him.

---

618. Ṭabarī later, III, 193, identifies this as the jail. See also Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 120; ʿAlī, "Topography of Medina," 81.

619. Fa-iḥdirhu ilayya. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV, and Glossarium, s.v. ḥadara.

620. Hind bt. Abī ʿUbaydah b. ʿAbdallāh, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan's wife and mother of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm.

According to ʿUmar—Yaʿqūb b. al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad—ʿImrān b. Muḥriz of the Banū al-Bakkāʾ:[621] The Ḥasanids were taken to al-Rabadhah. With them were ʿAlī and ʿAbdallāh, the two sons of Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan, whose mother was Ḥubābah bt. ʿĀmir b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Bishr b. ʿĀmir Mulāʿib al-Asinnah [the Spear-Juggler].[622] Ḥasan b. Ḥasan died in prison, as did ʿAbbās b. Ḥasan—whose mother was ʿĀʾishah bt. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh—ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan and Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan.

According to ʿUmar—al-Madāʾinī: When the Ḥasanids were taken forth, Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan said: [ʿUmar adds: "Someone other than Abū al-Ḥasan [i.e. al-Madāʾinī] had already recited this poem of Ghālib al-Hamadānī to me"]:[623] [181]

What you recall of ruins, of wastes, and of whether household members are far or near to you,
Is but foolishness when white hair has covered you with a color like cotton.
Fifty of your years have passed, as the counters would count for you if they reckon.
Distant is the memory of youth.[624] It is yours no longer.
Youth shall not come round to you again.
Worries have fallen upon me and worry has settled upon my pillow; my heart is shattered.
The people were taken out to misfortune, still I was made[625] for an age with a hump in its back.

---

621. Bakkāʾ b. ʿĀmir were a clan of ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah. They are mentioned when Ṭabarī, I, 2491, discusses the creation of al-Kūfah. Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, I, 107, II, 221.

622. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 196, identifies her as Umm ʿAbdallāh bt. ʿĀmir.

623. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 228, introduces this poem as follows: "In that which ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿAtakī recounted to me on the authority of his father, who received it from Abū Zayd [i.e., ʿUmar b. Shabbah], who, in turn, received it from al-Madāʾinī, Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh said, recalling his father and his family and their transportation and imprisonment." In setting this poem, I have followed the Leiden text's pattern, i.e., not breaking the hemistichs where they are not broken in the text.

624. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 545, and Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 228, read: fa-ʿaddi dhikra al-shabāb, "so abandon the memory of youth."

625. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 545, and Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 228, read: wa-khulliftu li-dahrin, "I was left behind for an age . . ."

It is awry; the ignoble find it sweet.
And [even] the noble find it distasteful when they drink.[626]
My life here has been given for a hank of white hair and a shinbone, scarred from its shackles.
Well-born[627] lords were among his sons but in his case no regard was had to God or lineage.
O links of the chain, what mercy and kindness you contain[628] are tarnished by [his] high degree.
Female forebears from the noblest strains, fair, sensible and loving, have kept you pure.
What can be my excuse before God when the fine, "wondrous" swords were not unsheathed for you?
Nor did I lead a massed raid, for which the daughters of the pure-born were selected.[629]
The fleetest steeds and the spearheads with sharp points on them
To recompense the Banū Nutaylah[630] in just measure for the measure they have milked.
Murder for murder; and for the captive in bonds,
[there shall be] captives, shackled, bereft.
The family of the Messenger Aḥmad have become, among men, like one mangy with scabs on him.
[182] Woe betide them for what their blades have committed.
O, what a lifeline from a people they have cut off!
And with what a strand have they betrayed the King[631]
Tied with a promise, while its knots are lies!

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Rāshid b. Yazīd—al-Jarrāḥ b. ʿUmar, Khāqān b. Zayd, and others of his associates: When they brought ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan and his family in shackles and stood with 626. Wa-yajtawīhi al-kirāmu in sharibū. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV.

627. Wa-al-sādata al-ghurra. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV.
628. Ironically.
629. Banātu al-ṣarīḥi tuntakhabu. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIV.
630. See note 476.
631. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 229, reads: wa-ayyu ʿahdin khānū al-ilāhu bihi.

them before al-Najaf,[632] ʿAbdallāh said to his family, "Don't you know of anyone in this town who could defend us from this tyrant?" The two sons of Ḥayy,[633] al-Ḥasan[634] and ʿAlī, met him wrapped so as to conceal two swords. They said to ʿAbdallāh, "We have come to you, son [i.e., descendant] of the Messenger of God; command us to do what you want." "You have done your duty," ʿAbdallāh replied, "but you cannot prevail against these [people]." With this they went away.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿImrān b. Abī Farwah: Abū Jaʿfar ordered Abū al-Azhar to imprison the Ḥasanids at al-Hāshimiyyah.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm: The Ḥasanids were brought before Abū Jaʿfar. He took a look at Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan and asked, "Are you the 'Younger Brocade'?"[635] When Muḥammad said that he was, the caliph exclaimed, "By God, you I shall kill as I have killed no other member of your family." Then he ordered a column that had been built to be split apart. Muḥammad was put inside and was built over while still living.

According to Muḥamad b. al-Ḥasan—al-Zubayr b. Bilāl: People would frequently visit Muḥammad simply to gaze at his beauty.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿImrān—Abū al-Azhar: ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan said to me, "Try to get a cupper (ḥajjām)[636] for

---

632. Al-Najaf is a town just southwest of al-Kūfah and is a major Shīʿī pilgrimage site. The tomb of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib is an important monument, despite some differences in the early sources about his place of burial. *EI*², s.v. al-Nadjaf (E. Honigmann); Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 271–72.

633. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 526, gives this as "the two sons of his brother." An alternative version is provided by Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 295, where al-Ḥasan and ʿAlī are identified as the sons of Ṣāliḥ. Ibn Saʿd, al-Ṭabaqāt al-kubrā, VI, 400, records an ʿAlī b. Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥayy.

634. Ṭabarī, III, 2526, mentions al-Ḥasan b. Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥayy in the obituary list for the year 161/777–78. He was the father-in-law of ʿĪsā b. Zayd b. ʿAlī, whom he concealed after Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm's death. Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 204.

635. Ibrāhīm's edition VII, 546, reflects Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm's more common sobriquet "the Golden Brocade," but the one given here may have been used to distinguish him from his relative, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān, who was known simply as "the Brocade," or it may be a scribal confusion of fā' and ghayn.

636. Cupping involved drawing blood to the surface of the body by application of a heated glass vessel.

me; I am in dire need of one." I therefore asked permission of the [183] Commander of the Faithful, who said, "Bring him an eminent cupper."

According to ʿUmar—Abū Nuʿaym al-Faḍl b. Dukayn:[637] Thirteen of the Ḥasanids were imprisoned. Al-ʿUthmānī and two of his sons were imprisoned with them in Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah,[638] which was east of al-Kūfah in the area that lies toward Baghdad. The first of them to die was Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan, then ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan. The latter was buried near the place where he died, perhaps not in the tomb that people claim as his, but close to it.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥarb: Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr was imprisoned near Abū Jaʿfar, who was aware of his innocence. However, Abū ʿAwn[639] eventually wrote from Khurāsān to inform the Commander of the Faithful "that the people of Khurāsān are avoiding me; the matter of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh has gone on too long for their liking." At that, Abū Jaʿfar ordered Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr to be beheaded and sent his head to Khurāsān, swearing to them that it was the head of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, who was descended from Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Messenger of God.

According to ʿUmar—al-Walīd b. Hishām—his father: When Abū Jaʿfar went to al-Kūfah, he said, "I cannot vent my anger enough upon this vile member of a vile house." He summoned Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh [b. ʿAmr] and asked, "Did you marry your daughter to ʿAbdallāh's son?" "No," said Muḥammad. The caliph continued, "But is she not his wife?" "Yes," he said, "her 637. Abū Nuʿaym al-Faḍl b. Dukayn al-Mulāʾī (d. 219/834) was a historian and muḥaddith who lived in al-Kūfah and transmitted considerable information about Ṭālibids and ʿAlids. *EI*², s.v. (F. Rosenthal); Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 142–57; Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography, 278.

638. Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah was a city founded by Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah that lies midway between Baghdad and al-Kūfah. Lassner cites this mention in Ṭabarī as an instance in which Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah has been mistakenly identified with Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah. Both Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 526, and Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 225, give the same place name. *EI*², s.v. (J. Lassner) and s.v. al-Hāshimiyya; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 287; Lassner, Shaping, 151–58.

639. Abū ʿAwn ʿAbd al-Malik b. Yazīd al-Khurāsānī was an important commander in the service of the ʿAbbāsid revolutionaries. He then served as governor of Egypt and of Khurāsān. Although he was dismissed from the latter position by al-Mahdī, he was allowed to intercede with the caliph on behalf of his son, ʿAbdallāh b. Abī ʿAwn. Ṭabarī, III, 477, 536–37; *EI*², s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Zambaur, Manuel, 24, 48.

uncle and his father, i.e. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, contracted the marriage between them, and I gave my consent to his consummation of the marriage." The caliph then asked, "What about the assurances that you gave me?" "I am bound by them," replied Muḥammad. The caliph said, "Didn't you become aware of the dyeing with henna? Didn't you perceive the fragrance of perfume?" Muḥammad answered, "I have no knowledge of that. People knew what contractual obligations I have toward you, so that they kept all such things from me." The caliph said, "Would you like to ask me to release you from your obligations, so that I will discharge you and you can renew corresponding pledges to me?" [184] Muḥammad replied, "I have not broken my pledges, for you to reimpose them upon me. I have done nothing for which I should ask you to release me from my oath, so as to have you release me from it." At this the caliph ordered him to be beaten to death. Then he had his head severed and sent to Khurāsān. When ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan heard about that, he said, " 'We are God's and to him is our return'. By God, although we were safe with him in the time of their [Umayyad] authority, Muḥammad has been killed with us in the time of our [Hāshimī] authority."[640]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—Miskīn b. ʿAmr: When Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan came out in open revolt, Abū Jaʿfar ordered Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr's beheading and then sent it [his head] to Khurāsān. Together with him he sent leading men who would swear by God that it was indeed Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, descended from Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Messenger of God.

According to ʿUmar: I asked Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. Ibrāhīm why Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr was killed. He replied, "There was a need for his head."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥarb: ʿAwn b. Abī ʿAwn[641] succeeded his father as doorkeeper for the Commander of the Faithful. When Muḥamad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan was actually killed, Abū Jaʿfar sent his head off to Abū ʿAwn in Khurāsān. With the head he dispatched Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī al-

640. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr was a direct descendant of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān. Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 202.

641. For his father, see note 639.

Karrām[642] and ʿAwn b. Abī ʿAwn. When the head arrived there, the people of Khurāsān were suspicious and said, "Was he not killed once before and his head brought to us?" Then the story became clear to them, so that they realized what had really happened. People thereafter used to say, "Abū Jaʿfar was never known to have uttered any lie other than this."

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿImrān b. Abī Farwah: Al-Shaʿbānī and I used to visit Abū al-Azhar when [185] we were in al-Hāshimiyyah. Now Abū Jaʿfar would write to him, saying, "From ʿAbdallāh, the servant of God, the Commander of the Faithful to Abū al-Azhar, his mawlā." Abū al-Azhar would write to Abū Jaʿfar, "From Abū al-Azhar, his mawlā and devoted servant." One day when we were with him—Abū Jaʿfar had given him leave for three days, during which time Abū al-Azhar did not function in his official capacity,[643] and we were alone with him on those days—a letter from Abū Jaʿfar came to him. Abū al-Azhar read it and tossed it aside. He then went off to see those of the Ḥasanids who were imprisoned. I reached for the letter and read it. In it the caliph had said, "Abū al-Azhar, do what I ordered you to do with Mudallah.[644] Be quick about it and discharge the matter." Al-Shaʿbānī read the letter and said, "Do you know who Mudallah is?" "No," I replied. "By God," al-Shaʿbānī said, "it's ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan. Watch what Abū al-Azhar does." We did not have long to wait before Abū al-Azhar came and sat down, saying, "By God, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan has perished." After a little while longer he went back in and then came out again looking downcast. "Tell me," he said, "about ʿAlī b. Ḥasan. What kind of man is he?" "Do you think that I'm a truthful man?" I asked. Al-Shaʿbānī replied, "Yes and more than that." "By God," I said, "he is the best of those whom this [earth] supports and this [heaven] overshadows."[645]

---

642. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī al-Karrām b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar. He is later ordered by ʿĪsā b. Mūsā to identify Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh's head. See p. 289.

643. Thalātha ayyāmin lā yanūbuhā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. nāba.

644. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. daliha, for its application to ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan as signifying one who is out of his mind with sorrow.

645. Khayru man tuqilluhu hādhihi wa-tuẓilluhu hādhihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. qalla. Another famous use of this expression is the statement often quoted from the first caliph, Abū Bakr: "What earth would bear me up, what heaven would overshadow me, were I to speak about the Qurʾān what I know not?" Ṭabarī, Jāmiʿ al-bayān, I, 78.

"Well," replied Abū al-Azhar, "he's gone."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—his grandfather, Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh: In prison we were aware of the appointed times for ritual prayer only because ʿAlī b. Ḥasan kept reciting short portions (aḥzāb, sing. ḥizb)[646] [of the Qurʾān].

According to ʿUmar—Ibn ʿĀʾishah[647]—a mawlā of the Banū Dārim:[648] I said to Bashīr al-Raḥḥāl,[649] "Why are you in such a hurry to revolt against this man?" Bashīr answered, "After arresting ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, Abū Jaʿfar sent for me, so I came to him. One day he ordered me to go into a certain house, which I did. There I beheld the corpse of ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan and fell in a dead faint. When I regained consciousness, I gave God my [solemn] word that no two swords would clash over the caliph's without my being on the side of the one against him. To the messenger who was with me as his representatives I said, "Don't tell Abū Jaʿfar what I witnessed;[650] if he finds out about it, he will kill me.' " [186]

According to ʿUmar: I told Hishām b. Ibrāhīm b. Hishām b. Rāshid,[651] a person from Hamadhān, the one known as "al-ʿAbbāsī," that Abū Jaʿfar had ordered ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan to be killed. Hishām swore by God that the caliph had not done so. Rather he had sent a secret message to ʿAbdallāh stating that Muḥammad had come forth in open revolt and had been killed. At this ʿAbdallāh's heart was broken, and he died.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh: One of the Ḥasanids who survived said that they were given poison[652] to drink and

646. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXV, revises this to Aḥzāb, the title of the thirty-third sūrah. This sūrah, which begins in the middle of the forty-second ḥizb, is slightly under one-and-a-quarter aḥzāb in length. The aḥzāb divisions, however, each of which is one-sixtieth of the Qurʾān, may be comparatively recent. EI[1] and EI[2], s.v. Ḥizb (D. B. Macdonald).

647. ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ al-Taymī. See note 446.

648. Dārim b. Mālik were a clan of Tamīm. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 59, II, 231.

649. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXV. Madelung, Al-Qāsim und die Zaiditen, 73, identifies him as a Muʿtazilī ascetic. He fell in the battle at Bākhamrā, i.e., the defeat of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh by ʿĪsā b. Mūsa. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 339–41.

650. Lā takhburhu bimā laqītu. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXV.

651. Al-Hamadhānī al-ʿAbbāsī.

652. Kānū yusqūna al-samma. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXV.

that they all died except Sulaymān and ʿAbdallāh, the sons of Dāwūd b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan; Isḥāq and Ismāʿīl, the sons of Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan; and Jaʿfar b. Ḥasan.[653] All[654] of them who were killed were murdered only after Muḥammad's open rebellion.

ʿĪsā also said: A woman who was a mawlā of the Ḥasan family looked at Jaʿfar b. Ḥasan and said, "By my soul, how well Abū Jaʿfar understands men, in that he let you go free but had ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan killed!"

The Remaining Account of Events for 144[655]

Among these events was Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr's transport of the descendants of Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī from Medina to Iraq.

The Reason [Abū Jaʿfar] Had [the Descendants of Ḥasan] Transported to Iraq

According to al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad[656]—Muḥammad b.
[187] Saʿd[657]—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: When Abū Jaʿfar appointed Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī as governor of Medina, he ordered him to search strenuously for Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, not to treat them as of minor importance [as former governors had].

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Mawālī: Riyāḥ vigorously pressed the search for them, showing 653. Jaʿfar b. Ḥasan had earlier been a litigant in the dispute between the Ḥasanids and the Ḥusaynids over the guardianship of the endowments (wuqūf) of ʿAlī. Ṭabarī, II, 1671–73.

654. Kullu man qutila minhum. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXV.

655. The Leiden text's editor, M. T. Houtsma, notes that this concluding section of year 144 is missing from the Algiers manuscript and in the Berlin manuscript has been placed at the end of the year 145.

656. Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad b. Abī Usāmah Dāhir al-Tamīmī (d. 282/895) was a Baghdādī historian and traditionist. GAS, I, 160; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, VIII, 218–19; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 260–61; Dhahabī, Siyar, XIII, 388–90.

657. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Manīʿ (d. 230/845), a mawlā of the Banū Hāshim, was a Baghdādī traditionist and author of Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt al-kubrā. He served as secretary (kātib) for Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī. *EI*², s.v. Ibn Saʿd (J. W. Fück); al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, V, 321–22.

no leniency.[658] He used all means at his disposal in that effort, with the result that Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm became fearful and began to move about from place to place. Increasingly concerned with his desire to lay hands on them, Abū Jaʿfar wrote ordering Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān to seize their father, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, as well as his brothers, Ḥasan b. Ḥasan, Dāwūd b. Ḥasan, Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan, and Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān. This last mentioned was their brother by their mother, Fāṭimah bt. Ḥusayn. He was also to seize several others of the Banū Ḥasan, to shackle them, and to send them to the caliph in al-Rabadhah, for in this year Abū Jaʿfar had made the Pilgrimage.[659] He also wrote telling Riyāḥ that he should seize me along with the others. Riyāḥ, therefore, sent me to the caliph as well. Having just begun the Pilgrimage, I was overtaken, arrested, cast in irons, and carried off on a back road[660] until I came to them in al-Rabadhah.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: I saw ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan and his family being led forth from the Dār Marwān after the late-afternoon prayer. They were in irons and were transported in uncushioned litters. At that time I had already reached physical maturity, so I remember what I saw.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Mawālī: About 400 men from Juhaynah, Muzaynah[661] and other tribes were arrested with the Banū Ḥasan. I saw them in al-Rabadhah, standing in the sun with their hands bound behind their backs. I was imprisoned with ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan and his family when Abū Jaʿfar came to al-Rabadhah after coming from the Pilgrimage. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan requested Abū Jaʿfar's permission to enter his presence. Abū Jaʿfar, however, refused and did not [188] see ʿAbdallāh until he had left this world. Then Abū Jaʿfar summoned me from among the others, and I was allowed to sit until I was brought into the caliph's presence. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī was with the

658. Lam yudāhin can also mean that he made no effort to dissemble or to mask his activities.

659. See p. 122 for the caliph's pilgrimage route.

660. Wa-ʿūrida bī al-ṭarīqu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿaraḍa.

661. Muzaynah is reckoned genealogically among the subdivisions of Khindif. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 88, II, 439; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 201.

caliph, and upon seeing me he said, "Yes, Commander of the Faithful, he is the one. If you are forceful with him, he will tell you where they are." I greeted him with a "Peace be with you," but Abū Jaʿfar said, "May God grant you no peace! Where are those two reprobates, the sons of a reprobate, those two deceivers, the sons of a deceiver?" I replied, "Will the truth avail me anything in your eyes, Commander of the Faithful?" "What do you mean?" he said. "May my wife be repudiated and other evils befall me if I know where they are!"[662] Not accepting that from me, he called for the lashes. I was made to stand between two flogging poles [ʿuqābān][663] while he had me beaten 400 times. I was not conscious of the lashing until it was over, having been carried senseless to my associates. The caliph then sent for al-Dībāj, i.e., Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, whose daughter was the wife of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan. When Muḥammad was brought before him, Abū Jaʿfar said, "Inform me about those two deceivers, what they have done, where they are." "By God, Commander of the Faithful," Muḥammad answered, "I have no knowledge of them." At this the caliph retorted, "You had better give me information!" Muḥammad responded, "I have already told you—and by God, I am a truth-speaking man—previously I did have information about them, but today, I swear I know nothing of them." The caliph ordered him to be stripped. This was done, and he was given 100 lashes. An iron collar linking his hand to his neck[664] was fastened on him. When his whipping was finished, he was taken away, and a shirt of his made of pure white linen[665] was put on him over the effects of the beating. He was brought to us thus clothed and, by God, because of the shirt's sticking to the blood, they could not get it off him without milking a ewe over it. Then the shirt was stripped off, and they tended to him.

Abū Jaʿfar said, "Take them down to Iraq," so we were brought to al-Hāshimiyyah and confined there. The first of those who died in prison was ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan. The jailer came and said, "The 662. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. in, for this substitution of the third person for the first.

663. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿaqaba, and Lane, Lexicon, V, 2103.

664. Jāmiʿatu ḥadīdin. Lane, Lexicon, II, 458.

665. Qamīṣun qūhiyyun. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. qāha.

one among you most closely related to him should come forth and pray for him." His brother, Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī [189] went out and prayed for him. Then Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān died. His head was taken, and the caliph sent it to Khurāsān, accompanied by a group of the shīʿah. They made the rounds of the districts of Khurāsān, and began to swear by God that "this is the head of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, descendant of Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Messenger of God."[666] Thus they led the people to suppose it to be the head of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, the one whose revolt against Abū Jaʿfar they kept hearing about.

In this year the governor of Mecca was al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh, the governor of Medina was Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān al-Murrī, and the governor of al-Kūfah was ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah was the governor of al-Baṣrah, while its judiciary was headed by Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh. The governor of Egypt was Yazīd b. Ḥātim.

---

666. Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn was the mother, by different fathers, of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr and of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan.

The Events of the Year

145

(April 1, 762–March 20, 763)

Among the events of this year was the revolt of Muhammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan in Medina and, later, the revolt of his brother, Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh in al-Baṣrah, and their eventual murders.[667]

The Rebellion of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and His Murder

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: When Abū Jaʿfar had the Ḥasanids brought down [to al-Rabadhah], Riyāḥ went back to Medina and pressed on with the search, narrowing in on Muḥammad until the latter decided to come out in open revolt.

According to ʿUmar: I recounted to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Jaʿfarī[668] that Muḥammad had felt hemmed in and 667. Additional sources: Fragmenta historicorum, I, 235–50; Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 449; Ibn Qutaybah, al-Maʿārif, 378; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 381; Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 452–53; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 181–94; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 189; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 529–54, Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 165–67; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 82–96; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 404–17.

668. A descendant of Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib.

therefore rebelled before the time that he had settled upon with his brother Ibrāhīm. Ibrāhīm [b. Muḥammad] denied this version and said, "Muḥammad remained the object of such an intensive search that his son tumbled down [the mountainside] and died, a [190] search that bore down on him to the point that he lowered himself into one of the wells in Medina [ostensibly] to draw water for his associates. He was plunged into it up to his head, but his body, which was bulky, could not be completely concealed. Even so, Ibrāhīm [b. ʿAbdallāh] postponed his timing because he was smitten with smallpox."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: The people of Medina were [all] discussing Muḥammad's uprising. We were in such a hurry to buy food that some people sold their wives' ornaments [to do so]. Riyāḥ heard that Muḥammad had come to al-Madhād[669] so he rode out toward there at the head of his army. Muḥammad had, in fact, left for al-Madhād before Riyāḥ, together with Jubayr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Sulamī, Jubayr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Yaʿqūb b. ʿAṭāʾ,[670] and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Aslamī. But they overheard a water carrier tell her mistress that Riyāḥ had ridden out to al-Madhād in search of Muḥammad and that he had already reached the marketplace. Muḥammad's supporters, therefore, entered a house belonging to one of the Juhaynah, barring its door against Riyāḥ's men. Riyāḥ passed right by the door without realizing that they were inside and then returned to the Dār Marwān. When it was time for the last evening prayer, Muḥammad said the prayer in the house rather than going out.[671]

Some sources say that it was Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Sabrah[672] of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy[673] who informed Riyāḥ about Muḥammad.

According to al-Faḍl b. Dukayn—a source: I heard that ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAmr b. Abī Dhuʾayb and ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b.

669. Al-Madhād is a site where the Prophet Muḥammad had a trench dug during the siege of Medina in 8/627. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 88.

670. Van Arendonk, Les débuts 313 = Opkomst, 286, identifies this Jubayr with the Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAṭāʾ b. Yaʿqūb mentioned in the list of Muḥammad's supporters cited by Ṭabarī, III, 259–60.

671. Or this could be Riyāḥ praying in the Dār Marwān?

672. Alternatively, b. Abī Samrah, following Ṭabarī, Indices.

673. For mention of this Qurashī subgroup in the genealogy of the Prophet Muḥammad, see Ṭabarī, I, 1101–2. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 4, 27, II, 160.

Jaʿfar[674] came to see Muḥammad before his uprising and said to him, "Why are you waiting to come out in open revolt?[675] By God, in this community we find no one more ill-fated for it than you. What keeps you from coming out in revolt on your own?"

[191] According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Riyāḥ sent for us, so I came to him along with Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn,[676] Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī,[677] ʿAlī b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī,[678] and other leading men of Quraysh, including Ismāʿīl b. Ayyūb b. Salmah b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah, whose son Khālid was with him. While with Riyāḥ in the Dār Marwān, we heard the cry Allāhu akbar, the sound of which overwhelmed everything else. We assumed that it was coming from the guardsmen's quarters, whereas they assumed that it was coming from the Dār. Ibn Muslim b. ʿUqbah,[679] who was also with Riyāḥ, jumped up and leaned upon his sword, exclaiming, "Do what I tell you with these people and cut off their heads!" ʿAlī b. ʿUmar cried, "By God, this very night we're on the verge of being destroyed!" which prompted Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī to stand up and say, "What's that to you? We must act with loyalty and obedience." At this point Riyāḥ and Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz rose and went into a cu-

674. Abū Saʿd ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. (Abī) al-Ḥakam b. Rāfiʿ (d. 153/770) was a respected traditionist known for his Qadarī views, but whose support of Muḥammad's uprising was deplored by such as Sufyān al-Thawrī. Muḥammad assigned him duties that included bearing his lance and heading his police forces. Ṭabarī, III, 292, later identifies him as a servant to Abū al-ʿAbbās. Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 20–22; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, 101–2; Caskel, Ǧamharat annasab, I, 195, II, 124; Ṭabarī, III, 193, 199.

675. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 553, has this as "Why are we . . ."

676. I.e., Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq.

677. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn, known as "The Younger Ḥusayn," was the brother of Muḥammad al-Bāqir, the fifth imām, and was regarded as a trustworthy traditionist, quoted by al-Tirmidhī and al-Nisāʾī. He died toward the end of the 150s. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XII, 429–30; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 299.

678. The grandson and great-grandson of ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn, Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, respectively. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XXI, 348.

679. Ibn Muslim b. ʿUqbah was probably a descendant of Muslim b. ʿUqbah al-Murrī, the aged Syrian commander who quelled an anti-Ummayyad rebellion in Medina during the caliphate of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah. He died in 64/683, on his way to Mecca to fight the anticaliph ʿAbdallāh b. Zubayr. Ṭabarī, II, 409–27; EI[1] s.v. (H. Lammens).

pola (junbudh)[680] in the Dār Yazīd.[681] They stayed out of sight there while we got up and left by way of the Dār ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān, continuing to the point where we had to scale a dung heap (kiban)[682] in the alley of ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr.[683] Ismāʿīl b. Ayyūb said to his son Khālid, "O my son, by God, I can't make this jump by myself, so lift me up." This his son did.

According to Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿImrān—his father: While Riyāḥ was in the Dār Marwān, news reached him that Muḥammad was coming out in open revolt that very night. He sent for my brother, Muḥammad b. ʿImrān, for al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. al-ʿAbbās, and for several others. My brother went and I went with him, and we entered Riyāḥ's presence after the final evening prayer. We offered him our salutations, but he did not answer us. We sat down, and my brother said, "How is the Amīr—may God prosper him—this evening?" "Fine," Riyāḥ answered in a subdued voice. Then he [192] was silent for a long time. Eventually he roused himself and said, "You people of Medina, the Commander of the Faithful has been seeking the object of his quest in the East of the earth and in the West while he has lived in hiding among you![684] I swear by God, if he comes forth in open rebellion, I shall not leave a single one of you with his head on his shoulders!" My brother said, "May God prosper you. I will be your surety[685] for him; this, by God, is false!" To this Riyāḥ responded, "You have the largest number of kinfolk of anyone here, and you are the qāḍī of the Commander 680. Arabicized form of Persian gunbad(h) or gumbad(h). Steingass, Persian-English Dictionary, 1099; Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v.

681. For Medina, Ṭabarī, Indices, 706, mentions both a Dār Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik and a Dār Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah. Later in the narrative of this year, III, 267, he cites both the Dār Marwān and the Dār Yazīd as army food depots.

682. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. kabā.

683. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr of the Banū Tamīm was both a cavalry soldier and a poet who fought with Khālid b. al-Walīd in the conquest of Iraq. Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 378; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, III, 248–49. See also Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 111.

684. Bayna aẓhurikum. According to Lane, Lexicon, V, 1928, the expression carries the implication of staying among a people for the purpose of seeking aid of them, i.e., "as though it meant that the back of one of them was before him, and that of another behind him, so that he was defended in either direction." Muḥammad replies to this implication in his mosque oration on pp. 152–53. See also Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. nafaqa.

685. Ana gharīruka minhum. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXV, and Glossarium, s.v. gharra.

of the Faithful. Go summon your kinfolk." My brother jumped up to leave, but Riyāḥ told him to sit down and said, "Thābit, you go."[686] So I rose quickly and sent word to the Banū Zuhrah,[687] who live in Ḥashsh Ṭalḥah,[688] Dār Saʿd, and Dār Banū Azhar, that they should ready their weapons. Various of them presented themselves. Ibrāhīm b. Yaʿqūb b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ,[689] who was one of the finest shots, came with a bow slung over his shoulder. When I saw what a large number they were, I entered Riyāḥ's presence and said, "Here are the Banū Zuhrah with their weapons, now with you, so give them permission to enter." "How absurd!" said Riyāḥ; "Do you intend to bring armed men into my presence at night?[690] Tell them to sit in the courtyard, and that if anything happens, they should fight." I therefore said to them, "He has refused to admit you. No, by God, there is nothing [for us] here! So sit down with us, and we will discuss matters."

We stayed for a little while, and then al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith left leading a contingent of cavalry to patrol as far as the top of al-Thaniyyah[691] He then went to his house and bolted it behind him. I tell you, we were in this very situation when two horsemen appeared from the direction of al-Zawrāʾ,[692] galloping to a halt between the Dār ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ[693] and Raḥbat al-

686. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿImrān was known as Ibn Abī Thābit al-Zuhrī. See note 407.

687. Banū Zuhrah b. Kilāb were a branch of Quraysh. *EI*² s.v. Ḳuraysh (W. Montgomery Watt); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 20, II, 611; Watt, Muḥammad at Mecca, 5–8; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 128–35.

688. In his entry on Ḥashsh Kawkab, Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 262, refers to this site, which means "Ṭalḥah's Garden," as simply another place in Medina. Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 112, associates this with Ṭalḥah b. Abī Ṭalḥah, i.e., ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Dār. Ṭabarī, I, 1386.

689. His great-grandfather Abū Waqqāṣ Mālik b. Uhayb b. ʿAbd Manāf was a cousin of the Prophet Muḥammad's mother, Āminah bt. Wahb b. ʿAbd Manāf. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 20; *EI*² s.v. Āmina (W. Montgomery Watt).

690. Ṭurūqan. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ṭaraqa.

691. Thaniyyat al-Wadāʿ, the "farewell promontory," was a mountain exit from the city of Medina on the road to Mecca, a spot from which travelers could take a final look at the city they were leaving. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 86; Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. thanā.

692. Al-Zawrāʾ was the area from which ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān's house took its name. Ṭabarī, I, 2827, notes its construction in 28/648–49. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 156; Lecker, "Markets of Medina," 142–46; ʿAlī, "Topography of Medina," 88.

693. ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ, a Qurashī of the Banū Adī, first appears in Ṭabarī offering advice to al-Ḥusayn b. Abī Ṭālib but is best remembered as Ibn al-Zubayr's

Qaḍā',[694] at the place of drawing water. We said [to each other], "By God, haste is the evil here."[695]

Then we heard sound in the distance, so we stayed there for a long night. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh approached from al-Madhād along with 250[696] men. As he entered upon the [divergence] of the [193]
Banū Salimah[697] and the Buṭḥān roads, he said, "Go by the way of the Banū Salimah so that you may be safe, God willing."[698] We heard a cry of Allāhu akbar, but then the sound died away. He drew closer until, having emerged from the alley of Ibn Ḥubayn,[699] he went deep into the marketplace as far as the date-sellers' area and passed through the basket-sellers' area. From there he reached the prison, which in those days was in the Dār Ibn Hishām, and breached it, releasing those who were there. Then he advanced until, when he was between the Dār Yazīd and the Dār Uways, we truly saw a terrifying sight.

Ibrāhīm b. Yaʿqūb alighted, unslung his quiver, and said, "Should I shoot?" but we told him not to. Muḥammad made a circle of the courtyard until he came to the Dār ʿĀtikah bt. Yazīd.[700] He sat down at its door while the people were skirmishing until a man of Sind was killed as he began his morning observance in the mosque. It was one of Muḥammad's partisans who killed him.

According to ʿUmar—Saʿd[701] b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar—Jahm b. ʿUthmān: Muḥammad left al-Madhād riding on a donkey, and governor in al-Kūfah at the time of al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd's uprising there. Ṭabarī, II, 232, 598–638.

---

694. Raḥbat al-Qaḍā' was the name of a mosque in Medina and of the neighborhood around it. Ṭabarī, I, 2792.

695. Sharru al-amri wa-allāhu jiddun.

696. The number is given as 150 in Fragmenta historicorum, I, 238, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 530.

697. Salimah b. Saʿd were a clan of the Khazraj tribe and were remembered for being among the earliest supporters of Muḥammad in Medina. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 174–76; Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 594 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 879; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 190, II, 508; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 358–59.

698. The statement is a play of words on Salimah and the root SLM, which carries connotations of peace and safety.

699. Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 118.

700. ʿĀtikah bt. Yazīd was the daughter of the second Umayyad caliph, Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, wife of the fifth, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, and mother of the ninth, Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. Ṭabarī, II, 1174; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 552–53.

701. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVI.

we accompanied him. He appointed Khawwāt b. Bukayr b. Khawwāt b. Jubayr[702] to head the foot soldiers and put ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar in charge of the [commander's] lance, saying, "Take care of it for me." ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd carried it, but then he asked to be released from doing so. Muḥammad released him and sent him off with his son, Ḥasan b. Muḥammad.[703]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Rukānah: Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh sent his brother two loads of swords, which Muḥammad stored in al-Madhād. He sent for us on the night he made his uprising, and we were not even 100 [194] strong. Muḥammad rode a bedouin donkey with a black coat. Two roads diverged from there, the Buṭḥān road and the Banū Salimah road. We asked him which one we should take, and he said, "On the Banū Salimah road God will keep you safe." We continued on until we reached the Marwān Gate.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Zanbīl b. Nahshal,[704] one of the Banū Yarbūʿ[705]—Abū ʿAmr al-Madīnī—a Qurashī shaykh:[706] The heavens beat down upon us for days in Medina. When the downpour subsided, toward the end of it I went out to feel the rain, removing myself some distance from Medina.[707] In fact, I was resting against my saddle when a man came upon me, seemingly out of nowhere, and sat down beside me. He was wearing filthy, ragged clothes and a tattered turban. I asked him, "Where have you come from?" "From a little flock I own," he replied; "I gave orders to its shepherd about something

---

702. Khawwāt b. Bukayr was a descendant of one of the Anṣārī horsemen who fought at the side of the Prophet at the battle of Badr. According to al-Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIII, 426, he died in 40/660 at the age of ninety-four. Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 443, 453 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 660, 675.

703. Abū al-Zift al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan's wine drinking was later an indirect cause of the insurrection in Medina that al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī mounted during the reign of the caliph Mūsā al-Hādī. Ṭabarī, III, 552–60; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, Ṣāḥib Fakhkh (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

704. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVI. The Indices also suggests "b. Ratbīl" and makes a tentative identification with Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿAbbās al-Bāhilī (d. 249/863). GAS, I, 20, 29, 79.

705. Yarbūʿ b. Ḥanẓalah was a clan of Tamīm. *EI*¹, s.v. Yarbūʿ (G. Levi della Vida); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 59, II, 591.

706. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVI.

707. Kharajtu fī ghibbihā mutamaṭṭiran fa-intasaytu ʿan al-Madīnah. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. maṭara and nasaʾa; Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVI.

I needed and then came on here, heading for my people." ʿUmar continued: I couldn't start down the road of any field of knowledge without his anticipating and even outdoing me[708] there. I began to be overcome by admiration of him and what he brought, so I said, "What people do you belong to?" "The Muslims," he replied. "Of course," I said, "but from which group of them are you?" "No need for you to continue,"[709] he replied. "But that's precisely what I must do," I insisted. "Now who are you?" At this he jumped up and said:

In tattered shoes he suffers sore feet [continuing to the end of the three verses [quoted earlier].][710]

Then he turned and left. But, by God, hardly had he vanished from my sight than I regretted losing him before I had any knowledge of him. So I went after him to question him further, but it was as if the earth had closed over him. At this point I returned to my saddle and went on to Medina. But a day and a night passed before I witnessed the dawn ritual prayer in Medina, and there was a man leading us in prayer whose voice I recognized. He recited, "We have indeed made for you a clear victory."[711] When he finished he ascended the minbar, and who should it be but my [195] acquaintance, who was, in fact, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan.

According to ʿUmar—Ismāʿīl b. Ibrāhīm b. Hūd, a mawlā of Quraysh—Ismāʿīl b. al-Ḥakam b. ʿAwānah[712]—a man he named from whom he heard a similar story: Ismāʿīl said, "I told it to a man of al-Anbār whose patronymic was Abū ʿUbayd. He mentioned that Muḥammad or Ibrāhīm had dispatched a man from the Banū Ḍabbah[713]—according to what Ismāʿīl b. Ibrāhīm b. Hūd

708. Wa-katharanī fīhi. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCXXXVI, and Glossarium, s.v. kathura.

709. Lā ʿalayka allā tazīda. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿalā.

710. P. 115.

711. Qurʾān 48:1

712. Ismāʿīl b. al-Ḥakam b. ʿAwānah was a descendant of Abū al-Ḥakam ʿAwānah b. al-Ḥakam b. ʿIyāḍ (d. 147/764), a blind Kūfan historian and genealogist who is credited with works on Muʿāwiyah and the Umayyads. *EI*², s.v. ʿAwānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī (Saleh El-Ali); Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 93; GAS, I, 307–8.

713. Ḍabbah b. Udd were an important Arab tribe who formed part of the Ribāb confederacy. In both al-Baṣrah and Khurāsān, they were counted with thought—so that the man could give him some knowledge of Abū Jaʿfar. The man came before al-Musayyab, who at that time was head of the police,[714] and sought to use his kinship connection with him. Al-Musayyab, however, said, "I've no choice but to take you before the Commander of the Faithful." He therefore took him to see Abū Jaʿfar, and the man confessed his identity. Abū Jaʿfar asked, "Have you not heard Muḥammad [or Ibrāhīm] say (he repeated the lines):

Fear banished and disgraced him.
Thus it is with one who hates the heat of battle."?

To this Abū Jaʿfar responded, "Inform him that we say:

O the shameful behavior we deem worse than death!
Because of it we would bid death welcome."

The caliph then said, "You are discharged; now go and tell him that."

According to ʿUmar—Azhar b. Saʿīd b. Nāfiʿ, who was an actual witness: Muḥammad came out in open revolt on the first day of Rajab in 145.[715] He and his confederates spent the evening in al-Madhād. Later that night they came forward and stormed the prison and the treasury. Muḥammad ordered Riyāḥ and Ibn Muslim imprisoned together in the Dār Ibn Hishām.

According to ʿUmar—Yaʿqūb b. al-Qāsim—ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib:[716] Muḥammad made his uprising on 27 Jumādā II in 145.[717]

According to ʿUmar b. Rāshid:[718] He made his uprising on 27 Jumādā II in 145. On the night he came forth, I saw him wearing Tamīm. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 59, 89, II, 240; *EI*², s.v. (W. Caskel); Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 203–6.

---

714. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 293, where Musayyab is mentioned as charged with the caliph's personal guard (ḥaras). Musayyab b. Zuhayr al-Ḍabbī, one of the revolutionary nuzarāʾ al-nuqabāʾ, served the first five ʿAbbāsid caliphs. His assignments included governing first Khurāsān and then the Jazīrah for al-Mahdī. Akhbār al-dawlah, 219; Ṭabarī, III, 500; Crone, Slaves, 186–87.

715. Saturday, September 25, 762.

716. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 262, repeats this isnād with the addition of ʿUmar b. Rāshid as an eyewitness.

717. Wednesday, September 22, 762.

718. Ṭabarī, Indices, identifies him as a mawlā of the Banū Anaj.

a yellow headdress of a quilted type,[719] a yellow robe,[720] one length of cloth that he used to bind up his breeches, another that he used as a turban, and a sashed sword. He started out saying to his confederates, "Do not kill! Do not kill!"[721] When the Dār [Marwān] proved inaccessible to them, he said, "Enter by the door to the reserved section [of the mosque]." However, they rushed blindly forward and set fire to the wicket door.[722] No one was able to pass through, so Rizām, al-Qasrī's mawlā, placed his shield on the fire and then walked across it. The people did what he did and entered through that door. Some of Riyāḥ's associates pushed hard against the door, but those who were with Riyāḥ in the Dār [Marwān] left via Dār ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz by way of the bathhouse. Riyāḥ, however, went up into[723] a latticed oriel in the Dār Marwān. Muḥammad ordered his men to climb up and tear it down. They went up to him, brought him down, and imprisoned him in the Dār Marwān. With him they imprisoned his brother, ʿAbbās b. ʿUthmān.[724] Muḥammad b. Khālid,[725] his nephew al-Nadhīr b. Yazīd, and Rizām had been in the prison, but Muḥammad had had them brought forth and then ordered al-Nadhīr to ensure the safety [in confinement] of Riyāḥ and his associates. [196]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Muḥammad imprisoned Riyāḥ, his nephew, and Ibn Muslim b. ʿUqbah in the Dār Marwān.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Thābit[726]—his maternal uncle, Rāshid b. Ḥafṣ: Rizām said to al-Nadhīr, "Leave him to me. You saw how he harassed me." Al-

719. Qalanasuwatan ṣafrā'a muḍarrabatan. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVI, and Glossarium, s.v. ḍaraba. For the qalanasuwah, see Ahsan, Social Life, 30, 52; Dozy, Vêtements, 365–71; *EI*², s.v. Libās (Y.K. Stillman et al.); Grabar, "Cérémonies umayyades," 55.

720. Wa-jubbatan ṣafrā'a. For the jubbah, see Ahsan, Social Life, 40, 74; Dozy, Vêtements, 107–17.

721. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 530, reads lā taqtulū illā yaqtulū, i.e., "Do not kill unless they do."

722. For bāb al-khawkhah, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 411.

723. Wa-taʿallaqa Riyāḥu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿaliqa; cf. Fragmenta historicorum, I, 238: fa-ṣaʿida Riyāḥu mashrabatan fī al-dār.

724. In the account of his death at the hands of Ibn Khuḍayr, he is characterized as "a righteous man." Ṭabarī, III, 242.

725. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī, the former governor of Medina.

726. See note 407.

Nadhīr replied, "That's between you and him," and then stood up to leave. Riyāḥ said to Rizām, "O Abū Qays, I did to you what I had to even though I knew you would prevail." Al-Nadhīr said to him, "You did what you are suited for, and we shall do the same." Rizām reached for him, but Riyāḥ kept appealing to him until he [197] left off, saying, "By God, you are insolent when in possession of power and are contemptible when afflicted."

According to ʿUmar—Mūsā b. Saʿīd al-Jumaḥī: Riyāḥ imprisoned Muḥammad b. Marwān b. Abī Salīṭ, a descendant of the Anṣār, and also one of the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf,[727] who said these lines while in prison:

The Qaysī noble forgets not the honor due him that men offer to men they trust.[728]
Whenever Saʿīd rattles the gate, we shamble toward him with the gawky gait of ostrichs.
Creeping like ants we match his march with small steps, not prideful strides.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—Ismāʿīl b. Yaʿqūb al-Taymī: Muḥammad ascended the minbar, gave praise and glory to God, and then said:[729] "Now then, you people, in the matter of this tyrant, the enemy of God, Abū Jaʿfar, you well know how he constructed the Green Dome,[730] which he built as a way of opposing God in His dominion and belittling the sacred Kaʿbah.[731] God seized Pharaoh simply for saying "I am your most exalted Lord."[732] Certainly the people with the strongest claim to 727. ʿAmr b. ʿAwf was a division of Aws, one of the two main tribal groupings in pre-Islamic Medina. *EI*², s.v. al-Aws (W. Montgomery Watt); Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, I, 177, II, 171.

728. Mulqā al-rijāli ilā al-rijāli. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. laqiya; Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 3012.

729. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 531.

730. The audience chamber of al-Manṣūr's palace in Baghdad was topped by a green dome (al-qubbah al-khaḍrā') that rose to such a height (48.36 meters) that it could be seen from far beyond the city. As most sources date commencement of the construction of Baghdad to the year 145/762, reference to the dome in this sermon is probably an anachronism. *EI*², s.v. Baghdad (A. A. Duri); Le Strange, Baghdad, 31–33; Lassner, Topography, 135.

731. The central sanctuary of the great mosque in Mecca, toward which Muslims orient themselves in prayer. *EI*² s.v. (A. J. Wensinck and J. Jomier).

732. Qur'ān 79:24.

uphold this religion are the descendants of the first Muhājirūn[733] and the Anṣār[734] who assisted them.[735] O God, they [the ʿAbbāsids] have made lawful what You proscribed and have proscribed what You made lawful. They give security to the one You inspire with fear and [try to] frighten the one to whom You give security. O God, reckon them by number and kill them in Your might, omitting not a single one of them. O you people, by God I have not come out in revolt from among you.[736] For me you are people of strength, not of affliction. Indeed I have chosen you for myself. By God, I came here only when there was no city on earth in which God is worshiped where the oath of allegiance to me has not been taken."

According to ʿUmar—Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh— his father—his father: When Riyāḥ sent me off,[737] news of that reached Muḥammad, so he made his uprising that night. Now Riyāḥ had already instructed the soldiers who were with me that if a man should appear from the direction of Medina, they should behead me. When Riyāḥ was brought to Muḥammad, he said, "Where is Mūsā?" "There is no way to him," answered Riyāḥ "By God, I have already sent him down to Iraq." Muḥammad said, "Send someone after him and have him brought back." Riyāḥ replied, "I have alread arranged with the army who are with him that, if they see anyone approach from Medina, they should kill Mūsā." Muḥammad asked his associates, "Who will help me in the matter of Mūsā?" and Ibn Khuḍayr said that he would do so. Muḥammad said, "Then go look for some men." Ibn Khuḍayr selected some and then set off. [198]

By God, all of a sudden Ibn Khuḍayr[738] was in front of us as if he had approached from Iraq. Catching sight of him, the soldiers 733. Those who emigrated with the Prophet Muḥammad from Mecca to Medina in 1/622. EI[1], s.v. (F. Buhl).

734. A name meaning "helpers" that was applied to the people of Medina who assisted and supported the Prophet Muḥammad and his followers. EI[2], s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt).

735. This part of Muḥammad's address is repeated on p. 192.

736. Min bayna aẓhurikum; see note 684.

737. This continues the account of Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, a brother of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, from p. 130.

738. Ṭabarī, Indices, identifies him as a descendant of Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr. See note 958.

said, "It's the Commander of the Faithful's messengers." When Ibn Khuḍayr and his men were among us, they drew swords, and the commander and his associates took me, and he had me kneel down, released me from my bonds, and made me keep going until he brought me before Muḥammad.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. al-Jaʿd:[739] Abū Jaʿfar would write to Muḥammad as though from his army commanders, who would [seem to] summon Muḥammad to appear and would inform him that they were on his side.[740] Muḥammad used to say, "Were we to meet, all of the army commanders would side with me."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: When Muḥammad took Medina, he made ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. al-Zubayr[741] its governor, charged ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh al-Makhzūmī with its judiciary, Abū al-Qalammas ʿUthmān b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb[742] with its police forces, and ʿAbdallāh b.
[199] Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Miswar b. Makhrimah[743] with its office of payment of stipends.[744] He sent word to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, saying, "I [confidently] assume that you will help us and stand together with us." Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz made excuses to him but said he would do so. Then he slipped away from Muḥammad and went to Mecca.

According to ʿUmar—Ismāʿīl b. Ibrāhīm b. Hūd—Saʿīd b. Yaḥyā Abū Sufyān al-Ḥimyarī[745]—ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar: I was head of 739. Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. al-Jaʿd b. ʿUbayd al-Jawharī (d. 230/845) was a Baghdādī muḥaddith and jewel merchant. GAS I, 105, VII, 51; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XI, 360–66; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 256–58; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 269.

740. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 531.

741. ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid was a member of the prominent Qurashī family whose forefather, al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām, fought against ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib at the Battle of the Camel. Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 201–2; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 296.

742. Abū al-Qalammas ʿUthmān b. ʿUbaydallāh was a descendant of the second caliph, ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

743. Abū Muḥammad al-Madanī was a Qurashī muḥaddith who died in 170/786. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 150–51, where the name is vocalized as Makhramah; Van Arendonk, Débuts, 312 = Opkomst, 285.

744. Dīwān al-ʿaṭāʾ. *EI*², s.v. ʿAṭāʾ (C. Cahen).

745. Abū Sufyān Saʿīd b. Yaḥyā al-Ḥimyarī al-Ḥadhdhāʾ al-Wāsiṭī (the cobbler from Wāsiṭ) was a muḥaddith deemed trustworthy by al-Sijistānī. He died in 202/818. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 87–8.

the police forces for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh until he sent me off on an assignment and put al-Zubayrī[746] in charge of his police.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar b. Saʿīd b. Nāfiʿ: None of the leading citizens stayed away from Muḥammad except a small group that included al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Ḥizām, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mundhir b. al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Ḥizām, Abū Salamah b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb,[747] and Khubayb b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr.[748]

According to ʿUmar—Yaʿqūb b. al-Qāsim—his grandmother, Kulthum bt. Wahb: When Muḥammad made his uprising, the people of Medina turned aside. Among those who joined the revolt was my husband, ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Yaḥyā b. ʿAbbād b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr,[749] who went to al-Baqīʿ.[750] I hid myself with Asmāʾ bt. Ḥasan b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās.[751] ʿAbd al-Wahhāb wrote to me in verses that he had composed, and I wrote to him:

May God have mercy on youths who fought on the day of al-Thaniyyah[752]
They fought for him, [even] young girls and esteemed people of pure lineage
But [eventually] the people ran away and left him one and all, all but some lionhearted cavalry.

Continued Kulthum bt. Wahb, "It became popular to add:" [200]

May the all-merciful God kill ʿĪsā, the killer of the Pure Soul.

---

746. I.e., ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. al-Zubayr.

747. Brother of Abū al-Qalammas above and thus also a descendant of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

748. Khubayb b. Thābit was a grandson of anticaliph ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, who opposed Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and was killed by Syrian troops in 73/692. For Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 19, II, 546.

749. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Yaḥyā was a great-grandson of the the anticaliph ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr.

750. Baqīʿ al-Gharqad was the first Muslim cemetery in Medina and the burial place of many of the Prophet's family. *EI*², s.v. Baḳīʿ al-Gharḳad (A. J. Wensinck and A. S. Bazmee Ansari); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 473–74.

751. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVI.

752. I.e., Thaniyyat al-Wadāʿ. See note 691.

According to ʿUmar—Saʿd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥakam b. Sinān al-Ḥakamī, the brother of al-Anṣār—others: Mālik b. Anas was asked for a legal opinion about joining Muḥammad's uprising. People said to him, "We are obligated by an oath of allegiance to Abū Jaʿfar." Mālik responded, "You gave the oath of allegiance only under compulsion. A sworn contract is not incumbent upon anyone who has been coerced." At this, the people hurried off to join Muḥammad, but Mālik stayed at home.

According to Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Ibn Abī Mulaykah,[753] the mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar: Muḥammad sent for Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar[754] (who was a man of advanced years), summoning him at the time he made his uprising to give his oath of allegiance. Ismāʿīl said, "O son of my brother, by God you are as good as dead, so how can I give you the oath of allegiance!" Therefore, the people held back from him for a little while. The sons of Muʿāwiyah,[755] however, had already hurried to Muḥammad's side. Ḥammādah, the daughter of Muʿāwiyah, came to Ismāʿīl and said, "O Uncle, my brothers have already hastened to their cousin's cause. If you keep saying this, you will hold people back from him, and my cousin and my brothers will be killed." The old man refused to do anything but proscribe Muḥammad. It is said that Ḥammādah rushed at Ismāʿīl and killed him. Muḥammad was about to say the ritual prayer for Ismāʿīl, but ʿAbdallāh b. Ismāʿīl[756] jumped at him, saying, "You order my father's killing and then you pray for him!" The guards pushed him aside, and Muḥammad prayed for Ismāʿīl.

---

753. Ibn Abī Mulaykah, a descendant of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh (d. 117/735), known as Abū Muḥammad or Abū Bakr al-Taymī, was the muezzin of the sacred mosque at Mecca and the judge of Mecca for al-Zubayr. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 304; Dhahabī, Siyar, V, 88–90.

754. In an earlier ʿAlid episode, his father, ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib, tried to persuade his cousin Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī not to oppose Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah's assumption of the caliphate. EI[2] s.v. ʿAbdallāh b. Djaʿfar (K.V. Zetterstéen).

755. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib was the son of the last of the Banū Hāshim to see the Prophet. He was an uncle of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, and the names of his sons, Muḥammad's cousins, are given as Ḥasan, Yazīd, and Ṣāliḥ. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 107–9; Nagel, "Bericht", 257; Ṭabarī, III, 202, 204.

756. ʿAbdallāh b. Ismāʿīl b. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Muḥammad was brought ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī.[757] [201] The latter held his eyes squeezed shut and said, "I am under oath, if I see him, to kill him." ʿĪsā b. Zayd[758] said, "Let me behead him," but Muḥammad prevented him from doing so.

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Maʿn[759]—Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Qasrī:[760] I was in the prison of Ibn Ḥayyān[761] when Muḥammad made his public appearance, and he released me. When I heard the summons to his cause that he made from the minbar, I said to myself, "This is the call of one entitled to make it. By God, in [responding to] it I will acquit myself well before God."[762] I said to Muḥammad, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have now made your uprising in this area. If Abū Jaʿfar occupies any of its passages,[763] its people will die of hunger and thirst. Rise up with me. Within but ten days I could strike him with 100,000 swords." But Muḥammad refused me. One day when I was with him, he said to me, "We have never found such fine personal goods as something we found in the possession of Ibn Abī Farwah,[764] the son-in-law of Abū al-Khaṣīb." [Muḥammad 757. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī was called al-Aʿraj ("the Lame"). His grandfather was known as Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, and his great-great-grandfather was ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. He himself betrayed Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzāʿī to Abū Muslim, prompting the former's execution. *EI*², s.v. ʿAlids (B. Lewis), especially the genealogical chart; Ṭabarī, III, 61.

758. ʿĪsā b. Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, whose patronymic was Abū Yaḥyā. His father, Zayd b. ʿAlī, was the eponym of the Shīʿī sect of the Zaydiyyah. ʿĪsā b. Zayd and ʿĪsā b. Mūsā were the two figures of whom al-Manṣūr, shortly before his death, warned his son al-Mahdī. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 405–28; *EI*¹, s.v. Zaid b. ʿAlī (R. Strothmann); Ṭabarī, III, 448, 507.

759. Muḥammad b. Maʿn b. Muḥammad b. Maʿn b. Naḍlah b. ʿAmr al-Ghifārī was a muḥaddith of Medina, said to have died at about the time that Sufyān b. ʿUyaynah did, i.e., 196/811. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 412–13.

760. Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Qasrī was the former governor of Medina. See note 361, above, under the year 141, and the account of his dismissal under year 144.

761. I.e., Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī.

762. La-ubliynna allāhu fīhā balāʾan ḥasanan. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. balā. Balāʾ, in the sense of acquitting oneself well on the battlefield, was also grounds for a larger allotment from the army stipendiary system.

763. Law waqafa ʿalā naqbin min anqābihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. naqaba and waqafa.

764. Perhaps the son of the man with whom Muḥammad's brother, Ibrāhīm, stayed in Baghdad. Ṭabarī, III, 287.

had seized him.] I said to myself, "Don't I see you eyeing those fine goods with intent to steal?"[765] Then I wrote to the Commander to the Faithful and informed him of how few still sided with Muḥammad. Although Muḥammad was well disposed toward me, he imprisoned me until such time as ʿĪsā b. Mūsā released me after killing Muḥammad.[766]

According to ʿUmar—Saʿd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar—his sister, Buraykah bt. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd—her father: One day while I was with Muḥammad, his foot in my lap, Khawwāt b. Bukayr b. Khawwāt b. Jubayr came to see him. He greeted Muḥammad, but Muḥammad returned the greeting perfunctorily. Then a young Qurashī lad came in and greeted him. To this young man Muḥammad returned a courteous greeting. I said [to Muḥammad], "You are still not putting your partisanship aside." "How's that?" he said. "The Anṣārī leader came to see you and [202] gave his greetings, but you responded to them half-heartedly. Then some Qurashī vagabond comes and makes his salutations, and you were ceremonious in reciprocating them." He said, "I did no such thing, although you've examined me more closely than anyone should do to another."

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Isḥāq b. al-Qāsim: Muḥammad appointed al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar[767] as governor of Mecca. With him he dispatched al-Qāsim b. Isḥāq,[768] whom he named governor of the Yemen.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—his family: Muḥammad appointed al-Qāsim b. Isḥāq governor of the Yemen and set Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh over Syria, so that the two of them could proselytize for him. He was killed, however, before they arrived [at their respective posts].

765. Allā arāka qad abṣarta ḥurra al-matāʿ. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. baṣura.

766. See pp. 108–12 for the circumstances of Khālid al-Qasrī's imprisonment.

767. Al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah supported his brother ʿAbdallāh's revolt in al-Kūfah in 127/744 and was charged with jibāl by him. He was eventually imprisoned by al-Manṣūr and remained there until the caliph's death. Although al-Mahdī released him, al-Ḥasan died shortly thereafter. Ṭabarī, III, 1881, 1977; Nagel, Entstehung, 147–50; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 300–9; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XII, 274–75.

768. Al-Qāsim b. Isḥāq was a descendant of Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭalib and a cousin of al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 301; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 201.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar b. Saʿīd: At the time of his uprising Muḥammad appointed ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Darāwardī[769] as head of the aresenal.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah and others: When Muḥammad made his uprising, Ibn Harmah[770] said that a certain one of them—and he alone—has recited these verses to Abū Jaʿfar:

You have wrested the caliphate from one who desired it.
The misleader, the lost one raised his hopes.[771]
He has destroyed himself in foolishness and cowardice.
Of it not the smallest bit was alloted to him.
Greedy men assisted him, but they were the scum on the flood that floods collect.
They called upon Iblīs when they lamented and lowed,[772] but the tempter, the forsaken one, did not come to their rescue.
They were the people obedient to him, but he turned his back.
And a group of them [still] came behind him.
Truly, they did not fall short in this,
in following on the heels of the misguider, but they did not go far.
It was not the people who gave you the caliphate but [203]
the King, the Exalted One gave you that.
The legacy of Muḥammad is yours, and you are the roots of legitimacy when the roots are torn up.

According to ʿUmar—Maḥmūd b. Maʿmar b. Abī al-Shadā'id al-Fazārī[773] and Mawhūb b. Rashīd b. Ḥayyān al-Kilābī:[774] When 769. Known as Abū Muḥammad al-Juhanī, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Muḥammad b. ʿUbayd (d. 187/803) was a Medinese muḥaddith and a mawlā of the Juhaynah tribe. His laqab, al-Darāwardī, is ascribed to a Khurāsānī town of that name or to his habit of using the Persian andarūn as a word of invitation. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 538; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 315–16; Dhahabī, Siyar, VIII, 366–68.

770. Abū Isḥāq Ibrāhīm b. ʿAlī b. Salamah al-Fihrī (d. 176/792) was a Medinese poet who composed panegyrics for the Umayyad caliph Walīd b. Yazīd and for ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan but who also gained the support of Abū Jaʿfar. *EI*² s.v. (C. Pellat); GAS, II, 444–45; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, VI, 59–60; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, I, 50.

771. I.e., Iblīs/Satan.

772. Daʿū Iblīsa idh karibū wa-jārā (jaʾarū). Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII.

773. Grandson of the poet quoted below.

774. Mawhūb b. Rashīd b. Ḥayyān b. Abī Sulaymān b. Samʿān al-Kilābī.

Muḥammad made his uprising and ʿĪsā proceeded against him, Abū al-Shadāʾid[775] said:

Fine mounts and blood mares have brought you ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, so be in no hurry.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: Muḥammad was very swarthy—his complexion almost black—and corpulent. He was nicknamed "Tar Face" because of his dark complexion, and, in fact, Abū Jaʿfar used to call him "Charcoal Face" (al-muḥammam).

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Ibrāhīm b. Ziyād b. ʿAnbasah: I never saw Muḥammad ascend the minbar, while I was in my usual place [nearby], without hearing rumbling beneath him.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Ḥabīb—one who was present when Muḥammad was preaching on the minbar: Phlegm in his throat got in his way, so he cleared his throat and it went away. Then the phlegm returned, so he cleared his throat and again it went away. Then it came back, so he cleared his throat once more. Again this happened. At this point he looked about without seeing any place in which to spit,[776] so he expectorated toward the ceiling of the mosque and made it stick there.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfiʿ[777]—Ibrāhīm b. ʿAlī, who was of the family of Abū Rāfiʿ: Muḥammad was a stutterer. I saw him on the minbar, stammering words [that were] in his breast. Then he would strike his chest with his hand to make the speech come forth.[778]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: One day ʿĪsā b. Mūsā en-[204] tered Abū Jaʿfar's presence and said, "May God gladden you, Commander of the Faithful." "Why?" replied the caliph. "I have bought the frontage of the Dār ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar[779] from

775. Abū al-Shadāʾid al-Fazārī was a satirical poet in Medina who died in 145/762. GAS, II, 647.

776. Mawḍiʿan yabṣuqu fīhi, following Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 553.

777. ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfiʿ b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām (d. 216/831) was known as ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfiʿ the Younger to distinguish him from the faqīh ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfiʿ al-Ṣāʾigh ("the Goldsmith") al-Makhzūmī, who died in 206/821. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 648–49; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 46–48.

778. Veccia Vaglieri "Divagazioni," 339, counts this speech defect among the reasons why Muḥammad was unable to attract broad public enthusiasm.

779. Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 112, further identifies this as Dār ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib.

Muʿāwiyah's sons, Ḥasan, Yazīd and Ṣāliḥ."[780] He said, "And you are happy! Indeed, by God, they only sold it so they could take advantage of you with its price."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿImrān—Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Madān: Muḥammad made his uprising in Medina after al-Manṣūr had traced the outlines of his city, Baghdad, with a reed. The caliph then went to al-Kūfah, and I accompanied him. He yelled at me to catch up with him but then was silent for a long time. Eventually he said, "Ibn al-Rabīʿ, Muḥammad has come forth in open revolt." "Where?" I asked. "In Medina," he answered. "By God, he is destroyed," I exclaimed, "and will ruin [others]. He has revolted without sufficient forces and without [the support of] leading men. O Commander of the Faithful, come, I will tell you what Saʿīd b. ʿAmr b. Jaʿdah al-Makhzūmī[781] told me. Saʿīd said, 'On the day of [the battle of] the Zāb,[782] I was standing with Marwān when he said, "O Saʿīd, who is that fellow leading the cavalry charge against me?" "ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās,"[783] I answered. He said, "Which of them is he? Point him out to me." "All right," I said, "he is a man of sallow complexion, with a handsome face and slender forearms, a man who entered your presence and heaped abuse upon ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah[784] when he was put to flight."[785] Marwān said, "Indeed, I recognize him now. By God, I wish that ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib could fight me in his stead. ʿAlī and his descendants have no part in this affair. But this

780. See note 755.

781. Ṭabarī, Indices, gives b. Hubayrah al-Makhzūmī.

782. Al-Zāb al-Akbar, a tributary of the Tigris, was the site of the decisive battle against Marwān b. Muḥammad, the last Umayyad caliph. EI[1], s.v. (E. Honigmann); Ṭabarī, III, 38–42.

783. Abū Jaʿfar's uncle. For the account of his attempt to secure the oath of allegiance for himself, see under the year 137. His ʿAbbāsid prepotence is apparently here being favorably contrasted with the ʿAlid's.

784. ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib rebelled in al-Kūfah in 127/744 and, although unable to maintain power there, held areas of western Persia until 129/746–47. After retreating to Khurāsān, he was executed by Abū Muslim. The sect associated with him was known as al-Janāḥiyyah. EI[2] s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen) and s.v. al-Djanāḥiyya (M. G. S. Hodgson and M. Canard); Ṭabarī, II, 1879–87, 1976–80; Shahrastānī, Al-Milal wa-al-niḥal, I, 150–52; Laoust, Schismes, 35–36.

785. For an account of this incident see Ṭabarī, II, 1980–81.

is a man from the Banū Hāshim, descended from the Messenger of God's uncle and from Ibn ʿAbbās. He carries the whiff of Syria and the backing of Syria. O Ibn Jaʿdah, do you know what prompted me to settle the succession upon ʿAbdallāh and [205] ʿUbaydallāh,[786] the two sons of Marwān, to the neglect of ʿAbd al-Malik[787] although he is older than ʿUbaydallāh?" I said, "No." He said, "I found the one most capable of handling this affair to be ʿAbdallāh, and ʿUbaydallāh is more like ʿAbdallāh than ʿAbd al-Malik. Therefore I settled the succession on ʿAbdallāh [first]." Abū Jaʿfar then said, "I adjure you by God, did Ibn Jaʿdah really tell you this?" "May the daughter of Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah[788] be irrevocably divorced [from me]," I replied, "if he did not tell me what I have told you."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq:[789] During the night on which Muḥammad made his uprising, a man from the family of Uways b. Abī Sarḥ of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy[790] went to Abū Jaʿfar. He made the journey from Medina in nine days, arriving at night.[791] He stood at the gates of the city and shouted until his presence was announced and he was admitted. Al-Rabīʿ said to him, "What do you want at this hour, when the Commander of the Faithful is sleeping?" "I must

---

786. ʿAbdallāh b. Marwān b. Muḥammad and ʿUbaydallāh b. Marwān b. Muḥammad were sons of the last Umayyad caliph. The circumstances in which he had the bayʿah given to them as his successors are described in Ṭabarī, II, 1895. ʿAbdallāh successfully checked the Khārijī rebellion led by al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Shaybānī until his father arrived with sufficient forces to fight a conclusive battle. Although he escaped the pursuit of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, Abū Jaʿfar's uncle, he was eventually captured and remained in prison until his death during the caliphate of Hārūn al-Rashīd. Ṭabarī, II, 1938–40; *EI*² s.v. Marwān II (G. R. Hawting); Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 137.

787. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān b. Muḥammad campaigned with his father in the latter's ostensible avengement of Walīd b. Yazīd's murder. Ṭabarī, II, 1870–71, 1876.

788. See note 262.

789. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 533.

790. The ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy were a clan of Quraysh. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 4, II, 160; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 166–67. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 533, gives the man's name as al-Ḥusayn b. Sakhr with a variant of "b. Saḥr."

791. D. H. Hill, "Camel and Horse," 34, estimates that a courier could cover about 100 miles in a day and about 400 miles in a week. As the distance from Medina to al-Kūfah is roughly double the latter figure, the courier obviously made very good time.

see him," the man replied. Al-Rabīʿ said, "Give your information to us, and we will inform him." The man refused, however, so al-Rabīʿ entered the caliph's presence and apprised him of the situation. Abū Jaʿfar said, "Ask him what he wants and then tell me." To this al-Rabīʿ replied, "The man has insisted on speaking to you directly." The caliph thus gave permission for the man to enter his presence, whereupon he announced, "Commander of the Faithful, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh has come out in open revolt in Medina." Abū Jaʿfar replied, "You have killed him, by God, if you are speaking the truth. Tell me who has taken his side." The man gave him the names of those of the leading citizens of Medina and of the people of Muḥammad's family who had revolted with him. Abū Jaʿfar then asked, "Have you seen him and looked at him with your own eyes?" "I have seen him," the man replied, "and I have looked at him with my own eyes and spoken to him while he was sitting on the Messenger of God's minbar." Abū Jaʿfar had him taken to a room. In the morning a messenger of Saʿīd b. Dīnār, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's slave who was in charge of ʿĪsā's properties in Medina, came to Abū Jaʿfar. He told him about the Muḥammad affair, and [other] reports of it came to the caliph in constant succession. Abū Jaʿfar sent the Uwaysī away, saying, "I will have men following right behind you and I will enrich you." The caliph ordered for him the sum of 9,000 dirhams,[792] 1,000 for each night he traveled. [206]

According to ʿUmar—Ibn Abī Ḥarb: When news of Muḥammad's uprising reached Abū Jaʿfar, he was apprehensive about it, and al-Ḥārith, the astrologer,[793] began to say to him, "Commander of the Faithful, why are you concerned about him? By God, were he to rule the earth, he would last for ninety days."

According to ʿUmar—Sahl b. ʿAqīl b. Ismāʿīl[794]—his father: When the report of Muḥammad's uprising reached Abū Jaʿfar, he left immediately for al-Kūfah, saying, "I am Abū Jaʿfar, I have lured the fox from his lair."

---

792. Specification is supplied in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 533.

793. Perhaps a forefather of al-Ḥārith al-Munajjim, a Baghdādī astrologist who served the vizier al-Ḥasan b. Sahl. Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 995; GAS, VI, 146. For the accuracy of this prediction, see Ṭabarī, III, 316.

794. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Sulaymān—Ḥabīb b. Marzūq[795]—Tasnīm b. al-Ḥawārī:[796] When Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the two sons of ʿAbdallāh, made their uprising, Abū Jaʿfar sent word to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, who was in his custody, saying, "This man has now come out in revolt. If you have a thought on the matter, let us know." Now ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī did have an opinion about them, but he replied, "A restricted man has restricted judgment; let me out so that my opinion can emerge freely." Abū Jaʿfar, however, sent word to him, "Were Muḥammad to come knocking at my door, I would still not let you out. I am kinder to you than he, even though he were the head of your family." At this ʿAbdallāh sent word back to Abū Jaʿfar, "Leave immediately for al-Kūfah and press them hard, for they are partisans (shīʿah) of the family of this [Muḥammad's] house and their helpers. Surround al-Kūfah with strongpoints and behead whoever leaves it in any direction or comes to it from any direction. Additionally, send for Salm b. Qutaybah[797] [who was in al-Rayy] to [207] come down to you. Write to the people of Syria and order them to convey to you as many men of strength and courage as the postal service [i.e., relay horses] can carry. Reward these people well and dispatch them together with Salm." The caliph did what ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī suggested.

According to ʿUmar—al-ʿAbbās b. Sufyān b. Yaḥyā b. Ziyād:[798] I heard our old men say that Muḥammad made his uprising during the period when ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī was in detention. Abū Jaʿfar said to his brothers, "This fool still has some excellent ideas about warfare. Go see him and seek his advice, but don't tell him that I commanded you to do so." So the brothers went off to visit 795. Ḥabīb b. Abī Ḥabīb Marzūq (d. 218/833) was a secretary for Mālik b. Anas and transmitter of al-Muwaṭṭaʾ. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 292.

796. In the last year of Abū Jaʿfar's reign, Tasnīm b. al-Ḥawārī appears as the administrator in Oman who sent certain Indian prisoners to the caliph. His son Ḥasan was governor there in 169/785. Ṭabarī, III, 385, 568; Crone, Slaves, 121.

797. Salm b. Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī (d. 149/766), whose patronymic was Abū ʿAbdallāh, served as governor of al-Baṣrah for Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah at the conclusion of the Umayyad period and again under al-Manṣūr. His father was governor of Khurāsān under al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. Ṭabarī, II, 1180–82; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 299–300; Crone, Slaves, 136–37; Zambaur, Manuel, 40; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, III, 111; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 429–30; Bligh-Abramski, "Evolution versus Revolution," 231.

798. There is some variation in Ibn al-Athīr's account.

ʿAbdallāh, and when he saw them, ʿAbdallāh asked, "Why have you come? What brings all of you now when you've stayed away from me for such a long time?" They replied, "We asked permission of the Commander of the Faithful, and he gave it to us." ʿAbdallāh said, "This signifies nothing. What's going on?" "ʿAbdallāh [b. Ḥasan's] son has come out in open revolt," they said. ʿAbdallāh asked, "What do you think Ibn Sallāmah[799] [meaning Abū Jaʿfar] is going to do?" They replied, "By God, we don't know." At this ʿAbdallāh exclaimed, "Indeed stinginess has already killed him.[800] Order him to get out money and pay the troops. If he is victorious, his money will soon come back to him. But if he's vanquished, his opponent will not get his hands on a single dirham."

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Shaybān[801]—Zayd, the mawlā of Mismaʿ b. ʿAbd al-Malik: When Muḥammad made his uprising, Abū Jaʿfar summoned ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and said to him, "Muḥammad has risen in revolt; head out against him." ʿĪsā responded, "Commander of the Faithful, these uncles of yours are all around you. Call for them and take counsel with them." The caliph replied, "What about the words of Ibn Harmah?"

You are looking at a man who does not show people his secret, and does not whisper in their ears about what he is trying to do.
When he comes to something [daunting], he walks past with an air of scorn.
And if he says that he will do something, then he does so.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā: I transcribed these letters from Muḥammad b. Bashīr, who testified to their authenticity. Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān,[802] an Iraqi scribe, and al-Ḥakam b. Ṣadaqah b. Nizār related them to me. I also heard Ibn Abī Ḥarb declare them authentic. He had a version that when Muḥam- [208]

799. The name of al-Manṣūr's mother, a Berber slave woman, was Sallāmah. *EI*², s.v. al-Manṣūr (H. Kennedy); Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 114.

800. His stinginess is said to have earned Abū Jaʿfar the nickname Abū Dawānīq, the dāniq (pl. dawāniq or dawānīq) being a small coin of little value. Ṭabarī includes a number of stories about the caliph's parsimonious nature in the accounts with which he concludes his section on al-Manṣūr's reign.

801. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Shaybān b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Mismaʿ.

802. Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Humānī.

mad's letter reached Abū Jaʿfar, Abū Ayyūb had said, "Let me respond to him on this." Abū Jaʿfar refused sharply, saying "I will answer him. Since our quarrel is about the comparative nobility of our lineages, leave him to me."[803]

When news of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's uprising in Medina reached Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, the caliph wrote to Muḥammad:[804]

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate: From the servant of God, ʿAbdallāh, the Commander of the Faithful, to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh: "The recompense for those who war against God and His Messenger and on the earth strive for iniquity is that they will be slaughtered or crucified or their hands and feet on alternate sides shall be severed or they shall be exiled from the land.[805] That is their disgrace in the world, while in the Hereafter theirs will be a severe punishment, except for those who repent before you overpower them. Know that God is forgiving, merciful."[806] I am obligated to you by God's compact and His covenant, His promise of protection and that of His Messenger, so that if you repent and turn back before I overpower you, I will grant immunity to you, to all your sons, your brothers, and your family and whoever follows you, for your lives and for your worldly goods. I will also overlook the blood you have shed and the goods you have obtained. Further, I will give you 1,000,000 dirhams and anything else you request. I will let you settle anywhere in the country that you wish > [209] and will release those of your family who are in my custody. I will grant immunity to all who came to your side, gave you the oath of allegiance, followed you, or had anything to do with your affair. Moreover, I will never pursue

803. See also Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 115.

804. See also Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 182–87; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 536–42; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 84–86; Two modern biographies of al-Manṣūr provide paraphrases of these letters: Jūmard, Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, 186 (extracts); Rustum, Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, 56–60.

805. This Qurʾānic citation is repeated in one version of al-Manṣūr's testament to his son al-Mahdī. Ṭabarī, III, 447; A. Dietrich, "Politische Testament."

806. Qurʾān 5:33–34. For the ʿAbbāsid use of Qurʾānic citation, see Zaman, "Considerations."

a single one of them for anything he has done. If you wish to make a completely secure agreement for yourself, then send to me whomever you wish to receive on your behalf such guarantee of safe-conduct, contract, and covenant as you would trust.

At the heading he had written "From the servant of God, ʿAbdallāh, the Commander of the Faithful, to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh."

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh wrote to Abū Jaʿfar:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate: From the servant of God, the Mahdī, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, to ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad: "Ṭā', Sīn, Mīm. These are the verses of the book that makes clear. We recite to you from the story of Moses and Pharaoh with truth for a people who believe. Pharaoh was exalted in the land and made of its people factions, oppressing a group of them by slaughtering their sons but sparing their women. Truly he was one of those who commits iniquity. We wanted to act graciously toward those who on the earth were oppressed, to make them leaders and to make them inheritors. And to make them strong in the earth and to show Pharaoh and Hāmān and their armies that against which they were on guard."[807] To you I extend a grant of immunity like the one that you extended to me, because the right to do so belongs to us. You have laid claim to this office only through us. You made your uprising to acquire it through our support and attained it only thanks to us. Our paternal ancestor, ʿAlī, was the waṣī and the imām, so how could you have inherited his wilāyah when his own descendants are still alive.[808] Further you well know that no one has laid claim to this office who has a [210] > lineage, nobility, and status like ours. By the nobility of our fathers, we are not the sons of the accursed, the out-

807. Qur'ān 28:1–6. Reference to Pharaoh as a secular tyrant was a standard feature of anti-Umayyad polemic.

808. In classical Shīʿī thought the religio-political authority (wilāyah) of the leader or guide (imām) of the community is secured through designation of one who stands in hereditary succession from the original agent (waṣī).

casts, and the freedmen![809] No one from the Banū Hāshim has the sort of bonds we can draw upon through kinship, precedence, and superiority. We are the descendants of the [fore]mother of God's Messenger, Fāṭimah bt. ʿAmr,[810] in the Jāhiliyyah[811] and descendants of his daughter Fāṭimah in Islām. You can make no such claim! Truly God has elected us and has chosen in our favor. Our forefather[812] is one of the prophets, Muḥammad.[813] One of our ancestors, ʿAlī, was the first to become a Muslim. Of the spouses among us is the most virtuous, Khadījah the Chaste, the first to pray facing the qiblah. The best of daughters is Fāṭimah, mistress of the women who dwell in the Garden. Among those born into Islam are Ḥasan and Ḥusayn, lords of the young men who dwell in the Garden. Hāshim[814] is the forefather of ʿAlī twice over,[815] as is ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib[816] of Ḥasan. Twice is God's Messenger my forefather, through Ḥasan and through Ḥusayn. I am at the very center of the Banū Hāshim's kinship lines. My paternity is purest among them, undiluted with non-Arab blood, and no concubines dispute for me [in precedence].[817] In both the Jāhiliyyah and Islam, God has never stopped electing for me fathers and mothers, even 809. For a consideration of these epithets, luʿanāʾ, ṭuradāʾ, and ṭulaqāʾ, see Traini, "La Corrispondenza," 778 n. 28.

810. Fāṭimah bt. ʿAmr was the Prophet's grandmother as wife of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim.

811. The pre-Islamic period.

812. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCXXXVII, for references to early sources with waladanā.

813. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 537, adds "and the most excellent of them."

814. Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf was the great-grandfather of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, while his mother was Fāṭimah bt. Asad b. Hāshim. EI[2] s.v. Hāshim b. ʿAbd Manāf (W. Montgomery Watt); EI[1], s.v. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib (C. Huart).

815. Muḥammad Abū al-Faḍl Ibrāhīm, editor of the Cairo edition, VII, 567, evidently understands this to mean that Hāshim was the progenitor of two ʿAlīs whom he identifies as ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and ʿAlī Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn.

816. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was the grandfather of Ḥasan b. ʿAlī's father and the great-grandfather of his mother Fāṭimah.

817. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 568 n. 1, notes that this is an allusion to Abū Jaʿfar's mother, Sallāmah, who was a Berber concubine. In replying to this charge, the caliph's response records it as lam talidka al-ʿajamu wa-lam tuʿarriq fīka ummahātu al-awlād. Ṭabarī, III, 112.

choosing for me in the Fire.[818] I am descended from the person of highest rank in the Garden and the one with the lightest punishment[819] in the Fire.[820] I am descended from the best of the good and the best of the bad, the best of the people of the Garden and the best of the people of the Fire. I am obligated[821] to you by God, so that if you become obedient to me and respond to my call, I will grant immunity for your life and your possessions and for [211] everything that you have done except in contravention of one of God's mandated punishments[822] or a legitimate claim by a Muslim or by someone who has executed a valid contract. You know well what your obligations are. I am more entitled to the office than you are, as well as more faithful to a covenant. You, however, have given me the kind of covenant and grant of immunity that you have given to other men before me. But what kind of assurances are these you give me? The grant of immunity given to Ibn Hubayrah,[823] or that given to your uncle, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, or that given to Abū Muslim![824]

Abū Jaʿfar wrote to him:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate: Your statement has now reached me, and I have read your letter. My, how you pride yourself on kinship through

818. Fī al-nār. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 537, reads fī al-ashrār, i.e., "among the wicked."

819. Wa-[ibn] ahwanihim ʿadhāban. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII.

820. This could be Abū Ṭālib, the Prophet's grandfather, or his father ʿAbdallāh. Abū Jaʿfar's response, however, explicitly mentions the latter.

821. See Abū Jaʿfar's parallel pledge on pp. 166–67.

822. Ḥaddan min ḥudūdi allāh. Qurʾānic reference to these "limits" may be found at 2:187, 229, 230; 4:13, 14; 9:97, 112; 58:4; 65:1.

823. Abū Khālid Yazīd b. ʿUmar (see note 321) was governor of Iraq for the last Umayyad caliph, Marwān b. Muḥammad, and eponym of the settlement on the Euphrates, Qaṣr b. Hubayrah. The episode of the amān that was granted to him by al-Saffāḥ through the agency of Abū Jaʿfar but then nullified, as detailed in Ṭabarī, III, 66–71. Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 207–8; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VIII, 185; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 287; EI[2] s.v. Ḳaṣr Ibn Hubayra (J. Lassner); Elad, "Siege of al-Wāsiṭ," 59–90.

824. The account of Abū Jaʿfar's treacherous dealings with Abū Muslim is given in year 137. See also Mottahedeh, Loyalty and Leadership, 65.

women, as to delude the uncouth and the rabble! But God did not make women equal [in such matters] to uncles and fathers or [even] to paternal relations and guardians.[825] God gave the uncle status equal to a father,[826] giving him [legal] precedence in His book over the less significant mother. Had God chosen these women according to their degree of kinship, Āminah[827] would be the closest womb relation, the greatest claim, and, one day, would have been the first to enter the Garden. God's choice of his creatures, however, is based on His knowing what will proceed from them and on His selecting the best of them. As for what you have to say about Abū Tālib's mother, Fāṭimah,[828] and her maternity, the fact is that God did not bless with Islam any of her offspring, not a single daughter or son. Had anyone been blessed with Islam through kinship, it would have been ʿAbdallāh,[829] who most deserves every good in this world and the Hereafter. Yet God's way is to choose for His religion whomever He wills, as when He said, "You do not guide whom you like, rather God guides whom He [212] wills. He best knows those who are rightly guided."[830] God, in fact, sent Muḥammad, who had four uncles,[831] sending down on him the revelation, "Admonish your nearest relatives."[832] Muḥammad admonished them and summoned them [to Islam]. Two of them responded,[833] one of whom was my forefather. Two of them re-

825. On this argument, see Sourdel, "Appels et programmes," 121.

826. Li'anna allāha ja'ala al-ʿamma aban. Further to this central argument for ʿAbbāsid hegemony, see Bosworth, "Al-Maqrīzī's Epistle," 43.

827. Āminah bt. Wahb b. ʿAbd Manāf was the mother of Muḥammad. EI^{2}, s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt).

828. See note 810.

829. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, the father of the Prophet. EI^{2}, s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt).

830. Qur'ān 28:56.

831. Abū Ṭālib, al-ʿAbbās, Ḥamzah, and ʿAbd al-ʿUzzah (Abū Lahab). EI^{2}, s.v. Muḥammad (F. Buhl and A. T. Welch).

832. Qur'ān 26:214.

833. Ḥamzah and al-ʿAbbās. Their respective conversions are related in Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 131–32, 546 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah 184–85, 811.

fused,[834] one of whom was your forefather. So God severed Muḥammad's line of [spiritual] inheritance (wilāyah) from these two, placing between them and Muḥammad neither pact nor protection nor inheritance. You claim that you are the descendant of the persons with the lightest punishment in the Fire, descendant of the best of the bad. But in ingratitude to God there is no [such thing as a] small degree, nor is there lightness or triviality in God's punishment. There is no élite in evil. It is not fitting for a believer who believes in God to take pride in the Fire. But you shall go, and you shall find out: "Those who do evil shall come to know by what kind of reversal they will be overturned."[835] As to your boast about Fāṭimah, the [grand]mother of ʿAlī, and that Hāshim is his paternal ancestor on two counts and that Fāṭimah is the mother of Ḥasan, and that ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib is his paternal ancestor twice over, and further, that the Prophet is your paternal ancestor on two counts: The fact is that God's Messenger is the best of those of the beginning and the end, and to him Hāshim has only one lineage connection, as does ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. You claim to be at the very center of Banū Hāshim lineage, their purest both maternally and paternally, unbegotten by foreigners, your bloodlines undiluted by concubines. Apparently, you hold yourself superior to the Banū Hāshim, one and all. But look—woe upon you—where you will be with God tomorrow! Truly, you have gone beyond all bounds. You even hold yourself superior to one who was better than you in his essence (nafs) and his lineage, in the beginning and in the end, i.e., Ibrāhīm,[836] son of the Messenger of God, and [see yourself] superior, therefore, to the father who begot him! In particular, the best of your forefather's sons and the most excellent people among them are nothing but con-

834. Abū Ṭālib and Abū Lahab. The former became Muḥammad's guardian after the death of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib and supported him against Qurashī opposition. Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 79, 118–27 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah 114–15, 166–77.

835. Qur'ān 26:227.

836. Ibrāhīm was the Prophet's son by his Coptic wife Māriyah. EI[2], s.v. Māriya (F. Buhl).

cubines' sons. After the death of God's Messenger there [213] was no one born among you who was more excellent than ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn,[837] yet he was the son of a concubine. He was certainly better than your grandfather, Ḥasan b. Ḥasan. After ʿAlī there was no one among you to equal his son, Muḥammad b. ʿAlī,[838] yet his grandmother was a concubine. He was certainly better than your father. Further, there is no one the equal of his son, Jaʿfar,[839] yet his grandmother was a concubine. He is certainly better than you. Whereas you say that you are the descendant of God's Messenger, God in His book says, "Muḥammad was not the father of anyone among your men."[840] You are the descendants of his daughter, which is a close kinship. But it does not legitimate inheritance,[841] nor does it bequeath the wilāyah, neither does it confer the imāmah on her. So how could it be inherited from her? Your forefather sought her [in marriage] by every means. Then although he brought her forth during the day, he treated her rudely in private and buried her at night.[842] The people, however, insisted that the two shaykhs[843] be given their preeminence. Further, the tradition, with no disagreement among Muslims, has come down that the grandfather, i.e., the mother's father, and the maternal uncle and aunt do not inherit.[844] You boast about ʿAlī and his precedence,[845] yet when the Messenger of God was dying,

837. Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, the fourth imām, whose mother is said to have been a daughter of Yazdigird, the last Sāsānid king. Her name is given us Sulāfah. Ṭabarī, III, 2331; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 267; Dhahabī, Siyar, IV, 386.

838. Abū Jaʿfar Muḥammad b. ʿAlī (d. 114/732), known as Muḥammad al-Bāqir, was the grandson of Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī and acknowledged as the fifth imām of the Ithnā ʿasharī line. EI[1], s.v. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī (F. Buhl).

839. Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq. See note 600, above.

840. Qurʾān 33:40.

841. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 539: lā yajūzu lahā al-mīrāth. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII.

842. Wa-marraḍahā sirran. Dozy, Supplément, II, 590. Veccia Vaglieri, EI[2], s.v. Fāṭima, refers to traditions that mention ʿAlī's harsh treatment of his wife, her nighttime burial, and Abū Bakr's and ʿUmar's initial ignorance of her death.

843. I.e., Abū Bakr and ʿUmar.

844. For Muslim laws of succession and the division of inheritances, (farāʾiḍ), see Schacht, Islamic Law, 169–74.

845. I.e., his record of early commitment of Islam.

he commanded someone else to perform the ritual prayer. Subsequently, the people took one man after another [as caliph] without taking ʿAlī. He was among the six,[846] but all of them passed over him, as a way of keeping him from it [succession to the caliphate]. They did not judge that he had a claim to it. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[847] preferred ʿUthmān to ʿAlī. When ʿUthmān[848] was killed, ʿAlī was suspected of it. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr fought him, while Saʿd[849] refused to give him the oath of allegiance and even shut his door to him. Saʿd then gave the oath of allegiance to Muʿāwiyah[850] after his death. ʿAlī sought the caliphate in every way and fought for it. But his associates split off from him, and his partisans had misgivings about him [even] before the arbitration. Then ʿAlī decided upon two arbitrators[851] with whom he was satisfied, giving them his pledge and his covenant. But these two decided to depose him. Then there was Ḥasan,[852] who sold his claim to Muʿāwiyah for a few gaudy robes and some cash[853] and [214] took himself off to the Ḥijāz. He submitted his faction to the hand of Muʿāwiyah, handing affairs over to those who were not worthy of them [i.e., the Umayyads] and taking money from those who had no right [legally or spiritu-

846. The shūrā, or electoral body, was comprised of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf, al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām, Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh, Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, and ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

847. Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf was an early Qurashī convert and, as one of the six-member shūrā, instrumental in the appointment of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān as the third caliph. EI[2], s.v. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (M. T. Houtsma and W. Montgomery Watt); Ṭabarī, I, 2776–97.

848. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, the third caliph. EI[1], s.v. (G. Levi Della Vida).

849. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ was an early Meccan convert who later led the conquest of central Iraq and was the founder and first governor of al-Kūfah. When ʿAlī became caliph, Saʿd refused to acknowledge him and retired to his estate in al-ʿAqīq, a valley lying near Medina. EI[1], s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen); Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 202–12; Zambaur, Manuel, 42.

850. Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān b. Ḥarb, the first Umayyad caliph. EI[2], s.v. (M. Hinds).

851. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ and Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī, who negotiated for Muʿāwiyah and ʿAlī respectively in the aftermath of the battle of Ṣiffīn.

852. Al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib (d. 49/669) was the second Shīʿī imām. In 40/660 he renounced his claim to the caliphate in favor of Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. EI[2], s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

853. Bi-khiraqin wa-darāhima.

ally] to it [in the first place].[854] If you have anything to do with it, you too will sell it and take its price. Further, your uncle Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī[855] rebelled against Ibn Marjānah.[856] But the people fought with Ibn Marjānah against Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī until they had killed him and brought his head to Ibn Marjānah. Then you rebelled against the Umayyads, but they massacred you, crucified you on palm trunks, burned you in fires, and expelled you from the lands, so that Yaḥyā b. Zayd[857] was slain in Khurāsān. The Umayyads killed your men and took the children and women captive, transporting them to Syria in uncushioned litters[858] like enslaved prisoners of war. Consequently, we went forth against them, seeking to avenge you and to attain your blood retaliation. We made you heirs to their territory and their homes. We even raised the reputation of your ancestor and gave him a place of preeminence. You, however, now make use of that against us as proof. You also suggest [falsely] that we made mention of your forefather and gave precedence to him only so that we could set him ahead of Ḥamzah, al-ʿAbbās,[859] and Jaʿfar.[860] But it is not as you suppose. In fact, these men left the earth unblemished, [their reputa-

854. Min ghayra wulātihi. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII.

855. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī was the grandson of the prophet Muḥammad and the third Shīʿī imām, whose challenge to the accession of Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah as caliph concluded in the massacre at Karbalāʾ on 10 Muḥarram 61/680. EI^{2}, s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

856. ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān or b. Abīhi was the Umayyad governor of al-Kūfah charged with thwarting Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī's claim to the caliphate. He himself was killed six years after the battle of Karbalāʾ by Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar in an engagement fought at al-Jāzir on 10 Muḥarram 67/686. EI^{1}, s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen).

857. Yaḥyā b. Zayd was the grandson of ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn and an imām for the Zaydīs. He was killed in battle against a force sent by the governor of Khurāsān, Naṣr b. Sayyār. EI^{1}, s.v. (C. Van Arendonk).

858. Bi-lā waṭāʾin fī al-maḥāmil. See Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 570 n. 6.

859. Both were sons of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib and thus among the paternal uncles of the Prophet. The former became the subject of a famous Persian romance. EI^{2}, s.v. Ḥamza b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib (G. M. Meredith-Owens).

860. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib was a cousin of Muḥammad and an older brother of ʿAlī. He is especially remembered for his skillful intervention with the Najāshī during the early Muslim emigration to Abyssinia. EI^{2}, s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

tions] accepted, their virtue agreed upon. Your forefather, however, was afflicted with fighting and war; the Umayyads used to curse him as the unbelievers are cursed in the prescribed prayer. But we argued in support of him and reminded them of his excellence. We have rebuked them and charged them with injustice for the way they defamed him. You know quite well that in the Jāhiliyyah our claim to honor rested on the task of supplying water for the great mass of pilgrims[861] and holding custody of the [well of] Zamzam.[862] This responsibility devolved upon al-ʿAbbās from among his brothers. Your forefather contested it with us, but ʿUmar judged in our favor against him. We have continued to discharge this responsibility in both the Jāhiliyyah and Islam. When the people of Medina were suffering a drought, ʿUmar made entreaties to his Lord[863] and sought His favor only through our forefather, with the consequence that God revived the people and gave them abundant rain to drink. Your fore- [215] father was on the spot, but ʿUmar made no entreaties through him. You know very well that not one of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib's sons outlived the Prophet but al-ʿAbbās, who, from among the Prophet's uncles, was his heir.[864] More than one of the Banū Hāshim has sought this office, but only al-ʿAbbās's descendants attained it. The water-supplying belonged to him, as his inheritance from the Prophet, and the caliphate lies with his progeny. There remains no eminence and excellence in the Jāhiliyyah or in Islam, in this world or in the Hereafter, that al-ʿAbbās does not inherit and bequeath. As for your remarks about Badr, it should be said that [the era] of Islam having ar-

861. Siqāyatu al-ḥajīji al-aʿẓami. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V 541: siqāyatu al-ḥājji al-aʿẓami.

862. A well within the precincts of the Great Mosque of Mecca, which Muslim tradition attributes to the angel Gabriel's intervention on behalf of Hājar and her son Ismāʿīl. EI[1], s.v. (B. Carra de Vaux); Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 8–9.

863. Ṣalāt al-istisqāʾ is the technical designation applied to supplication for rain in periods of great drought. T. Fahd, EI[2], s.v. Istiskāʾ, mentions the occasion on which ʿUmar led the istisqāʾ prayer by holding the hand of al-ʿAbbās. See also the account in Ṭabarī, I, 2574–75.

864. Al-ʿAbbās lived until 32/652–53.

rived, al-ʿAbbās supplied Abū Ṭālib and his family with provisions and lavished money on them when disaster befell. Were it not for al-ʿAbbās's[865] being sent forth to Badr reluctantly, Ṭālib and ʿAqīl[866] would have died starving and licking the bowls of ʿUtbah and Shaybah.[867] He was one of those who give sustenance to others (muṭʿimīn).[868] He thus took from you shame and disgrace and gave you instead a sufficiency of support and provisions. Moreover, he even ransomed ʿAqīl on the day of Badr, so how can you hold yourself superior to us when we have sustained you in [the time of] unbelief and ransomed you from captivity? We have far outreached you with our forefathers' noble deeds. We, not you, are heirs to the Seal of the Prophets.[869] We sought to avenge you and secured what you were incapable of obtaining for yourselves. May the peace and compassion of God be upon you![870]

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Ibn al-Qasrī[871] decided to betray Muḥammad, so he said to him, "Commander of the Faithful, send Mūsā b.
[216] ʿAbdallāh together with Rizām, my mawlā, to Syria that they

865. References to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib's alleged early, but concealed, conversion to Islam, and to his allegedly forced participation with the Qurashī contingent at Badr may be found in Ṭabarī, I, 1324, 1339, 1344. See also Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 320 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 475, where al-ʿAbbās leads the list of those Quraysh who assisted the combatants at Badr.

866. Ṭālib and ʿAqīl were the Prophet's cousins, sons of the latter's uncle and protector Abū Ṭālib b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. According to Ṭabarī, Ṭālib returned to Mecca before the engagement at Badr, while ʿAqīl and Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith were the two nephews ransomed by al-ʿAbbās. Ṭabarī, I, 1308, 1344–45; Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 338 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 513; *EI*², s.v. ʿAḳīl b. Abī Ṭālib (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

867. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah and Shaybah b. Rabīʿah of the clan of ʿAbd Shams were among the leading Meccans killed at Badr. Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 337 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 507; Ṭabarī, I, 1332–34, 1338.

868. For a list of the Meccan muṭʿimūn, see Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 320–21.

869. For a discussion of the Qur'ānic basis of caliphal authority that draws largely upon the sources used in Ṭabarī's tafsīr, see Qāḍī, "The Term 'Khalīfa.' "

870. Van Arendonk, Débuts, 53 = Opkomst, 48, notes a perhaps apocryphal reply by Muḥammad to his letter, which is conserved in a Leiden manuscript of the Kitāb al-Maṣābīḥ by Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Ḥasanī.

871. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī. See pp. 107–12.

may summon people to your cause." Muḥammad sent the two of them, and Rizām left with Mūsā for Syria. Muḥammad found out, however, that al-Qasrī had written to Abū Jaʿfar about his affair, so he imprisoned him, along with a group who sided with him, in the Dār Ibn Hishām, which lay south of the oratory used for funeral processions, which today belongs to Faraj the Eunuch. In the meantime, Rizām brought Mūsā to Syria and then slipped away from him and went on to Abū Jaʿfar. Mūsā wrote to Muḥammad, "I am reporting to you that I have now encountered Syria and its people. The mildest statement was that of one who said, 'By God, we've become so fed up with misfortune and so weary of it that there can be no place for us [Syrians] in this affair. We have no need of it.' Among them is a group who swear that 'if we awake from tonight or reach evening tomorrow, that will improve our lot greatly and be a very good omen for us.' I have written to you even though I've had to hide my face and been in fear of my life."

According to al-Ḥārith: It is said that Mūsā, Rizām, and ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Miswar[872] headed off for Syria at the head of a cohort. When they got to Taymāʾ,[873] Rizām stayed behind in order to buy provisions for them. He then rode on to Iraq while Mūsā and his confederates went back to Medina.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh informed me in Baghdad—Rizām being present as well—as follows: "Muḥammad sent Rizām and me to Syria in command of the men who accompanied us so that we could summon people to his cause. We were in Dawmat al-Jandal[874] when a massive heat wave hit us. We therefore got down from our riding animals and bathed in a pool. Rizām unsheathed his sword and then stood behind me, crying, "O Mūsā, do you think that if I were to behead you and then take your head to Abū Jaʿfar that anyone would stand as well with him

872. See note 743.

873. Taymāʾ was an oasis city in the northwestern section of the Arabian peninsula that lies between Wādī al-Qurā and Syria. EI[1], s.v. Taimāʾ (F. Buhl); Cornu, Répertoires, 93; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 67.

874. Dawmat al-Jandal, or Dūmat al-Jandal, was a North Arabian oasis on the road from Medina to Damascus, about fifteen days' march from the former. EI[2] s.v. Dūmat al-Djandal (L. Veccia Vaglieri); Cornu, Répertoires, 91; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 487–89; Crone, Meccan Trade, 151.

[217] as I?" I said, "You never stop fooling around, Abū Qays. Now sheathe your sword and may God forgive you." He sheathed his sword and we mounted.

Accorrding to ʿĪsā: Mūsā turned back before reaching Syria. ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad and he went to al-Baṣrah, where they were pointed out and detained.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfiʿ b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr—his brother, ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfiʿ the Elder:[875] When Muḥammad made his uprising, my father, Nāfiʿ b. Thābit,[876] did not come to him. Muḥammad thus sent for him, and my father went to him while he was in the Dār Marwān. "O Abū ʿAbdallāh," Muḥammad said, "I did not see you coming to us." Nāfiʿ b. Thābit replied, "I simply have no sympathy for what you intend to do." Muḥammad kept on at him, insisting, "At least wear your arms so that others will follow your example." "O fellow," exclaimed Ibn Nāfiʿ, "By God, I judge you're on a bad bet: You have made an uprising in a region in which there is no money or troops or mounts or weapons. But I'm not going to destroy myself with you or help [others] to shed my blood." "Go away," said Muḥammad. "After this you will count for nothing." Nāfiʿ continued to reside there, however, frequenting the mosque until Muḥammad was killed. In fact, Nāfiʿ alone prayed in the mosque of God's Messenger on the day Muḥammad was killed.

At the time of his uprising Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh sent—ʿUmar reported on the authority of Azhar b. Saʿīd b. Nāfiʿ—al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah to Mecca as its governor. With al-Ḥasan was al-ʿAbbās b. al-Qāsim, a member of Abū Lahab's[877] family. Al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh [Abū Jaʿfar's governor of Mecca] did not become aware of their presence until they were near to Mecca. He went out to them, and his mawlā said to him, "What do you think we should do now that we've come so close to them?" "Flee, all of you, with God's blessing," said al-Sarī, "and meet me at Bi'r Maymūn."[878] They did so, and al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah entered Mecca. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ṣakhr, a member of the Uways family, left the same night and reached Abū Jaʿfar in nine days. He reported to the caliph, who said, "The Qārah are fair to those who shoot at them." Then he rewarded him with 300 dirhams.[879]

875. Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 371–74, identifies him among those from whom his brother transmitted as ʿAbdallāh b. Nāfiʿ al-Kabīr (rather than al-Akbar).

876. Nāfiʿ b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, grandson of the man who rebelled against the Umayyads in Mecca and was defeated in 72/692 by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf after a six-month siege. EI^{2}, s.v. ʿAbdallāh b. Zubayr (H. A. R. Gibb).

877. Abū Lahab ʿAbd al-ʿUzzah, a paternal uncle of Muḥammad, withdrew clan protection from the Prophet after the death of Abū Ṭālib. For this he was excoriated in the Qurʾān, in sūrat al-Masad [111], which draws one of its other titles from his sobriquet of Abū Lahab, meaning "Father of the Flame." EI^{2}, s.v. (W. Montgomery Watt).

According to ʿUmar— Ayyūb b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ [218]
b. Muʿāwiyah—his father: I was with Muḥammad at the time when he gave al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah charge of Mecca. Al-Ḥasan asked him, "Do you think there will be heavy fighting between us and the people in Mecca? What are your thoughts about al-Sarī?" "O al-Ḥasan," Muḥammad said, "al-Sarī has always shunned what we find hateful, loathing what Abū Jaʿfar has done. If you are victorious over him, then don't kill him or upset his people or seize his possessions. If he gets away from you, don't try to track him down."

ʿUmar continued: Al-Ḥasan said to Muḥammad, "O Commander of the Faithful, I never thought you'd say such things about someone from the family of al-ʿAbbās." Muḥammad replied, "But I do. Al-Sarī has always been angry at what Abū Jaʿfar did."

According to ʿUmar—ʿUmar b. Rāshid, the mawlā of the ʿAnj: I was in Mecca, and at the time when he made his uprising, Muḥammad dispatched to us al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah, al-Qāsim b. Isḥāq, and Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAnbasah, who was called "Abū Jabrah." Al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah was in command of them. Against them al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh sent his secretary, Miskīn b. Hilāl, at the head of 1000, a mawlā of his, Miskīn b. Nāfiʿ, commanding another 1000, and a man from Mecca called Ibn Faras (who was renowned for his bravery), leading yet another 700. Al-Sarī gave Ibn Faras 500 dīnārs. The opposing forces met at Baṭn 878. Bi'r Maymūn was a well near Mecca whose precise location is unclear. It is later mentioned in Ṭabarī, III, 456, as the site of al-Manṣūr's death. *EI*², s.v. (G. Rentz); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 302; Masʿūdī, Murūj, 6, 157.

879. Qārah was a tribal group belonging to al-Hawn b. Khuzaymah. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I 49, II, 465. On p. 163 his reward is recorded as 9,000 dirhams.

Adhāḥir,[880] which is located between two passes. One was the pass that leads down to Dhū Ṭuwā[881] and over which the prophet Muḥammad and his Companions came down to Mecca. Therefore it is an entry into the sacred territory. The two groups sent messages to each other. Ḥasan sent word to al-Sarī, saying, "Quit the area between us and Mecca. Do not spill blood[882] in God's sacred territory." The two messengers swore to al-Sarī, saying, "We [219] have waited until Abū Jaʿfar died to come to you." To them al-Sarī replied, "I will take the same oath upon myself [to say] that four days have passed since a messenger from the Commander of the Faithful has come to me. Therefore, grant me a delay of four nights, for I expect another of my messengers. In the meantime, I will undertake to look after you and your riding animals. If what you are saying is true, I will hand Mecca over to you. If it is false, I will strive against you until you conquer me or I conquer you." But al-Ḥasan refused, saying, "We won't delay until we've fought against you." Now with al-Ḥasan were [only] seventy men and seven horse soldiers.[883] When they drew close to al-Sarī, al-Ḥasan said to his troops, "Not one of you should advance until Wathīq[884] blows the trumpet. When he does so, then let your charge be as one." When we [the Meccans] came close to them and al-Ḥasan feared that al-Sarī would overwhelm him and his confederates, he shouted at Wathīq, "For God's sake, blow the trumpet." This he did, and they charged us as one man. Al-Sarī's associates were routed, however, with seven of their soldiers being killed.

According to ʿUmar: Al-Ḥasan overtook them with some horsemen from his forces. Al-Sarī's men were behind the pass 880. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII. Given as Adhākhir in Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 127, and Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 549 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 817.

881. Also vocalized as Dhū Ṭawā in Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 45, it is identified as a site near Mecca that serves as one of the boundary markers for the ḥaram. The Qurʾān, 20:12, 79:16, refers to the valley by the name of Ṭuwā, as the place where God called Moses. See also Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿarab, XV, 21.

882. Second-person pl., following Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 574.

883. For the symbolic use of seven and seventy to express ideas of magnitude or of divine influence, see Conrad, "Seven and the Tasbīʿ."

884. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII, following the subseqent references. Wathīq is mentioned later at III, 267, as one of the leaders of an uprising of blacks in Medina.

with a Qurashī group who had gone forth with them. He reproached them, trying to get them to help him. But when the Qurashīs saw them, they said, "These associates of yours have already been routed." Al-Sarī retorted, "Don't be hasty; wait until the cavalry and the men appear in the mountains." But they asked him what was left, and he admitted, "By the grace of God they have all been routed." They continued to flee until they entered the government compound (dār al-imārah), throwing off their fighting gear, rushed at a soldier named Abū al-Rizām, and entered his house. They were still there when al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah entered the mosque and addressed the people, announcing to them the death of Abū Jaʿfar and calling upon them to support Muḥammad's cause.

According to ʿUmar—Yaʿqūb b. al-Qāsim—al-Ghamr b. Ḥamzah b. Abī Ramlah, al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib's mawlā: When [220] al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah seized Mecca and al-Sarī fled, the news reached Abū Jaʿfar, and he said, "Poor old Ibn Abī al-ʿAḍal [i.e. al-Sarī]!"

According to ʿUmar—Ibn Abī Musāwir b. ʿAbdallāh b. Musāwir, the mawlā of the Banū Nāʾilah from the Banū ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿayṣ:[885] I was in Mecca with al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh when al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah reached him before Muḥammad's uprising. At that time al-Sarī was actually in al-Ṭāʾif, and his deputy in Mecca was Ibn Surāqah from the Banū ʿAdī b. Kaʿb.[886] Ibn Surāqah appealed to ʿUtbah b. Abī Khidāsh al-Lahabī for assistance against al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah in the matter of a debt that al-Ḥasan owed to him. ʿUtbah thus placed al-Ḥasan in confinement. Al-Sarī wrote to Ibn Abī Khidāsh on his behalf: "Now then, you've made a mess of things[887] and struck a bad judgment for yourself when you imprisoned Ibn Muʿāwiyah but got only money from his brother." Al-Sarī then wrote to Ibn Surāqah ordering him to release al-Ḥasan, and he wrote to [al-Ḥasan] b.

885. The Leiden text's vocalization; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 27, 28, II, 383, gives Maʿīṣ b. ʿĀmir and identifies them as a clan of ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy.

886. ʿAdī b. Kaʿb b. Luʾayy was a clan of Quraysh. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 4, 26, II, 139; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 150–59.

887. Fa-qad akhtaʾta ḥazzaka. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVII.

Muʿāwiyah telling him to stay there until he arrived and made a decision about his situation.

According to ʿUmar: Not long after this Muḥammad made his uprising, and al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah set out for al-Sarī as [Muḥammad's] governor of Mecca. Al-Sarī was told that, lo and behold, Ibn Muʿāwiyah had drawn near, to which he replied, "Surely he won't do anything, given my efforts on his behalf. In fact, how could the people of Medina come out against me? By God, there is no house in the city where some kind act of mine has not penetrated." He was told that al-Ḥasan had already established himself [in the city], so he came back [from al-Ṭāʾif].

According to ʿUmar: Ibn Jurayj[888] went to al-Ḥasan, and he said to him, "Listen here, fellow, you'll never get into Mecca. Its people are on al-Sarī's side. Do you think you can conquer Quraysh and force it to give up its home!" Al-Ḥasan replied, "O weaver's son, are you trying to scare me with the people of Mecca? By God, I shall either pass the night there or die outside it!" At this, he leapt up at the head of his associates as al-Sarī approached him, [221] and he confronted him in Fakhkh.[889] One of al-Ḥasan's men struck al-Sarī's secretary, Miskīn b. Hilāl, on the head and split it open. Al-Sarī and his confederates were put to flight, and al-Ḥasan's men entered Mecca. Abū al-Rizām, one of the Banū ʿAbd al-Dār[890] from the family of Saybah, took al-Sarī under his protection,[891] keeping him hidden in his house as al-Ḥasan entered Mecca. In fact, al-Ḥasan stayed in Mecca for only a short time. Then a letter arrived from Muḥammad ordering al-Ḥasan to join him.

---

888. Abū Walīd or Abū Khālid ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Jurayj (d. 150/767) was a Meccan muḥaddith and faqīh; he is often cited as among the first to produce an ordered collection of ḥadīths. Cf. Goldziher, Muslim Studies, II, 196–97, who qualifies this assertion. *EI*², Suppl., s.v. Ibn Djuraydj (Ch. Pellat); GAS, I, 91; Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, 21–22.

889. Fakhkh, sometimes known as Wādī al-Zāhir, was a place near Mecca that was to become the site of a related ʿAlid insurrection in 169/786 led by al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, Ṣāḥib Fakhkh. *EI*², s.v. (L. Veccia Vaglieri); Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 237–38.

890. The Banū ʿAbd al-Dār b. Quṣayy were a clan of Quraysh; they are first mentioned by Ṭabarī, I, 1137, in connection with the rebuilding of the Kaʿbah during the Prophet's lifetime. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 4, II, 123; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 125–28.

891. Wa-iltaffa Abū al-Rizām . . . ʿalā al-Sarī. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. laffa.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Isḥāq b. al-Qāsim: I heard countless of our associates mention that when al-Ḥasan and al-Qāsim took Mecca, they equipped themselves and gathered a large force. Then they went forth to meet Muḥammad and to assist him against ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. As their deputy in Mecca, they left a descendant of the Anṣār. In Qudayd,[892] news of Muḥammad's death met them. At this, people began to slip away from them. Al-Ḥasan took off for Basqah, there being in the sands a stony area called the Basqah of Qudayd.[893] He met up with Ibrāhīm and remained in al-Baṣrah until Ibrāhīm was killed. Al-Qāsim b. Isḥāq also headed toward Ibrāhīm. When he was in Yadīʿ,[894] in the region of Fadak, news of Ibrāhīm's death reached him. He therefore went back to Medina and remained hidden until the daughter of ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar, the wife of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, obtained for him and for his brother a guarantee of safety. Then the sons of Muʿāwiyah came out of hiding,[895] and al-Qāsim did so as well.

According to ʿUmar—ʿUmar b. Rāshid, the mawlā of ʿAnj: When al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah had triumphed over al-Sarī, he halted a little while until the letter from Muḥammad came to him [222] with orders to join him, and also reporting to him that ʿĪsā had drawn close to Medina and urging him to be quick in getting there.

According to ʿUmar: Al-Ḥasan left Mecca in a heavy rain on Monday, which they assert is the day on which Muḥammad was killed. One of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's couriers met up with him in Amaj,[896] a watering place of the Khuzāʿah [tribe] that lies between ʿUsfān[897] and Qudayd, with the news of Muḥammad's death. Hearing this, al-Ḥasan fled, as did his associates.

---

892. Qudayd was a Ḥijāzī site, also known as al-Khaym or Khaym Umm Maʿbad, on the route from Mecca to Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 313–14; Cornu, Répertoires, 76, 82.

893. Like ḥarrah, the word basqah connotes an area of lava flow and volcanic debris. Groom, Arabic Topography, 59.

894. Yadīʿ was a district between Fadak and Khaybar. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 433.

895. Fa-ẓahara with Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 576. The Leiden text has faṣaharahu.

896. Amaj was a site in the area of Khulayṣ. Cornu, Répertoires, 70; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 249.

897. ʿUsfān was a watering place on the route from Mecca to Medina and was thus called, according to Yāqūt, because a stream cut randomly through it. Cornu, Répertoires, 88; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV 121–22.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Thābit—Abū Sayyār: I was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's chamberlain, and a rider came to me at night and said, "I have just arrived from al-Baṣrah. Ibrāhīm has already made his uprising there and has taken control of the city." I went first to the Dār Marwān and then to the place where Muḥammad was staying. I banged on the door, and Muḥammad shouted at the top of his lungs, "Who's there?" "Abū Sayyār," I said. "There is no might and no power except in God,"[898] he responded. "O God, I seek protection with You from the evil of knockers in the night except from the one who knocks on Your behalf bringing good." He then added, "Is it good?" "It is," I said. He asked, "What is behind your call?" I answered, "Ibrāhīm has seized al-Baṣrah." Now, when Muḥammad said the sunset and the dawn prayer, someone would shout aloud, "Pray to God for your brothers among the people of al-Baṣrah and for al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah, and ask His assistance against your enemy."

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: A Syrian by the name of Abū ʿAmr came to us and stayed at our house. My father kept asking him, "What to do you think of this fellow?" To this Abū ʿAmr would answer, "When I've met him and sounded him out, then I'll let you know." Sometime later my father encountered Abū ʿAmr and questioned him. "By God," responded Abū ʿAmr, "he's a man all right, but I saw that the fat on his back was a yard thick. That's not how a true warrior looks." Yet afterward Abū ʿAmr gave Muḥammad the oath of allegiance and fought with him.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Salm,[899] the [223] mawlā of al-Manṣūr who went by the name Ibn al-Bawwāb: Abū Jaʿfar wrote a letter, as if from the tongue of Muḥammad, to al-Aʿmash,[900] calling upon him for help. When he read it, al-Aʿmash said, "We know you well, O Banū Hāshim. You are the sort who

898. Wensinck, Concordance, I, 532 s.v. ḥāla.

899. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Salm, identified also as ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. al-Bawwāb, was doorkeeper to the caliph al-Hādī as the deputy of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, and later vizier for Hārūn al-Rashīd and al-Amīn. Ṭabarī, III, 590.

900. Abū Muḥammad Sulaymān b. Mihrān al-Asadī (d. 148/765), a noted scholar of Qurʾān and ḥadīth, was born in Ṭabaristān but lived most of his life in al-Kūfah and died there. The sources differ about whether his transmissions from love bread soup (tharīd)."[901] When the messenger returned to Abū Jaʿfar, he made his report with the statement: "I swear, these are al-Aʿmash's very words."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh had taken over Medina and, getting word of that, we went forth immediately. We were but lads; in fact, at that time I was only fifteen years old. We reached him when people had already gathered around to get a look at him. No one was being held back from him, so I got up close and took a good, long look at him. He was on horseback, wearing a pleated white shirt and a white turban. He was a broad-chested man with a face scarred by smallpox. His next move was to send someone off to Mecca. That city was seized in his name, and its people donned white.[902] He sent his brother, Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh, to al-Baṣrah. Ibrāhīm occupied that city and brought it under his control, so its people put on white as well.

The account now returns to that transmitted by ʿUmar:

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: The Commander of the Faithful, Abū Jaʿfar, put ʿĪsā b. Mūsā in charge of the fight against Muḥammad, saying, "I don't care which of those two kills the other." The caliph gave ʿĪsā 4,000 soldiers detached from the army and sent with him Muḥammad, the son of Abū al-ʿAbbās, [the late] Commander of the Faithful.[903]

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Shaybān—Zayd, the mawlā of Mismaʿ: When Abū Jaʿfar ordered ʿĪsā b. Mūsā to present himself, the latter said, "Seek the advice of your uncles." "Get going, fellow," retorted Abū Jaʿfar. "By God, no one is intended other than you or me. Either you must go, or I must." ʿĪsā therefore traveled until he reached us in Medina.

Anas b. Mālik are legitimate. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 342–44; Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 226–48; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 429–31; Van Arendonk, Débuts, 309–10, 315–16 = Opkomst, 283, 288.

901. A soup made of bread, broth, and vegetables, it was counted among the favorite dishes of the Prophet Muḥammad. Wensinck, Concordance, I, 290; *EI*², s.v. Ghidhā' (M. Rodinson); Waines, "Cereals, Bread, and Society, 266."

902. White was the color associated with ʿAlid support. Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, II, 51; cf. ʿAthamina, "Black Banners," 323–24.

903. See note 394.

[224] According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Shaybān: Abū Jaʿfar summoned Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī who, though leprous for many years, was very knowledgeable about warfare.[904] He had even been on the battlefield with Marwān. The caliph said to him, "O Jaʿfar, Muḥammad has now come out in open revolt. What are your thoughts on this?" "Where did he make his uprising?" asked Jaʿfar. "In Medina," replied Abū Jaʿfar. At this Jaʿfar exclaimed, "Praise God, he has staged his revolt in a place where he will find no resources, no men, no weapons, and no mounts. Send one of your mawlās in whom you have confidence. Have him go as far as Wādī al-Qurā.[905] From there he can prevent Syrian provisions from reaching Muḥammad, who will starve to death where he is. The caliph did as Jaʿfar advised.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Rāshid b. Yazīd: I heard our associates Ismāʿīl b. Mūsā,[906] ʿĪsā b. al-Naḍr,[907] and others mention that Abū Jaʿfar sent Kathīr b. Ḥuṣayn al-ʿAbdī on ahead. Kathīr camped at Fayd and entrenched himself against Muḥammad until the time of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's arrival. Then Kathīr went on to Medina with ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. ʿAbdallāh added, "I actually saw the trench still there for a long time, but eventually it was obliterated and disappeared."

According to ʿUmar—Yaʿqūb b. al-Qāsim—ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib whom I encountered in Ṣanʿāʾ:[908] At the time when he sent him against Muḥammad. Abū Jaʿfar said to ʿĪsā, "You must let Abū al-ʿAskar Mismaʿ b. Muḥammad b. Shaybān b. Mālik b. Mismaʿ[909] travel with you. I once saw him hold Saʿīd b. ʿAmr b.

---

904. Further to this conversation see Lassner, "Provincial Administration: Governors of the Ḥaramayn," 44–45.

905. Wādī al-Qurā was the valley that lay northwest of Medina as a principal corridor to Syria. Its Jewish inhabitants were defeated by the Prophet Muḥammad in 7/628. EI[1], s.v. Wādi -l-Ḳurā (A. Grohmann); Cornu, Répertoires, 88; Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 345.

906. Ismāʿīl b. Mūsā al-Bajalī al-Sammān.

907. Both Ismāʿīl b. Mūsā and ʿĪsā b. al-Naḍr share the professional designation al-Sammān, i.e. "butter merchant."

908. Ṣanʿāʾ is the present-day Yemeni capital. It is situated on a broad plain in the Sarāt chain. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 425–31; EI[1], s.v. (R. Strothmann); Cornu, Répertoires, 84.

909. Abū al-ʿAskar Mismaʿ b. Muḥammad was a descendant of one of the leading households of Umayyad al-Baṣrah. Crone, Slaves, 118; Morony, Iraq, 257.

Jaʿdah b. Hubayrah back from the people of al-Baṣrah, who were ready to rally against him[910] when he was recruiting for Marwān. Saʿīd stayed, instead, with Abū al-ʿAskar, eating sugared marrow." ʿĪsā therefore went forth in the company of Mismaʿ. When ʿĪsā was in Baṭn Nakhl,[911] Mismaʿ and al-Masʿūdī b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd[912] stayed behind until Muḥammad was killed. When Abū Jaʿfar heard about that, he said to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, "I hope you behead him!" [225]

According to ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib—his father: As he was bidding him farewell, Abū Jaʿfar said to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā,[913] "ʿĪsā, I am sending you to what is between these two—and he pointed to his two sides [i.e., to what I hold most important]—so if you can subdue the fellow, then sheathe your sword and offer a general amnesty. But if he gets away, then make them a surety for him until they bring him to you. They will know where he goes." When ʿĪsā entered Medina, that is what he did.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: Abū Jaʿfar dispatched ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās against Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh in Medina. With him he sent Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās, son of the [former] Commander of the Faithful, and a number of the Khurāsānī commanders and their troops. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah al-Ṭāʾī[914] headed ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's vanguard. The caliph supplied them with horses, mules, weapons, and provisions, leaving nothing unprovided.[915] Along with ʿĪsā b. Mūsā he dispatched Ibn Abī al-Karrām al-

910. Muḥlibūn ʿalayhi, with Lane, Lexicon, II, 624.

911. Baṭn Nakhl was a stage on the route from al-Baṣrah to Medina. Ṭabarī, III, 267, 557, later specifies its situation as about two nights' journey, or thirty (farsakhs), from Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 449–50; Cornu, Répertoires, 71.

912. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVIII. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Hudhalī al-Masʿūdī was a Kūfan muḥaddith and faqīh who died in 165/781. Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 93–95; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 163; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 195–96.

913. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 544.

914. See note 48.

915. Fa-lam yatruk lahu shayʾan, following the suggested emendation in note b. The text reads fa-lam yanzil, which could mean "and ʿĪsā did not break his march," i.e., he was so well equipped that he did not need to make the usual halts to gather reinforcements.

Jaʿfarī,[916] one of Abū Jaʿfar's inner circle and favorably disposed to the ʿAbbāsids. Abū Jaʿfar had confidence in him and therefore sent him. . . .[917]

The account returns to that of ʿUmar b. Shabbah.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Abū Jaʿfar wrote to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, "Write down for me the names of those members of the Abū Ṭālib family who actually meet with you. As for those who do not, confiscate their property." ʿĪsā therefore seized the spring of Abū Ziyād because Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad [i.e. Abū Ziyād][918] stayed hidden away from him. But at the time of Abū Jaʿfar's arrival, Jaʿfar spoke with him and asked about his property. The caliph retorted, "Your Mahdī has already seized it."

[226] According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: When ʿĪsā got as far as Fayd, he wrote [messages] on strips of silk to certain leading men of Medina, including ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Muṭṭalib al-Makhzūmī and ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥī.[919] When his letters arrived in Medina, many people broke away from Muḥammad, including ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Muṭṭalib. He, however, was seized and brought back. He stayed for a short while and then left again but was returned yet another time. His brother ʿAlī b. al-Muṭṭalib[920] was among Muḥammad's strongest supporters. He kept talking to Muḥammad about his brother until he persuaded Muḥammad to leave him alone.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: ʿĪsā b. Mūsā wrote to my father on a piece of yellow silk, which a bedouin brought between the soles[921] of his sandals. I saw the bedouin sitting in our house, being at the time but a small boy. He handed the letter to my father.

---

916. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Karrām al-Jaʿfarī appears later in the narrative (pp. 231, 298) as the one who carries Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's head to Abū Jaʿfar and identifies Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh's head for ʿĪsā b. Mūsā.

917. There is a portion missing here from the Algiers manuscript.

918. Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq. See p. 222, where the "spring of Abū Ziyād" (ʿayn Abī Ziyād) is identified as a land grant (qaṭīʿah).

919. ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ṣafwān served as judge of Baghdad under Abū Jaʿfar and governor of Medina under al-Mahdī. He died in 160/776–77. Ṭabarī, III, 458, 460, 469, 482; Zambaur, Manuel, 24, where the governor's name is given as Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, X, 306.

920. ʿAlī b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥanṭab al-Makhzūmī. His brother was judge of Medina. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 563.

921. Bayna khiṣāfay naʿlihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. khaṣafa.

It read thus: "Muḥammad has taken upon himself what God has not bestowed on him and has reached out for what God has not given to him. In His book God said, 'Say: O God, Master of sovereignty, You give sovereignty to whom You will and You strip sovereignty from whom You will. You exalt whom You will and You abase whom You will. In Your hand is what is good. You have power over everything'."[922] [The letter concluded:] "Be quick to get it over with! Less waiting and watching! Call upon those of your people who obey you to go forth with you."

According to ʿUmar: He went off along with ʿUmar b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar and Abū ʿAqīl Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAqīl. They called upon al-Afṭas Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib to join them, but he refused, maintaining a steadfast allegiance to Muḥammad. Muḥammad was told that they had left, so he sent for their camels and confiscated them. ʿUmar b. Muḥammad thus came to Muḥammad and said, "You summon [people] to justice and to the repudiation of tyranny. Why then were my camels seized? I had just prepared them for a major or lesser Pilgrimage. Muḥammad handed the camels over to him and then they left under cover of the same night, [227] meeting up with ʿĪsā four or five nights out of Medina.

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar b. Abī ʿAmr b. Nuʿaym b. Māhān—his father: Abū Jaʿfar wrote letters to certain leading Qurashīs and others and ordered ʿĪsā to send the letters to them when he got near to Medina. Accordingly, as ʿĪsā drew close, he sent the letter to their intended recipients. Muḥammad's guardsmen, however, seized both the messenger and the letters. Among them Muḥammad found a letter to Ibrāhīm b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar and to a number of Qurashī leaders. Muḥammad sent for us all, except Ibn ʿUmar and Abū Bakr b. Abī Sabrah.[923] We were confined in the Dār Ibn Hishām, which was near the oratory. My father continued: Muḥammad sent for me and for my brother, and we were brought forward and beaten 300 times each. As he was beating me and saying, "You meant to kill me," I said to him, "I spared you when you were keeping yourself hidden behind a rock and in a tent. But finally, at the point when Medina came into your hand and your position became harsh, I stood against you. With whom should I stand? I have no intention of losing my power, or my possessions, or my kinfolk [for your sake]." Then Muḥammad ordered us[924] back to prison, and we were fettered with leg irons and chains amounting to eighty raṭls[925] in weight. Muḥammad b. ʿAjlān[926] went to see Muḥammad and said, "I have beaten these two men viciously and so completely fettered them that they cannot pray the ritual prayer." Ayyūb b. ʿUmar's father and brother remained imprisoned until the arrival of ʿĪsā.

922. Qur'ān, 3:26.

923. Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sabrah was a muḥaddith and judge of Mecca under al-Manṣūr. He died in Baghdad in 162/778. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, X, 228; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 29; Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 330–32; Van Arendonk, Débuts, 312 = Opkomst, 286.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Thābit—ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥakam:[927] As ʿĪsā was drawing near Medina, we were with Muḥammad one night when he said, "Give me your advice. Should I get out of here or should I stay?"[928] His followers differed, so he turned to [228] me and said, "Tell me what to do, Ibn Abī Jaʿfar." "Don't you know," I said, "that you are in the land of God least endowed with horses, food, and weapons and the most deficient in manpower?" "Yes, I do," he replied. "Don't you know," I said, "that you will be fighting the strongest of God's lands in men and the one with the most wealth and weapons?" "Yes, to be sure," he replied. "The best course, then," I said, "is to proceed to Egypt with those who support you. For I swear that no one there could turn you back, and you could fight the fellow with weapons like his, with mounts like his, with men like his, and with resources like his." At this Ḥunayn b. ʿAbdallāh shouted out, "God forbid that you should leave Medina" and recounted to him the saying of the

924. Thumma amara binā. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVIII.

925. The Baghdādī standard for the raṭl (pl. arṭāl) is the equivalent of about 406 grams, i.e., about one pound. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 31.

926. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. ʿAjlān was a Medinese muḥaddith and faqīh who died in 148/765. He was the mawlā of Fāṭimah bt. Walīd b. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah, whose father and grandfather were killed at the battle of Badr. According to Ṣafadī, Wāfī, IV, 92, his mother was pregnant with him for three years and he was born with developed teeth. Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 317–22; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 303–5; Van Arendonk, Débuts, 312–13 = Opkomst, 286.

927. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXVIII.

928. See Lassner, "Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr," 42–43, who notes this conversation as a parallel to that between Abū Jaʿfar and Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah (p. 186).

Prophet, "I saw myself in an invulnerable breastplate, and I took that to be Medina."[929]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar—someone close whom he trusted: At the time of his uprising, the people of Medina and its environs, as well as certain bedouin tribes such as Juhaynah, Muzaynah, Sulaym,[930] the Banū Bakr,[931] Aslam[932] and Ghifār,[933] responded to Muḥammad. [Unfortunately] he gave precedence to the Juhaynah, which angered the Qaysī tribes.

According to Muḥammad—ʿAbdallāh b. Maʿrūf, one of the descendants of Riyāḥ b. Mālik b. ʿUṣayyah b. Khufāf,[934] who had witnessed this himself: The Banū Sulaym came to Muḥammad under the leadership of their headmen. Their spokesman, Jābir b. Anas al-Riyāḥī, said, "Commander of the Faithful, we are your maternal uncles and your neighbors, and we have weapons and mounts in our possession. By God, Islam came at a time when the Banū Sulaym owned more horses than there were in the Ḥijāz. Indeed, if a bedouin had what remains with us now, the entire desert would be at his disposal. Do not dig a trench. The Messenger of God dug his trench for reasons God knows best. If you dig a trench, the footsoldiers will not be able to fight effectively and the horses will not be able to be moved on our behalf between the lines. Those in front of whom a trench is dug are those who must fight in it, while it prevents them from getting at those against whom it is dug." At this one of the Banū Shujāʿ[935] inter- [229]

929. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 268, gives this as "I saw myself putting my hand into an invulnerable breastplate, whose beginning was in Medina" and dates it to the year of the battle of Uḥud. See Wensinck, Concordance, II, 120.

930. See notes 156, 187, and 123, respectively.

931. Bakr b. Wāʾil were a North Arabian tribal group belonging to Rabīʿah. *EI*², s.v. [W. Caskel]; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 141, II, 223; Donner, "Bakr b. Wāʾil Tribes."

932. Aslam b. Afṣā were a clan of Khuzāʿah, a group of whom became Muslims after meeting the Prophet Muḥammad on his hijrah to Medina. *EI*², s.v. Khuzāʿa [M. J. Kister]; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 200, 201, II, 197; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 240–42.

933. Banū Ghifār b. Mulayk [Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 42, gives Mulayl] b. Ḍamrah b. Bakr were a clan of Kinānah centered in the Ḥijāz between Mecca and Medina. They accepted an alliance with the Prophet and fought with him in the campaign against Mecca. *EI*², s.v. [J. W. Fück] and s.v. Kināna [W. M. Watt].

934. Riyāḥ b. Mālik were a clan of the Banū Sulaym. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 122, II, 488.

935. Ṭabarī, Indices, lists this as a clan of Juhaynah. Their steadfast bravery is given special mention at III, 240, 242, 255. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 531.

vened, saying, "The Messenger of God dug a trench, so follow his way of thinking, or do you intend to set aside the Messenger of God's way for your own?" "O Ibn Shujāʿ," Jābir responded, "nothing weighs more heavily on you and your associates than actually meeting them [in battle], and nothing is more to my liking and that of my associates than fighting them directly." "With the trench," Muḥammad added, "we have simply followed the Messenger of God's footsteps. No one can turn us from him nor will I forsake him."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: When Muḥammad knew for certain that ʿĪsā had advanced, he excavated the trench, the one dug by the Prophet for the confederacies.

According to ʿUmar—Saʿd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar—Muḥammad b. ʿAṭiyyah, the mawlā of the Muṭṭalibīs. When Muḥammad had the trench dug, he rode out to it, wearing a white outer garment and a sash. With him rode the people. When he came to the place, he got down into it and took the lead in digging with his hand, extracting a brick from the Prophet's trench. He shouted Allāhu akbar, as did the people with him, who [also] exclaimed, "Rejoice in victory. This is the trench of your forefather, the Messenger of God."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah—Muṣʿab b. ʿUthmān b. Muṣʿab b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr: As ʿĪsā made camp in al-Aʿwaṣ, Muḥammad ascended the pulpit to praise and glorify God. Then he said, "God's enemy and yours, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, has now encamped at al-Aʿwaṣ. Surely the people with the strongest claim to uphold this religion are the descendants (abnāʾ)[936] of the first Muhājirūn and the Anṣār who assisted them.[937]

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Abī Isḥāq al-ʿAbsī,[938] a shaykh of the Ghaṭafān[939]—Abū ʿAmr, the teacher (muʾaddib) of 936. Often found within the expression abnāʾ al-dawlah, this term became one of special significance for the ʿAbbāsids as a designation for the family members and the descendants of their early Khurāsānī supporters. *EI*², s.v. (B. Lewis).

937. Cf. the sermon on p. 153.

938. He is subsequently identified in Ṭabarī, III, 234, as Ibrāhīm al-Ghaṭafānī.

939. The Banū Ghaṭafān b. Saʿd, a tribal subgroup of Qays ʿAylān, were late in offering allegiance to the Prophet and renounced their alliance in the riddah

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaymān— al-Zubayrī, i.e., ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid, whom Abū Jaʿfar killed: Gathered with Muḥammad was a group whose equal or augment I have never seen. I would estimate that we were 100,000. As ʿĪsā drew close to the city, Muḥammad preached to us, saying, "O people, this man has now come near you with a large force and full war apparatus. I hereby absolve you from your oath of allegiance to me. Whoever wishes to stay may do so. Whoever wishes to leave may do so." People slipped away until Muḥammad was left at the head of a band which was far from numerous. [230]

According to ʿUmar—Mawhūb b. Rashīd b. Ḥayyān b. Abī Sulaymān b. Samʿān, one of the sons of Qarīṭ b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Kilāb—his father: When Muḥammad made his uprising, the people rallied to him. He crowded them together and seized control of the mountain passes so that no one could get out. Hearing that ʿĪsā and Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah had approached, Muḥammad climbed the pulpit and said, "O people, we gathered you together to fight and closed the mountain passes against you. Now this enemy is near to you and at the head of a large force. Victory, however, comes from God, and the affair is in His hand. It seems right to me that I should give you permission [to leave] and open the passes for you. Whoever wishes to remain should stay but whoever wishes to be off may leave." A world of people left, including me. When we were in al-ʿUrayḍ,[940] which is about three mīls from Medina, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's vanguard met up with us just outside of al-Ruḥbah.[941] Their forces looked exactly like a swarm of locusts. We kept going, and ʿĪsā's forces headed for Medina going in the opposite direction to ours.[942]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Many people from Medina left the city with their children and their families for the outlying regions and the mountains. Muḥammad ordered Abū al-Qalammas to bring back those [231] wars. *EI*², s.v. (J. W. Fück); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, II, 274; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 248–49.

---

940. Al-ʿUrayḍ is a district in the ḥarrah area near Medina. Ṭabarī, I, 1365, 1372; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 114.

941. Al-Ruḥbah is a town on the route to Syria that runs through Wādī al-Qurā. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 33.

942. Wa-khālafūnā ilā al-Madīnah. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. khalafa; Dozy, Supplément, I, 396; Lane, Lexicon, II, 794.

whom he could, but a considerable number were impossible to reach, so he left them alone.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—al-Ghāḍirī:[943] Muḥammad asked me, "If I give you a weapon will you fight with me?" "Yes," I said, "if you give me a spear, I shall pierce them with it when they are in al-Aʿwaṣ, a sword and I shall strike them with it when them are in Hayfā."[944] Before very long he sent for me and asked, "What are you waiting for?" "How light a matter for you, may God preserve you!" I said. "If I am killed and people pass by, and someone will say, 'There, by God, was a real desert Arab!' [what will you care?]." Muḥammad replied, "Woe to you, the people of Syria, Iraq, and Khurāsān have already put on white." I said, "[Go ahead and] make the world be white as cream and me black as the pencase's wool! With ʿĪsā in al-Aʿwaṣ, what difference does it make to me?"

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father—his grandfather: Together with ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, Abū Jaʿfar dispatched Ibn al-Aṣamm ["the Deaf"], who attended to his staging posts for him. When they reached the environs of Medina, they settled about a mīl from the mosque of the Messenger of God. Ibn al-Aṣamm said, "Look you, the cavalry have no task alongside the foot soldiers. I am afraid that if the troops leave you exposed, they will penetrate your forces." ʿĪsā therefore moved them up to the watering place of Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik in al-Jurf,[945] which was about four mīls from Medina. He cautioned, "No foot soldier should venture more than two or three mīls beyond until the cavalry catches up with him."

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Muḥammad b. Abī al-Karrām: Having made camp near al-Qadūm,[946] ʿĪsā sent for me in the mid-[232] dle of the night, and I found him sitting with a [lighted] candle and monies in front of him. "Scouts have come to inform me," he said, "that this man is in a weak position, but I fear that he will sally forth. I assume that he has no road but to Mecca. Take for

943. Al-Ghāḍirī al-Muḍḥik.

944. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIX, while the Leiden text reads Hasfā. This is the only reference in Ṭabarī, and it is not cited in Yāqūt.

945. Al-Jurf was a site about three mīls from Medina on the way to Syria. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 128; ʿAlī, "Topography of Medina," 90.

946. Al-Qadūm was a mountain near Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 312.

yourself 500 men and go with them toward Mecca, yet veering from the road until you come to the tree. Then stay there." ʿĪsā b. Mūsā paid them by the light of the candle, and I went forth with them, passing the al-Baṣrah [road] in the Baṭḥāʾ, i.e., the Baṭḥāʾ Ibn Azhar,[947] about six mīls from Medina. The people there were afraid, so I said, "Don't be afraid. I am Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. Do you have any barley mush (sawīq)?"[948] They brought us some barley mush, and we drank, staying there until Muḥammad was killed.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—a trustworthy source he knew: As ʿĪsā drew close [to Medina], he sent al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan b. Zayd[949] to Muḥammad to prevail upon him to abandon his purpose and to inform him that the Commander of the Faithful had given him and his household a guarantee of safety. Muḥammad said to al-Qāsim, "By God, were it not for the fact that messengers are not to be killed, I would behead you. From the time you were a lad, I have never seen you faced with a choice between good and bad parties when you didn't go for the bad rather than the good." Muḥammad sent word to ʿĪsā, "Listen, fellow, certainly you are closely related to the Messsenger of God. Therefore do I summon you to the Book of God, to the sunnah[950] of His Prophet and to acting in obedience to Him. I warn you of God's retribution and His punishments. I will not abandon this affair until[951] God Himself has cast it aside. Hear me now, lest the one who calls you to God kills you, and you die as the worst 947. A baṭḥāʾ is a broad, shallow riverbed. The Prophet halted beneath a tree in the Baṭḥāʾ Ibn Azhar when making his raid on al-ʿUshayrah. Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 285 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 421; Ṭabarī, I, 1268; Groom, Arabic Topography, 59; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 446.

948. Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1472, describes this as a kind of gruel made by moistening barley or wheat with water, clarified butter, or other forms of fat. A Qurashī expedition against the Prophet in the second year after the hijrah became known as ghawzat al-sawīq because of the sacks of barley meal which were discarded by the raiders as they made their retreat. Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 361–62 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 543–44; Ṭabarī, I, 1364–67; Waines, "Cereals, Bread, and Society," 266, 282–83.

949. Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan b. Zayd was the great-great-grandson of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Öhrnberg, Offspring of Fāṭima, table 8.

950. The "practice" of the Prophet, i.e., the norms for Muslim behavior that are drawn from the words and deeds of Muḥammad as recorded in the canonical collections of ḥadīth.

951. Ḥatta. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIX.

[possible] victim. On the other hand, if you kill him, then surely your burden will be even greater and your offense more monstrous." Muḥammad sent this letter with Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar.[952] When Ibrāhīm delivered it to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, the latter said, "Go back to your master and say to him, 'There can be nothing between us but battle.' "

[233] According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Karrām b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar—his father: When ʿĪsā drew near to Medina, he sent me to Muḥammad with a guarantee of safety for him. Muḥammad said to me, "Why would you people fight me and consider shedding my blood lawful when I am simply a man who is trying to avoid killing?"[953] "My people are calling you to [accept] the guarantee of safety," I said. "If you refuse to do anything but fight them, they will fight you just as the best of your ancestors, ʿAlī, fought Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr[954] for breaching the oath of allegiance made to them, for assailing their regnal authority,[955] and for striving against them." I later informed Abū Jaʿfar of that, and he said, 'It certainly does not make me happy that you said one thing to him and quite another to me.' "

According to ʿUmar—Hishām b. Muḥammad b. ʿUrwah b. Hishām b. ʿUrwah[956]—Māhān b. Bakht, Qaḥṭabah's mawlā: As we arrived at Medina, Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar b. Muṣʿab came to look us over, riding around our army until he had spied out all of it and then turning to leave. We were so frightened by him that ʿĪsā and Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah began to exclaim with admiration, "One lone horseman is advance scout for his cohort!" As he got to the limit of our range of vision, we saw him standing in one place. "Blast you, go and find out what's happening with that fellow," said Ḥumayd, "I can see his horse is not moving at all." So Ḥumayd dispatched to Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar two men from his cohort, and they discovered that Ibrāhīm's mount had stumbled and 952. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 268, gives the name as Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar al-Zubayrī.

953. Ana rajulun farrun. Ibrāhīm's edition VII, 585, reads this as farra.

954. A reference to the Battle of the Camel.

955. Wa-[ʿalā] kaydi al-mulk. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. kāda. See note 424.

956. His great-grandfather Abū al-Mundhir Hishām b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām (d. 146/763) was a Medinese muḥaddith and faqīh who eventually joined al-Manṣūr's entourage in Baghdad and died there. GAS, I, 88; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, VI, 34–47; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VIII, 87.

thrown him to the ground. His armor (tannūr)[957] had broken his neck. Ḥumayd's two men took his booty and brought us armor said to belong to Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr.[958] It was gilded and unlike any ever seen.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: ʿĪsā made camp at Qaṣr Sulaymān in al-Jurf early on a Saturday morning, 12 Ramaḍān 145[959] and stayed there both Saturday and Sunday. Early Monday morning he went out to take up a [234] position at Salʿ[960] so that he could survey Medina and those who were entering and leaving it. He covered all its approaches with cavalry and troops except the area around the mosque of Abū al-Jarrāḥ[961] at Buṭḥān. This he left open as an exit for those wanting to flee, and Muḥammad showed himself at the head of the people of Medina.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Muḥammad b. Zayd: We reached Medina together with ʿĪsā. He summoned Muḥammad [to desist and accept the guarantee of safety] three times, on Friday, on Saturday, and on Sunday.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Shaybān—Zayd, the mawlā of Mismaʿ: After ʿĪsā had set up camp, he made a mounted advance, with something like 500 foot soldiers surrounding him as they marched. Before him moved a banner that he carried on the march. ʿĪsā halted at al-Thaniyyah and cried out, "O people of Medina, God has forbidden us to shed each other's blood. Come and take the guarantee of safety! Whoever takes his stand under our banner is safe, as is whoever goes into his house, enters the 957. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. tannūr. The term ordinarily connotes a baking oven, especially one for bread.

958. Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr, son of the Prophet's cousin and early supporter, al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām, and brother of the anticaliph ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, was renowned as a warrior and especially remembered for his heroic stand against the Syrian troops of the Umayyad caliph ʿAbd al-Malik in 71/690. EI[1], s.v. (H. Lammens), Ṭabarī, II, 803–14; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, V, 332–355; Masʿūdī, Murūj, V, 240–42, 247–49.

959. December 4, 762.

960. Salʿ was a mountain pass near Medina; see the map on p. 1001 of EI[2], s.v. al-Madīna ii. The modern city (R. B. Winder) for Djabal Salaʿ [sic]. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 236–37.

961. Perhaps the mawlā of Umm Ḥabībah, a wife of the Prophet, who transmitted ḥadīth from her and from the third caliph, ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 56.

mosque, throws down his weapons, or leaves Medina. Leave us and our opponent to face each other, and [may the victory go] to us or to him." The people of Medina heaped abuse upon him and vilified him, saying such things as, "O son of a sheep, O son of this, O son of that!" That very day ʿĪsā went away and returned next morning. He did what he had done the day before, and once again the people of Medina reviled him. On the third day, he approached with [many] horses, men, and weapons, the like of which I've never seen. Lord knows, we didn't have long to wait before he got the better of us, proclaimed the guarantee of safety, and left for his encampment.

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm al-Ghaṭafānī—Abū ʿAmr, teacher of Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān—al-Zubayrī, i.e., ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid: When we came face to face, [235] ʿĪsā himself proclaimed, "O Muḥammad, the Commander of the Faithful has ordered me not to fight you before I extend to you the guarantee of safety. I am bound to offer this to you, your family, your descendants, and your associates. Furthermore, you will be given thus and thus amount of money. Your debt will be discharged, and you will be treated in an appropriate way."[962] Muḥammad shouted back, "Forget this! If you only understood that fear does not make me swerve from you nor does desire draw me near, you would not behave thus." The fighting was relentless, and Muḥammad dismounted to engage in it. I would estimate that he killed seventy men on that day by his own hand.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Muḥammad b. Zayd: On Monday ʿĪsā halted at Dhubāb.[963] Summoning a mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. Muʿāwiyah who had accompanied him as head of his armored troops. ʿĪsā said, "Take ten of your cohort, the ones who have protective armor." The man brought them forward, and ʿĪsā said to us, "Ten of you should stay with him, O family of Abū Ṭālib." This we did, and with us were the two sons of Muḥammad 962. More explicit promises are made in Abū Jaʿfar's letter to Muḥammad. See pp. 166–67.

963. Dhubāb was a mountain near Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 3; Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 135.

b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī,[964] ʿAbdallāh[965] and ʿUmar, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAqīl, al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan b. Zayd b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī, and ʿAbdallāh b. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar, who was in command of ten of us. "Hurry to the people," ʿĪsā said, "call upon them to support us, and offer them a guarantee of safety. God's guarantee of safety is enduring." We first went as far as the market of the fuel vendors and made an appeal to them. But they called us names and showered us with arrows, saying, "This is the descendant of God's Messenger who is with us. We, therefore, are with him." Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan b. Zayd spoke to them, saying, "I, too, am descended from the Messenger of God. Most of those whom you see are descended from God's Messenger. We call you to the Book of God, to the sunnah of His Prophet, to the sparing of your blood, and to a guarantee of safety for you." Again, they began to call us names and to shoot flights of arrows at us. Al-Qāsim told his servant to collect these arrows, which he did. [Al-] Qāsim then took hold of them and went to see ʿĪsā. "What are you waiting for?" he asked ʿĪsā. "Look what they did to us." ʿĪsā therefore sent Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah at the head of 100 men. [236]

According to ʿUmar—Azhar b. Saʿīd b. Nāfiʿ—his brothers, ʿUthmān and Muḥammad, the sons of Saʿīd who were with Muḥammad: Al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan and a man from the Abū Ṭālib family who was with him halted at the top of Thaniyyat al-Wadāʿ. They called upon Muḥammad to accept the guarantee of safety, but he hurled insults at them, so they retired. At this point, ʿĪsā advanced. He had already assigned the army commanders to their sectors, putting Hazārmard[966] near the baths of Ibn Abī al-Ṣaʿbah, Kathīr b. Ḥuṣayn near the house of Ibn Aflaḥ,[967] which was in Baqīʿ al-Gharqad, and Muḥammad b. Abī

964. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, IV, 238, placing his death about 140/757, identifies Muḥammad b. ʿUmar simply as a grandson of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and one of the sayyids of the Banū Hāshim. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 321.

965. His mother was Khadījah bt. Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, daughter of the fourth Shīʿī imām, and he was known as Dāfin, i.e., "One who Conceals." He died in 152/769. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 16.

966. Not ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. Abī Ṣufrah al-ʿAtakī (see note 374), who was also known as Hazārmard. For this Persian epithet, see Noth, Quellenkritische Studien, 152.

967. Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 143.

al-ʿAbbās at the Banū Salimah gate. The remaining army commanders he assigned to the passageways leading into Medina. ʿĪsā led his close associates to the head of al-Thaniyyah, where they shot arrows and catapulted stones for a while.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar: Muḥammad made the mosque curtains into chain armor for his associates.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Isḥāq b. al-Qāsim—ʿUmar, an Anṣārī shaykh: Muḥammad made mosque covers into quilted armor for his associates. Two men from [the tribe of] Juhaynah came to him, and to one he gave quilted armor, but not to the other. So the one who had the quilted armor fought, but the other one did not join him. During the battle, an arrow struck the one with the armor and killed him. His friend uttered this verse:

O Lord, do not make me like a treacherous one[968] who sold his remaining days for [a piece of] quilted armor.

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar—Ismāʿīl b. Abī ʿAmr:
[237] We were stopped at the Banū Ghifār's trench when a man approached us on horseback, and all that could be seen of him were his two eyes. He called out for a guarantee of safety, which was granted him. He then came right up next to us and said, "Is there anyone with you who could give Muḥammad a message from me?" "Yes," I said, "I could." "Then give him a message from me," he said, uncovering his face. To our surprise it was an old man with dyed hair. He said, "Tell Muḥammad that so-and-so the man of Tamīm speaks to you with a sign to this effect: You and I sat in the shade of the rock on Jabal Juhaynah in the year such-and-such. Wait patiently until nightfall, because the greater part of the army is on your side." Ismāʿīl continued: I came to Muḥammad before morning—that was on Monday, the day when he was killed—and I found in front of him a waterskin of white honey split down the middle. A man was pulling out a handful of honey and dipping it in water. Then he fed it to Muḥammad little by little. Another man wrapped his belly with a turban cloth. At this point I delivered the message to him. "Now you have made your report," he said. I replied, "My two brothers are in your power." "Where they are is good for them," he said.

968. Ka-man khān. Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIX.

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab b. ʿUmārah b. Ḥamzah b. Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr[969]—Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. al-Zubayr: Muḥammad's banner was my father's responsibility. I used to carry it on his behalf.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Al-Afṭas Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn was accompanied by a yellow standard with the picture of a serpent on it. Each of Muḥammad's associates from the family of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib was accompanied by a standard. Their war cry was "One and one alone!"[970] which was the Prophet's war cry at the Battle of Ḥunayn.[971]

According to ʿUmar—Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī al-Ḥakam—Jahm b. ʿUthmān, the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym as well as one of the Banū Bahz: On the day we faced ʿĪsā's associates in battle, ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar said to me, "Today we number what the people of Badr did on the day they faced the idolaters." We were a few more than 300. [238]

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās[972]—his father: ʿĪsā b. Mūsā was born in 103 and took part in the war with Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm when he was forty-three years old.[973] Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah was in charge of ʿĪsā's vanguard, while Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās, son of the [former] Commander of the Faithful, led the right flank. The Khurāsānī Dāwūd b. Karrāz[974] was charged

969. Ibrāhīm b. Mūṣʿab would be the great-great-grandson of Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr al-ʿAwwām (d. 72/691), the governor of al-Baṣrah who is remembered for the severity of his attack against the ʿAlid partisan al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd al-Thaqafī and his followers. Ṭabarī, II, 718–50; EI[1], s.v. Muṣʿab b. al-Zubair (H. Lammens); Dhahabī, Siyar, IV, 140–45.

970. According to the Glossarium, s.v. aḥad, this expression signifies that "God is one, without partner," i.e., it is the equivalent of the credal formula inna allāha wāḥidun lā sharīka lahu.

971. Ḥunayn was the site of a battle in 8/630, mentioned in the Qurʾān 9:25, where the Prophet's forces were initially ambushed but soon regrouped to rout the enemy. EI[2], s.v. (H. Lammens and Abd al-Hafez Kamal).

972. Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā was the grandson of al-Saffāḥ's designated successor to al-Manṣūr.

973. Ṭabarī, III, 519, mentions his death in the year 167/783–84, and Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 435, notes that he lived to be 65. But see EI[2], s.v. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā (D. Sourdel).

974. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXXXIX. Dāwūd b. Karrāz served under Abū Muslim in Marw and is mentioned among the Khurāsānī duʿāt. Ṭabarī, II, 1968–69; Akhbār al-dawlah, 221.

with the left flank, and al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah was in command of the rear guard.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Abū al-Qalammas encountered Asad b. al-Marzubān's[975] brother, Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān, in the market of the firewood vendors. They laid on with swords, until the swords themselves were broken, and then returned to their respective battle stations. At this point Asad's brother grabbed another sword while Abū al-Qalammas picked up a trivet stone (uthfiyyah),[976] placed it on the bow of his saddle, and covered it with his armature. They then returned to each other, and as they drew close, Abū al-Qalammas stood up in his stirrups and hit Asad's brother in the chest with the trivet, knocking him down. Abū al-Qalammas then dismounted and cut off his head.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Qāsim b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿUmarī: While we were with Muḥammad, a man from Medina, a mawlā of the family of al-Zubayr named al-Qāsim b. Wā'il, stepped forth and called for a duel. In response, a man came forward against him whose perfection and equipment was unique in my experience. When Ibn Wā'il saw this man, he took off. We were very affected by that, and, in the grip of that emotion, I heard the sound of a footstep behind me.[977] I wheeled around and was surprised to see Abū al-Qalammas and hear him say, "God curse the prince of fools for [239] letting someone like that make bold with us. If a man steps out, he may be going out to something beyond his range." He then fought a duel with the opponent and killed him.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar b. Saʿīd b. Nāfiʿ: On that day al-Qāsim b. Wā'il left the trench and called for a duel. Hazārmard answered the challenge, but when al-Qāsim saw him, he was so awed by the man that he retreated. Abū al-Qalammas then

975. Asad b. al-Marzubān was a Persian army officer who later appears in the incidents of harassment directed against ʿĪsā b. Mūsā in order to convince him to renounce his claim to the caliphate in favor of al-Manṣūr's son. Asad's eventual execution for suspected treason is graphically presented in the events of 151/768–69. Ṭabarī, III, 344, 368. In the late Sāsānid period, the marzbān was the military governor of a frontier district. Ṭabarī, I, 1056, and Nöldeke, Geschichte der Perser, 102.

976. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. thafā.

977. Khashfa rajulin. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. khashafa and ṣāta.

stepped forward to duel with him and said that he had never used his sword as he did on that day. Then he struck Hazārmard on his shoulder vein and killed him, saying, "Take that blow! I am the son of al-Fārūq!"[978] One of ʿĪsā's comrades retorted, "You have killed a better man than 1000 Fārūqs."

According to ʿUmar—the Kūfan ʿAlī Abū al-Ḥasan al-Ḥadhdhā' (the Cobbler)—Masʿūd al-Raḥḥāl: I was witness to Muḥammad's murder in Medina. In fact, I was watching them near the Aḥjār al-Zayt.[979] I was looking down on them from the mountain, i.e., Salʿ, when I noticed one of ʿĪsā's cohort come forward on horseback, armored in such a way that you could see nothing of him but his eyes. He came far enough forward that he left the line of his confederates behind. Then he came to a standstill between the two combat lines and called for a duel. One of Muḥammad's cohort went out to meet him wearing a white full-sleeved gown (qabā')[980] and a white cap. He was on foot, and he conversed with the challenger for a long time. I assumed that he was asking him to dismount so that their positions would be equal. Eventually, I observed the man on horseback bend his leg and dismount. Then the two faced off against each other. Muḥammad's associate struck the challenger a blow on the iron helmet he was wearing, forcing him to sit back on his haunches stunned and motionless. At this point Muḥammad's man pulled off his helment, hit him on his head, and killed him. He then went back and joined his fellow soldiers. Without a moment's loss, another came forth from ʿĪsā's line, just like the first, and the original fellow from Muḥammad's side challenged him to combat and did to him what he had done to his comrade. Once again, he went back to his battle line. A third fellow came forth, and Muḥammad's man challenged him, dueled with him, and killed him. When the third was killed, he turned back to head for his associates but ʿĪsā's men attacked him in waves, throwing spears at him and piercing him. He rushed toward his confederates but never reached them, in- [240]

978. "Al-Fārūq" was an epithet of the caliph ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

979. Aḥjār al-Zayt was a site near al-Zawrā', the sūq in Medina, where the prayer for rain is performed. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 109, III, 156; Lecker, "Markets of Medina," 143.

980. See Dozy, Vêtements, 352–62; Ahsan, Social Life, 41–42.

stead falling flat on the ground so that ʿĪsā's men killed him short of his goal.

According to ʿĪsā—Muḥammad b. Zayd: When we told ʿĪsā that Muḥammad's supporters were shooting at us, he orderd Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah to move forward. Ḥumayd advanced with 100 men carrying arrows and shields, all of them on foot except him. Before long they had marched up to a rampart this side of the trench where certain of Muḥammad's partisans were ensconced. Ḥumayd's men forced them in the open and then came to a halt at the wall. Ḥumayd sent word to ʿĪsā that the wall should be razed. ʿĪsā, therefore, sent for laborers, and they razed it, and Ḥumayd's men got all the way to the trench. Ḥumayd then let ʿĪsā know that they had reached the trench. ʿĪsā sent gates the size of the trench to Ḥumayd so that his troops crossed over on them to the other side. Then they fought a very fierce battle from early morning until late afternoon.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: In the company of his cohort ʿĪsā b. Mūsā moved forward to lay siege to Medina. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and his supporters came out to meet him, and for several days they battled each other fiercely. A troop from the Juhaynah tribe called the Banū Shujāʿ stood steadfastly with Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh until they were killed. They were, indeed, doughty fighters.

The account returns to that of ʿUmar.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar: ʿĪsā ordered them to throw the camels' saddlebags into the trench. He also ordered the two gates from Saʿd b. Masʿūd's house at al-Thaniyyah thrown over the trench. The cavalry then crossed, and the opposing forces met near the sluice gates of Khashram,[981] where they fought until late afternoon.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b.
[241] Abī Thābit: Muḥammad went out that day, before noon, to the Dār Marwān. There he performed the ritual ablution and anointed himself as if for burial. Only then did he go forth [to battle].

According to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Thābit—ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar: I drew near to Muḥammad and said to him, "By the life of my father, as I judge the situation, you don't hold a chance. None of those with you believes in fighting. Leave immediately to meet up with al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah in Mecca, for he has the greatest part of your partisans with him." "O Abū Jaʿfar," said Muḥammad, "by God, were I to leave, the people of Medina would be killed. I swear that I shall not turn back until I have killed or been killed. But as far as I'm concerned, you may do as you like; go wherever you wish." I went with him as far as Dār Ibn Masʿūd[982] in the camel market. Then I hurried off, making my way toward the oil sellers [section]. Muḥammad went on to al-Thaniyyah, and those who were with him were killed by arrows. When it was time for the afternoon prayer, Muḥammad prayed.

981. ʿInda mafātiḥi Khashram. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. fataḥa.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah—Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad: I saw Muḥammad between the two houses of the Banū Saʿd. He was wearing a clay-dyed robe[983] and mounted on an old packhorse. At his side stood Ibn Khuḍayr, who was begging him to go on to al-Baṣrah or elsewhere. To this Muḥammad kept answering, "By God, you people will not be afflicted with me twice. Go where you wish; you are quite free to do so." "Where is there escape from you?" said Ibn Khuḍayr, but then he left, set fire to the stipends register [i.e. that recording the names of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's partisans], and killed Riyāḥ. Next he met up with Muḥammad in al-Thaniyyah and fought until he was slain.

According to ʿUmar—al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: Ibn Khuḍayr, a descendant of Muʿṣab b. al-Zubayr, rebelled with Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. On the day Muḥammad was killed, Ibn Khuḍayr, seeing the disorder among Muḥammad's partisans and how the sword had exhausted them, asked [242] Muḥammad's permission to enter Medina. Muḥammad gave his consent but without knowing what Ibn Khuḍayr intended. The latter entered the presence of Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī and his brother and slaughtered the two of them. He went back to tell Muḥammad what he had done and then moved forward and fought until, without delay, he was killed.

---

982. ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd was a Companion of the Prophet and is cited as the source of many exegetical ḥadīths. His house stood to the north of the main mosque. EI^{2}, s.v. (J. -C. Vadet); Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 104.

983. ʿAlayhi jubbatun mumashshaqatun. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. mashaqa.

The account returns to that of ʿUmar.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar—his brother: When Ibn Khuḍayr went back, he killed Riyāḥ and Ibn Muslim b. ʿUqbah.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Ibn Khuḍayr slit Riyāḥ's throat but without finishing him off. Therefore he began beating Riyāḥ's head against the wall until he died. Riyāḥ's brother, ʿAbbās, a righteous man, was killed with him, and the people held that against Ibn Khuḍayr. The latter then went on to Ibn al-Qasrī, who was imprisoned in the Dār Ibn Hishām. Having been alerted, Ibn al-Qasrī barricaded the two gates of the Dār against him. Ibn Khuḍayr worked hard against the gates, but those in the prison joined forces to block them. Ibn Khuḍayr could not prevail against them, so he returned to Muḥammad and fought in front of him until he was killed.

According to ʿUmar—Miskīn b. Ḥabīb b. Muḥammad: At the prescribed time Muḥammad prayed the afternoon prayer in the mosque of the Banū al-Dīl[984] in al-Thaniyyah. When he had uttered the concluding formula, he asked for something to drink, and Rabīḥah bt. Abī Shākir of the Quraysh tribe gave him a drink. Then she said to him, "If only I could be a ransom for you! Save yourself!" Muḥammad replied, "Then in Medina not a cock would be left to crow." He went on, and when he was in the bed of the watercourse of Salʿ, he dismounted. He hamstrung his mount,[985] and the Banū Shujāʿ hamstrung theirs. Each and every one broke his sword scabbard.

[243] Miskīn: I saw myself, as a lad, gathering something like 300 dirhams' worth of ornaments from them. Muḥammad said to them, "You have given me the oath of allegiance, and I am not moving until I am killed. But whoever wishes to go has my permission to do so." Then Muḥammad turned to Ibn Khuḍayr and asked him whether he had set fire to the stipends register." "Yes,"

984. Al-Dīl, also al-Du'il, was a clan of the Banū Bakr b. ʿAbdmanāt. Ṭabarī, I, 1440; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 43, II, 234; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 184–85.

985. This was an act of bravery by which the warrior indicated that he was cutting off his only possible means of flight. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib is credited with being the first in Islam to do so and died fighting at the battle of Mu'tah in 8/629. Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 534 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 794.

replied Ibn Khuḍayr, "I feared that on the basis of it people would be seized." Muḥammad said, "You did right."

According to ʿUmar—Azhar—my two brothers: On that day we put ʿĪsā's cohort to flight two or three times, without ourselves suffering a reverse. We even heard Yazīd[986] b. Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar say, "We've routed them, but what a victory it would have been if only he had had [enough] men!"

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb[987] was one of those who were routed and ran away from Muḥammad that day. Muḥammad sent after him, and he was brought back. Then the young boys started to shout out after him, "Behold the babbling old fart!"[988] Afterwards ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz used to say that the worst thing that ever happened to him was the young boys' taunting.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—a mawlā of Hishām b. ʿUmārah b. al-Walīd b. ʿAdī al-Khiyār: We were with Muḥammad, and Hishām b. ʿUmārah came up to him along with me. He said, "I'm not sure those you see won't desert you. If ever I run away or you are killed or I am killed or we are vanquished, I testify that this servant of mine is to be freed in God's sight." Then, by God, I was with Muḥammad when an arrow fell on his shield and split it in two, before sinking into his armor." He turned toward me and said, "Hey there." "Here I am," I replied. "Blast your eyes!" he said; "have you ever seen anything like this, what's your name? Do you care more for yourself or for me?" "For you, of course," I [244] responded. At this he said, "You are free in God's sight, so get out of here as fast as you can."

According to ʿUmar—Mutawakkil b. Abī al-Faḥwah—Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Farwah: We were overlooking the ridge of Salʿ—there were bedouins of the Juhaynah tribe there as well—when a man climbed up to us holding a spear on which he had stuck a man's head with the throat, liver, and entrails still attached. I found it a terrifying sight. Seeing an evil omen in it, the bedouins shied away, fleeing until they reached level ground. The man climbed to the summit and shouted down the mountain to his associates some gibberish in Persian like kūhbān.[989] His confederates climbed up to him, right to the top of Salʿ, where they erected a black flag. Then they swooped down the mountain toward Medina and entered it. Asmāʾ bt. Ḥasan b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, the wife of ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās, ordered a black veil erected on the minaret of the Messenger of God's mosque. When Muḥammad's confederates saw that, they called out to each other, "Medina has been entered," and they fled. Hearing of the people who had entered Medina from the Salʿ mountain, Muḥammad said, "Every people has a mountain that protects them, while our mountain is only a way for people to come at us!"

986. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXL.

987. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh was a great-grandson of the second caliph.

988. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. baqqa, where this translation in offered tentatively as ecce garrula cum crepitu ventris. For two proverbial uses of the term baqqah, see Ṭabarī, I, 759–60.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—someone he trusted: The sons of Abū ʿAmr al-Ghifārī opened a way for the wearers of black via the Banū Ghifār. The ʿAbbāsid forces entered that way, coming up on Muḥammad's partisans from behind.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿImrān: On that day Muḥammad shouted at Ḥumayd b.
[245] Qaḥṭabah, "If you are a cavalryman and are proud of so being above all the people of Khurāsān, then fight a duel with me. I am Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh." "I know very well who you are," responded Ḥumayd; "you are a nobleman and the son of a nobleman; you are a sharīf and the son of a sharīf.[990] No, by God, Abū ʿAbdallāh, I shall not duel with you while from these throngs but one man still stands before me. When I have dealt with that lot, then I swear that I shall duel with you."

According to ʿUmar—ʿUthmān b. al-Mundhir b. Muṣʿab b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr—a man from the Banū Thaʿlabah b. Saʿd:[991] I was in al-Thaniyyah on the day Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan was killed. With him was Ibn Khuḍayr, to whom Ibn

989. The Persian means "mountain guards." As an alternative, the Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXL, give kūhiyyān, which would mean "mountain dwellers."

990. The term sharīf is applied to those who claim descent from the Prophet Muḥammad.

991. Thaʿlabah b. Saʿd b. Ḍabbah was a clan of Ḍabbah b. Udd. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 89, II, 551; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 203.

Qaḥṭabah began offering the guarantee of safe-conduct, reluctant to see him die. But, dismounting, Ibn Khuḍayr continued to attack people with his sword, while quoting the following lines:

Give him to drink neither sour milk nor sweet, if you find him not swift and big-strided.
Full of liveliness,[992] he swallows the hard ground like the wolf chases prey that comes near.
Overtaking the tracks as though they turn back, and the veil on the sun's disc as it sinks.

He mingled with the people, and someone struck Ibn Khuḍayr a piercing[993] blow on his buttock. He withdrew to his associates, ripped off a piece of cloth to wind around his back, and then returned to the fight. This time someone hit him on the eyesocket brow, pushing the sword into the eye itself. Ibn Khuḍayr sank to the ground, and people rushed at him, slashing his head. When he was killed, Muḥammad got down off his horse and fought standing over his corpse until he himself was killed.

According to ʿUmar—Makhlad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥāḍir b. al-Muhājir al-Bāhilī—al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān, the mawlā of the Banū Numayr[994]—his brother (a brother of his had been killed with Muḥammad): When the Khurāsānīs caught sight of Ibn Khuḍayr, they shouted to each other, "Khuḍayr has come! Khuḍayr has come!" Because of that they took off in all directions. [246]

According to ʿUmar—Hishām b. Muḥammad b. ʿUrwah b. Hishām b. ʿUrwah—Māhān b. Bakht, Qaḥṭabah's mawlā: Ibn Khuḍayr's head was brought to us, but it contained so many wounds we could not even begin to carry it. It looked like an eggplant that had been ripped apart, but we stuck most of it back together.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar b. Saʿīd: Beholding the black standard on the minaret of the mosque undermined the morale of Muḥammad's partisans. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah came against 992. Dhā mayʿatin. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. māʿa.

993. Fa-ḍarabahu ḍāribun ʿalā ilyatihi fa-khallahā. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXL.
994. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 269, gives this name as al-Fuḍayl b. Sulaymān.

Muḥammad from the alley of Ashjaʿ[995] and killed him unawares. He then took his head and brought it to ʿĪsā. Along with Muḥammad, Ḥumayd killed many other men.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Ḥadhdhāʾ—Masʿūd al-Raḥḥāl: On that day I saw Muḥammad plunging into the fight by himself. Indeed, I was watching him when a man struck him a sword blow just beside his right earlobe. Muḥammad fell to his knees, and they joined forces against him.[996] Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah shouted, "Don't kill him," so they held off, and Ḥumayd himself came and cut off Muḥammad's head.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: On that day Muḥammad fell to his knees, trying to defend himself and saying, "Woe to you! I am descended from your Prophet, yet beset by difficulties and deeply wronged."[997]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—Ibn Abī Thābit—ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar: Ibn Qaḥṭabah pierced his chest and knocked him down. Then he dismounted, cut off his head, and brought it to ʿĪsā.

[247] According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Abū al-Ḥajjāj al-Minqarī: I saw Muḥammad on that day—of all God's creatures he most closely resembled the tales told of Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib[998]—cutting people sharply with his sword and killing all who drew near him so long as he carried it. By God, indeed, his thrusts continued unabated until a man shot an arrow at him. I believe I actually saw him turn first red then grey. Suddenly the cavalry descended upon us, and Muḥammad came to a standstill at the side of a wall. People held back from him, and as he felt death overcome him, he leaned against his sword and broke it.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—his grandfather: Muḥammad carried the sword of God's Messenger, Dhū al-Faqār.[999]

---

995. Ashjaʿ b. Rayth were a clan of the Ghaṭafān tribe. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, 135, II, 201; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 249–50.

996. Wa-taʿāwaw/taghāwaw ʿalayhi. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXL.

997. Muḥrijun wa-maẓlūmun. Ibid.

998. Ibid. Ḥamzah was the Prophet's uncle whose legendary battle exploits were memorialized in various epic recensions. See note 859.

999. This sword, which Muḥammad obtained as booty in the battle of Badr, became the property of ʿAlī but eventually passed into ʿAbbāsid possession. EI^{2},

According to ʿUmar—Hurmuz Abū ʿAlī, the mawlā of the Bāhilah [tribe][1000]—ʿAmr b. al-Mutawakkil, whose mother served Fāṭimah bt. Ḥusayn: On the day he was killed, Muḥammad carried the Prophet's sword, Dhū al-Faqār. When he sensed death approaching, he gave his sword to a merchant who was with him and to whom he owed a debt in the amount of 400 dīnārs. Muḥammad said to the man, "Take this sword. You will never meet any member of the family of Abū Ṭālib who will not take it and give you your just due." The sword stayed in the merchant's possession until Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān[1001] was appointed governor of Medina. Jaʿfar was told about the sword, and, summoning the man, he took the sword from him and give him 400 dīnārs. It stayed with him until al-Mahdī became Caliph where Jaʿfar continued as governor of Medina. News of the sword's whereabouts reached al-Mahdī, and he took it. It then passed to Mūsā,[1002] who tried it out on a dog,[1003] and the sword broke in pieces.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Qurayb al-Aṣmaʿī:[1004] I saw [Hārūn] al-Rashīd, the Commander of the Faithful, in Ṭūs,[1005] girded with a sword. He said to me, "O Aṣmaʿī, would you not like me to show you Dhū al-Faqār?" "Yes," I said, "may God make me your ransom." He said, "Unsheathe this sword of s.v. (E. Mittwoch). For traditions about Dhū al-Faqār, see Wensinck, Concordance, III, 51.

---

1000. A component tribe of Qays whose traditional lands lay along the route between Mecca and Riyāḍ. *EI*², s.v. (W. Caskel); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, 137, II, 220.

1001. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī al-Hāshimī (d. 174/790). His cousin al-Manṣūr appointed him governor of Medina in 146/763–64 and removed him in 150/767–68; later he was appointed governor of al-Baḥrayn, of Mecca and then of al-Baṣrah. At one point he complained of Abū Jaʿfar's preferential treatment of his brother Muḥammad. Ṭabarī, III, 327, 358, 379, 410, 492, 740; Zambaur, Manuel, 20, 24, 40; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 106: Dhahabī, Siyar, VIII, 239–40.

1002. Mūsā, i.e., Mūsā b. Muḥammad al-Hādī ilā al-Ḥaqq, son of al-Mahdī, was the fourth ʿAbbāsid caliph and reigned briefly from 169/785 to 170/786. *EI*², s.v. al-Hādī ila 'l-Ḥaḳḳ (D. Sourdel).

1003. Dogs are considered unclean under Muslim law, and in popular belief have a long-standing association with evil spirits.

1004. Abū Saʿīd ʿAbd al-Malik b. Qurayb (d. 213/828) was a renowned Baṣran grammarian and philologist at the court of Hārūn al-Rashīd. *EI*², s.v. al-Aṣmaʿī (B. Lewin); Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 965.

1005. Ṭūs was a town and a district in the Naysābūr quarter of Khurāsān. *EI*¹ s.v. (V. Minorsky); Le Strange, Lands, 388–90; Cornu, Répertoires, 155.

mine." I did so, and I saw on it eighteen notches like vertebrae (faqārah).[1006]

[248] According to ʿUmar—Abū ʿĀṣim al-Nabīl—the brother of al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Numayrī: We were with Muḥammad when 40,000 troops encircled us, surrounding us like a tract of black stones. I said to him, "If you were to charge at them, they would scatter before you." "Surely," he said, "the Commander of the Faithful does not charge in such a way. Were he to do so, he would have nothing left." However, we kept repeating that to him, so that finally he launched an attack, but they pressed in upon him and killed him.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Salm, known as Ibn al-Bawwāb, successor to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ as chamberlain for Hārūn [al-Rashīd], a cultured and learned person—his father—al-Aslamī, i.e., ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir: Muḥammad said to me when we were fighting ʿĪsā with him, "A rain cloud is enveloping us; if it showers us, we will be victorious. If it passes over us to ʿĪsā's forces, then look for my blood on the oil stones." Before long, by God, a cloud was right on top of us. As it began to shift, I exclaimed, "It's doing so!" Then it passed right over us and hit ʿĪsā and his confederates. From that point on things were as bad as could be until I saw him lying dead among the oil stones.[1007]

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī al-Karrām b. ʿAbdallāh:[1008] About the time of the afternoon prayer ʿĪsā said to Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, "I see that you've been taking your time with this fellow; now put Ḥamzah b. Mālik[1009] in charge of warring against him." "By God! Though you may wish that," said Ḥumayd, "I won't leave you while I'm still fighting men and have scented victory in the offing." He then redoubled his efforts until Muḥammad was slain.

1006. According to some early Muslim traditions, the sword was made of material from Paradise and was passed down among the prophets who preceded Muḥammad. Rubin, "Prophets and Progenitors," 47.

1007. Wüstenfeld, "Medina," 146.

1008. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXL.

1009. Ḥamzah b. Mālik (d. 181/797), the son of Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzāʿī, was head of the shurṭah, or police guard, for the caliphs al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī. He was appointed governor of Sijistān in 159/775–76 and of Khurāsān in 176/792–93. Ṭabarī, III, 459, 626; Crone, Slaves, 181.

According to ʿUmar—Jawwād b. Ghālib. b. Mūsā, the mawlā of the Banū ʿIjl—Ḥumayd, the mawlā of Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās:[1010] On that day ʿĪsā had doubts about Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, who was in charge of the cavalry. He said to him, "O Ḥumayd, I don't see you doing your utmost." "Do you have doubts about me?" retorted Ḥumayd. "By God, when I see [249] Muḥammad I shall give him a death strike with my sword or be killed before I reach him." Ḥumayd then passed Muḥammad when he had already been killed and struck a blow with his sword in order to fulfill his oath.

According to ʿUmar—Yaʿqūb b. al-Qāsim—ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib: Muḥammad was killed after the late afternoon prayer on Monday, 14 Ramaḍān.

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar—his father: ʿĪsā sent someone to break into the prison, and we were brought before him while the battle between Muḥammad and ʿĪsā was still going on. We stayed where we had been thrown down before him until Muḥammad's head was brought to ʿĪsā. I said to my brother Yūsuf, "He will call upon us to identify him, but we will not do so for him, for we can [pretend to] be afraid that we could be wrong." When the head was brought ʿĪsā said, "Would you recognize Muḥammad?" "Yes," we said. "Take a look," said ʿĪsā; "is this he?" I cut in before Yūsuf, saying, "I see a great deal of blood and wounds but, by God, I cannot be sure that it is he." He released us from the irons, and we stayed with him through the entire night until morning. Eventually, ʿĪsā gave me jurisdiction over the area that lies between Mecca and Medina, a post that I held until Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān arrived. At this point Jaʿfar had me brought down to him and placed me under his own jurisdiction.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Ismāʿīl b. Ṣāliḥ b. Mītham—Abū Kaʿb: I was in ʿĪsā's presence at the time when he had Muḥammad killed and his head was placed before him. ʿĪsā turned to his associates and said, "What do you say about this fellow?" Those present slandered Muḥammad, but one of ʿĪsā's army commanders turned to them and said, "You have lied, by God, and spoken falsehoods. It was not for these reasons that we fought him. He set himself in opposition to the Commander of the Faithful and sowed dissension among the Muslims, even if he did rigorously keep the fast and pass the night in prayer." At these words those people fell silent.

1010. The son of the first ʿAbbāsid caliph. See note 394.

According to ʿUmar—Ibn al-Bawwāb ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad[1011]—his father—al-Aslamī: Someone reached Abū Jaʿfar [250] with a report that Muḥammad had fled. But the caliph called him a liar and declared, "We do not put the People of the House (ahl al-bayt)[1012] to flight."

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Rāshid b. Yazīd—Abū al-Ḥajjāj the camel driver: I was standing next to Abū Jaʿfar, as he questioned me about Muḥammad's revolt, when news reached him that ʿĪsā had been defeated. He sat up from a reclining position and struck his prayer rug with a stick he was carrying. "That cannot be," he exclaimed. "What would become of the games of our young lads there on the *minbar*s or of the gossiping chatter of the women? I cannot survive this."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—one of his associates: An arrow hit Abū al-Qalammas on the knee, the head becoming embedded. He worked at it but to no avail. Then someone told him to leave it alone until it began to fester, when it would come out. Therefore he let it be. When the enemy forces went looking for him after the rout, he had only gotten as far as the stony tract (al-Ḥarrah), because what hit him in the knee had slowed him down. But he kept working at the arrowhead until he extracted it. He then fell to his knees and emptied his quiver, shooting at them until they sheered off from him. Thus he caught up with his associates and was saved.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Qāsim: After our defeat that day, we were [standing around] in a group that included Abū al-Qalammas. I turned to him because suddenly he was overwhelmed with laughter. "By God," I said, "this is no place for laughter!" But lowering my glance, I saw one of the defeated soldiers whose shirt had been cut

---

1011. See note 899.

1012. A Qurʾānic phrase that has come to designate the family of the Prophet Muḥammad, whether narrowly conceived as applying only to the ʿAlids or, more broadly, as embracing the Ṭālibids, ʿAbbāsids, and others. *EI*², s.v. (I. Goldziher, C. Van Arendonk, and A. S. Tritton); Bosworth, "Al-Maqrīzī's Epistle," 42–43; Daniel, "Anonymous 'History,'" 427–29.

to shreds, only its collar[1013] remaining. His breast was completely bare and, though he was quite unaware of it, even his genitals were in plain sight. Abū al-Qalammas' guffaws made me start to laugh.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Abū al-Qalammas stayed hidden in al-Furʿ,[1014] remaining there for some time. Then one of his slaves assaulted him and shattered his skull with a rock. The slave subsequently went to one of Abū Qalammas' concubines and said, "I have killed your master. Come to me now [251] and I'll marry you." "Wait a moment," she said, "and I shall prepare myself for you." So he gave her some time, but she went straight to the authorities and informed on him. The slave was therefore seized and his own skull shattered.

According to ʿUmar—Maḥmūd b. Maʿmar b. Abī al-Shadāʾid [al-Fazārī]—his father: When ʿĪsā's cavalry contingent entered [Medina] via the gorge of the Banū Fazārah[1015] and Muḥammad was killed, one group rushed recklessly against Abū al-Shadāʾid. They killed him and took his head.[1016] His daughter, al-Nāʿimah bt. Abī al-Shadāʾid, cried out, "Alas for the [fine] men!" One of the men in the army asked her, "Who are your menfolk?" "The Banū Fazārah," she said. "By God," he replied, "had I known that, I would not have entered your house. But don't be afraid; I am kin of yours from the Bāhilah tribe." He then gave her a snip from his turban, and she fastened it to her door.

Abū al-Shadāʾid's head was brought to ʿĪsā while Ibn Abī al-Karrām and Muḥammad b. Lūṭ b. al-Mughīrah b. Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib[1017] were with him. They both intoned the formula "We are God's and to Him is our return" and said, "Of the people of Medina there is no one left. This is the head of Abū al-Shadāʾid Fāliḥ b. Maʿmar, a blind man of the Banū Fazārah."

1013. Jurubbān, from Persian girībān or girbān, is defined by Lane, Lexicon, II, 403, as the neck opening of a shirt, the part upon which the buttons are sewed. According to Dozy, Supplément, I, 181, it was the part of the shirt that covered the buttocks.

1014. Al-Furʿ was a city between Mecca and Medina, at a distance of eight posting stations from the latter. Cornu, Répertoires, 73; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 252.

1015. Fazārah was a component tribe of Dhubyān b. Baghīḍ. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, II, 246; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 255–59.

1016. See note 775.

1017. His great-grandfather Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith was the Prophet's cousin.

ʿĪsā commanded a herald to proclaim: "Whoever comes with a head will have his own head struck off."

According to ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Zādān—ʿAbdallāh b. Barqā: I saw one of ʿĪsā's army commanders come at the head of a group to ask where Ibn Hurmuz'[1018] abode was. We directed him there, and Ibn Hurmuz came out wearing a thin white shirt.[1019] They had their army commander get down, and they transported Ibn Hurmuz on the commander's nag. Thus they went forth conducting him in procession until they had brought him into ʿĪsā's presence. But ʿĪsā did nothing to alarm him.

According to ʿUmar—Qudāmah b. Muḥammad:[1020] ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Hurmuz and Muḥammad b. ʿAjlān rebelled with Muḥammad. When the fighting came, each of the two girded on [252] a longbow. We assumed[1021] they wanted to show people that they were quite fit to do so.[1022]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Ḥusayn b. Yazīd: Ibn Hurmuz was brought to ʿĪsā after Muḥammad was killed, and ʿĪsā said, "O shaykh, shouldn't your good sense have kept you from rebelling with those who rebelled?" Ibn Hurmuz replied, "It was disaster that engulfed the people and engulfed us with them." "Follow a straight course [i.e., watch your step in the future]," said ʿĪsā.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah—Mālik b. Anas: I would go to see Ibn Hurmuz, and he would command a slave girl to bolt the door and to lower the curtain. Then he would reminisce about the early days of this ummah[1023] and weep until his beard was wet. When later he rebelled with Muḥammad, someone said to him, "By God, there's no fight left 1018. Abū Bakr ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Hurmuz al-Aṣamm (d. 148/765) was a muḥaddith and faqīh of Medina known to be cautious in his legal pronouncements but a vigorous opponent of heterodoxy. Dhahabī, Siyar, VI, 380, recounts how on one occasion Muḥammad b. ʿAjlān kissed Ibn Hurmuz's head in gratitude for the latter's instruction. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 679; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 284.

---

1019. ʿAlayhi qamiṣun riyāṭun. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. rayṭ.

1020. Qudāmah b. Muḥammad b. Qudāmah b. Khashram b. Yasār al-Ashjaʿī was a muḥaddīth of Medina. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 326–27.

1021. Following Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 599, with fa-ẓanannā.

1022. Note a in the Leiden text offers the explanation that "they were, of course, educated men who were unaccustomed to carrying bows."

1023. A term that signifies the Muslim community as a religio-political unit.

in you!" "I'm well aware of that," he replied, "yet some ignorant fellow may see me and follow my example."

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Muḥammad b. Zayd: When Muḥammad was killed, the sky was rent with a rainstorm unlike anything I've ever seen. ʿĪsā's herald cried out, "No one in the army should spend the night in Medina except Kathīr b. Ḥuṣayn and his men. ʿĪsā reached his encampment in al-Jurf and stayed there until morning. Then he sent news of the victory [to Abū Jaʿfar] with al-Qāsim b. Ḥasan b. Zayd and sent Muḥammad's head with Ibn Abī al-Karrām.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Morning found Muḥammad still lying where he had been killed. His sister Zaynab bt. ʿAbdallāh and his daughter Fāṭimah sent word to ʿĪsā, "You killed this man and have no further need of him. With your permission, we shall inter him." ʿĪsā sent word back to them, "As for what you mentioned, cousins, which bears upon what happened to Muḥammad: I did not order it, nor did I know of it, so inter him as two upright women would." They sent[1024] for Muḥammad, and he was brought to them. It is said that the slash in his neck was stuffed with a corresponding amount of cotton. He was buried in al-Baqīʿ [cemetery], his tomb facing the alley of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib's house, at the entrance to the main road or thereabouts. ʿĪsā sent some flags, and one was placed on the door of Asmāʾ bt. Ḥasan b. ʿAbdallāh, another on al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith's, another on Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Zuhrī's door, another on ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ṣafwān's, and yet another on the door of Abū ʿAmr al-Ghifārī's house. His herald proclaimed, "Whoever enters under one of these flags or enters one of these houses is under our protection." The heavens poured down copious rain, but in the morning the people went peacefully about their marketplaces. ʿĪsā began to go back and forth to the mosque from al-Jurf, remaining in Medina for several days. Then he left for Mecca on the morning of 19 Ramaḍān.[1025] 1024. Following Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 600, fa-baʿathatā.

1025. Saturday, December 22, 762.

According to ʿUmar—Azhar b. Saʿīd: The day after Muḥammad was killed, ʿĪsā gave permission for his burial but commanded that his associates be gibbeted between Thaniyyat al-Wadāʿ and Dār ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. Azhar said, "I saw them in two rows. ʿĪsā entrusted Ibn Khuḍayr's stake to the one guarding it, but some people carried it away during the night and buried him before anyone could stop them. The other bodies remained gibbeted for three days. Then the people began to find them noisome, so ʿĪsā ordered them to be thrown on the open area (mafraj)[1026] in Salʿ, which was the graveyard of the Jews. They were not left there, however, but were subsequently thrown into a trench at the base of Dhubāb."

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbdallāh—his mother, Umm
[254] Ḥusayn bt. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn: I said to my uncle Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad,[1027] "May I be your ransom, what happened to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh?" He said, "Muḥammad was killed near the Bayt Rūmī[1028] in the civil disorder that he instigated. His brother was killed in Iraq by the same father when the hooves of his horse were in water."[1029]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: Ḥamzah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī[1030] took part in the uprising with Muḥammad. Although his uncle Jaʿfar forbade him to do so, Ḥamzah remained one of Muḥammad's staunchest supporters. Jaʿfar kept saying to Ḥamzah, "By God, he will be killed," and himself played no active part.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Ibn Abī al-Karrām: ʿĪsā sent me to Abū Jaʿfar, accompanied by 100 soldiers, with the head of Muḥammad. When we reached a point overlooking al-Najaf, we shouted Allāhu akbar. ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl[1031] was in Wāsiṭ besieging

---

1026. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLI; Glossarium, s.v. faraja; Groom, Arabic Topography, 88, 161.

1027. I.e., Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq.

1028. See Nagel, "Bericht," 261, where the site is thus rendered but with no identification.

1029. See Ṭabarī, III, 314, for the offensive (or defensive) use of water in Ibrāhīm's final battle.

1030. A nephew of Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq.

1031. ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl al-Ḥārithī al-Muslī (d. 157/773–74), of the Banū Musliyah b. ʿĀmir, was an officer in the ʿAbbāsid revolution who pursued Marwān to Egypt

Hārūn b. Sa'd al-'Ijlī[1032] at that time, so Abū Ja'far asked al-Rabī', "Woe to you, why this shout of Allāhu akbar?" "That is Ibn Abī al-Karrām," said al-Rabī', "who has come with the head of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh." Abū Ja'far said, "Allow him to enter along with ten of those who are with him." Al-Rabī' therefore gave me permission, and I set the head before the caliph on a shield. Abū Ja'far asked, "What members of his family were killed with him?" "No one," I said, "by God, not a man." "God be praised, so this is he?" exclaimed Abū Ja'far. He then lifted Muḥammad's head up to al-Rabī' and asked, "What did his associate who was here earlier tell us?" Al-Rabī' replied, "He suggested that a large number of them were killed." "No," I insisted, "by God, not a one."

According to 'Umar—'Alī b. Ismā'īl b. Ṣāliḥ b. Mītham: When Abū Ja'far was brought Muḥammad's head while in al-Kūfah, he ordered it to be carried about on a white plate. I saw it when it had become brown and spotted. That evening the caliph had it sent to the outlying provinces.

According to 'Umar—'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Ḥabīb of the people of Yanbu': When Abū Ja'far was brought the heads of the Banū [255]
Shujā' he said, "So this is what people come to! I searched for Muḥammad, but these men provided cover for him. They moved him from place to place and accompanied him in these moves. Then they fought with him, remaining steadfast until they were killed."

According to 'Umar: 'Īsā b. Ibrāhīm,[1033] Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab b. 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah b. Muṣ'ab, Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah and others quoted to me the poem of and, along with Shu'bah b. Kathīr al-Māzinī, killed him at Būṣīr. He died in Baghdad, and Abū Ja'far offered prayers over his corpse. Ṭabarī, III, 46, 49, 380; Kindī, Wulāh, 110; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 590; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 262, II, 160.

---

1032. Hārūn b. Sa'd al-'Ijlī was a Kūfan muḥaddith, faqīh, and poet who had earlier supported Zayd b. 'Alī's revolt. He died in hiding about 150/768. Ziriklī, A'lām, VIII, 60; Van Arendonk, Débuts, 309, 314 = Opkomst, 282, 287; GAS, I, 560; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 6, 7.

1033. Abū Nūḥ 'Īsā b. Ibrāhīm b. Nūḥ (d. 255/869) was the secretary of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān, an adopted son of the caliph al-Mu'taṣim, who served in several important capacities under his successor, al-Mutawakkil, and was murdered with him. Ṭabarī, III, 1462.

ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr[1034] who, elegizing Muḥammad, recited:

You weep for Mudillah,[1035] as they were hunted, lassoed by ʿĪsā,[1036] who aimed a shrewd hit at ʿUthmān.[1037]
Why not for the Mahdī, and the two sons of Muṣʿab, did you shed your tears, pouring them out, flowing like rain?
And for Ibrāhīm's loss when there parted from him
the throngs and [alone] he faced his opponents?
But your tears have flowed astray, and you arouse in me the torments of an emotion evoking sorrows.
By God, midwives have never delivered the like of them, keenest and loftiest in lineage and status.
First to rise up and first to speak, rejecting slander from the well-springs of justice.
There, were you to gouge out, without disfigurement, your eyes from anguish, you'd be publicly excused.
A calamity, by your life, if the like struck
Mayṭān,[1038] Mayṭān would be split open by it.

Ibn Muṣʿab said:

O my two friends, stop scolding and know that I am not in this more blameworthy than you.
Stop at the son [descendant] of the Prophet's tomb and offer greeting.
There's no harm in stopping and offering greeting [256] To a tomb that contains the best man of his time in rank and good temper and generous spirit.

1034. ʿĀʾid al-Kalb ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab (d. 184/800) served various posts under the caliphs al-Mahdī and al-Hādī and was governor of Medina and the Yemen for Hārūn al-Rashīd. His son, Abū ʿAbdallāh Muṣʿab al-Zubayrī, was a noted geneaologist of the Quraysh. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 618–19; Zambaur, Manuel, 25; GAS, I, 271–72, II, 647–48; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 138.

1035. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLI, gives this vocalization although the name has been previously vocalized at III, 185, as Mudallah in a reference to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan.

1036. I.e., ʿĪsā b. Khuḍayr.

1037. I.e., ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. al-Zubayr, the son of Abū Jaʿfar's former governor of Medina.

1038. Taking the reading in note l of the Leiden text, which is the name of a mountain in the vicinity of Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān V, 243–44.

A man who refuted with justice the injustice of our land and wiped out monstrous deeds and gave graciously.
He neither avoided the path's goal nor swerved from it; he did not open his mouth with vile speech.
Had fortune [good and bad] magnified anything between the Prophet's time and his, then you would be the one glorified in him.
Or allowed anyone to enjoy well-being before him,
the goal of it would be that he should be made safe.
They sacrificed in Ibrāhīm the finest victim, his days were severed as was he.
A hero who by himself plunged into their adversities, neither wavering, nor trembling,[1039] nor yielding Until the swords passed into him. Perhaps the swords were their deaths;[1040] perhaps.
A sacrifice were the Banū Ḥasan. Their sacred things have been laid bare among us, their plunder has been scattered.
In their homes their women weep, cooing like doves when doves trill.
They used killing them to seek favor and see it as an honor for themselves in the Imām's eyes and as an advantage.
By God, had the Prophet Muḥammad witnessed, [God's blessing on the Prophet and peace]
His ummah pointing spears at his son [descendant] until blood drips from their spearheads,
In truth, he would know for sure that they had squandered this kinship and made lawful what is forbidden.

According to ʿUmar—Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Ibrāhīm—Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan: One night I left our dwellings in Suwayqah[1041]—that was before Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's revolt—when suddenly I saw some women who looked as if they had come from our houses. I was concerned about them, so to see 1039. [Lā] riʿahan. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLI.

1040. Kānat ḥutūfahum al-suyūfu. Ibid.
1041. Suwayqah was an area in Medina where the family of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib lived. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 286–87.

where they were heading, I followed them as far as the outskirts of al-Ḥumayrā'[1042] toward al-Ghars.[1043] One of them then turned [257] to me and said:

Suwayqah, once occupied, is now ruined.
Now in the evening has desolation afflicted it.[1044]

I then realized that they were jinn[1045] so I went back.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: When ʿĪsā b. Mūsā killed Muḥammad he seized all the assets of the Ḥasanids, and Abū Jaʿfar subsequently declared this lawful.

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar:[1046] Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad[1047] met Abū Jaʿfar and said, "O Commander of the Faithful give me back my land grant, the spring of Abū Ziyād, so that I may eat from its palm boughs." "How dare you speak in such a manner!" retorted the caliph. "By God, I shall really give you a bad time." Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad replied, "Don't be too hasty with me. I have already reached sixty-three years of age, the age when my father and my grandfather and[1048] ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib died. May I thus be held accountable if I have ever caused you a moment's unease or, if I should outlive you, if I do so to the one who comes after you." So Abū Jaʿfar had sympathy for him and forgave him.

According to ʿUmar—Hishām b. Ibrāhīm b. Hishām b. Rāshid: Abū Jaʿfar did not return the spring of Abū Ziyād before his death, but eventually al-Mahdī gave it back to Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad's descendants.

According to ʿUmar—Hishām b. Ibrāhīm: When Muḥammad was killed, Abū Jaʿfar ordered a sea embargo against the people of Medina. Nothing was transported to them from the area of al-

---

1042. Al-Ḥumayrā' was a date-palm grove near Medina. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 306.

1043. Wādī al-Ghars lay between Maʿdin al-Naqrah and Fadak. "Ghars" was also the name of a spring in Medina whose water was blessed by the Prophet. He asked ʿAlī that his corpse be washed with it before burial. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 193.

1044. Laqad amsat ajadda bihā al-kharābu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. jadda.

1045. Sākinī al-arḍ. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. sakana.

1046. On this passage see Nagel, "Bericht," 257–58.

1047. I.e., Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq.

1048. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 603, offers the alternate reading "and my forefather, ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib," which would satisfy those traditions that place the death date of Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq's grandfather ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn well short of the age of sixty-three.

Jār[1049] until al-Mahdī became caliph and lifted the embargo, permitting transport.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. Ibrāhīm—his mother, Umm Salamah bt. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr, the wife of Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh: The sons of the Makhzūmī woman,[1050] i.e., ʿĪsā,[1051] Sulaymān[1052] and Idrīs,[1053] sons of ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan quarreled with the sons of [258]
Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan about ʿAbdallāh's legacy, saying, "Your father Muḥammad was killed and ʿAbdallāh had made him his heir."[1054] They took the dispute to al-Ḥasan b. Zayd[1055] who, in turn, wrote to the Commander of the Faithful, Abū Jaʿfar, about the matter. The caliph replied as follows: "When this letter of mine reaches you, make them the heirs of their grandfather. I return their assets to them in recognition of their relationship and to protect their kinship connection."

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: Among those of the Hāshimites who rebelled with Muḥammad were al-Ḥasan, Yazīd, and Ṣāliḥ, the sons of Muʿāwiyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib, and Ḥusayn and ʿĪsā, the sons of Zayd b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.[1056]

1049. Al-Jār was a town on the Red Sea, some fifty kilometers south of Yanbuʿ, that served as the supply port for Medina. EI^{2}, s.v. (A. Dietrich); Cornu, Répertoires, 74; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 92–94.

1050. ʿĀtikah bt. ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Ḥārith b. Khālid b. al-ʿĀṣī. The Banū Makhzūm were a prominent clan of Quraysh, some of whose female members became wives of Umayyad and ʿAbbāsid caliphs. EI^{2}, s.v. Makhzūm (M. Hinds); Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 433.

1051. One of the several half-brothers of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm; this is his only mention in Ṭabarī. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 396.

1052. Eponymous founder of the Maghribī Sulaymānid dynasty, he died during the revolt of Ṣāḥib Fakhkh al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī in 169/785–86. Ṭabarī, III, 559; Öhrnberg, Offspring of Fāṭima, 26; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 433.

1053. Known as al-Aṣghar (d. 175/791), Idrīs escaped the massacre following the defeat of his nephew Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, eventually settled in the area of Tlemcen, and founded the Idrīsid dynasty. Ṭabarī, III, 560–61; EI^{2}, s.v. Idrīs I (D. Eustache); Öhrnberg, Offspring of Fāṭima, 30; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 487–91; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, VIII, 318–19.

1054. Because there is no right of representation in Sunnī law, Muḥammad's sons would have had no de jure entitlement to their deceased father's inheritance from his father. Schacht, Islamic Law, 170.

1055. See note 410.

1056. Zayd b. ʿAlī, son the the fourth imām, Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, and eponymous founder of the Zaydiyyah (d. 121/739 or 122/740), staged an armed rebellion in al-Kūfah during the caliphate of Hishām b. Yazīd. While acknowledging the opin-

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: I heard that Abū Jaʿfar used to say, "Whoever would have believed that the sons of Zayd b. ʿAlī would join the uprising when we had killed their father's killer just as he killed Zayd b. ʿAlī, gibbeted him just as he did and consigned him to fire just as he consigned Zayd b. ʿAlī." Other rebels were Ḥamzah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, and ʿAlī and Zayd, the sons of Ḥasan b. Zayd b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

According to ʿĪsā: Abū Jaʿfar said to al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, "It's as if I could see your two sons standing beside Muḥammad with two swords, each wearing a long-sleeved tunic." "O Commander of the Faithful," replied al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, "I have bemoaned their unruliness to you before today." Abū Jaʿfar said, "Certainly, and this is what comes from that." Other rebels were al-Qāsim b. Isḥāq b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib and al-Murajjā ʿAlī b. Jaʿfar b. Isḥāq b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib.[1057]

According to ʿĪsā: Abū Jaʿfar said to Jaʿfar b. Isḥāq, "Who is this al-Murajjā? God do such and such to him!" Jaʿfar b. Isḥāq said, "O [259] Commander of the Faithful, that one is my son. By God, if you want me to sever relations with him, I shall certainly do so." Among those of the Banū ʿAbd Shams[1058] who rebelled was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ b. Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams.

According to ʿUmar—Abū ʿĀṣim al-Nabīl—ʿAbbād b. Kathīr:[1059] Ibn ʿAjlān[1060] joined Muḥammad's rebellion on a mule. When Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān was appointed governor of Medina, he put Ibn ʿAjlān in chains. I went to see Jaʿfar and asked, "How do you suppose the people of al-Baṣrah feel about the man who put al-Ḥasan[1061] in chains?" "By God, badly," he said.

---

ions of other historians, Ṭabarī, II, 1667–89, 1698–1716, places the events of his death in the year 121/738–39. EI[1], s.v. Zaid b. ʿAlī (R. Strothmann); Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 127–51.

1057. A descendant of the Prophet's cousin Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib.

1058. ʿAbd Shams was a clan of Quraysh. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 4, 8, II, 131; Guillaume, Life of Muhammad, 45, 58 = Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 68, 87.

1059. ʿAbbād b. Kathīr al-Thaqafī was a Meccan muḥaddith (although born in al-Baṣrah) who died about 170/786–87. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 613; Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 106; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 87–89.

1060. ʿAbū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. ʿAjlān. See note 926.

1061. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (d. 110/728), who has been dubbed "the patriarch of Muslim mysticism" (Schimmel, Mystical Dimensions, 30), was greatly admired

"Well," I replied, "Ibn ʿAjlān's situation here is like al-Ḥasan's there." Therefore Jaʿfar let Ibn ʿAjlān go. Muḥammad b. ʿAjlān was the mawlā of Fāṭimah bt. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAbd Shams.

According to ʿUmar—Saʿd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh: ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. ʿĀṣim[1062] took part in Muḥammad's uprising. After Muḥammad was killed, ʿUbaydallāh was brought before Abū Jaʿfar, and the caliph said to him, "You are one of those who joined Muḥammad's rebellion against me." "I had no choice," replied ʿUbaydallāh, "but that or disbelief (kufr) in what God sent down upon [our Prophet] Muḥammad." (ʿUmar regarded this tradition as conjectural.)

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Salamah b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar: ʿUbaydallāh had responded to Muḥammad's call to join his uprising but then died before he could do so. Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. Abī Qays b. ʿAbd Wudd b. Naṣr b. Mālik b. Ḥisl b. ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy rebelled with Muḥammad. Other partisans were ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Abī ʿAwn,[1063] the mawlā [260] of al-Azd, ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Miswar b. Makhrimah, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Muḥammad al-Darāwardī, ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAṭāʾ b. Yaʿqūb,[1064] the mawlā of the Banū Sibāʿ[1065] (Ibn Sibāʿ of Khuzāʿah was ally to the Banū Zuhrah), his sons Ibrāhīm and Isḥāq as well as Rabīʿah, Jaʿfar, ʿAbdallāh, ʿAṭāʾ, Yaʿqūb, ʿUthmān, and ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, [also] the sons of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAṭāʾ.

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab b. ʿUmārah b. Ḥamzah b. Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr—al-Zubayr b. Khubayb b. Thābit b.

---

for his ascetic piety and his rhetorical skill. Al-Dhahabī, Siyar, IV, 587, reports that all of al-Baṣrah prayed at his funeral. *EI*², s.v. (H. Ritter).

1062. Abū ʿUthmān ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar (d. 147/764), a descendant of the third caliph, was a noted muḥaddith and faqīh of Medina. GAS, I, 89; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 35; Van Arendonk, Débuts, 313 = Opkomst, 286; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 195.

1063. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was a trustworthy muḥaddith of Medina. According to Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 388, his devotion to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan aroused Abū Jaʿfar's suspicions. This prompted ʿAbd al-Wāḥid to go into hiding with Muḥammad b. Yaʿqūb b. ʿUtbah (who is mentioned as transmitting on his authority), where he died unexpectedly. Ṭabarī, III, 2456.

1064. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAṭāʾ, a muḥaddith and faqīh, went into hiding after Muḥammad's uprising but was eventually put to death during Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān's tenure as governor of Medina. Van Arendonk, Débuts, 313 = Opkomst, 286.

1065. Sibāʿ b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā was a clan of the Banū al-Ḥārithah. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 200, II, 512.

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr: I was in al-Murr in Baṭn Iḍam[1066] accompanied by my wife, Amīnah bt. Khuḍayr, when a man passed us ascending from Medina. She asked him, "How's Muḥammad doing?" "He's been killed," the man replied. She then asked, "How's Ibn Khuḍayr doing?" "He, too, has been killed," he answered. At this news she fell to the ground in prostration. When I asked whether she was prostrating herself because her brother was killed, she said, "Yes; why was he not put to flight or captured?"

According to ʿĪsā—his father: Abū Jaʿfar asked ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, "Who came to Muḥammad's assistance?" "The family of al-Zubayr," said ʿĪsā. When the caliph asked, "Who else?" ʿĪsā named ʿUmar's family. At this the caliph exclaimed, "By God, it certainly is for something other than his friendship for them or [their] love for him or his family!" Abū Jaʿfar used to say, "Were I to find 1,000 from al-Zubayr's family, all of them good except for one evildoer, I would kill the whole lot. But if I were to find 1,000 of ʿUmar's family, all of them evil except for one good man, I would forgive the whole lot."

According to ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab b. ʿUmārah b. Ḥamzah b. Muṣʿab—Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. al-Zubayr: When Muḥammad was killed, my father fled, as did [261] Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan.[1067] Abū Habbār al-Muzanī and I were with them. We first came to Mecca and then descended to al-Baṣrah, where we hired [mounts] from a man named Ḥakīm. Arriving at al-Baṣrah after the night was well advanced, we found the entrances closed off and sat nearby until daybreak. Then we entered and dismounted at the Mirbad.[1068] In the early morning hours we sent Ḥakīm to buy food for us. He had it brought by a black man wearing a leg iron.[1069] When the man carried the food in to us, Ḥakīm paid him his wage, but the black became angry 1066. Al-Murr is identified as a wādī in Baṭn Iḍam or as Baṭn Iḍam itself. "Iḍam" was the name of a wādī belonging to the Ashjaʿ and Juhaynah tribes and the name of a mountain between al-Yamāmah and Ḍariyyah. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 214, V, 106.

1067. See note 411.

1068. The Mirbad was a vast open area where caravans stopped and camels and other animals were traded. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 97–99; *EI*², s.v. (C. Pellat); Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 11–12.

1069. The account in Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 392, offers some variation: The black bearer is described as an insignificant porter, but there is no specific mention of leg irons. When asked his wage, he first set it at four dawāniq, which would have with us. We told Ḥakīm to increase the amount, but the fellow was still angry. At this point, we said to Ḥakīm, "Woe to you, double the amount for him." Ḥakīm refused, beginning to have some misgivings about us. He started to take a close look at our faces and then left. Before long cavalry surrounded our house. We asked the landlady why they had come, but she said, "Don't be concerned about them. They are looking for one of the Banū Sa'd[1070] named Numaylah b. Murrah[1071] who joined Ibrāhīm's rebellion." And, indeed, we only became concerned when the black man was brought into our presence with his head and face covered. When he was brought in the covering was removed, and he was asked, "Are these the ones?" "Yes," he said, "these are the ones. This one is Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh, this other is 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad, and this third is 'Uthmān's son. The fourth I recognize only as one of their associates." Together we were seized and brought before Muḥammad b. Sulaymān.[1072] Looking at us, he approached Mūsā and said, "May God not keep your line intact! Why have all of you left your land and come to me? If I release you, I will be opposing the Commander of the Faithful. Yet if I seize you, I am severing your lineage." Muḥammad b. Sulaymān then wrote to the Commander of the Faithful, while we were placed in irons.[1073] The caliph responded that we be transported to him. Accordingly, we were dispatched to him in the company of an army contingent. Upon arrival in al- Baṭīḥah,[1074] we found been about two-thirds of a dirham. Although this amount was then paid to him, he remained unsatisfied, so that his recompense was subsequently increased more than fourfold. Contented with this amount, he then left.

---

1070. The Banū Sa'd al-Fizr was a large component group of Tamīm. EI[1], s.v. Sa'd al-Fizr (F. Krenkow); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 59, 75, II, 497.

1071. When Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh took control of al-Baṣrah, he made Numaylah b. Murrah al-'Abshamī his administrator there. Ṭabarī, III, 301; Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 281; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-'arab, 215–16.

1072. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās was a cousin of Abū al-'Abbās and Abū Ja'far. He followed his father as governor of al-Baṣrah and held that position at the time of his death in 173/789–90, during the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd. He also governed al-Kūfah for a time. Ṭabarī, III, 607–8; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, III, 121–23; Zambaur, Manuel, 40, 43.

1073. Wa-ḥaddadnā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ḥadda; Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 606, offers the alternative reading bi-khabarinā, "with news of us."

1074. Al-Baṭīḥah is the marsh area created by the lower Tigris and Euphrates between al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. EI[2], s.v. (M. Streck and Saleh El-Ali); Cornu, Répertoires, 27; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 450–51.

another contingent awaiting us. We came by one army post to another all the way to Baghdad. Once there, we were brought before
